I. DEFINITION.

A creditors' bill has been defined to be a bill by which a creditor seeks to satisfy his debt out of some equitable estate of the debtor which is not liable to levy and sale under execution at law,[1] or out of some property which has been put beyond the reach of the ordinary process.[2]

II. WHEN MAINTAINABLE.

A. Generally — 1. When Remedy at Law. A cardinal rule of equity jurisprudence particularly applicable in this class of cases is that a court of equity will not aid a complainant where there is an adequate remedy at law.[3] Where the property sought to be subjected by a creditors' bill to the payment of the owner's debts can be reached by the process of courts of law the bill will not be

In their most comprehensive sense they are bills in equity by creditors to enforce payment of debts out of the property of debtors, under circumstances which impede or render impossible the collection of the debts by the ordinary process of execution. Remedy at law must be ineffectual.— The jurisdiction over a creditors' bill is only exercised when the remedy afforded at law is ineffectual to reach the debtor's property, or when the enforcement of the legal remedy is obstructed by some encumbrance or by a transfer which has been made to defeat the creditors' rights. Goddard v. Fishel-Schlichton Importing Co., 9 Colo. App. 306, 48 Pac. 279.

Where an attachment creditor obtained a judgment in a court of law, his right to have the property attached applied to the satisfaction of his debt is amply protected at law against junior execution liens, and a court of equity will not entertain a bill filed by such creditor to enforce his prior lien. Chittenden v. Rogers, 42 Ill. 95.

Under Indian Terr. Ann. St. (1899) § 2199, after execution directed to the county in which judgment was rendered, or to the county of the defendant's residence, returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, the plaintiff in an execution may institute an action by equitable proceedings in the court from which the execution issued or in the court of any county in which the defendant resides or is summoned for discovery of any money, chose in action, equitable or legal interest, and all other property which the defendant is entitled to, and for subjecting the same to the satisfaction of the judgment, and in such action persons indebted to the defendant or holding the money or property in which he has an interest, or holding the evidences or securities for the same, may be also made defendants. Daugherty v. Bogy, 3 Indian Terr. 197, 53 S. W. 542.

entertained.[4] It must appear that a court of law is incompetent to reach the property of defendant on execution, either by reason of its peculiar character or by inability to discover it.[5] Where, however, the remedy of a creditor at law is incomplete or inadequate, it is no bar to a resort to a court of equity.[6]

2. Exclusiveness of Proceedings Authorized by Statute. Statutes in many of the states now provide creditors with different methods of obtaining satisfaction of their judgments by way of proceedings supplemental to execution. Proceedings under these statutes have in some states been held to be exclusive and to preclude the resort to a creditors' bill in equity,[7] although in most states such proceedings have been held to be cumulative merely and not to take away the remedy by way of a creditors' bill.[8]

B. Exhausting Remedies at Law — 1. General Rule. A general rule established by the cases is that before a creditor seeking to subject his debtor's

Thus when proceedings supplementary to execution, as provided in Ida. Rev. St. tit. 2, c. 2, will not result in the application of the judgment debtor's property or money in the payment of the judgment a creditors' bill will lie in favor of the judgment creditor, since in such cases those proceedings are not adequate and cannot accomplish the purpose of a creditors' bill. Contra in Georgia.—Since the uniform procedure act of 1897, abolishing courts of equity and investing the superior courts with ju-the rule is based are: (1) That a judgment and execution returned unsatisfied are the best evidences of the debt; (2) that legal tribunals should adjudicate legal claims.[10] A creditor need not, however, enforce his claim against property of the debtor in another state before proceeding against the fraudulent grantees of his debtor to subject land in the county where his judgment was obtained to the payment of the judgment.[11] And it has been held that where it has been established by one of the parties to a creditors' bill by a judgment and return nulla bona of execution thereon that the debtor is insolvent, and that for that reason there is no adequate remedy at law, then all creditors, whether having judgments or not, should be allowed to come in by intervening petition.[12] So the exhaustion of the remedy at law against an indorser on an instrument merged into judgment, and who was not a party to the judgment proceedings, is not essential to the maintenance of an equitable action in the nature of a creditors' bill against the judgment debtors.[13] It has been held that where a creditor has security for his debt he must first exhaust such security in order to obtain relief by a creditors' risdiction of all causes legal and equitable, it is held that the rule requiring a creditor to first exhaust his remedies at law is no longer applicable and that a creditor might in one suit establish his claim and subject equitable interests of his debtor to its payment. De Lacy v. Hurst, 83 Ga. 223, 9 S. E. 1052. For the former rule see Stinson v. Williams, 35 Ga. 170; Pease v. Scranton, 11 Ga. 33; Field v. Jones, 10 Ga. 229; Stephens v. Beal, 4 Ga. 219; Thurmond v. Reese, 3 Ga. 449, 46 Am. Dec. 440; McGough v. Columbia Ins. Bank, 2 Ga. 151, 46 Am. Dec. 382.

Necessity of supplementary proceedings.— A creditors' bill to enforce a judgment lien against property claimed by the defendant under a judicial sale need not be preceded by proceedings supplemental to execution, as such summary process is applicable to the discovery of property subject to execution, concealed or withheld by the debtor, or others in collusion with him without pretense of substantial right, and not to cases where the attitude of the parties to the property in controversy is fully understood. Ryan v. Maxey, 14 Mont. 81, 35 Pac. 515.

Applications of rule.— General creditors of a society cannot file a bill to enjoin the foreclosing of a mortgage made by the society on the ground that it was unauthorized. Howell v. Cooper, 37 Barb. (N. Y.) 582. So where a judgment was obtained against three defendants and a new suit was brought on the judgment, but process therein was served on only one of the defendants in the judgment and execution against the joint property of all defendants and against the separate property of the one served with process, it is not sufficient to authorize a creditors' bill. The creditor had not exhausted all legal remedies. Recovery of a second judgment did not prevent the creditor from suing out execution on the first judgment. Howard v. Sheldon, 11 Paige (N. Y.) 558. And it has been held that judgment and execution returned nulla bona are necessary prerequisites to the filing of a creditors' bill, although the demand sought to be enforced be one for taxes and the collector has made a return that the defendant had no visible property on which the taxes could be levied. Durant v. Albany County, 26 Wend. (N. Y.) 66 [reversing 9 Paige 182].

What is a sufficient exhaustion of remedies at law.— Where a suit was instituted to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of land in New York by a debtor who resided in Connecticut and was insolvent and the plaintiff sued him on his debt in Connecticut, pending which suit he died, and the plaintiff sought to revive against the administrator, but the court directed the action to be discontinued and thereafter the probate court appointed commissioners in insolvency who settled and fixed plaintiff's claim on presentation, and the assets of the estate were found insufficient to pay preferred claims and costs, it was held that plaintiff had sufficiently exhausted his remedies at law. Bill filed by one creditor in behalf of all.— Where a court of equity has under a creditors' bill filed by a judgment creditor for the benefit of himself and all other creditors assumed charge of a debtor's property for distribution among creditors, a creditor who has no judgment can come in. bill in equity.[14] Where a judgment debtor is taken in custody under a capias ad satisfaciendum it is presumed to be a satisfaction of the judgment, and so long as the debtor remains in custody no creditors' bill can be brought against him by the plaintiff in the execution.[15] However, a creditor need not have the body of the debtor taken into custody, although the law permits it, where the plaintiff has had execution issued against the property of the debtor.[16]

2. Of Particular Requisites — a. Judgment — (i) Necessity For — (a) General Rule. One of the first requisites to the maintaining of a creditors' bill is that the creditor has established his claim or debt by a judgment at law. A general creditor with a mere legal demand cannot come into equity.[17] The fact that an action is pending at law which might result in judgment and execution does not alter the rule.[18] Nor can a defendant file a cross bill in the nature of a creditors' bill based on a general claim.[19] Where a judgment creditor files a bill in respect of a judgment as to which he is entitled to relief by reason of having complied with conditions precedent to relief in equity, he cannot join in his bill and obtain relief in respect of a claim not reduced to judgment.[20]

(B) Exceptions and Limitations of Rule — (1) WHERE DEBTOR DECEASED. A line of cases hold that where the debtor is dead a creditor may file a bill to reach equitable assets of the deceased debtor without having procured a judgment at law;[21] but other courts hold that a court of equity will not ordinarily take jurisdiction of proceedings to enforce a claim against a deceased debtor until it has been exhibited and allowed against his estate.[22] Some of them, however, make an exception to this doctrine where an estate of a decedent is insolvent.[23]

(2) WHERE DEBTOR INSOLVENT. The insolvency of the debtor will not relieve a creditor of the necessity of first having his claim established by judgment.[24] In several of the states, however, it is held that the procuring of a judgment and the issuance of execution thereon and its return unsatisfied is but one form of proof of the creditors' want of remedy at law, and that the insolvency of the debtor may be established by other means, and that where it is shown that judgment and execution would be fruitless and involve useless and unnecessary expense a creditor might maintain a creditors' bill to reach equitable interests of his debtor without first obtaining a judgment at law.[25] So it has been held that where the fund sought to be reached is beyond legal process, the debtor is insolvent, and the claim of the complainant is undisputed, a creditors' bill might be maintained, although no judgment was first had establishing the debt.[26]

Under statute in West Virginia courts of equity have power to enforce judgment liens against land of a judgment debtor at any thereon which will dispense with the necessity of their reducing their debts to judgment before proceeding by a bill in equity to subject assets of the partnership to the payment of their debts,[34] whether the firm be solvent or insolvent.[35] An inchoate or unperfected lien acquired under an attachment has been held not to support a creditors' bill.[36]

(7) BILL TO SET ASIDE FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE. In the absence of statute providing otherwise, a judgment at law is a prerequisite to a bill brought by a creditor to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of the debtor's property.[37] In many jurisdictions, however, this rule has been expressly abrogated by statute, and it is no longer necessary to obtain a judgment before bringing a bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of the debtor's property.[38] Statutes of this charactime without reference to whether the judgment might be made by process of execution or not. Marling v. Robrecht, 13 W. Va. 440; Pecks v. Chambers, 8 W. Va. 210.

North Carolina.— Dawson Bank v. Harris, 84 N. C. 206; Carr v. Fearington, 63 N. C. 560. In two recent North Carolina decisions (Hancock v. Wooten, 107 N. C. 9, 12 S. E. 199, 11 L. R. A. 466; Dawson Bank v. Harris, 84 N. C. 206) it was held that a complaint for two causes of action — one to establish a debt and another to set aside fraudulent conveyances would lie, and that no judgment at law was necessary to authorize its maintenance. These decisions make no reference to the statute expressly authorizing this procedure in case of fraudulent conveyances, but seem to be based on the ground that under the code the court has power to administer both equitable and legal relief, and that therefore all relief should be given in one action. For former rule holding judgment necessary see Clark v. Banner, 21 N. C. 608; Donaldson v. State Bank, 16 N. C. 103, 18 Am. Dec. 577.

ter have no application, however, where the thing complained of has not been executed but rests merely in contemplation or intention;[39] nor to a case where the debt has not matured.[40] So it has been held that these statutes are not operative where the bill is filed in a federal court,[41] since such legislation cannot affect the jurisdiction of the federal court.[42] So it has been held that these statutes are not intended to change the established mode of settling the estate of a deceased person, and that accordingly a creditor of such person cannot maintain a bill, to reach and apply, in payment of his debt, land fraudulently conveyed by such person in his lifetime.[43]

(8) In Case of Award. A party may maintain a creditors' bill in equity upon an award for a specific sum without first reducing the demand to judgment.[44]

(9) Other Exceptions. In Arkansas it has been held that a suit in equity to subject the debt of a third person to the extinguishment of the plaintiff's demand against his debtor is an equitable garnishment.[45]

In Louisiana, since the adoption of the code of practice, a judgment against the original debtor is no longer necessary to support an action of mortgage, even when the via executica is resorted to.[46]

Under the statutes of Massachusetts a debt need not be reduced to judgment in order to maintain a bill in equity to reach and apply to the payment of the debt property of the defendant which cannot be attached or taken on execution at law.[47] This remedy is not taken away or limited by the subsequent legislative grant to the court of general equity powers;[48] and the statutes have been held to apply even though the debt is secured by mortgage.[49] Nevertheless to authorize the maintenance of such a bill the debt must have matured,[50] and where it appears

(II) Character of Judgment—(A) Personal Judgment. It has been held that the judgment must be a personal one.[52]

(B) Decree in Equity. A money decree in equity answers the same purpose as a judgment at law.[53]

(C) Dormant Judgment. The judgment must be one still in force. A dormant judgment will not furnish sufficient basis for a creditors' bill.[54] But the fact that after filing his bill and before decree complainant's judgment at law became dormant will not preclude his maintaining his bill, nor is it necessary in such case for him to have his judgment revived and execution again issued thereon in order to entitle him to a decree.[55]

(D) Where Obtained. Ordinarily it is held that the judgment forming the basis for a creditors' bill must be one rendered in the jurisdiction where the bill is filed[56] or facts stated in the bill showing the impossibility of obtaining such a judgment.[57] A judgment rendered in one state is not sufficient to support a

(Mich.) 353, it was held that execution on the judgment must have been issued within a reasonable time before the filing of the bill, and that where the statute required special application after two years after the rendition of judgment to obtain the issuing of an execution, the plaintiff could not maintain a creditors' bill on a judgment nine years old without having made such application and had execution again issued and returned, although the judgment under the statute remained in force for ten years. But in Postlewait v. Howes, 3 Iowa 365, it was held that the fact that in order to get an execution on the judgment a scire facias must be obtained did not make the judgment dormant, where the statute made it a lien for ten years and the statute of limitations on judgments was twenty years, and for all practical purposes the judgment was still alive, and a creditor might maintain a bill on such judgment. In Dunton v. McCook, 93 Iowa 258, 61 N. W. 977, it was held that a creditor might maintain a bill, although the lien of the judgment had expired.

creditors' bill filed in another state.[58] So in some jurisdictions it is held that the judgment of a federal court cannot be made the basis of a decree in a state court,[59] even though such federal court be of the district in which the creditors' bill is filed,[60] such court being deemed a court of another jurisdiction. In several of the states, however, it has been held that judgments of federal courts within the state are domestic judgments and will support creditors' bills.[61] In the federal courts it has been held in some cases[62] and denied in others[63] that a judgment rendered in a court of another state than the one in which the bill is filed is an insufficient basis for a creditors' bill. It has also been held that the judgment of a federal court of one district will not support a creditors' bill filed in the federal court of another district.[64] But the federal courts will take jurisdiction of a creditors' bill founded on a judgment rendered in a state court within the district over which the jurisdiction of the federal court in which such bill is filed extends.[65]

Under the statutes of Michigan, in a suit in aid of execution, it is not necessary that the bill should show an execution returned unsatisfied. Wilson v. Addison, 127 Mich. 680, 87 N. W. 109; Vanderpool v. Notley, 71 Mich. 422, 39 N. W. 574.

Reason for rule.— The purpose of requiring the issue and return of an execution as a foundation for a creditors' bill is to make it appear that a court of law is incompetent to reach the property of the defendant; and, when such execution has been returned unsatisfied for some reason other than the officer's inability to find property on which to levy, such return will be insufficient as a foundation of a creditors' bill. Hughes v. Link Belt Machinery Co., 95 Ill. App. 323 [affirmed in 195 Ill. 413, 63 N. E. 186, 59 L. R. A. 673].

Inadequate legal remedy.— Where the debtor's property is so connected with equities or trusts, or involves a variety of interests so that adequate remedy at law cannot be had, a judgment creditor may bring a creditors' bill to reach such property before the issuance of execution. Piatt v. St. Clair, 6 Ohio 227.

A statute authorizing proceedings by "a judgment creditor" means a judgment creditor who has exhausted his legal remedies of execution on the judgment. Baxter v. Moses, 77 Me. 465, 1 Atl. 350, 52 Am. Rep. 783.

The execution must have been issued in conformity to the statutory requirements, and where such requirements are not complied with the failure to do so may be taken advantage of in proceedings on a creditors' bill based on such execution. Manning v. Merritt, Clarke (N. Y.) 98. But see Rider v. Mason, 4 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 351, holding that the regularity of the execution will not be considered on a creditors' bill, but that the party attacking it must move to set it aside in the court whence the execution issued.

although the complainant has filed suit on the judgment and recovered a new judgment in the same state[68] or in another state,[69] and it is no objection to a creditors' bill that an alias execution has been taken out on the judgment and not yet returned,[70] unless it appears that the sheriff has levied or can levy the execution on property sufficient to satisfy the judgment.[71] An assignee of a judgment need not take out a new execution prior to filing a creditors' bill founded on the judgment, where his assignor had caused execution to be issued which was returned nulla bona.[72]

(B) Where There Are Several Defendants. Where there are several defendants in the judgment complainant must show the issuance and return unsatisfied of execution against all the defendants,[73] unless one of the defendants is in the position of a surety toward the others,[74] and the bill is brought with his consent and for his benefit.[75]

(C) Where Debtor Is Insolvent. There is a diversity of opinion as to whether the insolvency of the debtor excuses the want of an execution. While some of the cases hold that it does not,[76] the view is also strongly maintained by many cases that the purpose of suing out execution and having it returned is to establish the insolvency of the debtor and the want of remedy at law, and that where the debtor is shown to be insolvent by other evidence, and that the issuance of execution would be a mere idle ceremony and of no practical utility, it may be dispensed with.[77]

Execution against joint property of firm. — In Produce Bank v. Morton, 67 N. Y. 199 [disapproving Produce Bank v. Morton, 40 N. Y. Super. (E) In Case of Fraudulent Conveyances or Obstructions — (1) IN GENERAL. There are two classes of cases where a creditor is permitted to come into equity for relief after he has obtained a judgment at law: The one class where his judgment or execution has given him a lien, but he is compelled to come into equity to have removed some obstruction or conveyance fraudulently or inequitably interposed which prevents or embarrasses a sale under execution;[79] the other class where he comes into equity to obtain satisfaction of his debt out of property of the debtor which cannot be reached at law. In the latter case, as already shown,[80] the relief depends on the creditor having exhausted his remedies at law by having execution issued and returned unsatisfied. In the former the creditor can come into equity to have the fraudulent obstruction removed as soon as he obtains a lien by judgment or execution,[81] and is not obliged to show

Contra.— In South Carolina the legal remedy must be exhausted by obtaining a return of nulla bona on the execution before a creditor can obtain a bill to set aside fraudulent conveyances of the debtor's property. Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C. 526; Verner v. Downs, 13 S. C. 449. These cases must be distinguished from State v. Foot, 27 S. C. 340, 3 S. E. 546, and Burch v. Brantley, 20 S. C. 503, where the court, while recognizing the correctness of the foregoing decisions, reached the peculiar conclusion that the complaint need not allege that the execution had been returned unsatisfied.

"The general principle, deducible from the authorities applicable to this case, is, that where property is subject to execution, and a creditor seeks to have a fraudulent conveyance or obstruction to a levy or sale removed, he may file bill as soon as he has obtained a specific lien upon the property, whether the lien be obtained by attachment, judgment, or the issuing of an execution. But if the property is not subject to levy or sale, or if the creditor has obtained no lien, he must show his remedy at law exhausted, by an actual return upon his execution that no goods or estate can be found, (which is pursuing his remedy at law to every available extent) before he can file a bill to reach the equitable property of the debtor." Tappan v. Evans, 11 N. H. 311, 327.

Basis on which court of equity acts.— A court of equity aids a creditor in case of fraudulent conveyance because, although it may be void at law and the property be sold on execution, yet the fraudulent obstruction has the effect to place a cloud on the title which may be derived through a sale of the property on execution and thus prevents a fair sale of the property and the obtaining of a full price therefor. Fleming v. Grafton, 54 Miss. 79; Partee v. Mathews, 53 Miss. 140; Pulliam v. Taylor, 50 Miss. 551; Carlisle v. Tindall, 49 Miss. 229; Vasser v. Henderson, 40 Miss. 519, 90 Am. Property held in trust.—According to some decisions, where the legal title to property in question has never been in the debtor but has been placed in another person who held it on a secret trust for the debtor, this property is not liable to levy and sale on execution, but can only be reached by a creditors' bill after issuance and return of execution nulla bona. Robinson v. Springfield Co., 21 Fla. 203; Maynard v. Hoskins, 9 Mich. 485. Other decisions hold that where the debtor has paid for land but taken title thereto in his wife's name, a creditor seeking to subject the land to the payment of his judgment need not first have a levy made on the land. Call v. Perkins, 65 Me. 439; Griffin v. Nitcher, 57 Me. 270; Des Brisay v. Hogan, 53 Me. 554; Corey v. Greene, 51 Me. 114; Brown v. Edmonds, 9 S. D. 273, 68 N. W. 734.

It is the settled practice in Virginia to entertain suits by judgment creditors for relief in equity when the debtor has, subsequent to judgment, conveyed his land in trust for the payment of debts, or on other trusts authorizing a sale of the land, and in such a case the court will decree a sale to satisfy the judgment. And in such a case the judgment creditor need not have had an elegit issued before coming into equity. Taylor v. Spindle, 2 Gratt. (Va.) 44.

83. See supra, II, B, 2, a, (I), (B), (7).

his debt out of the property of the debtor, the creditor, in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, must have a judgment establishing his debt,[84] and a lien on the property in question either by judgment or levy or be in a situation to perfect a lien thereon and subject it to sale upon the removal of the obstruction.[85] Such lien is usually acquired on real estate by judgment and on personalty by execution.[86]

(2) WHERE LIENS HAVE BEEN OBTAINED BY ATTACHMENT. In the courts of some states bills filed by attachment creditors to set aside fraudulent conveyances or to remove fraudulent encumbrances from property on which liens have been obtained by attachment are entertained.[87]

(F) In Proceedings to Reach Trust Property. Where the proceedings are to reach trust property held for the benefit of creditors of the defendant, execution need not be issued and returned nulla bona.[88]

(G) In Proceedings to Reach Equitable Interest in Land. In some jurisdictions to reach a debtor's equitable interest in land no execution is necessary, but a judgment will be sufficient.[89]

(H) AGAINST WHAT PROPERTY ISSUED. An execution directed against the personalty of the defendant merely is not sufficient. It must be one that might be levied on the real estate of the defendant.[90]

(III) Where Directed. Ordinarily the execution should be issued to the county of the debtor's residence.[91] This, however, has been held unnecessary where a debtor has no real or personal property in the county where he resides, liable to levy and sale on execution.[92] And it has been said that if the plaintiff knows that the defendant in the execution has property in a particular county execution should be sent there.[93]

(IV) Levy. A creditors' bill to subject equitable interests of a debtor to the payment of a judgment may be maintained without showing a levy of an execution on the property sought to be reached.[94]

(V) Return — (A) Necessity For — (1) In General. The issuance of execution on the creditor's judgment alone is insufficient; it must be returned[95] unsatisfied in whole or in part prior to the filing of the bill.[96]

The bill must allege that the debtor at the time the execution issued resided in the county where the judgment was recovered, or that the judgment had been docketed and execution issued to some other county where defendant resided, or must show that for some other cause the remedy at law has been exhausted by issuing the execution in the county where the judgment was recovered (Wheeler v. Heermans, 3 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 597); or show some legal excuse for not issuing execution to such county (Merchants', etc., Bank v. Griffith, 10 Paige (N. Y.) 519).

Where a creditor had a judgment and the debtor's land was encumbered by a prior judgment lien of record, but alleged in the bill to have been satisfied, it was held not necessary to show the issuance of execution to the county where the land lay, but sufficient to show execution returned unsatisfied in the county of the debtor's residence showing want of personal property. Return to court from which execution issued.— Under the New York statutes where judgment is recovered in the superior court or court of common pleas and docketed in another county a creditors' bill cannot be sustained upon return of the execution to the

(2) On Second Execution Issued. Where an execution was issued to the proper county and returned nulla bona, it is no defense to a creditors' bill founded thereon that an execution had been issued to another county and not returned.[97]

(B) Time of Making. A return of the execution on the return-day named therein is a good one,[98] and quite a number of authorities hold that the officer in charge of an execution may take the responsibility of making a return of the execution before the return-day therein named.[99] But the creditor may not file his bill before the return-day named in the execution, although the execution has been actually returned before that day.[1]

(C) Form and Requisites. The object of requiring the issuance and return unsatisfied of execution being to show that the complainant has no remedy at law, the return of the execution unsatisfied must be made in good faith and because the defendant has no property out of which to make it, and a return for any other reason will not be sufficient.[2] And the execution and its return must be broad enough to show that defendant has no real property as well as no personalty.[3] The return of an execution unsatisfied by direction of the plaintiff in the execution,[4] without any effort made by the officer to collect the execution or find property on which to levy it, is insufficient.[5] The fact that the plaintiff in the execution did not direct the sheriff to levy the execution on certain property which plaintiff knew of belonging to the defendant is held to be no defense.[6] A return of an execution against three defendants stating that they had no property out of which the execution could be collected, without particularly stating that neither of them had such property, is sufficient to show that the execution could not be made out of joint or separate property of the defendants.[7] A personal demand on the defendant in the execution for payment thereof, or of property out of which to make it, is not essential to the validity of the return.[8]

(D) Operation and Effect. The return by the officer of an execution nulla bona is prima facie and sufficient evidence that the defendant has no property subject to levy at that time, so as to authorize a creditors' bill based on the judgment on which the execution issued,[9] and dispenses with proof that the debtor is

An execution "returned not executed" is insufficient to form the basis for a creditors' bill. Richardson v. Gilbert, 21 Fla. 544.

4. Wharton v. Fitch, Walk. (Mich.) 143; Williams v. Hubbard, Walk. (Mich.) 28. See also Gauler v. Wohlers, 12 Ill. App. 594, holding that where it appeared that the sheriff had levied an execution on considerable personal property of a defendant and all that was shown in regard to it was a statement in the return that the property had been taken from him on replevin, and that under direction of the plaintiff's attorney he had returned the execution unsatisfied, and the sheriff did not say that he demanded any property from the defendant, the complainant should have shown that without any fault of the sheriff or himself or by some instrumentality of the defendant the property so levied on could not have been made available on the execution.

Wharton v. Fitch, Walk. (Mich.) 143.

But where the officer makes a demand of the defendant and is unable after effort to find property of defendant whereon to levy the execution, the fact that he returns the execution unsatisfied by direction from plaintiff does not invalidate the return, although the execution is returned before the return-day. Effect of second return.— Where an execution was returned nulla bona and another without property other than that which the creditor seeks to reach by his bill.[10] Such a return has been held to be conclusive evidence of the exhaustion of legal remedies and the necessity for resort to a court of equity, when it is good on its face and not made collusively,[11] and proof that the debtor had property on which the execution might have been levied will not prevent the creditor from maintaining his bill,[12] unless such property be brought within the jurisdiction of the court by cross bill.[13]

3. Exhausting Remedies at Law After Suit Brought. The exhaustion of remedies at law by judgment and the issuance of execution thereon and its return unsatisfied are essential to give jurisdiction to a court of equity to entertain a creditors' bill, and where such jurisdiction does not exist at the time of the filing of the bill because of the want of such judgment or execution, the defect cannot be cured by the subsequent recovery of a judgment or the issuance and return unsatisfied of execution thereon and the setting up of such facts in a supplemental bill.[14] So where a bill was properly filed on one judgment it has been held that the complainant could not bring in and obtain relief in respect of another judgment obtained since the filing of the original bill.[15]

36. In Arkansas it was held in one case that a creditors' bill would not lie to subject a debt due from a public corporation for work done for the corporation. Boone County v. Keck, 31 Ark. 387. But in another decision it was held that in a proceeding against the debtor alone when no injury could result to the public corporation thereby, a claim made against such corporation for work completed might be subjected to the payment of his debts by sale or compulsory assignment of the claim. Riggin v. Hillard, 56 Ark. 476, 20 S. W. 402, 35 Am. St. Rep. 113.

In Kentucky, although a creditor may not have a decree against the state for money due an insolvent debtor who is an officer of the state (Divine v. Harvie, 7 T. B. Mon. 439, 18 Am. Dec. 194), yet such decree may be rendered against a town or city corporation which may be sued for money actually due to a town or city officer for services at the filing of this bill (Speed v. Brown, 10 B. Mon. 108).

In Missouri it has been held that where a judgment has been obtained against a resident of the state who is employed in a municipal office, and execution issues and is returned nulla bona, neither by a suit against said officer and the city, nor by statutory garnishment, can the city be compelled to pay the salary due such officer to such judgment creditor. Geist v. St. Louis, 156 Mo. 643, 648, 57 S. W. 766, 79 Am. St. Rep. 545. On the other hand it has been held that "where a debtor has absconded so that judgment cannot be obtained against him, and has no property in the State subject to attachment, but has money in the city treasury belonging to him, it may be reached by bill in equity, in the first instance, without a previous judgdictions it is well settled that a creditor may obtain discovery and relief by a creditors' bill in respect to the salary of his debtor as a public officer.[37] In other jurisdictions a bill will not lie.[38]

5. Equities Between Husband and Wife. A debt due a husband by his wife may be reached by a creditors' bill,[39] but a debt due the wife before the marriage and never reduced to possession by the husband cannot be reached by a creditors' bill against the husband, as the wife's equity is superior to the equity of creditors;[40] nor can the marital property rights of the husband in an estate descended to the wife be so subjected before suitable provision is made by him for her maintenance.[41]

6. Funds In Custodia Legis. Money paid into court, in which money the debtor has an interest, although it is paid into court for his benefit, cannot be reached by a creditors' bill.[42] But money in court in the hands of a receiver may be reached at the suit of one who is a creditor of all the parties litigant.[43]

7. Interests in Insurance Policies. The interest of a debtor in a life-insurance policy may be reached by a creditors' bill,[44] whether such interest arises by the terms of the policy or by reason of premiums paid in fraud of creditors.[45]

8. Interests in Trust Estates. Ordinarily, a creditors' bill will lie to subject

ment at law, and without showing fraud or any other recognized ground of equitable jurisdiction; and the fact that cities are not liable under the statutory garnishment will not protect them from such proceeding in equity." Pendleton v. Perkins, 49 Mo. 565. Policy for benefit of debtor's wife.— The interest of a debtor in an insurance policy carried by him on his life for the benefit of his wife, by reason of payment of premiums in excess of five hundred dollars per annum, may be declared by a court of equity and impressed upon the contract in an action brought during the life of the husband, wherein the company issuing the policy and all of the parties interested therein are made parties. The nature and extent of the creditor's right and the manner and condition upon which it is to be continued and preserved may be adjudged, and the husband and wife may be enjoined from transferring the policy except in subordination of the rights of the creditor. Stokes v. Amerman, 121 N. Y. 337, 24 N. E. 819 [affirming 55 Hun 178, 8 N. Y. Suppl. 150]. The interest of a wife in a policy of insurance on the life of her husband payable to her in case she survives him, if not, then to his children, the premiums being paid by her husband, is not such a property right as may be reached by a creditors' bill against the wife upon the death of the husband, the wife the interest of a cestui que trust in a trust fund to the payment of his debts.[46] Some decisions apply this rule, although such interest was created by a third person for the benefit of the cestui que trust,[47] unless the donor's intention to withdraw the gift from the donee's creditors is expressed in or necessarily implied from the terms of the instrument creating the trust fund.[48] In some of the states, however, there are statutory provisions exempting the interest of a cestui que trust in a trust fund created by a third person for his benefit from seizure for his debts. These statutes have been construed to prevent the seizure of the income of such trust fund,[49] although by the terms of the trust the cestui que trust has power to require the trustee to pay over the whole or a part of the fund to him,[50] unless the interest is such an one as is alienable by the cestui que trust, in which case it may be reached.[51] But the surplus income above an amount sufficient for the proper support and maintenance of the cestui que trust, considering his habits and condition in life, can be subjected to the payment of his debts.[52]

9. Money. A creditors' bill will not lie to reach and compel a debtor to appropriate money that he has obtained by mortgage and which he has in his possession to the payment of his debt.[53]

10. Partnership Interests. The interest of a partner in a debt due a partnership may be subjected to the payment of judgments of creditors of the individual partner,[54] although such debt has been fraudulently released by the firm.[55] So the proceeds of a sale of partnership property of an insolvent firm may be reached by a creditors' bill against the partnership, although the proceeds have been divided among the partners.[56]

The interest of a debtor in letters patent may be reached by proper proceedings in equity and subjected to the payment of his debts;[57] not so, however, in the case of an unpatented invention.[58] Likewise royalties under contract may be reached by a creditors' bill.[59]

12. Pension Money and Annuities. Pension money, after it reaches the debtor, is not exempt, and land purchased therewith, the title to which is fraudulently taken in the name of the pensioner's wife, may be reached by a creditors' bill.[60] So too annuities may be subject to creditors' bills.[61]

17. Seats in Merchants' Exchanges. According to some decisions a seat in an exchange, which seat has a money value and is transferable subject to the purchaser procuring himself to be elected a member, is property subject to a creditors' bill.[68] Other decisions maintain the contrary view.[69]

18. Undivided Interests. An undivided interest is equally subject to a creditors' bill with one in severalty.[70]

IV. Persons By and Against Whom Relief May Be Obtained.

A. Persons by Whom Relief May Be Obtained. Under a statute authorizing a decree on foreclosure for any balance due complainant above the proceeds of the sale a decree that defendant is personally liable, and not requiring him to pay any deficiency after confirmation of the sale, does not render complainant a decree creditor, so as to enable him to maintain a creditors' bill against defendant.[71] Where a party has conveyed his property to a trustee to pay his debts, not specifying them, the trustee to avoid a multiplicity of suits may file a bill like a creditors' bill to ascertain all liens.[72] Where a purchaser under a void decree has upon disaffirmance of the sale been substituted to the rights of the creditor he may maintain a bill to enforce such right and, as incident to the relief sought, make his bill a creditors' bill.[73] The pendency of other creditors' bills against an obligor does not preclude the pledgee from maintaining an original bill to determine and enforce his interest against a future pledgee of the same property after it had been wrongfully taken from the first pledgee's possession instead of intervening under the other bills, although the second pledgee was a party to such other bills.[74] No change of the ownership or form of a debt affects the right to attack a fraudulent conveyance by the debtor.[75] Any one holding the demand of a creditor defrauded by a conveyance, no matter when the right of the holder accrued, may assert against the conveyance all the rights of him who held such claim when the fraudulent conveyance was made.[76] The assignee of a judgment may maintain a creditors' bill.[77] So a bill in which a creditors' bill is united with a bill to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of an assignment by the debtor may be filed by an assignee of the person who sued out the execution on which the bill is founded.[78] It is also held that the judgment creditor himself may maintain a creditors' suit, although he had assigned the judgment before commencing suit, where the assignee agreed that he might prosecute it.[79]

B. Persons Against Whom Relief May Be Obtained.[80] It has been held that a creditors' bill will lie against a non-resident debtor to subject lands within the state to the satisfaction of claims against him;[81] against a foreign corporation to reach the latter's patent owned by it for the purpose of having it applied to the payment of plaintiff's claim;[82] and against one in whose favor the judgment debtor has fraudulently confessed judgment and who has bought in the property at a sale on execution under such judgment to set aside the fraudulent judgment, execution, and sale, and to subject the property so sold to the satisfaction of complainant's claims.[83] A statute giving a right to proceed by a creditors' bill in case any corporation, not municipal, or any trader or any firm of traders who shall fail to pay their debts, applies to all corporations not municipal, as well as traders only.[84] A creditors' bill cannot be maintained against executors to reach property in custodia legis,[85] nor against one having funds of the debtor in his hands when he has a set-off upon a claim against the debtor to the full amount.[86] So it has been held that a bill against the debtor of the judgment debtor will not lie for satisfaction of the claim.[87]

V. PLEADING AND PRACTICE.

A. Jurisdiction.[88] Two or more creditors who have obtained judgments upon which executions have been returned nulla bona may join in a creditors' suit for the purpose of giving the court jurisdiction, where the aggregate of their debts exceeds the minimum jurisdictional amount, although their individual claims are less than such amount.[89] Where the property sought to be subjected is within the jurisdiction of the court, it is immaterial whether the defendants are resident within the jurisdiction.[90] A creditors' bill brought in the county where the judgment was rendered must be brought in the court out of which the execution issued, but when brought in another county may be brought in any court of general jurisdiction.[91] Where a federal court has acquired jurisdiction by reason of diversity of citizenship, such jurisdiction will not be ousted by the admission as co-complainant of a citizen of the state in which the district where the suit is instituted lies.[92]

B. Process. The judgment debtors must be made parties by service of proc-

Purchasers of property sought to be subjected, who purchase pendente lite, are not necessary parties. Shumate v. Crockett, 43 W. Va. 491, 27 S. E. 240.

A corporation and all its stock-holders are necessary parties defendant to a creditors' suit for the appointment of a receiver, for an accounting, and to enforce personal liability of stock-holders, and if the corporation cannot be brought in the suit must be dismissed. Elkhart Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Guaranty Loan Co., 87 Fed. 252, 30 C. C. A. 632.

A judgment creditor and his immediate assignee are necessary parties to a bill by a subsequent assignee. Cooper v. Gunn, 4 B. Mon. (Ky.) 594. But see Andrews v. Kibbee, 12 Mich. 94, 83 Am. Dec. 766, where it was held that where the judgment plaintiff had assigned the claim on which the judgment was rendered to secure a debt of an equal amount, the assignee was the proper party plaintiff in the creditors' bill, and that the assignor could not sue unless the bill contained an allegation that the assignee neglected or refused to sue under circumstances calculated to prejudice the rights of the assignor.

A mortgagee is not a necessary party to a bill to subject the equity of redemption to the payment of a judgment debt, but the better practice is to make him a party and fix the amount of the mortgage debt. Wessel v. Brown, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 685.

Persons claiming interest in property.— If the answer shows that persons not before the court claim the property in the debtor's possession which the creditor attempts to reach, such persons or their representatives must be made parties before a decree can be had. 2. PARTIES PLAINTIFF. A creditor may prosecute a suit for himself alone,[2] or for himself and all other creditors who may come in and join in the prosecution thereof,[3] provided the suit is in its nature one for the benefit of all creditors;[4] for otherwise other creditors are not entitled to share.[5] So it is necessary that all other creditors stand on the same footing and have judgment and execution returned unsatisfied where that is a prerequisite.[6] All creditors having demands cognizable in equity of equal standing upon a common fund or estate out of which they claim to be paid may unite in an action in behalf of all, and a complaint filed by one in behalf of all is not multifarious.[7] And it has been said

The judgment debtor is a necessary party defendant in an action to subject his equitable interests to the payment of a judgment,[9] even though he be a non-resident,[10] and where there are several judgment debtors, all of them are necessary parties defendant,[11] unless it is shown by the bill that the persons not made parties were mere sureties,[12] were not legally or morally liable to contribute toward the satisfaction of the debt,[13] or were insolvent[14] or out of the jurisdiction of the court.[15] And where the object of a creditors' bill is to set aside a conveyance made by one judgment debtor, another judgment debtor not a party to the conveyance is not a necessary party to the suit.[16] Judgment debtors are not necessary parties to suits to set aside obstructions in the way of satisfying executions.[17]

c. Parties to Conveyances Sought to Be Set Aside. Where a conveyance is sought to be set aside, all the parties to the conveyance are necessary parties to the suit.[19]

d. Assignees or Transferees. Where assignments of the property have been made by parties to the conveyance the assignees of such parties are necessary parties to the suit.[20] But where the bill seeks to set aside transfers to several parties and an accounting from the transferees, it is not necessary that the ultimate transferees be made parties, if no accounting is sought from them or any relief prayed against them.[21]

e. Trustees and Cestuis Que Trustent. In creditors' bills brought to subject equitable interests of debtors to the satisfaction of their debts, where the legal title to the property is held by trustees, such trustees are necessary parties defendant,[22] as are also all cestuis que trustent where their interests are sought to be affected,[23] particularly if the cestuis que trustent are limited in number.[24]

f. Guardian and Ward. D. Pleading and Defenses[26] — 1. The Bill — a. The Allegations — (I) In General. The bill must allege that plaintiff is a creditor of the defendant debtor.[27] It must show definitely that the complainants are creditors so as to inform the defendants when, in what manner, and by what contracts the indebtedness claimed arose.[28] If the debt is in judgment, the ownership of the judgment by plaintiff must be alleged, and it is not sufficient to allege an ownership of the execution issued on the judgment;[29] so the bill must state facts showing

A creditors' bill by the assignee of a judgment, alleging that the assignment was by deed, imports a sufficient consideration to support the assignment. Gleason v. Gage, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 121. To entitle the assignee of a judgment to maintain a creditors' bill, it need not be alleged that the assignment was in writing. Jones v. Smith, 92 Ala. 455, 9 So. 179.

What allegation of ownership sufficient.—

that relief cannot be had at law.[30] If the bill seeks to subject to the payment of a claim land transferred by the debtor, it must allege that the debtor was insolvent at the time he made the transfer or that the transfer tended to create insolvency.[31]

(II) As to Persons in Whose Behalf Brought. A creditors' bill need not state that it is in behalf of all the creditors,[32] although it shows that there are other creditors beside plaintiff.[33]

(III) Showing Valid Judgment. So the judgment must be pleaded with sufficient particularity to show a valid judgment.[34]

(IV) Exhaustion of Legal Remedies. The bill should allege the issuing of execution, time when returnable, and actual return of sheriff thereon,[35] and that the execution was returned nulla bona or satisfied in part only.[36] Where

Where it appeared that one of the judgments described in the bill was obtained in the name of one of the complainants for the use of a third party, but the bill alleged said judgment was the property of such complainant, it was held a sufficient averment to show that such complainant was the party in interest, and that the suit was properly brought in his name. 34. Carver v. Williams, 6 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 1084, 10 Am. L. Rec. 310, 6 Cinc. L. Bul. 672. Compare Kilham v. Western Bank, etc., Co., 30 Colo. 365, 70 Pac. 409, holding that in an action by a judgment creditor to subject lands standing in the name of the debtor's father to payment of the debt, the complaint was not objectionable for failure to allege jurisdictional facts necessary to the rendition of the judgment and sustaining the attachment in the original suit; such jurisdiction, in the absence of a plea denying it, being presumed.

Stay of judgment.— A petition to subject land to a lien need not allege that the judgment was not appealed or stayed, as this is merely a matter of defense. Aylord v. Kipp, 4 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 87, 1 Clev. L. Rep. 14.

35. Crawford v. Cook, 55 Ill. App. 351; Albright v. Herzog, 12 Ill. App. 557; Cassidy v. Meacham, 3 Paige (N. Y.) 311. If the statute makes the execution returnable at a fixed time the pleading need not show when returnable. Strange v. Longley, 3 Barb. Ch. (N. Y.) 650.

A bill of a judgment creditor to enforce a judgment obtained against a partnership, not showing in what county the place of business of such partnership was, or where the domicile or residence of any of the members was at any time, thus giving no information showing that execution was issued either to the county where the firm was seated or where any member resided, or not showing the time of the return of the execution, was held to be bad. All necessary data should be given to show a proper exhaustion of legal remedies. Preston v. Wilcox, 38 Mich. 578.

Right to amend.— Where a bill was held defective on demurrer for failure to allege the recovery of a judgment and the issuance of execution thereon and its return nulla bona, and thereafter the creditor suggested that he had such judgment and had had execution issued thereon and the same returned nulla bona, it was held that the defect in the bill could not be cured, since the right of complainant to file a bill was to be determined as of the time of filing the original bill. Where the law was changed subsequent to the obtaining of judgment and issue of execution thereon and return of such execution, the bill should show that the execution was returned under the old law. Satterlee v. True, 3 Edw. (N. Y.) 423.

the insolvency of a judgment debtor dispenses with the necessity of a return of an execution, an allegation that the judgment debtor is insolvent,[37] or that he has no property left subject to execution,[38] or any allegation equivalent thereto is sufficient.[39]

(v) Description of Property and Debtors Interested. The property sought to be reached by a creditors' bill should be described with certainty,[40] unless it is unknown to complainant, in which case he is not required to point out the property sought to be reached.[41] And the bill should allege particularly the interest of the debtor sought to be reached; it is not sufficient to state generally that the debtor has an interest in land or personal property subject to the payment of his debts.[42]

(vi) Absence of Collusion. It is sometimes required that the bill should state that it is not filed by collusion and that the defendant has property not subject to execution to the value of one hundred dollars.[43]

b. Prayer For Relief. Although the prayer for relief is defective, the complainant will be awarded such relief as is consistent with the case made by his complaint and within the issues,[44] even though the bill be taken pro con-

What allegation sufficient.— An allegation that the sheriff returned said writ of execution to this court, the said return stating in effect that the said sheriff had been unable to satisfy said writ of execution and was unable to find any property in Cook county on which to levy the writ, and he, said sheriff, therefore returned the same no property found and no part satisfied, as by said writ of execution and the return of the sheriff indorsed thereon as aforesaid now on file in the office of said superior court will more fully appear, and to which or to a copy whereof your orator prays leave to refer, is a sufficient allegation of the return of the writ nulla bona to give the court jurisdiction to entertain a creditors' bill. French v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 79 Ill. App. 110. Where the allegation in the bill relates to a joint judgment and states that the sheriff returned that M and S had no property, it was held a sufficient averment to show want of individual as well as joint property. Conant v. Sparks, 3 Edw. (N. Y.) 104.

What allegation insufficient.—It is not sufficient to allege an execution returned "no goods." The bill should show that defendant had no property real or personal subject to execution. State Bank v. Oliver, 1 Disn. (Ohio) 159, 12 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 548.

Under a prayer for general relief a sale of property not attached may be decreed, where fesso,[45] and although such relief is inconsistent with the specific relief prayed for in the bill.[46]

c. Verification. A bill which seeks discovery of legal assets belonging to the defendant is insufficient unless verified by oath;[47] but when discovery is merely incidental to the relief sought in matters of ordinary equitable cognizance, the bill need not be verified by oath.[48] Where verification is required it is sufficient for the complainant to swear to the obtaining of the judgment and return of the execution nulla bona on information of his attorney.[49] The verification may be by the attorney or his clerk who had charge of the collection of the debt, conducted the proceedings at law, and had personal knowledge of the facts stated in the bill.[50] Verification according to the affiant's best belief and recollection is insufficient.[51]

d. Amendments. A bill may be amended,[52] even though the bill as originally filed shows on its face that the remedy at law has not been exhausted.[53] And an amendment is not a departure because it adds as parties to the bill some who were not made parties in the original bill.[54]

e. Supplemental Bill. A supplemental bill cannot be filed where a cause of action did not exist at the time of the filing of the original bill, as where at that time an execution had not been issued and returned nulla bona,[55] or where the cause of action on which the original bill was filed subsequently abates, as where the judgment on which the original bill was founded is set aside pending the suit.[56] But where the bill is maintainable on some other ground, a creditor may file a supplemental bill setting up that he has obtained a judgment and had execution issued thereon and that such execution had been returned nulla bona since the filing of the original bill.[57] A supplemental bill may be filed to subject to the payment of a judgment obtained subsequently to the institution of the original bill, and upon which execution has been issued and been returned nulla bona, property acquired subsequently to the filing of the original bill as well as property sought to be reached by the original bill.[58]

f. Multifariousness. If the object of the bill is single and for the subjection of the debtor's property to the satisfaction of complainant's judgment, and the relief if granted must be the same as to any portion of such property, whether held by the debtor or in trust for him by another or by several, the bill is not

A bill will not lie against a debtor to discover the names and addresses of persons indebted to him, as in such case the debtor is a mere witness and his answer would not be evidence against any other person. Detroit Copper, etc., Rolling Mills v. Ledwidge, 162 Ill. 305, 44 N. E. 751 [affirming 58 Ill. App. 351].

Under the Alabama code a bill for discovery by a judgment creditor with execution returned nulla bona is sufficient, if after alleging judgment and return of execution it charges that the debtor has no visible means subject to legal process of value sufficient to without the jurisdiction of the court as of that within the jurisdiction.[65] But the defendant cannot be compelled to discover property to a later date than that of the filing of the bill, a supplemental bill being required to reach after-acquired property.[66] Where a bill seeking satisfaction of complainant's judgment out of property of the debtor fraudulently conveyed and concealed avers that the property fraudulently conveyed is not of sufficient value to pay plaintiff's judgment, it sufficiently appears that the discovery sought is necessary.[67] A defendant in a creditors' suit, from whom discovery is prayed in respect to his indebtedness to the judgment debtor, cannot object to the making of such discovery because the bill waives answer under oath.[68] Objection to entertaining a bill filed for discovery as a creditors' bill is not too late, although made after the report of the master, intention to treat it as a creditors' bill not being disclosed till after the answer and the taking of the testimony.[69]

2. ANSWER.[70] Where the bill alleges that the defendant has property, it is not sufficient for the answer to deny that he has, but the answer must disclose whether the defendant had any property at the time of the filing of the bill;[71] and where the defendant denies that he has property, except such as he claims is exempt from seizure for the payment of his debts, it must show the amount and value of such property so that the court may determine whether the same is exempt or not.[72] The facts stated in an answer to a bill for discovery will not conclude complainant from showing such facts to be otherwise than as stated.[73]

3. DEFENSES — a. Statute of Limitations[74] and Laches.[75] The defense of the statute of limitations may be set up by any party to the proceeding.[76] The right to file a creditors' bill does not accrue until the execution has been returned nulla bona, and the statute of limitations begins to run only from that time.[77] According to some decisions, although a creditors' bill is filed by one creditor for himself and all others who may come in and share the burden of the litigation, the statute runs against the demands of creditors, other than the plaintiff, until such time as they come in;[78] other decisions, however, do not seem to sustain this pay the judgment, but that he has property, or an interest in property, real or personal, money or effects, or choses in action, subject to the payment of such judgment; but that the kind and description of the property and how the same is held is kept concealed and hidden and is unknown to the complainant, and that discovery is necessary to enable the complainant to reach it and subject it to the satisfaction of his demand. 70. Interplea.— In a creditors' suit to enforce a judgment against land owned by defendant, an answer filed by one not a party to the action, setting up an oral agreement by defendant to convey the land to him in consideration of the payment of a certain judgment against the land, but praying for no relief, should be dismissed, as such answer is not a proper interplea. view.[79] Where the plaintiff is guilty of gross laches he will be precluded from maintaining a creditors' suit,[80] and equity will decline to interfere under a bill for discovery as under a bill for relief.[81]

b. Irregularities in Proceedings at Law Which Form the Basis of Creditors' Bill. The validity of the judgment upon which the creditors' bill is based cannot be questioned in the proceedings on the bill.[82] The fact that the execution was not issued and returned in conformity with statutory requirements cannot be taken advantage of in proceedings on the creditors' bill founded on such execution.[83]

Calculation of statutory period.— Where a creditor of an insolvent corporation files a bill for a receiver for a sale of the company's property, and that stock-holders be compelled to pay their unpaid subscriptions for the benefit of creditors, another creditor, subsequently making himself a party and proving his claim, is entitled by relation to the benefit of the suit as a party plaintiff from the beginning, and the time that elapses from the commencement of the suit to his becoming a party is not to be construed as a part of the time limited for the commencement of an action on his claim. Dunne v. Portland St. R. Co., 40 Oreg. 292, 65 Pac. 1052.

Claims filed subsequent to plea.—A plea of the statute of limitations has no effect on claims coming in subsequently thereto. Williams v. Banks, 11 Md. 198.

Upon motion for a receiver, if it does not distinctly appear from the bill that the judgment and execution at law were regular and there is reason to suspect that there was irregularity in either judgment or execution, the motion will be denied, with liberty to renew the same, after the defendant shall have had an opportunity to move the court

c. Want of Proper Parties. The want of proper parties should be raised by demurrer,[84] and if the demurrer is sustained the complainant should have leave to amend.[85]

d. Pendency of Proceedings Supplemental to Execution. The pendency of proceedings supplemental to execution is no bar to a creditors' bill to reach equitable assets of the debtor.[86]

e. Another Action Pending.[87] A pending creditors' bill, filed by claimant therein for himself and all other creditors who may join therein, is no bar, before decree rendered to another bill subsequently filed by a creditor of the same debtor who is not a party to the first proceedings;[88] nor is the appointment of a receiver in the first suit a bar.[89] But where several suits are pending, the court will order proceedings in all suits but one stayed and will require the parties to come in under the decree in that suit.[90]

f. Bankruptcy or Insolveney of Debtor. Where a creditors' bill is filed before the debtor is declared a bankrupt, his discharge in bankruptcy is no bar to the suit;[91] and a creditor who has taken out a capias ad satisfaciendum and caused the arrest of the debtor thereon may, although the debtor has applied for the benefit of the insolvent debtor's act, join other judgment creditors in a creditors' bill for the purpose of enlarging the fund for the payment of their claims and excluding a fraudulent creditor from any share.[92]

g. Assignment of Equitable Interest Before Suit. Where a creditor seeks to subject to the satisfaction of his debt an equitable interest of his debtor, the assignment of such interest before the filing of the bill bona fide and for a valuable consideration will bar the creditor.[93]

h. Subrogation.[94] Where a bank which is a party to a creditors' bill against a depositor pays the deposit to the latter it is subrogated to the rights of the depositor and may avail itself of any defense existing in her behalf.[95]

E. Practice — 1. Intervention — a. Who May Come in. Where funds of a debtor are in the hands of a court of equity a judgment creditor may file an intervening petition to have such funds applied to his judgment[96] and is not bound to resort to independent proceedings in equity.[97] A bill may be a creditors' bill without being brought for plaintiff and all other creditors who may join.[98] If the complainant fails so to sue, the court should afford all judgment creditors an opportunity to have their judgments audited before commissioners by directing publication to be made calling upon them to present their claims for audit.[99] In general creditors' bills judgment creditors other than the complainant may intervene for the protection of their rights,[1] although their judgments were obtained after the creditors' bill was filed.[2] But where there are several creditors' bills which have not been consolidated, complainants in one cannot on motion be permitted to intervene in the others to assail the decree.[3] The original creditor after decree cannot bring in any new or additional claim.[4] In some jurisdictions the rule is that simple contract creditors can intervene.[5]

b. Status of Parties Intervening. The creditors whose claims have been recognized or established in any of the modes pointed out by the decree become quasi-parties to the litigation,[6] and may resist the allowance of any claim of equal or greater dignity than their own,[7] and are entitled to notice of applications to be made in the cause.[8] Creditors who intervene are bound by the decree as if made parties and served with process.[9]

c. Pleadings by Interveners. Intervening petitions are not required to conform to the technical rules applicable to pleadings between the principal parties and need not name other parties or contain prayer for process.[10]

their claims in the time limited by the decree, they are not strictly holden to the time unless injustice would thereby be done to other parties.[12] A creditor coming in under a general order must present the particulars of his claim to the master.[13]

2. CONTROL OF SUIT. The general rule seems to be that a creditor who commences suit for himself and all other creditors who may join may discontinue the same without the consent of the other creditors before any decree is made.[14] So it has been held that one complainant can only dismiss the suit as to himself where there are several complainants or where other creditors have intervened,[15] and in at least one jurisdiction, it is held that the payment of complainant's debt after order of reference does not abate the suit, but some other creditor should be substituted.[16] It has also been held that where the complainant assigns his individual claim pending the action, the suit may be continued in his name on behalf of the other creditors, until such time as his assignee may be substituted for him.[17] Where the original complainant unduly delays the prosecution, the conduct of the cause may be committed by the court to some other creditor.[18] In a suit in aid of execution, a demurring defendant is not entitled to object to the joinder of other defendants necessary to secure a lien on sufficient property of the judgment debtor to satisfy the complainant's claim.[19]

3. INJUNCTION[20] IN AID OF CREDITORS' BILLS — a. In General. An injunction is often granted in aid of a creditors' bill.[21] An injunction should be granted where it is made to appear that the debtor will or is taking steps to place his property beyond the reach of his creditors;[22] and a decree may be granted enjoining a debtor from disposing of his property where the creditors' bill is taken pro confesso and that too although fraud is not alleged.[23] The doctrine that equity will not, upon the filing of a general creditors' bill, restrain a particular creditor who has obtained an absolute judgment against an administrator from proceeding against the latter and his sureties has no application to a case where such judgment creditor is the one to file the bill, thereby submitting his claim to the control and disposition of the court.[24] The fact that another action, whether prior or subsequent to the creditors' bill, is pending on behalf of all creditors who may come in constitutes no objection to the granting of an injunction.[25] If it is sought to enjoin the defendant from proceeding to obtain a discharge under the insolvent laws, special cause must be shown for the injunction.[26] The injunction should not be general, but should be directed to a specific debt or trust pointed out in the bill and proved by oath to exist.[27]

b. Operation and Effect. An injunction issued to persons not parties to the suit is inoperative as to them, except as notice.[28] An order restraining creditors from bringing suit and requiring them to prove their claims does not affect a decree of the same court establishing a claim in another cause which could have been proved under such order.[29] An order of injunction in a creditors' suit will not prevent a judgment creditor, not a party therein, from levying on the debtor's property that is subject to sale under execution before defendant's title is equitably divested by an order of sequestration or the appointment of a receiver.[30] The usual restraining order under a creditors' bill does not operate to prevent a particular creditor from establishing his claim by judgment, such judgment not to entitle him to preference over other creditors.[31] An injunction restraining the defendant in a creditors' suit from in any way disposing of or intermeddling with the debtor's property, whether in his possession or not, does not prevent him from taking care of and protecting from tort-feasors the property in his possession.[32]

c. Violation of Injunction. An injunction against a judgment creditor in a creditors' suit is violated by his applying money previously earned or in his possession at the time of the service of the injunction to the payment of other debts.[33] On the other hand after service of the ordinary injunction in a creditors' suit, the defendant is not guilty of contempt by proceeding to judgment in a suit previously commenced.[34] And where, before proceedings are instituted by a creditors' bill and injunction to reach a month's salary, defendant has procured a third person to advance the amount thereof to him and given a draft on his employer to pay it when due, the fact that he makes a necessary indorsement on the check for the amount of the salary after the issuance of the injunction is no violation thereof.[35]

d. Dissolution. The injunction should not be dissolved upon affidavit of the defendant that certain necessary preliminaries to the granting thereof charged in the bill to have been taken had in fact not been taken,[36] nor upon the denial of defendant in his answer that he has any property or choses in action or any interest in property,[37] or that he has not property to the amount sought to be recovered.[38] So an injunction should not be dissolved on a denial of the full equity of the bill, if there is good reason for retaining the property in the receiver's hands.[39] Failure of a creditor, who has obtained an order enjoining the debtor from collecting his debts and disposing of perishable property, to apply for the appointment of a receiver is ground to dissolve an injunction.[40] So an injunction against a corporation will be dissolved where one creditor cannot be injured thereby, and its continuance would defeat the plans of a reorganization of the corporation entered into by the creditors and would be inconsistent with previous orders in the case.[41]

4. Receivers[42] — a. Power to Appoint and Grounds For Appointment. It is a well-established practice to appoint a receiver of the defendant's property in aid of a creditors' bill.[43] Such appointment is discretionary with the court,[44] and is usually made as a matter of course where the property is in danger of waste.[45] Where at the time of filing a petition in aid of execution plaintiff had a right to sell for the purpose of paying a debt due him all the property described in his security deed, the court did not abuse its discretion in granting an injunction and appointing a receiver.[46]

b. Application, Notice, and Hearing. The appointment of a receiver may be made without notice of the application, where the equity of the bill is not denied,[47] but a copy of the bill should be served before moving for a receiver.[48] A receiver may be appointed even before it appears that there is any property of the debtor to be administered by him.[49] It is no objection to a motion for a receiver that the bill waives answer on oath,[50] or that a motion for leave to amend a creditors' bill is pending, provided the defect in the bill is not fatal or does not render the bill demurrable.[51] The appointment of a receiver may be opposed by showing that the judgments of the creditors were obtained by fraud.[52] When a receiver has once been appointed the death of the judgment debtor will not terminate the receivership.[53] The appointment of a receiver cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that the judgment, which was the basis of the appointment, was invalid,[54] nor on the ground that the creditor at whose instance the appointment was made had not first obtained judgment at law.[55]

c. Assignment and Delivery of Property to Receivers. The appointment of the receiver and the giving of a bond by him vests in him the personal estate of the debtor as of the date of the order, without execution of any transfer or assignment.[56] As respects the debtor's real property the rule is different. The court may duly enforce and protect the receiver's rights to property ordered into his custody, and where a receiver in a creditors' suit became entitled to the possession of personal property of the debtor and rents and profits of his real estate and the defendant neglected to make an assignment to the receiver, the court on a bill filed by the receiver will interfere to protect his rights as against sheriffs and others who have seized upon the property to prevent his obtaining possession thereof, but would not do so by summary process as against those not parties to the suit. conveyance by the debtor to the receiver is necessary, and such conveyance, the court appointing a receiver, has power to order.[57] So the appointment of a receiver will not per se vest a title in the receiver to the trust income of the debtor, although the income may have already accrued and be in the hands of the trustee.[58] Where the defendant in a creditors' bill admits that he has certain property but denies that he has any other, the order for the delivering of his property to the receiver must be general.[59] An assignment to a receiver does not pass a right of action in the debtor for an injury to property exempt from execution,[60] nor for a mere personal tort.[61] The assignment executed by the debtor should contain an exception of property exempt by law, notwithstanding the general order of reference,[62] and notwithstanding the fact that a fraudulent assignment of all the debtor's property has been set aside.[63]

d. Possession and Control of Property. The court will restrain any persons within its jurisdiction from taking steps which will prevent the receiver from getting the property of the debtor in his hands,[64] and a receiver appointed by a domestic court on a creditors' bill to enforce a domestic judgment may hold the debtor's assets against a domestic attaching creditor, although the bill was filed by a citizen of another state.[65] Where a debtor's tenants have attorned to the receiver they will not be permitted to question his rights as receiver by disturbing his possession.[66] The receiver holds the debtor's choses in action in preference to one who purchased the same of the debtor after notice of the filing of the bill.[67] The rents and profits of real estate of a debtor during the time allowed for redemption from sale go to the receiver immediately.[68] A sale by a sheriff under execution of land in the possession of the receiver and subject to the lien of a judgment does not disturb the receiver's possession.[69] If the receiver takes possession of goods apparently in the debtor's possession, but which are claimed by a third person, he will be ordered to restore them on the claimant's undertaking to hold them subject to the order of the court, to be made after title is settled.[70] Where a demurrer to a creditors' bill to reach property in the hands of a third person is sustained, the functions of a receiver appointed to collect and hold rents and profits cease inter partes, but his amenability to the court as an officer thereof continues and the fund itself is subject to the court's order.[71]

e. Actions by Receiver. Where a receiver of a debtor's property is appointed in a creditors' suit he may sue for the recovery of the debtor's property[72] without exhausting his legal remedies by judgment and execution;[73] and may file a bill in chancery[74] to collect money which he claims is held in trust for the debtor, although he may have a concurrent remedy at law.[75] He may pursue by suit in his own name funds of the debtor which have been fraudulently transferred,[76] even though the creditor by amending his bill might impeach the same fraudulent transaction,[77] and may maintain a suit for usurious premiums paid by the judgment debtor for whom he is receiver.[78] A receiver appointed in a creditors' suit in one state cannot maintain suit in another state to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of the debtor.[79]

5. Evidence[80] — a. Burden of Proof and Presumptions. Where not admitted by the answer the allegations of the bill of recovery of a judgment, issuance of execution, and return thereof nulla bona must be proved.[81] If any party interested denies the validity of a claim it must be proved.[82] If the bill seeks to charge an equitable asset on the ground of the debtor's insolvency, such insolvency must be proved.[83] So if it is sought to subject the land of non-residents to payment of a debt complainant must prove non-residence.[84] The burden of proof is on the creditor to show that assets which he seeks to subject to the payment of his claim are the property of the judgment debtor.[85] In an action by a creditor of a husband to subject land taken in the name of the wife, the burden is on her to show that she paid for the land with funds not furnished by the husband.[86] Where a bill is brought to reach property not subject to execution and defendant admits that the return of nulla bona is prima facie evidence of the fact, the burden is on him to show that he has property subject to execution.[87] Allegations required to be made by rule of court need not be proved.[88] Where an execution was returned on the day the complaint was sworn to and summons dated, the presumption is that it was returned before the commencement of the action.[89] In the absence of proof of the value of the assets of the debtor that could be reached by process at law, it appearing that there were such assets, it will be presumed that they were of sufficient value to satisfy complainant's debt.[90] Where a bill is brought to subject the land of non-residents to the payment of debts, the presumption from lapse of time must be rebutted.[91]

b. Weight and Sufficiency of Evidence. The mere filing of the bill furnishes no proof of the truth of its contents.[92] In order to prove the judgment it is not necessary to introduce the entire record of the case.[93] The previous issue and return of the execution is sufficiently proved by producing the execution with the sheriff's return and date of filing indorsed thereon and testimony of a witness that he had seen it on file in the clerk's office.[94] A judgment against the debtor is in the absence of fraud conclusive evidence between creditors in relation to the property of the debtor, of the indebtedness and the amount thereof.[95] Return of an execution unsatisfied and the appointment of a receiver are prima facie evidence of want of assets.[96] It is sufficient proof of insolvency to show that the debtor is a non-resident of the state and that a person who resides in his home town and has known him thirty years knew him to have a homestead, a cow and the equitable assets only which is sought to be reached by the creditors' bill.[97]

c. Variance. To authorize a recovery on a creditors' bill, the pleadings and proof must correspond;[98] but this doctrine will not be extended to prevent a recovery in case of an immaterial variance.[99]

Findings.— A finding that execution was duly issued out of the proper court directed cases.[3] Where on the trial no assets either legal or equitable are discovered, the bill should be dismissed.[4] It has been held that a bill will be dismissed without prejudice, where there is nothing on which the decree could operate if granted.[5]

b. Reference. The fact that defendant's answer on oath is waived is no objection to an order for his examination on oath before a master.[6] The order of reference should direct that complainant have leave to examine the defendant or any other person on oath before the master for any of the purposes of the reference, and to compel the production of such books and papers as the master may deem necessary.[7] A reference should not be made to a commission or master who is a creditor and a party to the suit.[8] A decree or order of reference suspends all other pending suits for the administration of the debtor's assets.[9]

c. Examination Before Master or Commissioner. The examination should proceed with reasonable diligence and the master cannot adjourn it indefinitely without defendant's consent.[10] As respects the extent and scope of the examination, it is erroneous to direct defendant to be examined in relation to any matters other than those charged in the bill, except where an examination is intended as a substitute for an answer in cases where the defendant has given a stipulation to that effect.[11] Although defendant has filed a full answer, he must reply to interrogatories in regard to his property.[12] A defendant's evidence may be properly received by the master in reference to the true value, quantity, and condition of the property,[13] and he should be given an opportunity to show payment or set-offs to which he may be entitled.[14] He cannot be examined as to the title of property assigned and delivered to the receiver and sold by him.[15] Where a debtor has once gone through an examination he cannot be compelled to submit to another.[16] A refusal to allow the judgment debtor to examine the witnesses produced renders their evidence inadmissible against him.[17] Where a bill is referred to a commissioner to ascertain the liens and their priorities, any creditor may present his claim and if it is allowed he has the right to have the same passed on by the court without formal pleadings.[18] Upon a hearing before a commissioner the creditors may appear and contest each other's claims.[19]

The rule which requires a dismissal of the whole bill if any one or more of several co-complainants fails to make out his or their case is not applied with stringency to creditors' suits, and unless a misjoinder of such complainants will affect the propriety of the decree, the objection will not be allowed to prevail in any case when taken for the first time at the hearing. d. Report. On the filing of a report and after the usual time for excepting,[20] it may be submitted for ratification, and when ratified all parties are concluded thereby and the litigation is at an end.[21]

7. Abatement.[22] A creditors' suit in aid of an execution does not abate by the expiration of the time for returning the execution,[23] nor by plaintiff's death, if there is another creditor who will prosecute the suit.[24] But such a suit will abate on the death of the debtor, except where the execution has been levied, or the property taken in charge by the court,[25] and on the death of a defendant heir or devisee, although there are no surplus proceeds of sale to be returned to them.[26]

8. Judgment or Decree[27] — a. In General. The decree should settle all questions involved even to the adjustment of merely legal rights.[28] In an action commenced by a creditors' bill, it is not error to enter judgment for the full amount or value of the judgment debtors' property found to be in defendant's hands;[29] but the court has no power to decree to the creditor his specific portion of his debtor's property.[30] A decree may be rendered in favor of a receiver rather than the complainant, as it vests no title in him but keeps the property in the custody of the law.[31] A decree directing satisfaction of a judgment out of a sale of property to be discovered is not prejudicial to the defendant, as there can be no satisfaction of the judgment until something is discovered.[32] Where an audit is confirmed by a court of equity, the approved practice is also to pass an order to pay the claims which were thereby allowed; but the judgment of the court is effectually pronounced on a claim by confirming the auditor's report, if no steps are taken to revoke or overrule it.[33]

b. Decrees For Sale of Property — (i) Propriety and Necessity of Sale. No sale should be ordered, where there is an adequate legal remedy,[34] and before decreeing the sale the rents and profits of the land in the hands of the receiver should be accounted for and applied on the debts.[35] So under the statutes of one state the court has no power to order a sale of real estate, unless it be made to appear that the rents and profits therefrom for a period of five years will be insufficient to satisfy the claims;[36] but if this fact is shown the court will decree a sale.[37] So it has been held that a decree to rent land made in a creditors' pro-

What showing sufficient.— A decree of sale will be made where the bill charges that the rents and profits for a period of five years will be insufficient to satisfy a judgment and is taken pro confesso. Barr v. White, 30 Gratt. (Va.) 531. So if the bill alleges this fact and the answer says nothing on the subject and no application is made for an inquiry, a decree of sale may be made without inquiry. Ewart v. Saunders, 25 Gratt. (Va.) 203. It has also been held that where a master reported that the rents and profits will not pay the liens on the land in five years, and bases his opinion on the testimony of four witnesses, the average of whose estimates of the amount which a five-years' lease ceeding is no objection to a subsequent decree of sale in a suit to enforce a prior lien, the creditors to the former suit being parties.[38] Before making the decree it is not necessary to ascertain the value of the land.[39] If after a decree or sale is entered other liens are directed to be audited and reference made for that purpose, such order or audit and reference suspends a decree of sale.[40]

(II) Requisites of Decree of Sale— (A) In General. In decreeing a sale the court should ascertain and protect the rights of all the parties,[41] and also the rights of a tenant in possession under a lease executed before the judgment.[42] If a creditors' bill is filed in behalf of complainant only, and it does not appear that there are other creditors, the decree should direct a sale for the payment only of plaintiff's claim, and it is error to direct that the surplus of the sale be brought into court.[43] Where the bill and proceedings specify the land, a decree for the sale of the land in the bill and proceedings mentioned, or so much as may satisfy the purposes of the decree, is sufficiently certain.[44]

(B) Ascertainment of Amount of Liens and Priorities. A decree subjecting property to the satisfaction of a judgment and ordering a sale thereof must ascertain and state the precise amount for which it is liable,[45] and should also determine the priority of the liens.[46]

(C) As to Amount or Interest Sold. Where property in the hands of a receiver is more than sufficient to pay all debts he will be restrained from would realize being two hundred and forty-six dollars, and the debts amounting to two thousand five hundred dollars, a decree directing the sale is proper. Cooper v. Daugherty, 85 Va. 343, 7 S. E. 387.

Ineffectual attempt to rent.— Where a commissioner reports that the rents and profits for five years will be sufficient to satisfy the judgment, and an ineffectual attempt to rent in compliance with decree to that effect is made, but at a distance from the land and at a time of the year when it is very difficult to rent land, it is error to direct a sale. Mustain v. Pannill, 86 Va. 33, 9 S. E. 419.

In order to ascertain whether rents of land will pay the debts in five years, the decree should provide that the commissioner offer the same for rent, first for one year, then for two years, etc. Compton v. Tabor, 32 Gratt. (Va.) 121.

In West Virginia the rule was formerly the same as in Virginia, but the statute has been repealed and a court of equity may sell lands of a judgment debtor to pay his judgment debts whether the rents and profits of the lands of the debtor will pay the debt in five years or not. Pecks v. Chambers, 8 W. Va. 210; Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122. The present rule is that the court is not bound and ought not to decree such sale if the rents and profits of the land will satisfy the liens charged upon it in a reasonable time, unless consent to such sale is made. What is a reasonable time is a matter of discretion with the court, reviewable on appeal. Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122.

selling the whole.[47] So on a bill to subject contingent interests of a debtor in land to the claims of judgment creditors, if the debts are small, the debtor's interest should be protected by directing the commissioner to first offer for sale a fraction of the debtor's contingent interest in each lot.[48] It has also been held that on a bill against a debtor who has escaped, and the debtor' alienee, to subject lands devised to the debtor after his escape and conveyed by him while at large, equity will decree a sale of so much of the land as is liable to an elegit lien, if it appear that the profits are insufficient to keep down the interest of the debt, but will not decree a sale of the whole of the lands.[49] If it does not appear with reasonable certainty that the land first liable will be sufficient to discharge the lien, the decree may direct a sale of all the land in the order in which it is liable until enough is realized to pay off the judgment and costs.[50] Where two decrees are rendered in favor of two creditors against a debtor on the same day subjecting his land, the whole of the land should be directed to be sold.[51] If the bill merely seeks to subject an equity of redemption to sale, the creditor is only entitled to a sale of the equity of redemption and not the entire property.[52]

tained by proof,[58] a decree of sale on a creditors' bill establishes the complainant's claim as legal and valid,[59] unless it is otherwise declared in the decree,[60] and prevents the running of the statute of limitations against a claim as a simple contract debt.[61] The claim is established as valid, not only as against the debtor, but as against all creditors coming in to claim distribution.[62]

(II) WHO ARE BOUND BY DECREE. All creditors coming in after the institution of a creditors' suit are bound by the decree.[63]

9. CLAIMS OF CREDITORS UNDER JUDGMENT OR DECREE. A creditors' bill inures to the benefit of all creditors who present and prove their claims, although not made formal parties to the bill;[64] but this does not enable them to question the rights of any other creditors after settlement on an issue between the proper parties; their rights remain undisturbed except in so far as a proportionate abatement is concerned by reason of the additional claim.[65] If the defendant is insolvent, the insolvent schedule or his voluntary admission is sufficient proof of the debt of a creditor who afterward comes in to participate in the fund.[66] If a creditor comes in under a decree and seeks to prove a claim not set up in the pleadings or proof of the cause, he must present particulars of the claim to the master supported by affidavit that the amount claimed is justly due, and that neither he nor any one for his use has received payment or security or satisfaction therefor.[67]

So where an order or decree for an accounting is made under which all creditors are authorized to come in, it operates as an interlocutory judgment in favor of each and every creditor of the fund whether he actually comes in or not, and if he fails to come in and prove his claim before the final decree for distribution, his claim will be barred. But if a creditor who files a bill to reach the real estate of his debtor fails to state that there are any other liens thereon and makes only the debtor a party defendant, although the court directs a commissioner to ascertain all liens and their priorities, the court cannot, upon the report of the commissioner that a prior deed of trust had been satisfied, decree that the debt secured by it had been paid and order its release. 69. Where a suit is brought in behalf of complainant and other creditors who may come in, and a receiver appointed to collect order of court sell equitable interests of a judgment debtor which have come into his possession.[70] Where the plaintiff in a creditors' suit is successful, a sale of the property may be directed to be made by the sheriff.[71] A sale ordered by the court in a creditors' suit is not vitiated by the fact that the creditor instituting the same parted with his interest during the progress of his suit.[72] So a sale entered under a valid judgment before appointment of a receiver is valid, although made after the receiver is appointed.[73] An order confirming a commissioner's sale in a creditors' suit will be reversed where there is great inadequacy in the price received,[74] and where one who bids at a sale is unable to comply with the terms of sale, and by parol it is agreed that another shall stand in his stead and the sale is confirmed, the confirmation may properly be set aside, as it is not enforceable in a court of equity.[75] A sale of a debtor's property for cash for the amount of complainant's claim absolves the debtor from further liability and precludes a recovery of interest after the day of the sale.[76] Where parties to a creditors' bill unwarrantably occasion a loss to the funds arising from the sale of property by pretended bids, the amounts otherwise due them on the general distribution will be mulcted by the court to protect other creditors from loss on account of their conduct.[77]

b. Distribution. Where land is sold in a creditors' suit, the taxes due from the debtor must be first satisfied from the proceeds.[78] So all expenses of the sale are to be first paid from the proceeds thereof, and the balance only ratably distributed among the creditors, who are in that way made to contribute in due proportion to defraying the expenses of the suit.[79] Where realty is reached by creditors' suit, the proceeds are to be distributed among the creditors in the same order as the personalty is distributed by the executor and administrator.[80] Where an attorney obtains a judgment in the capacity of executor, and is at the same time attorney for other parties in a suit against the same defendant, and a few days later obtains a judgment for them, the court in applying the proceeds of an equity of redemption will recognize no priority but make distribution pari passu.[81] Where a sale of land for an inadequate consideration is set aside, the grantee who has paid certain debts of the grantor is entitled to take the place of the creditors as to such debts and to share in the proceeds of the sale.[82]

11. Costs[83]— a. In General. If a defendant is charged as a trustee and denies the trust, and the court finds that the trust exists, the defendant is not entitled to the assets and apply them to the payment of the various creditors, he alone can enforce the judgment. Rigney v. Tallmadge, 19 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 16.

costs out of the fund but is liable personally for the costs.[84] Parties voluntarily coming into a creditors' suit before any costs have accrued except such as were necessary to the institution and preparation of the suit are liable for all costs,[85] and creditors who intervene and have their claims properly proved are entitled to have their necessary costs taxed against the fund sought to be subjected.[86] If the complainant fails to find property on his bill he is liable for costs.[87] So also is a creditor who with knowledge that a decree has been entered in one creditors' suit brings a separate suit.[88] A defendant debtor of the debtor who admits his liability and is willing to pay the debt is entitled to his costs out of the fund;[89] and so is a person who is made a party to a bill on account of a supposed interest in a fund sought to be reached if he promptly disclaims such interest.[90] So a person made a party to a creditors' bill filed to administer an insolvent estate, but who has no interest in the estate and can derive no benefit from its administration, and who promptly disclaims interest therein, is entitled to his costs.[91] The expenses of a receiver in caring for property are a charge upon it, although it belongs to a person other than the judgment debtor.[92]

b. Costs of Referenee. Upon a reference to determine the priorities of the creditors, costs of the parties in attending the reference will not be allowed out of the fund.[93] The fees of the referee are taxable as costs and payable out of the funds derived from the litigation before distribution.[94]

c. Attorney's Fees. A plaintiff in a general creditors' bill is entitled to have his attorney's fees taxed.[95] So a creditor who collects funds of a debtor for the joint benefit of himself and other creditors should be allowed reasonable compensation for the services of his attorney,[96] at least to the extent that they are beneficial.[97]

Liability of intervener for costs.— Where to a petition in the nature of a creditors' bill praying for the appointment of a receiver of the assets of a debtor, a corporation holding mortgages against the debtor was made a party plaintiff on its own application, it thereby recognized the necessity for the bill and ratified it. If the mortgages were sufficient to cover the whole of the assets and it should thus appear that there was no necessity for the appointment of a receiver, but the corporation instead of objecting to such appointment joins as plaintiff in the proceeding, it is chargeable with its proportion of expenses up to the time it became a party and a like proportion to the end of the litigation. 12. APPEAL. The principles of law governing appeals in civil cases generally obtain in creditors' suits.[98]

VI. STATUTORY ENACTMENT RELATING TO CREDITORS' BILLS.

In some of the states statutes have been enacted which materially enlarge the kinds of property of debtors that may be reached without resort to equitable proceedings, or which materially enlarge the chancery jurisdiction.[99]

VII. LIENS AND PRIORITIES.

A. In General. The principle is well established that where a creditor by his superior diligence discovers and uncovers property which could not be seized on execution at law, and properly files a creditors' bill to subject such property of the debtor to the satisfaction of his judgment, he acquires a lien on such property[1] and becomes entitled to the satisfaction of his judgment out of such propplainant was a member of an illegal combination prohibited by statute, but the defendant corporation was found insolvent, and the bill was sustained as to other creditors, an allowance to plaintiff's attorney of two hundred and fifty dollars for services rendered for all creditors was not inadequate when only a small portion of all the service performed, which was of a much greater value, was in the interest of such other creditors. American Handle Co. v. Standard Handle Co., (Tenn. Ch. App. 1900) 59 S. W. 709.

Where services not beneficial.— Where the majority of the creditors of an insolvent corporation which had made an assignment formed a scheme to organize a new corporation to preserve the assets, but before the completion of the plan plaintiffs as creditors filed a general creditors' bill to wind up the corporation and for distribution, and such suit neither disclosed new assets, nor had any beneficial effect on the assigned property, plaintiffs were not entitled to payment of counsel fees from the general fund arising from the sale of the assets. Parkhurst, etc., Co. v. Ætna Coal Co., (Tenn. Ch. App. 1899) 54 S. W. 58.

Amount in dispute for the purpose of determining the question of appellate jurisdiction is the amount of the judgment plaintiff seeks to enforce, although the fund sought to be reached is greater in amount. Payne v. Becker, 87 N. Y. 153; Seaver v. Bigelow, 5 Wall. (U. S.) 208, 18 L. ed. 595.

Conclusiveness of record.— A decree dismissing a creditors' bill will be affirmed, notwithstanding it is claimed that facts were admitted at the hearing authorizing a recovery where the record shows no such admissions. Beidler v. Douglas, 35 Ill. App. 124.

Finality of decree.— The fact that a creditors' bill has by consent been irregularly converted into a proceeding for a sale for the purpose of distribution among the persons entitled to the price of the land in litigation cannot be taken advantage of on appeal. Ware v. Richardson, 3 Md. 505, 56 Am. Dec. 762.

Remanding instead of dismissing.— The reviewing court may, in order to obviate an objection made for the first time on appeal that necessary parties were omitted, refuse to dismiss the bill and remand it so that it may be amended as to parties. Rountree v. Macay, 59 N. C. 87.

Remanding instead of reversing.— If the property sought to be subjected to a creditors' bill is adjudged not liable to attachment and the complainants appeal without establishing their debt or attempting to do so, the court on reversing the decree will remand the cause in order that the debt may be established. Bill filed in behalf of all creditors.— Where certain creditors of an insolvent corporation in order to procure the aid of its officers in obtaining judgments and satisfaction of their claims agreed with the company and with other creditors to file a creditors' bill for the benefit of all creditors, and under such agreement they are facilitated in obtaining judgments and return of execution nulla bona, and are thereby enabled to file their bill, such creditors will not be allowed priority over others having no judgments. Their diligence is the diligence of all other creditors as well. Talcott v. Grant Wire, etc., Co., 131 Ill. 248, 23 N. E. 422.

Bill filed for sole purpose of removing obstacle to execution.— A creditors' bill to reach equitable assets operates as an equitable levy and entitles the creditor filing the same to priority, except where the bill is merely filed for the purpose of removing an obstacle obtained prior to the time when the complaining creditor obtained his;[3] and to the fastening or preservation of such a lien no injunction[4] or attachment or levy on the property[5] is necessary. Nevertheless the filing of a general creditors' bill by plaintiff, after execution in favor of it against a firm had been returned nulla bona, does not entitle plaintiff to priority over previous executions where plaintiff's bill did not discover assets nor aver facts which had not been sought to be taken advantage of by other parties previous to the filing of the bill.[6] Where a judgment creditor resorts to equity to reach a supposed equitable interest of the judgment debtor in the proceeds of the sale of real estate and he seeks to reach an interest not of record, he is subject to prior assignments of such interest, although not disclosed by record.[7] It has also been held that where a later creditor files a bill and gets the first execution set aside, the next execution thereto, if levied before equity acquired jurisdiction, will be paid in its proper order;[8] also that a bill filed in aid of an execution outstanding in the hands of the sheriff does not create an equitable lien as against prior valid execution liens which have previously attached to the same property. In such cases the complainant must finally get his payment by virtue of his execution and can only get what his execution will in its due legal order bring him.[9]

B. Where Fund in Court. Where, however, a fund is in court no one judgment creditor can obtain any preference over others by first filing a bill.[10]

C. Where Fund Is a Trust Fund For All Creditors. Where the property or fund is recognized in equity as a trust fund for all creditors, no one creditor can by filing a bill to obtain satisfaction of his debt out of it obtain a preference of payment out of such fund over other creditors, but the fund is to be distributed pari passu among all creditors.[11] from the way of selling the debtor's property on execution at a fair price. Mathews v. Mobile Mut. Ins. Co., 75 Ala. 85.

Distribution pari passu.—Between plaintiffs in five suits begun at the same term of court to reach assets not subject to be reached by process at law, distribution of such assets should be made pari passu. Judson v. Walker, 155 Mo. 166, 55 S. W. 1083.

Where no new property discovered.—Where real estate which was included in a deed of assignment was offered for sale by the assignee without result and subsequently sold for taxes to a person to whom the purchase-money was paid by the debtor and who held the land for him, on proceedings by a creditors' bill by a judgment creditor setting aside the tax-sale, it was held that the creditor filing the bill was not entitled to a preference over other creditors, as he had shown no superior diligence and no new property had been discovered. Reis v. Ravens, 68 Ill. App. 53.

Under the New York code declaring conveyances to one, where the consideration is paid by another, presumptively fraudulent as against creditors of the person paying the consideration and that where a fraudulent intent is not disproved a trust shall result in favor of all such creditors, all creditors are not entitled to share in the property without regard to proceedings taken; nor does the creditor have priority who first has judgment against such debtor and execution unsatisfied, but he has priority who first acquires a lien by suit in the nature of a creditors' suit. D. Where Bill Brought in Behalf of Creditors. Where a bill is brought by a creditor on behalf of all other creditors who may come in, the property will be administered so as to be distributed proportionately among all the creditors who may come in,[12] without, however, displacing the legal lien of any creditor.[13]

G. To What Property Lien Attaches. The lien of a creditor obtained by the filing of the bill attaches only to property of the debtor owned at the time of the commencement of the suit.[21] It does not attach to property of the debtor which is subject to execution.[22] And it is in all cases subject to prior legal or equitable liens or equities of others on the property.[23]

H. Duration of Lien. The lien thus acquired is not lost by the expiration of the lien of the judgment on which the bill is based,[24] nor by laches in the prosecution of the bill.[25] It is not affected by any subsequent transfer or assignment made by the debtor.[26] The lien is not disturbed by the bankruptcy of the debtor,[27] nor by his death.[28] constitute the different 'sects.' Each sect has a particular name, and that makes it a 'denomination.' A creed may have one article of belief, or many. What makes it a creed is the fact that it is the common belief of a sect,—not its length, or its brevity. It would be impossible to have a sect, or denomination, unless there were at least some one ground on which they agreed; and, so far as there was a common belief, just so far they would have a creed, or a covenant. And the case is not changed, whether the creed contains one article of faith, or thirty-nine."

I. DEFINITION.

Criminal law is that branch or division of law which defines crimes, treats of their nature, and provides for their punishment.[1]

II. NATURE AND ELEMENTS OF CRIME, AND DEFENSES.

A. In General — 1. DEFINITION. A crime is an act or omission which is prohibited by law as injurious to the public and punished by the state in a proceeding in its own name or in the name of the people or the sovereign.[2] In California,

1. Abbott L. Dict.; Black L. Dict.; Bouvier L. Dict.

"The term 'criminal,' when used in reference to judicial proceedings, is opposed to 'civil,' and in its most comprehensive meaning, may be regarded as including all cases for the violation of the penal law." Applegate v. Com., 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 12. See also Montee v. Com., 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 132, 142.

2. In re Bergin, 31 Wis. 383 [citing 1 Bishop Crim. L. § 32; 4 Bl. Comm. 5], where it was held that any wrong against the public, whether a felony or merely a misdemeanor, of which the law takes cognizance as injurious to the public, and punishes in what is called a criminal proceeding, prosecuted by the state in its own name, or in the name of the people or the sovereign, is a crime within the meaning of a constitutional prohibition against involuntary servitude except as a punishment for a crime. See also Patterson v. Natural Premium Mut. L. Ins. Co., 100 Wis. 118, 75 N. W. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 899, 42 L. R. A. 253.

Blackstone says: "A crime, or misdemeanor, is an act committed, or omitted, in violation of a public law, either forbidding or commanding it. This general definition comprehends both crimes and misdemeanors; which, properly speaking, are mere synonymous terms; though in common usage, the word 'crimes' is made to denote such offences as are of a deeper and more atrocious dye; while smaller faults and omissions of less consequence are comprised under the gentler name of 'misdemeanors' only." 4 Bl. Comm. 5. This definition has been followed and approved in a number of cases:

Connecticut.— State v. Bishop, 7 Conn. 181, 185.

Illinois.— Van Meter v. People, 60 Ill. 168, 170.

Michigan.— Slaughter v. People, 2 Dougl. 334, 335 note.

Minnesota.— State v. Sauer, 42 Minn. 258, 44 N. W. 115.

Missouri.—State v. Blitz, 171 Mo. 530, 540, 71 S. W. 1027.

Montana.— Helena v. Gray, 7 Mont. 486, 17 Pac. 564.

Ohio.— State v. Brazier, 37 Ohio St. 78.

Pennsylvania.— Lehigh County v. Schock, 113 Pa. St. 373, 7 Atl. 52.

Vermont.— State v. Peterson, 41 Vt. 504, 511.

Wisconsin.— In re Bergin, 31 Wis. 383.

"Crime" includes misdemeanors.—Although the word "crime" has sometimes been used to designate a gross violation of law as distinguished from a mere misdemeanor, in its broadest sense it applies to any violation of law which is punished by the state in a criminal prosecution, and therefore includes misdemeanors.

Illinois.— Van Meter v. People, 60 Ill. 168, holding that the term "crime" in a statute in reference to accessaries before the fact applied to misdemeanors.

Indiana.— Morton v. Skinner, 48 Ind. 123, holding that misdemeanors were included in the word "crime" in the provision of the constitution of the United States as to the surrender of fugitives from justice.

Michigan.— People v. Hanrahan, 75 Mich. 611, 42 N. W. 1124, 4 L. R. A. 751.

Minnesota.— State v. Sauer, 42 Minn. 258, 44 N. W. 115, holding that misdemeanors were included in the word "crime" in a statute allowing conviction of a crime to be proved to affect the credibility of a witness.

Nebraska.— Lord v. State, 17 Nebr. 526, 23 N. W. 507.

New York.— People v. French, 102 N. Y. 583, 7 N. E. 913, holding that a conviction in the police court of the offense of intoxication was a conviction of a "crime" within the meaning of a statute disqualifying a person convicted of a crime from serving on the police force.

Vermont.— State v. Peterson, 41 Vt. 504, holding that a misdemeanor was a crime within a constitutional provision relating to trial by jury.

Wisconsin.— In re Bergin, 31 Wis. 383, holding that a misdemeanor was a crime within a constitutional provision forbidding involuntary servitude except as a punishment for a crime.

See also EXTRADITION; INDICTMENTS AND INFORMATIONS; WITNESSES.

Petty offenses punishable summarily by a magistrate, such as disturbing public worship, are not included in the term "crime" in the New York code of criminal procedure. Steinert v. Sobey, 14 N. Y. App. Div. 505, 44 N. Y. Suppl. 146.

The "offense of intoxication," created by the New York excise law of 1857, as amended by N. Y. Laws (1869), c. 856, was held to be a "crime" within the meaning of the New York Consolidation Act (N. Y. Laws (1882), c. 410, § 268), providing that no person shall be appointed to membership in the police

Illinois, New York, and some of the other states the term "crime" is expressly defined by statute.[3]

2. DISTINCTION BETWEEN TORTS AND CRIMES. It has been said that the distinction between a tort and a crime is this: A tort or private wrong is "an infringement or privation of the civil rights which belong to individuals, considered merely as individuals,"[4] while a crime or public wrong is a "breach and violation of the public rights and duties, due to the whole community, considered as a community, in its social aggregate capacity."[5] An offense, however, which is punishable as a force or permitted to hold membership therein, or be appointed a patrolman, "who shall have been convicted of any crime." People v. French, 102 N. Y. 583, 587, 7 N. E. 913, where it was said: "It certainly has all the elements of a crime. Public intoxication is offensive to public decency, and dangerous to the good order and well-being of society. The officers charged with the arrest of other criminals are empowered to arrest persons guilty of this offense, and they are required to be tried as criminals and punished as criminals. Public intoxication is declared to be an offense, and, in the statutes, ordinarily the words 'offense' and 'crime' are synonymous. Various violations of the Excise Act are made crimes punishable as misdemeanors, and yet in the act they are called offenses."

"High crimes and misdemeanors."— Under a statute which gives the court jurisdiction of "high crimes and misdemeanors," it has been held that an offense to be cognizable by it must be allied and equal in guilt to the crimes which were felonies and capital at common law, such as murder, arson, rape, burglary, robbery, forgery, perjury, etc., and that a nuisance created on a highway by erecting an obstruction thereon is not within the statute. State v. Knapp, 6 Conn. 415, 417, 16 Am. Dec. 68 [quoting with approval 1 Russell Crimes 61, where it is said that "high crimes and misdemeanors are such immoral and unlawful acts as are nearly allied and equal in guilt to felony, yet owing to some technical circumstance, do not fall within the definition of felony"].

Violation of a valid municipal ordinance for which one may be prosecuted and punished is in most jurisdictions held to be a "crime." People v. Hanrahan, 75 Mich. 611, 620, 42 N. W. 1124, 4 L. R. A. 751. See also State v. West, 42 Minn. 147, 148, 43 N. W. 845, holding that violations of municipal ordinances, punishable by fine or imprisonment, are "criminal offenses" within the meaning of a constitutional provision that "no person shall be held to answer for a criminal offence unless on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except . . . in cases cognizable by justices of the peace." And see, generally, MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

3. See Cal. Pen. Code, § 15, declaring that a crime or public offense is an act committed or omitted in violation of a law forbidding or commanding it, and to which is annexed, upon conviction, either of the following punishments: First, death; second, imprisonment; third, fine; fourth, removal from office; or, fifth, disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit in this state. See also N. Y. Pen. Code, § 3. In Illinois it is declared by statute that "a criminal offense consists in a violation of a public law, in the commission of which there shall be a union or joint operation of act and intention, or criminal negligence." See Story v. People, 79 Ill. App. 562, 565.

4. 4 Bl. Comm. 5. See TORTS.

5. 4 Bl. Comm. 5. And see State v. Close, 35 Iowa 570; State v. Rankin, 3 S. C. 438, 16 Am. Rep. 737; Rex v. Higgins, 2 East 5, 6 Rev. Rep. 358. See also In re Yost, 14 York Leg. Rec. (Pa.) 25.

Injury to single individual generally no crime.— In State v. Schuerman, 52 Mo. 164, 165, it was charged that the defendant "did wilfully disturb the peace" of the prosecutrix, by using to her certain loud and abusive language. The court said: "There is neither assault, battery or affray charged in this complaint nor any other legal offense. The conduct of the defendant in using the language he did and in the manner indicated, was very immoral and reprehensible. It was not however such an offense as is denounced by the law as criminal and which would under our statute subject the offender to a criminal prosecution. He no doubt would be liable to a civil action for slander but I know of no statute rendering such conduct criminal. There is a statute against disturbing the peace of families or neighborhoods but none against disturbing the peace of a single individual by the use merely of loud and abusive language."

Private fraud.— At common law a mere private fraud, not injuriously affecting the public, is not a crime. In Rex v. Wheatly, 2 Burr. 1125, 1127, 1 W. Bl. 273, it was charged that defendant "falsely, fraudulently, and deceitfully, did sell and deliver" to the prosecuting witness sixteen gallons of malted liquor "for and as 18 gallons." Lord Mansfield said: "That the fact here charged should not be considered as an indictable offence, but left to a civil remedy by an action, is reasonable and right in the nature of the thing: because it is only an inconvenience and injury to a private person. . . . The offence that is indictable must be such a one as affects the public. As if a man uses false weights and measures, and sells by them to all or to many of his customers, or uses them in the general course of his dealing: so, if a man defrauds another, under false tokens. For these are deceptions that common care and prudence are not sufficient to crime may also cause special injury to individuals, and give rise to a civil action if they can show that the injury suffered by them is distinct from that suffered by the general public,[6] as in the case of an affray and assault and battery,[7] a nuisance,[8] and many other offenses. So the real distinction between a tort and a crime lies in the method in which the remedy for the wrong is pursued.[9]

3. MALA IN SE AND MALA PROHIBITA. Crimes have been divided according to their nature into crimes mala in se and crimes mala prohibita. The former class comprises those acts which are immoral or wrong in themselves, such as murder, rape, arson, burglary, and larceny, breach of the peace, forgery, and the like, while the latter class comprises those acts to which, in the absence of statute, no moral turpitude attaches, and which are crimes only because they have been prohibited by statute.[10]

4. TREASON, FELONIES, AND MISDEMEANORS — a. In General. At common law crimes were divided into treason, felonies, and misdemeanors, and this classification is still recognized, although the tests for distinguishing felonies and misdemeanors are no longer the same.[11]

b. Treason. High treason at common law consisted in compassing or imagining the death of the sovereign, levying war against him, adhering to his enemies, giving them aid and comfort, and certain other acts against the sovereign;[12] and petit treason consisted in the murder of a superior by an inferior, as of a husband by his wife, a master by his servant, or a lord or ordinary by an ecclesiastic.[13] In the United States treason consists only in levying war against the United States or the individual states, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.[14]

c. Felonies and Misdemeanors. The distinction between felonies and misdemeanors is very important. A felony at common law was any offense punishable by the forfeiture of either lands or goods, or both. Capital punishment was added when the crime was one of great enormity, such as murder, man-guard against. So, if there be a conspiracy to cheat: for ordinary care and caution is no guard against this. Those cases are much more than mere private injuries: they are public offences. But here, it is a mere private imposition or deception: no false weights or measures are used; no false tokens given; no conspiracy; only an imposition upon the person he was dealing with, in delivering him a less quantity instead of a greater; which the other carelessly accepted." See also Com. v. Warren, 6 Mass. 72; People v. Babcock, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 201, 5 Am. Dec. 256; Rex v. Lara, 2 East P. C. 819, 2 Leach C. C. 652, 6 T. R. 565. And see, generally, FALSE PRETENSES.

Private trespass and nuisance.— So there can be no indictment for a mere civil trespass not involving a breach of the public peace (Kilpatrick v. People, 5 Den. (N. Y.) 277; Rex v. Turner, 13 East 228); nor for a nuisance injuriously affecting only one individual (Com. v. Webb, 6 Rand. (Va.) 726). See NUISANCES; TRESPASS.

Damage to many without public injury.— There may be a case where, although many individuals are injured by the same act, no indictment will lie for a wrong to the public. Rex v. Richards, 8 T. R. 634, 5 Rev. Rep. 489.

7. See AFFRAY, 2 Cyc. 40; ASSAULT AND BATTERY, 3 Cyc. 1014.

8. See NUISANCES.

It is no objection that several suffer by the same injury.— Although "many persons receive a private injury by a public nuisance, every one shall have his action." Holt, C. J., in Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 938 [citing Williams' Case, 5 Coke 72*b*; Westbury v. Powell, Coke Litt. 50*a*]. See NUISANCES.

9. "An offense which is pursued at the discretion of the injured party or his representative is a civil injury. An offense which is pursued by the sovereign, or by the subordinate of the sovereign, is a crime." Austin Jurispr. § 17. See also 1 Bishop New Cr. L. § 230 et seq.; Cooley Torts 94, 95, 96. "An offence is regarded as strictly malum prohibitum only when, without the prohibition of a statute, the commission or omission of it would in a moral point of view be regarded as indifferent. The criminality of the act or omission consists not in the simple perpetration of the act, or the neglect to perform it, but in its being a violation of a positive law." Bouvier L. Dict.

slaughter, burglary, rape, larceny, robbery, and arson.[15] All crimes not amounting to felonies were misdemeanors.[16] Forfeiture for felony has been abolished both in England and in the United States, so that the term "felony" no longer has its original meaning; but in most states all crimes which were felonies at common law are still felonies,[17] and other crimes have been made felonies by statute.[18] In many states by statute all crimes which are punishable in the state prison or penitentiary, with or without hard labor, are felonies.[19] A crime is a felony

Derivation of term.— The word "felony" is said to be derived from the word "fee," which signifies the fief, feud, or beneficiary estate, and "lon," which signifies price or value, as being a crime punishable by the loss of the fee or feud which the feudal tenant held of his lord. 4 Bl. Comm. 95.

That a misdemeanor is a "crime" see supra, II, A, 1, note 2.

"Specially declared by law."— Where a statute (Wis. Rev. Stat. § 3294) provides that acts or omissions shall be deemed to be misdemeanors, within the meaning of the statute, when "specially declared by law" to be such, it is the statute law of the state, and not the common law, that is meant. See 14 Cent. Dig. tit. "Criminal Law," § 29 et seq.

When a statute substitutes imprisonment for life or a term of years as the punishment for a felony previously punished capitally, such felony is not thereby reduced to the grade of a misdemeanor. State v. Dewer, 65 N. C. 572.

Crimes not felonies.— In most of the states no crime is a felony unless it was so at common law or has been made so by statute.

Construction of statutes.— See Com. v. Barlow, 4 Mass. 439, where a court said that "in the construction of a penal statute, a misdemeanor could not be considered as made a felony, but by express words, or by necessary implication."

Accessaries.—If a statute punishing an act provides for the punishment of accessaries, it thereby makes the act a felony, for there can be accessaries in felonies only. Com. v. Barlow, 4 Mass. 439; Com. v. Macomber, 3 Mass. 254. See infra, V, A.

Use of the word "felonious" in a statute does not necessarily show an intention on the part of the legislature to make a misdemeanor a felony. Com. v. Barlow, 4 Mass. 439. And see Com. v. Newell, 7 Mass. 245.

In Michigan a statute (Comp. L. § 5954) providing that the term "felony," when used therein, or in any other statute, should mean an offense punishable by death, or by imprisonment in the state prison, was held to apply only to those provisions where neither the particular offense nor its grade was otherwise indicated than by the term "felony," and not to extend to those provisions of the statute which in defining the offense expressly designated it as a felony and made it punishable in the state prison, in which case no such general definition was required. Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 169.

A statute providing that "the term 'felony,' when used in any statute, shall be construed to mean an offense for which the offender, on conviction, shall be liable by law, to be punished by death or by imprisonment in a state prison,"•does not necessarily make an offense a felony, which before the statute was a mere misdemeanor, but establishes a rule of construction in all cases where the word "felony" is met with in a statute. constitutes both offenses,[23] and where the offenses are of different grades. 26. English statute.— By the statute of 1 Vict. c. 85, § 11, it became lawful upon an indictment for felony to convict of a misdemeanor. By that statute it was provided that on a trial for felony, where the crime charged should include an assault against the person, it should be lawful for the jury to acquit of the felony and find a verdict of guilty of assault against the person indicted if the evidence should warrant such finding.

American statutes.— In some states it is provided that "if, upon the trial of any person for a misdemeanor, the facts given in evidence amount in law to a felony, he shall not, by reason thereof, be entitled to an acquittal of such misdemeanor." People v. Arnold, 46 Mich. 268, 274, 9 N. W. 406, construing Mich. Comp. Laws, § 7919. It is also provided in effect in some states that on indictment for a felony the defendant may be

6. INFAMOUS CRIMES. An "infamous" crime is one which works infamy in the person who commits it.[27] At common law it was one which involved moral turpitude and which rendered the party convicted thereof incompetent as a witness.[28] The old test, which was the character of the crime rather than the nature of the punishment inflicted,[29] has been adopted to some extent in the United States.[30] The better modern view, however, is that the question is determined by the nature of the punishment, and not by the character of the crime, and that any crime is infamous that is punishable by death or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, in a state prison.[31]

7. Crimen Falsi. The term crimen falsi in the common law is applied to crimes which disqualify a person as a witness. The term involves the element of falsehood, and includes everything which has a tendency to injuriously affect the administration of justice by the introduction of falsehood and fraud.[32]

B. Power to Define and Punish Crime — 1. Power of State Legislatures. The legislatures of the different states have the inherent power to prohibit and punish any act as a crime, provided they do not violate the restrictions of the state and federal constitutions; and the courts cannot look further into the propriety of a penal statute than to ascertain whether the legislature had the power to enact it.[33]

2. Power of Congress. Unlike the state legislatures the United States congress has no inherent powers, but derives all its powers from the federal constitution.[34] Under the powers conferred by the constitution it may define and which the court is authorized to impose. Butler v. Wentworth, 84 Me. 25, 24 Atl. 456, 17 L. R. A. 764; In re Claasen, 140 U. S. 200, 11 S. Ct. 735, 35 L. ed. 409; Ex p. Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 5 S. Ct. 935, 29 L. ed. 89. And see supra, II, A, 4, c, note 20.

What offenses included.— The definition affords no accurate guide to the offenses that are comprehended within the meaning of this term as has been affirmatively decided. But it includes perjury, subornation, suppression by bribery, forgery of instruments, conspiracy to charge a person falsely with the crime of perjury, since all these are crimes immediately affecting the purity of all public justice. In re Ville de Varsovie, 2 Dods. 174. In the Roman law this term denoted the crime of falsifying, and might be committed either by writing, as by the forgery of a will or other instrument; by words, as by bearing false witness, or by perjury; and by acts, as by counterfeiting or adulterating the public money, dealing with false weights and measures, counterfeiting seals, and other fraudulent and deceitful practices. 3. Power of Territorial Legislatures. The powers of the territorial legislatures are derived from congress. By act of congress their power extends "to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States";[45] and this includes the power to define and punish crimes.[46]

4. Concurrent and Exclusive Jurisdiction — a. State and Federal Courts. The constitutional power of congress to enact legislation to define crimes and provide for their punishment implies the power to enact that such legislation shall be exclusive of the statutes of the states, and if it does so expressly or impliedly the states cannot punish such acts as offenses against the state.[47] Where this is not done, either expressly or by necessary implication, the statute of the state is not superseded by the federal statute, and the same act may be punished as an offense against the United States and also as an offense against the state.[48] These

An indictment by a grand jury of a state charging an offense over which the state and federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction, such as counterfeiting, properly charges the offense to have been committed against the people and sovereignty of the state, and not against the sovereignty of the people of the principles have been applied to embezzlement and larceny,[49] obtaining money or property under false pretenses,[50] bribery, and other offenses at elections,[51] perjury,[52] counterfeiting and forgery,[53] and other acts.[54] The legislatures of the states cannot legislate upon, nor can state courts assume jurisdiction of the trial and prosecution of, an offense against an act of congress, or of an action to recover a penalty for the violation of a penal law enacted by congress.[55]

Embezzlement or larceny by national bank officers or agents of the money or property of the bank, if punished, as is now the case, by an act of congress, cannot be punished by the states as offenses against the state. 52. It has been held that a state court has no jurisdiction of a prosecution for perjury in making a false oath before a clerk administering the oath under authority conferred upon him by the Homestead Act of congress (State v. Kirkpatrick, 32 Ark. 117); or in swearing falsely before the register of the United States land-office in a proceeding touching the public land (People v. Kelly, 38 Cal. 145, 99 Am. Ct. 584, 33 L. ed. 949). On the other hand it has been held that the state court may punish for perjury in taking a false oath in naturalization proceedings in a state court having jurisdiction of the proceedings under act of congress. Forged bank-notes, etc.—A state may punish the passing or attempting to pass a forged note purporting to be a note of one of the national banks. Jett v. Com., 18 Gratt. (Va.) 933. And it has been held that a state could punish the counterfeiting of notes, bills, or checks of the old Bank of the United States, or of passing such counterfeit bills or notes, or having possession of the same with intent to pass them. 54. Fugitive slaves.— It has been held by the supreme court of the United States that a state had power to punish the harboring, secreting, or in any way assisting a fugitive slave. Moore v. Illinois, 14 How. (U. S.) 13, 14 L. ed. 406 [affirming 5 Ill. 498].

b. State and Municipalities. Although the authorities are not wholly harmonious, the weight of authority is to the effect that the same act may constitute a crime both against the state and against a municipal corporation, and either may punish its commission without violating any constitutional provision.[56] Whether in any particular case the municipality has concurrent jurisdiction with the state over crimes depends wholly upon the powers conferred upon it in its charter or by general statute; and the power to punish crime concurrently with the state cannot be conferred upon it except in express terms or by clear implication.[57]

c. Territorial and Federal Courts. A territorial legislature may make an act a crime against the territorial government notwithstanding that congress has enacted that such act shall be a crime against the United States.[58]

C. How the Criminal Law Is Prescribed — 1. Prohibition by Law Is Essential. An act that is not prohibited and made punishable by law both at the time of its commission and at the time it is sought to punish therefor cannot be punished as a crime. A prohibition by the common law or by statute is essential.[59] And the prohibition must be by the laws of the state in which it is sought to punish.[60] The courts will not construe a penal statute so that a case which is apparently within the reason and mischief of it shall be punishable under it, although it is not specifically defined in the statute, merely because it is of the same character, or equally wicked with those which are included in the statute.[61] An act may be prohibited and made punishable either by the common law,[62] or by statute.[63]

2. APPLICATION AND OPERATION OF COMMON LAW — a. In General. The common law of England, as the term is here used, is that portion of the law which is based, not upon legislative enactment, but upon immemorial usage and the general consent of the people.[64] By the common law, all immoral acts tending to injure the community are offenses punishable by the courts.[65]

b. Adoption of Common Law. Crimes which were such at common law in England, aside from the numerous crimes which existed there by statute, are recognized and are punishable in many of the states, subject to the repeal or modification by statute of the common law and to the guaranties of the various state and federal constitutions.[66] In some of the states there are no common-law crimes, and nothing is punished as a crime unless it is declared a crime and made punishable by statute.[67] And there are no common-law crimes against the United States.[68]

c. Abrogation of Common Law. An express statutory repeal of the common law of crimes is rare.[69] But in all of the states the common law has been impliedly repealed to a greater or less extent. A criminal statute embracing the whole subject-matter implies an abrogation, and repeals the common law on that subject;[70]

60. See People v. Martin, 38 Misc. (N. Y.) 67, 70, 76 N. Y. Suppl. 953, where it was said: "A crime is essentially local, and is the creature of the law which defines or prohibits it. It is an offense against the sovereignty, and can be taken notice of and punished only by the sovereignty offended. The indictment against the defendants is in the name of The People of the State of New York. They prosecute for a crime committed against their law, not for a crime committed against the law of a foreign State. Their law is entitled 'The Penal Code of the State of New York' (Penal Code, § 1), and an act or omission forbidden by that law is declared to be a crime. Id. § 3. Therefore, if a crime has been committed against the People of the State of New York, it must have been an act or omission forbidden by their law."

and if the provisions of a criminal statute are so clearly repugnant to the rules of the common law as not to be reconcilable with them the common law is repealed by implication.[71] But a statute does not repeal the common law by implication, where they are not inconsistent and both can stand.[72]

d. Effect in Construction of Statutes. Where the legislature by statute adopts or creates an offense which was a crime at common law, it is proper to resort to the common law in order to ascertain the true meaning of the statute.[73] A statutory definition, when given, is to be followed, but where the statute prescribes a penalty without defining the offense the common-law definition of the crime is to be adopted.[74]

e. Reference to Common Law as to Procedure. Where a statute creating a crime does not prescribe a mode of proceeding to punish it, an indictment or other common-law remedy is proper;[75] and, subject to statutory and constitutional provisions, the whole proceeding must be conducted according to the course of the common law.[76]

3. Statutory Provisions — a. Creation and Definition of Crime in General. In the absence of provision to the contrary, a statute may punish an offense by giving it a name known to the common law, without further defining it, and the common-law definition will be applied.[77] In creating an offense which was not a crime at common law, a statute must of course be sufficiently certain to show what the legislature intended to prohibit and punish, otherwise it will be void for uncertainty.[78] But a penal statute is sufficiently certain, although it may use general terms, if the offense is so defined as to convey to a person of ordinary intelligence an adequate description of the evil intended to be prohibited.[79] It is sufficient if this intention is expressed in ordinary language without technical accuracy.[80] A statute need not use the word "unlawful" or "unlawfully" in defining an offense which it declares shall be a misdemeanor, as this is equivalent to declaring the act unlawful.[81] The providing by statute of a penalty of fine and imprisonment for the perpetration of an act is in itself sufficient, without other words, to render such an act unlawful.[82]

b. Necessity to Prescribe Penalty. It has been held in some of the cases that where an act is a crime solely by statute, and no penalty is prescribed in the statute, an indictment will be quashed, or judgment arrested.[83] Other courts

State v. Mann, 2 Oreg. 238, 241, where it was said: "It is a well settled rule of law that no one can be punished for doing an act, unless it clearly appears that the act sought to be punished comes clearly within both the spirit and letter of the law prohibiting it. The act constituting the offense should be clearly and specially described in the statute, and with sufficient certainty, at least, to enable the court to determine, from the words used in the statute, whether the act charged in the indictment comes within the prohibition of the law." Definition may be gathered from several statutes.— It is no objection that a statute denouncing an act as a crime and providing a punishment therefor refers to another statute for a fuller definition and explanation of the act. "Wilful" in title but not in body of act.— A statute cannot be construed independently of its title, and if the word "wilful" is used in the title the statute is not unconstitutional because the word does not appear in the body thereof. State v. Keasley, 50 La. Ann. 761, 23 So. 900.

Not necessary to declare the act a crime.— Where a statute makes an act unlawful, or imposes a punishment for its commission, such act becomes a crime, although the statute does not declare it a crime or fix its grade. In the former case it is a misdemeanor, in the latter a felony or a misdemeanor according to the nature of the punishment prescribed. State v. Pierce, 123 N. C. 745, 31 S. E. 847.

Statutes containing several sections.— It is not necessary that each section of a statute have held that where a statute prohibits any matter of public grievance or commands a matter of public convenience, although no penalty is prescribed for disobeying its prohibitions or commands, an indictment will be sustained and the offense punished by a fine.[84]

c. Gradation of Penalties. The gradation of penalties for offenses differing in their circumstances and surroundings is a matter wholly within the power and discretion of the legislature, which discretion, exercised within constitutional limits, is not subject to review by the courts.[85]

d. Repeal of Statutes — (i) What Constitutes. A statute may be repealed either expressly or by necessary implication. A statute is repealed by implication if a later statute is so repugnant to the earlier one that the two cannot stand together,[86] or if the whole subject of the earlier statute is covered by the later one having the same object, and which was clearly intended to prescribe the only rules applicable to the subject.[87] A repeal by implication, however, is not favored, and if by any reasonable construction the two can stand together in full force, or if the latter is merely affirmative or cumulative, or auxiliary and shall contain or disclose a penalty for its infraction, but each section may refer to the closing section of the act defining the crime, and the latter mode is applicable to all the antecedent sections. U. S. v. Crosby, 25 Fed. Cas. No. 14,893, 1 Hughes 448.

Penalty prescribed by other sections of same code.— A criminal statute is not void for uncertainty which prescribes as a punishment for the doing of a certain act the same punishment that is prescribed for doing another named act, when the same code defines the latter act and prescribes its punishment. Davis v. State, 51 Nebr. 301, 70 N. W. 984, construing Crim. Code, § 93, which provides that if one shall cause the death of another by displacing the fixtures of a railway he shall be guilty of murder either in the first or second degree, or of manslaughter.

(II) Effect of Repeal — (A) In General. If a penal statute is repealed without a saving clause, there can be no prosecution or punishment for a violation of it before the repeal.[91] If it is modified as to the penalty no judgment can be rendered exceeding the penalty left in force,[92] unless there is a statutory provision to the contrary.[93]

A saving of "prosecutions pending or offenses heretofore committed" saves a prosecution for a crime committed before the statute was passed, although the indictment was found subsequently (Sanders v. State, 77 Ind. 227), but does not apply where a prosecution has terminated in conviction, and judgment and sentence have been pronounced, but the time of execution postponed sine die (Aaron v. State, 40 Ala. 307), nor does it preserve the procedure of the statute repealed (Farmer v. People, 77 Ill. 322).

show a contrary intention on the part of the legislature.[6] The revival of the preëxisting statute, however, does not authorize prosecution for a violation of it after its repeal and before its revival.[7]

(F) Unconstitutional Repealing Statute. The unconstitutionality of a repealing statute renders it void, so that the general rule as to the effect of a repeal on pending prosecutions does not apply.[8] But it has been held that where the court has for a long time been divided as to the constitutionality of the repealing statute, and it is finally held unconstitutional, the statute repealed should not be held to have been in force, and the people exposed to its penalties prior to such adjudication.[9]

After the election of new judges, the law of 1855 was unanimously held void. In a prosecution for violation of the law of 1853, it was held that it would be unjust and wrong, under the circumstances, to hold that the law of 1853 had always been in force, and the people exposed to its penalties, and a judgment of conviction was reversed. Compare, however, People v. Tiphaine, 3 Park. In such instances the entire function of the court is to find out the intention of the legislature, and to enforce the law in absolute conformity to such intention. And in looking over the decided cases on the subject it will be found, that in the considered adjudications, this inquiry has been the judicial guide."

Whether an enactment is to be construed in this sense or with the qualification ordinarily imported into the construction of criminal statutes, that there must be a guilty mind, must, I think, depend upon the subject-matter of the enactment, and the various circumstances that may make the one construction or the other reasonable or unreasonable." motive is no defense where the act committed is a crime in contemplation of law;[18] and on the other hand a bad motive does not make an act a crime if it is not so in law.[19] While, however, motive is never an essential element in a crime it may throw light on the intent with which the act was committed,[20] and as a matter of evidence it is frequently an important element in the case of the prosecution.[21]

3. MALICE — a. In General. The term "malice," as used with respect to certain crimes, has a peculiar meaning, as in the case of arson,[22] murder,[23] malicious mischief,[24] etc. Even in this connection, however, the term is not used in its popular sense as denoting either general malignity or ill-will toward a particular individual.[25] In its broadest legal sense the term is synonymous with criminal intention and applies to the state of mind of a person who does a wrongful act intentionally or wilfully, and without legal justification or excuse.[26] The term

"malice" is more general in its signification than "wilfulness," but it implies wilfulness.[27]

b. Express and Implied Malice. Malice is either express or implied, express malice being where the party declares or manifests a positive intention to commit the crime, while implied malice is gathered, as an inference of law, from the facts and circumstances proved.[28]

4. WILFULNESS. The term "wilfulness" is vague in its meaning. "Wilful" is not necessarily used as a synonym of "voluntary."[29] It is sometimes held to be equivalent to "intentional" or "designed," and not to require a wrongful intention or malice,[30] but generally, when employed in a penal statute, it indicates a bad or corrupt purpose,[31] an evil intent without reasonable grounds to believe that the action is lawful.[32] It thus conveys the idea of legal malice in a greater or less degree.[33]

5. Wantonness. An act, to be criminal within the contemplation of certain statutes, must be wanton as well as wilful.[34] To make an act wanton it must be committed perversely, recklessly, and without excuse, without regard to the rights of others, with mischievous intent, and yet without settled malice.[35]

6. Specific Intent. There are certain crimes of which a specific intent to accomplish a particular purpose is an essential element, and for which there can be no conviction upon proof of mere general malice or criminal intent. In these cases it is necessary for the state to prove the specific intent by either direct or circumstantial evidence.[36] This is true for example of attempts to commit crime, where it is necessary to prove the specific intent to commit the crime intended,[37] aggravated assaults with intent to kill or to rape, where it is necessary to prove the intent to kill or rape,[38] larceny and robbery, where it is necessary to prove the specific intent to deprive the owner of his property in the goods,[39] burglary, where it is necessary to prove an intent to commit some felony,[40] arson, where it is necessary to prove an intent to burn,[41] of malicious mischief, where it is necessary to prove an intention to cause the injury,[42] etc.

7. Presumption of Intention — a. From Unlawful Act. A presumption of a criminal intention may arise from proof of the commission of an unlawful act. The general rule is that if it is proved that the accused committed the unlawful act charged it will be presumed that the act was done with a criminal intention, and it is for the accused to rebut this presumption.[43] This rule, however, does not apply in the case of crimes like burglary, assault with intent to kill, or rape, etc., for which a specific intent is necessary.[44] Here the burden is on the state to prove, by either direct or circumstantial evidence, that the act was done with the requisite specific intent.[45] But it is sufficient in such cases to prove facts from which the specific intent may be inferred.[46]

b. Natural Consequences. Another general rule of frequent application is that a sane man is presumed to intend the necessary or the natural and probable consequences of his voluntary acts.[47] In some cases this presumption is conclusive.[48] The presumption, however, does not extend to all possible consequences.[49] And it is not conclusive when a specific intent is the gist of the crime, as for example in the case of an assault with intent to kill,[50] attempt to commit a crime,[51] etc.

Use of deadly weapon.—As illustrating the text may be cited the presumption which the law indulges in homicide, where proof of the use of a deadly weapon is presumptive although not conclusive evidence of an intention to kill. For if a party does an act with a dangerous or deadly weapon, which from its nature and the manner in which it is done may naturally, probably, or reasonably produce death, or jeopardize life, the law attributes to such an act an intention to kill. Homicide.— Thus it is well settled that where a person strikes or shoots at another intending to kill him, and contrary to his intention kills a third person, he is guilty of the murder of the latter. See HOMICIDE. And one may be guilty of murder or manslaughter according to the circumstances if he unintentionally causes another's death in doing an

the other hand an offender is not excused because all the consequences of his crime did not ensue, or because his criminal act benefited the community to some extent.[53] It seems, however, that to render one liable criminally for unintended results the act intended must be malum in se as distinguished from malum prohibitum.[54] And this rule as to unintended consequences does not apply where a specific intent is necessary to constitute a particular crime.[55]

E. Defenses — 1. Ignorance or Mistake — a. Of Law. It is a well-settled principle that every one is presumed to know the law of the land, both common law and statutory, and that one's ignorance of the law furnishes no exemption from criminal responsibility for his acts.[56] It follows that it is no defense for the accused to show that he believed in good faith that the law which he violated was unconstitutional.[57] Nor will it avail the accused that he acted in good faith under the advice of counsel,[58] or that he is a foreigner and that the act with which he is charged is not a crime in his own country.[59] An exception to the general rule exists where a specific intent is essential to a crime, and ignorance of law negatives the existence of such intent, as where a person charged with larceny or robbery believed the property to be his own.[60] While ignorance of law is no defense, it is a matter which may be considered in mitigation of punishment.[61]

b. example where one kills another in his house, believing on reasonable grounds that he is a burglar,[63] where one kills an assailant in what he reasonably believes to be necessary self-defense,[64] where one takes another's property in the honest belief that it is his own,[65] where stolen goods are received by one who does not know that they have been stolen,[66] where one utters or has possession of forged paper or counterfeit coin in ignorance of its character,[67] where one votes illegally under a mistake of fact,[68] under some statutes where a person marries believing that his former wife is dead,[69] and in many other cases. (II) Exceptions to the Rule. To the general rule that ignorance or mistake of fact is a defense there are certain exceptions. As we shall see the rule does not necessarily apply to statutory offenses.[71] So also mistake of fact is not always an excuse if, considering the facts as they seemed to the accused, the intention was criminal,[72] if he was engaged in an immoral act,[73] or if he voluntarily closed his eyes to the truth or negligently failed to make inquiry.[74]

(III) STATUTORY OFFENSES. Where a statute punishes the doing under particular circumstances of an act which in the absence of such circumstances is lawful, one who does the act under bona fide and non-negligent ignorance or mistake as to the existence of such circumstances is not guilty, unless it appears that the legislature intended that persons doing the act should act at their peril.[75] As has been seen, however, the legislature may punish an act as a crime without regard to the intent of the party doing it,[76] and when such an intention on the part of the legislature appears, one who does the act cannot escape liability by showing ignorance or mistake of fact.[77] This principle has been applied to some

5. Entrapment. The fact that a detective or other person suspected that the defendant was about to commit a crime and prepared for his detection, as a result of which he was entrapped in its commission, is no excuse, if the defendant alone conceived the original criminal design.[86] If, however, the prosecutor in setting his trap waives his legal rights, as where he consents to the act, and the offense requires want of consent on his part, the prosecution will fail.[87]

L. art. 32, where it is said: "An act which would otherwise be a crime may be excused if the person accused can show that it was done only in order to avoid consequences which could not otherwise be avoided, and which, if they had followed, would have inflicted upon him, or upon others whom he was bound to protect, inevitable and irreparable evil; that no more was done than was reasonably necessary for that purpose; and that the evil inflicted by it was not disproportionate to the evil avoided." See also Com. v. Knox, 6 Mass. 76; In re Stratton, 21 How. St. Tr. 1045, 1223 (where Lord Mansfield said: "Wherever necessity forces a man to do an illegal act, forces him to do it, it justifies him, because no man can be guilty of a crime without the will and intention of his mind. It must be voluntary"). See Com. v. Brooks, 99 Mass. 434 (holding that a person whose wagon was stopped in the street by the crowding of other vehicles did not violate a city ordinance pro-

or excuses homicide in self-defense or to save life, or the taking of another's property when it is necessary to save life.[89]

7. Duress or Compulsion — a. In General. An act which would otherwise constitute a crime may also be excused on the ground that it was done under compulsion or duress.[90] The fear which will excuse the commission of a crime must have proceeded from a reasonable apprehension of an immediate and actual danger threatening the accused with death or great bodily harm. His apprehension of loss of property or of slight or remote injury to his person is not sufficient.[91] A threat of future injury is not enough.[92] A statute sometimes requires that the party threatening shall be actually present.[1] A crime is not excused on the ground of duress because it was committed by a child, being of sufficient capacity to be responsible, by command of his or her parent,[2] by an agent or servant by command of his principal or master,[3] or by an inferior in the army, navy, or civil service, by command of his superior.[4]

b. Coercion of Wife by Husband. Except in the case of treason, murder, and certain other crimes, where a married woman commits a crime in the presence of her husband there is, in the absence of a statute, a rebuttable presumption that she acts under coercion by him, and she is not responsible unless this presumption is rebutted.[5]

8. Condonation and Settlement. The fact that the person who was injured by the commission of a crime has condoned the offense or made a settlement with the defendant or with some third person in his behalf does not relieve the defendant or bar a prosecution by the state.[6] This rule, however, does not necessarily apply to misdemeanors. By statute in some jurisdictions, and it seems even at common law, the fact that certain misdemeanors, like assault and battery for example, have been condoned or compromised may be proved in defense.[7]

9. Discontinuance of Prosecution by Private Person. In England the fact that a private prosecutor refuses to proceed does not authorize the discharge of the accused, but the attorney-general may take the matter up, where it has been left by the private person, and try the case, or pray the court that sentence on a judgment of conviction may be pronounced.[8]

10. Defendant Furnishing State's Evidence — a. Right to Immunity or Discharge. In the absence of a statute an accomplice turning state's evidence and testifying against his co-defendants without any promise of immunity, or even under a promise of immunity made by the prosecuting attorney or committing magistrate, has no legal right to a discharge, and cannot plead the promise as a bar.[9] But in some jurisdictions there are statutory provisions to the contrary, and even in the absence of a statute it is an almost universal custom for the prosecuting attorney, with the consent of the court, to enter a nolle prosequi or to dismiss the charge against an accomplice who has performed his contract to testify, and such discharge is in every respect equivalent to an acquittal, and is a bar to a subsequent prosecution.[10] And it has been held that while the accused may not plead the promise of immunity as a bar he has an equitable title to executive pardon.[11]

b. Breach of Agreement to Testify. If the accomplice, after the promise of immunity, refuses to testify as agreed,[12] testifies falsely,[13] or makes only a partial disclosure,[14] he forfeits his equitable right to a discharge or a pardon. An accomplice who becomes a witness for the prosecution is impliedly bound to disclose all he knows of the crime and cannot remain silent as to privileged communications to his attorney.[15]

c. Testimony Before Grand Jury. Statutes exist in many jurisdictions conferring immunity on accomplices and others, where they shall disclose their criminal liability in testifying before a grand jury.[16]

11. Pendency of, or Recovery in, Civil Actions. The public and the person injured by a crime each has a distinct although concurrent remedy, as a criminal act is both a private and a public wrong, and these remedies may operate simultaneously.[17] Recovery in a civil action does not bar a criminal prosecution.[18] And therefore as a general rule the pendency of a civil action cannot be pleaded in bar.[19]

12. CONVICTION OF ANOTHER FOR SAME OFFENSE. The conviction of one person for a crime does not tend to prove that another did not commit it, and hence is no bar to a prosecution of the latter.[20]

III. CAPACITY TO COMMIT, AND RESPONSIBILITY FOR, CRIME.

A. In General. Of course no one can be held responsible for a crime, or even be guilty of a crime, unless he has sufficient capacity, mentally and otherwise, to commit it. Want of capacity therefore is a complete defense and not merely a mitigating circumstance.[21] Under this title is treated responsibility, as affected by insanity[22] and drunkenness[23] only. The responsibility of aliens,[24] convicts,[25] corporations,[26] Indians,[27] infants,[28] and married women[29] is treated under other titles.

B. Insanity — 1. EFFECT AS A DEFENSE. One who is so insane as to be incapable of entertaining a criminal intent, which is one of the essential ingredients of crime, cannot be guilty of a crime or held criminally responsible for his acts.[30]

Decision to the contrary.— In South Carolina it was held at an early date that if a person commences and carries on a civil action and a prosecution against the same person at the same time for the same assault, a nolle prosequi should be entered on the indictment until he makes his election which remedy to adopt. State v. Blyth, 1 Bay (S. C.) 166. The contrary was held in State v. Frost, 1 Brev. (S. C.) 385. And in Buckner v. Beck, Dudley (S. C.) 168, it was held that an indictment for an assault and battery and a civil action to recover damages would both lie, although the court would not give a severe judgment on the criminal conviction, unless the prosecutor would agree to relinquish his civil remedy. In State v. Stein, 1 Rich. (S. C.) 189, it was held that an indictment under a statute for harboring a slave was not barred because a civil action for the same offense was first commenced and was pending at the trial of the indictment.

Stay of proceedings.— In Com. v. Bliss, 1 Mass. 32, it was held that the trial of one indicted for fraud would be continued on application of the accused until after trial of a civil action pending for the same fraud. There was a decision to the contrary in People v. Judges Gen. Sess. of Peace, 13 Johns. (N. Y.) 85, where there was a prosecution and an action for assault and battery.

Statute providing for civil action.— Although where no method of proceeding is provided by statute for the punishment of an offense it may be prosecuted by indictment, yet where there is a statute providing for a civil action to recover a fine, penalty, or forfeiture for the offense in question a criminal prosecution will not lie. His insanity is a complete defense in all cases, and is not merely a mitigating circumstance.[31]

2. Time of Insanity. To render insanity effective as a defense it must appear that the accused was insane at the time of the commission of the act, and not merely prior or subsequent thereto.[32] Where a person becomes insane after commission of a crime, he cannot be tried while in such condition,[33] but such insanity does not exempt him from responsibility and prosecution if he afterward becomes sane again.[34] The former insanity of the accused does not excuse his crime if it appears that he recovered from it previously to the commission of the crime, but in the absence of such proof it will be presumed to be continuous to the time of the crime.[35] The law does not require that the insanity shall have existed for any definite period, but only that it shall have existed at the precise moment when the act occurred with which the accused stands charged.[36]

3. Degree of Capacity and Tests of Responsibility — a. In General. Various definitions have been given of the degree of mental capacity which will exempt one from criminal responsibility, but some of the tests have been abandoned, and in most jurisdictions the law on the subject is now well settled. No doubt all the courts agree that mere mental weakness does not exempt where there is sufficient capacity to know that the act is wrong.[37] The fact that the defendant is very

b. Power to Distinguish Between Right and Wrong. All of the courts, both in the United States and in England, agree that a man is not criminally responsible for an act if at the time of its commission he was so insane, from disease or defect of the mind, that he was incapable of understanding the nature and quality of the act, or of distinguishing between right and wrong, either generally or with respect to that particular act.[40] Some of the courts hold that this is the only test that a higher degree of insanity must be proved to absolve one from criminal responsibility than is necessary to discharge him from a contract.

Capacity of child.— Sir Matthew Hale laid down the test whether the defendant's perception of consequences and effects is only such as is common to children of tender years, holding that if so he ought to be acquitted. He reasoned that inasmuch as children under fourteen years of age are prima facie incapable of crime, imbeciles ought not to be held responsible criminally, unless of capacity equal to that of ordinary children of that age. 1 Hale P. C. 30. This test was also adopted in a Connecticut case, where it was held that the accused ought to be acquitted if he had no greater natural capacity than a child of fourteen years, reared in humble life and with ordinary training. f. Anger and Emotional Insanity. Mere emotional insanity, or temporary frenzy or passion arising from excitement or anger, although ungovernable and producing the crime, as in homicide cases, does not exempt one from responsibility, where he is otherwise sane, and has capacity to distinguish between right and wrong.[51]

g. Moral Insanity and Mental Depravity. Although there have been some decisions to the contrary,[52] it is now well settled that mere mental depravity, or moral insanity, so-called, which results, not from any disease of mind, but from a perverted condition of the moral system, where the person is mentally sane, does not exempt one from responsibility for crimes committed under its influence.[53] Care must be taken to distinguish between mere moral insanity or mental depravity and irresistible impulse resulting from disease of the mind.[54]

unless his drunkenness had resulted in insanity,[56] or unless it rendered him incapable of entertaining a specific intent which is an essential ingredient of the offense.[57] It can make no difference, where no specific intent is necessary, that the defendant was so drunk as to have no capacity to distinguish between right and wrong.[58] Nor can it make any difference that his drunkenness was the result of an uncontrollable desire for drink caused by long indulgence of the appetite.[59]

2. AGGRAVATION OF OFFENSE. According to the old law voluntary drunkenness at the time of committing a crime was regarded as an aggravation of the offense,[60] but this is no longer the law.[61]

3. WHERE SPECIFIC INTENT IS NECESSARY. The rule that drunkenness is no defense does not apply to the full extent where a specific intent is an essential element of the offense charged. If at the time of the commission of such an offense the accused was by drink so entirely deprived of his reason that he did not have the mental capacity to entertain the necessary specific intent which is required to constitute the crime he must be acquitted; and in like manner the fact of the defendant's drunkenness should be considered in determining the degree of the crime.[62] This doctrine has been applied for example to larceny and many men into a perfect, but temporary phrenzy; and therefore, according to some Civilians, such a person committing homicide shall not be punished simply for the crime of homicide, but shall suffer for his drunkenness answerable to the nature of the crime occasioned thereby; so that yet the formal cause of his punishment is rather the drunkenness, than the crime committed in it: but by the laws of England such a person shall have no privilege by this voluntary contracted madness, but shall have the same judgment as if he were in his right senses"); 1 Hawkins P. 58. In Ross v. State, 62 Ala. 224, 227, the lower court had instructed the jury that "mere drunkenness is not insanity, and drunkenness will not excuse criminal conduct, except where it extends so far as to destroy the capacity to distinguish between right and wrong." On appeal the court expressed the opinion that the charges stated "with reasonable accuracy when, and when not, drunkenness may afford defense against an indictment for an assault with intent to commit murder"; but, in view of the fact that the indictment was for that offense, in which a specific intent was necessary, it cannot be that the court intended to hold that voluntary drunkenness is a defense in prosecutions for crime not requiring a specific intent, merely because it destroys the capacity to distinguish between right and wrong. Such is not the rule. See State v. Douglass, (Kan. Sup. 1890) 24 Pac. 1118. And see the cases cited supra, note 55.

or any other crimes,[72] assault with intent to murder,[73] to rape,[74] or to wound or do great bodily harm,[75] and to conspiracy to commit murder.[76] On a prosecution for murder at common law, for which no specific intent is necessary, the drunkenness of the accused is no defense,[77] and the same is true of murder in the second degree, where murder is divided into degrees;[78] but to prevent a conviction of murder in the first degree the defendant may show that he was so drunk that he was incapable of the deliberation and premeditation, which is necessary for that degree of murder,[79] unless he formed the intent to kill before becoming drunk.[80] Some courts allow the fact of drunkenness to be shown in homicide on the question of provocation, not to show that there was provocation, but for the purpose of determining whether the defendant acted under the provocation or not.[81] In all cases the defendant is responsible notwithstanding his drunkenness, if he was not so drunk as to be incapable of entertaining the necessary specific intent,[82] or if he formed such intent and then voluntarily became drunk and committed the crime.[83] alleged offense so drunk as to render it highly improbable that he could have been at the place where it was committed is admissible to prove an alibi.[84]

5. INVOLUNTARY INTOXICATION. The rule that drunkenness does not exempt one from criminal responsibility applies to voluntary intoxication only. It does not apply where one involuntarily becomes drunk by being compelled to drink against his will, or through another's fraud or stratagem, or by taking liquor prescribed by a physician.[85] The fact that liquor was furnished the accused by or at the request of the person who was killed does not render intoxication involuntary.[86] Nor is intoxication involuntary because it results from an uncontrollable desire caused by long indulgence of the appetite.[87]

6. INSANITY FROM DRUNKENNESS. Temporary insanity, that is to say, the mental excitement or frenzy produced by immoderate drinking, does not exempt from responsibility where the accused voluntarily became intoxicated.[88] But settled insanity more or less permanent, including delirium tremens, although produced by prior voluntary habitual drunkenness, is on the same footing as insanity from any other cause, and exempts the sufferer from criminal responsibility to the same extent.[89]

7. DRINKING BY INSANE PERSON. The fact that an insane person voluntarily

Statutory provision construed.— In Georgia and perhaps elsewhere statutes provide that drunkenness shall be an excuse for crime if occasioned by the fraud or contrivance of another, in order to have the crime perpetrated. Construing the statute, it has been held that if one gives intoxicating liquors to another without a purpose at the time to persuade him to commit crime, but afterward when he is so drunk that he has lost the moral sense, he procures him to commit a crime, the intoxicated person is responsible. increases his infirmity by the excitement of intoxication does not deprive him of the benefit of his defense of insanity.[90]

D. Narcosis and Hypnosis — 1. Narcosis. If a person becomes temporarily insane through the voluntary immoderate use of morphine, cocaine, or other drugs, not taken as a medicine, his responsibility would seem to be the same as that of a person drunk from the voluntary use of intoxicating liquors, and so it has been held in Tennessee.[91] In Texas, however, it has been held that his responsibility is that of an insane person, and not that of a drunken person.[92]

2. Hypnosis. Proof that the accused committed the offense charged when under the influence of hypnotism, so that he did not know what he was doing or was compelled to commit the offense, would no doubt be a defense. But evidence of the effect of hypnotism is not admissible merely because the defendant testifies that another told him to commit the crime.[93]

W. 312, where it was said: "Parties who persist in subjecting themselves to the persistent use and habit of taking alcoholic drink, or other poisonous compounds and drugs, cannot expect the same forbearance and immunity from punishment as those bereft of reason by the act of God." It was held in this case that in a prosecution for murder, where the offense is divided into degrees, it is admissible to show defendant's immoderate use of drugs, not to excuse the crime, but to show his mental condition, with a view to ascertain his capacity to deliberate and entertain a malicious purpose, so as to be guilty of murder in the first degree, thus applying the rule in the case of drunken persons.

Code, art. 41, providing that evidence of temporary insanity produced by the recent voluntary use of intoxicating liquors is admissible in a criminal case only in mitigation of punishment, or to fix the grade of murder, does not include temporary insanity caused by the recent voluntary use of cocaine or morphine); Edwards v. State, 38 Tex. Crim. 386, 43 S. W. 112, 39 L. R. A. 262 (holding that one who is so insane from the recent use of cocaine and morphine that he does not understand the nature and quality of the act he is committing, and is incapable of forming an intent, cannot be guilty of an assault with an intent to murder; and holding further that where insanity is produced by other causes, such as morphine or cocaine, in conjunction with the recent use of intoxicating liquor, an act done in such a state of mind cannot be attributed solely to the use of liquor).

crime is a misdemeanor whether the crime attempted is a felony or a misdemeanor, and whether it is an offense at common law or under a statute.[94] But it has been held that an attempt to commit a misdemeanor which is purely statutory, and not malum in se, is not indictable as a separate misdemeanor, unless made so by statute.[95] And there can be no attempt to commit a crime which is itself a mere attempt to do an act or to accomplish a result.[96]

2. What Constitutes an Attempt — a. Definition. An attempt to commit a crime is an act done with intent to commit it, beyond mere preparation, but falling short of its actual commission.[97]

more than mere preparation or planning is essential. The accused must take at least one step beyond preparation, by doing something directly moving toward and bringing him nearer the crime he intends to commit.[98] Mere intent to commit a crime, without any overt act or conspiracy, is not an indictable offense.[99] The overt act which is relied upon as an attempt need not be an act which is ordinarily a part of the criminal transaction itself, but may be one which, although somewhat remote, leads up to it.[1]

c. The Intention. To convict one of an attempt to commit a crime, it is necessary to show that the overt act was done with the specific intent to commit that particular crime. Such an intent is essential.[2] A man may be guilty of murder, although he may not intend to cause death,[3] but the specific intent to kill must be shown to convict one of an attempt to commit murder.[4] So also to convict one of an attempt to rape it must be shown that he intended to have connection with the woman by force and without her consent, and not merely by persuasion,[5] unless she was unconscious, insane, or of such an age that she was incapable of consenting.[6] The principle applies also in prosecutions for attempts to commit other offenses.[7] While the specific intent is essential its existence may be inferred from the circumstances.[8] Thus an intent to commit murder may be inferred from the use of a deadly weapon or other attendant circumstances, in the absence of evidence negativing such intent;[9] and an intent to rape may be inferred from the circumstances.[10]

d. Voluntary Abandonment. The voluntary abandonment of the attempt before it is finally consummated may be urged by the accused to show his intent, but if he has proceeded beyond mere preparation his voluntary abandonment will not bar his conviction.[11]

e. Inability to Commit Intended Crime. To constitute an indictable attempt to commit a crime its consummation must be apparently possible, or in other words, there must be an apparent ability to commit it. If the means employed are so clearly unsuitable that it is obvious that the crime cannot be committed the attempt is not indictable.[12] On the other hand an apparent possibility is all that is required. If there is an apparent ability to commit the crime in the way attempted, the attempt is indictable although, unknown to the party making the attempt, the crime cannot be committed because the means employed are in fact unsuitable, or because of extrinsic facts, such as the non-existence of some essential object.[13] This principle has been applied for example to attempts to commit

B. Solicitation — 1. In General. By the weight of authority it is an indictable offense at common law to solicit another to commit a crime amounting to a felony, although the solicitation is of no effect and the crime is not in fact committed.[21] Thus it has been held a crime to solicit another to commit larceny or embezzlement,[22] arson,[23] murder,[24] sodomy,[25] adultery, where adultery is a felony,[26] or to utter counterfeit money or forged bills.[27] Some courts have held that a solicitation to commit a misdemeanor is not a crime.[28] But the weight of authority discards the test depending on the distinction between felonies and misdemeanors, and makes the decision depend on whether the crime advised or counseled is of a high and aggravated character, and such as seriously affects the public peace and economy.[29] One who solicits another to commit a felony is guilty of a misde-

In general, it has been considered as applying to cases of felony, though it has been held that it does not depend upon the mere legal and technical distinction between felony and misdemeanor. One consideration, however, is manifest in all the cases, and that is, that the offence proposed to be committed, by the counsel, advice or enticement of another, is of a high and aggravated character, tending to breaches of the peace or other great disorder and violence, being what are usually considered mala in se or criminal in themselves, in contradistinction to mala prohibita, or acts otherwise indifferent than as they are restrained by positive law"); Com. v. McHale, 97 Pa. meanor only, if the felony is not committed.[30] If the felony is committed, he is guilty as accessary before the fact, if absent, and as principal in the second degree, if present at the time of its commission.[31]

2. As an Attempt. Some of the courts have treated solicitation to commit a crime as an attempt.[32] By the weight of authority, however, it is not a sufficient overt act to be indictable as an attempt, but must be indicted as a distinct offense.[33]

V. Parties to Offenses.

A. In General. Parties to offenses are either principals in the first or second degree or accessaries before or after the fact. A principal is one who either actually perpetrates the crime or who, being actually or constructively present, aids and abets its commission,[34] while an accessary is one who procures, counsels, commands, or abets the principal, and is absent when the latter commits the crime, or who, after a crime has been committed, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the perpetrator.[35] The distinction between principals and accessaries applies only in the case of felonies, all who participate in treason and in misdemeanors, if guilty and punishable at all, being principals and indictable as such;[36] but it applies, unless a contrary intention appears, to offenses which are

The distinction between a principal and an accessary is as follows: The acts of the accessary are only auxiliary, and they may be performed either before or after the actual commission of the crime, but a principal may not only perform an antecedent act in furtherance of the crime, but at the date and time of its actual commission he must be doing something in connection with and in furtherance of the common purpose, whether present where the main fact is to be accomplished or not. In other words an accessary either has completed his offense before the crime is committed or his liability does not attach until after it has been committed, while the principal acts his part in furtherance of and during the consummation of the crime. made felonies by statute, whether at common law they were misdemeanors only or not punishable at all.[37] In some states the distinction between accessaries and principals is abrogated by statute, and all persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether directly committing it or counseling, aiding, or abetting, are principals.[38]

B. Principals in First Degree — 1. In General. One may be a principal in the commission of a crime in two degrees. The actor or actual perpetrator of a crime is a principal in the first degree. He who is actually or constructively present aiding or abetting is a principal in the second degree.[39] One may commit a crime as principal in the first degree without being actually present, as where he places poison for another, who takes it in his absence,[40] or obtains money by false pretenses by sending a letter through the mail.[41] Where several persons are acting together with a common intent and design to commit a crime, and each performs some part of the crime, they are all guilty as principals, although all are not actually present when the offense is finally consummated. commit the particular crime which is committed. If two persons join in a purpose to commit a crime, each of them, if actually or constructively present, is not only guilty as a principal if the other commits that particular crime, but he is also guilty of any other crime committed by the other in pursuance of the common purpose, or as a natural or probable consequence thereof.[58] In order to show a community of unlawful purpose it is not necessary to show an express agreement or understanding between the parties.[59]

b. Time of Common Intention. The common intention need not be formed before convening at the place of the crime,[60] but it must exist at the time the crime is committed, and not merely before or after.[61]

c. Acting as Detective. One who is present at the commission of a crime simply as a spy or detective, since he has no criminal intent, is not guilty as a principal in the second degree.[62]

d. Abetting Act Not Criminal. Where an act is not a crime, as because of absence of a criminal intent in the person doing it, one does not become guilty as principal in the second degree by being present, aiding, and abetting it, although he then supposes it is a crime.[63]

4. Persons Incapable of Committing the Crime in Person. One may be guilty as principal in the second degree, or as an accessary before the fact, by aiding in, or procuring or instigating a crime, although he or she is incompetent to commit the crime in person.[64] And where by statute the distinction between accessaries

D. Accessaries Before the Fact — 1. In General. An accessary before the fact is one who was absent at the time when a felony was committed, but who counseled, procured, or commanded another to commit it,[66] and he is equally guilty with the principal.[67] Absence at the time the felony is committed is essen-ing and abetting a married man to commit bigamy, although he, being unmarried, could not be guilty of that crime as principal in the first degree.

tial, otherwise the party is a principal in the second degree.[68] It is also necessary that the felony shall be in fact committed,[69] and by a guilty, not an innocent, agent.[70]

2. THE PROCURING, COUNSELING, OR COMMANDING. To render one guilty as an accessary before the fact, he must have participated in or instigated the crime.[71] Bare concealment of the fact that a felony is about to be committed, or failure to endeavor to prevent it, is not enough.[72] It is not necessary, however, to show that the criminal act was specifically commanded or advised;[73] and it is only necessary, to implicate one as accessary before the fact, that his instructions shall have been substantially followed.[74] The communication between the accessary and the principal may be through a third person, and the accessary need not know who the principal is to be.[75]

3. COMMUNITY OF UNLAWFUL PURPOSE. To render one guilty as an accessary before the fact, he must have had the requisite criminal intent,[76] but he need not necessarily have intended the particular crime committed by the principal. An accessary is liable for any criminal act which, in the ordinary course of things, was the natural or probable consequence of the crime he advised or commanded, although such consequence may not have been intended by him.[77] But for crimes which are the outcome of a total or substantial departure from his directions or instructions he is not liable.[78]

See 14 Cent. Dig. tit. "Criminal Law," § 88.

4. Repentance and Withdrawal. If one who has counseled or commanded the commission of a crime, or agreed to take part in it, repents and withdraws, to the knowledge of the other party, before the crime is committed, he will not be liable as an accessary;[79] but if he does not withdraw until it is too late, or fails to let the other party know of his withdrawal, he will be liable.[80]

5. Persons Incapable of Committing the Crime in Person. A person may be guilty as an accessary before the fact, although he is himself incapable of committing the crime as principal.[81]

E. Accessaries After the Fact — 1. In General. An accessary after the fact is one who, knowing a felony to have been committed, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the felon.[82] At common law one may be an accessary after the fact to an accessary before the fact.[83] It is essential to one's guilt as accessary after the fact, that the felony shall have been actually committed by the alleged principal,[84] and the aid or assistance must have been given after the felony was fully completed.[85]

2. Knowledge of Offense. To render one liable as an accessary after the fact he must have had actual knowledge at the time he relieved or assisted the principal that the latter had committed a felony.[86]

3. The Assistance or Relief. Any assistance or relief given to one known to be a felon, in order to hinder his apprehension, trial, or punishment, makes the

If one advises another to beat a man and the latter dies as a result of the beating, it is murder, and the adviser is an accessary to the murder; but if the advice is to burn a house and the person advised breaks in and commits larceny therein, but does not burn it, the adviser is not an accessary to the burglary, for that is a distinct and separate offense. 1 Hale P. Three things are requisite to constitute an accessary after the fact.— (1) A felony must have been committed; (2) the accused must have a knowledge that it was committed; and (3) he must receive, relieve, comfort, or assist him. Wren v. Com., 26 Gratt. (Va.) 952.

Presumption of knowledge.— At common law the mere fact that one receives a felon in the county in which he is attainted, which is supposed to be matter of public notoriety, raises no presumption of knowledge that he is a felon. 1 Hale P. C. 323, 622; 4 Bl. Comm. 37; Wren v. Com., 26 Gratt. (Va.) 952.

person assisting or relieving an accessary after the fact.[87] This does not apply, however, to mere acts of charity which relieve or comfort a felon, but do not hinder his apprehension and conviction or aid his escape.[88] It is essential that the aid or assistance shall be given to the felon personally.[89] Mere silence as to one's knowledge of a felony, with no intent to aid the felon, does not make one an accessary after the fact.[90]

4. Persons in Family Relation. Unless the rule is changed by statute, a person is not the less guilty as an accessary after the fact because of the existence, between him and the person assisted or relieved, of the relation of parent and child, brother and brother, sister and brother, or master and servant, and even a husband is guilty if he assists or relieves his wife.[91] But a wife does not become accessary in assisting or relieving her husband, since she is presumed to act under his coercion, and since she ought not to be bound to discover him.[92]

F. Prosecution and Punishment — 1. Principals in First and Second Degree. The court may in its discretion put a principal in the second degree on his trial and he may be convicted, before the trial and conviction of the principal in the first degree,[93] and even though the principal in the first degree has escaped or died,[94] or been acquitted, provided the evidence is sufficient to show that the principal in the first degree was guilty.[95] The guilt of a principal in the first

2. PRINCIPALS AND ACCESSARIES. At common law an accessary cannot be tried without his consent before the conviction or outlawry of the principal, except where the principal and accessary are tried together.[2] If the principal could not be found,[3] or if he had not been indicted, had refused to plead, claimed benefit of clergy, had been pardoned, or died before attainder, the accessary could not be tried at all.[4] In many jurisdictions, however, the common-law rule has been abolished by statute.[5] Even where the conviction of the principal need not be

VI. JURISDICTION.

A. Nature and Scope of Criminal Jurisdiction — 1. DEFINITION. Criminal jurisdiction is the power and authority constitutionally conferred upon a court, judge, or magistrate to take cognizance of an offense and to pronounce the judgment or sentence provided by law, after a trial in the manner sanctioned by law as proper and sufficient.[16]

2. NECESSITY FOR. There can be no valid prosecution and conviction for crime unless the court in which the prosecution is instituted and carried on is legally created and constituted,[17] and has jurisdiction of the offense charged,[18] and of the person of the defendant.[19] Jurisdiction, except of the person, cannot be conferred by the consent of the defendant.[20] The various remedies in the case of want of jurisdiction are elsewhere treated.[21] acquittal of one is not relevant on the trial of the other.

14. 4 Bl. Comm. 36. And see Nuthill v. State, 11 Humphr. (Tenn.) 247; U. S. v. Burr, 4 Cranch (U. S.) 469, 502 Appendix, 2 L. ed. 684, where it was said: "It is a settled principle in the law, that the accessary cannot be guilty of a greater offence than his principal. The maxim is accessorius sequitur naturam sui principalis; the accessory follows the nature of his principal. Hence results the necessity of establishing the guilt of the principal, before the accessory can be tried."

15. Where the statute abolishes the distinction between accessaries and principals, the accessary may be convicted of that degree of the crime shown by the evidence, and the conviction of the principal of a lower degree, or even his acquittal is immaterial on the question of his guilt. 3. Different Departments of Same Court. The fact that several departments of the same court are separately numbered does not make them separate and independent tribunals, so as to prevent the trial and conviction of the accused in one of them, where he was arraigned and pleaded in another.[22]

4. Effect of Order of Executive. As the criminal jurisdiction of the courts is conferred by statute it is not within the power of the executive to restrict or enlarge the same.[23]

5. Court First Acquiring Jurisdiction. Several courts may have concurrent jurisdiction of an offense.[24] In such a case the court first obtaining jurisdiction of the accused retains it to the exclusion of the other.[25]

B. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions — 1. Rule of Construction. Constitutional provisions and statutes establishing criminal courts and conferring jurisdiction upon them will be reasonably construed and the legislature's intention sustained, if exercised within constitutional requirements.[26]

2. Power of Legislature to Confer and Limit Jurisdiction — a. General Rule. Within constitutional limitations, the legislature has the power to create courts of criminal jurisdiction, to determine within what particular jurisdiction crimes shall be tried, and to make that jurisdiction exclusive.[27] But it has no power of course to confer or limit jurisdiction in violation of constitutional provisions.[28] Where the constitution confers general criminal jurisdiction on a superior court, an act of the legislature infringing such jurisdiction is unconstitutional and void.[29] But it has been held that the legislature may establish criminal courts in addition to those specified in the constitution and give them concurrent jurisdiction with existing criminal courts.[30] If a valid statute gives a court jurisdiction of an offense its judgment of conviction is valid, although it may have conceived that it was acting upon another statute which is unconstitutional.[31]

Inferior and general jurisdiction.— A general jurisdiction is that which extends to a great variety of matters, while an inferior jurisdiction is that which extends only to certain specific causes; hence where a statute limits the jurisdiction of a court to certain specific matters, it is an inferior tribunal within the meaning of a constitutional provision authorizing the legislature to create inferior tribunals. diction, whether state or county, and is consummated in another, a statute providing that the criminal may be tried in either of these jurisdictions is not unconstitutional.[32] But the legislature cannot confer jurisdiction of an offense committed wholly without the limits of the state, except perhaps where it is committed by a citizen.[33]

c. Creating Local and Special Courts. In many of the states constitutional provisions require that all laws regulating the proceedings and jurisdiction of courts shall be general and of uniform operation, and statutes in violation of such provisions are void.[34]

d. Impairing or Enlarging Jurisdiction Conferred by Constitution. Exclusive criminal jurisdiction conferred upon a court by a state constitution cannot be impaired by the legislature.[35] But where the jurisdiction is not exclusive, either expressly or by necessary implication, the legislature may confer concurrent jurisdiction upon another court, if by so doing it does not deprive the existing court of any constitutional jurisdiction.[36]

e. Crimes Previously Committed. The legislature may establish new courts for trial of crimes already committed,[37] but a statute creating a court will not by

3. STATUTES CONFERRING CONCURRENT JURISDICTION. Where a court has jurisdiction of a crime, a statute simply conferring the same jurisdiction on another court does not deprive the former of its jurisdiction, in the absence of an express provision or clear implication to that effect, but merely confers concurrent jurisdiction.[39] A statute conferring upon a justice of the peace jurisdiction to try a crime which is indictable in a superior court does not by implication oust the superior court of jurisdiction.[40] But where, from the terms of the statute conferring jurisdiction, it is apparent that the legislature intended the jurisdiction thus conferred to be exclusive, the first court is deprived of its jurisdiction,[41] and any criminal prosecution pending in the existing court when the statute goes into effect should be transferred to the new court.[42]

4. FEDERAL AND STATE COURTS. In some cases, as we have seen, the jurisdiction of the federal courts over offenses is exclusive of the jurisdiction of the state courts, while in others it is concurrent.[43] A court created by a state legislature has no jurisdiction, and by the great weight of authority congress cannot confer upon such a court jurisdiction of offenses against federal laws.[44] Nor can indictments found in a state court be tried in the federal courts.[45] The power of the state legislatures to confer upon the state courts jurisdiction to punish acts which are crimes against the United States is elsewhere treated.[46]

See 14 Cent. Dig. tit. "Criminal Law." § 130; and, generally, Justices of the Peace.

The English statutes, 1 Edw. III, c. 16, and 34 Edw. III, c. 1, regulating the powers and jurisdiction of justices of the peace, were held to have been adopted as part of the common law in Massachusetts. Com. v. Leach, 1 Mass. 59.

which are strictly construed. In other words the jurisdiction assumed must be clearly conferred by the statute.[55]

2. Time of Beginning Prosecution. If a statute provides that a complaint must be made to a justice of the peace within a time specified, the justice has no jurisdiction until the statute is complied with, although the superior courts have jurisdiction.[56]

3. Jurisdiction of Offense — a. In General. In England justices of the peace had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the charge of treason,[57] but might upon complaint direct the apprehension of one accused of treason, and bind him over to the court of king's bench.[58] A justice of the peace had power to hear and determine felonies where expressly authorized so to do by the terms of his commission.[59] In the United States generally a justice of the peace has ordinarily under the statutes no jurisdiction to try persons charged with felony, but his jurisdiction is limited to the trial of misdemeanors.[60]

Mayor's court.— Under constitutional provisions authorizing the legislature to vest judicial powers in such courts as it shall from time to time establish, the legislature may vest the powers of a justice of the peace in a municipal court held by the mayor to try cases without a jury, where the offense is committed within the city limits. Gray v. State, 2 Harr. (Del.) 76.

Police courts exist in some of the states by statute, and while they possess in general the criminal jurisdiction of justices of the peace, their jurisdiction is wholly statutory. These statutes are strictly construed. People v. Gooseman, 80 Mich. 611, 45 N. W. 369. Where a person is tried and convicted in a so-called police court, and the proceedings are void because this court has no legal existence on account of the unconstitutionality of the statute creating it, the fact that the police judge is also a justice of the peace and would have had jurisdiction as such of the offense does not validate his judgment as a police judge. Ex p. Giambonini, 117 Cal. 573, 49 Pac. 732.

Jurisdiction of grand jury.— A statute conferring original jurisdiction of certain specific offenses upon justices of the peace does not exclude the jurisdiction of the grand jury to inquire into all public offenses, where a statute declares all public offenses indictable. State v. Kobe, 26 Minn. 148, 1 N. W. 1054. See Grand Jury.

Disqualification by interest in penalty.— In Massachusetts it has been held that the interest of the justice of the peace in a penalty, however trivial the interest may be, deprives him of jurisdiction. Gifford v. White, 10 Cush. (Mass.) 494; Pearce v. Atwood, 13 Mass. 324.

This power to hear and determine felonies was very seldom exercised in the cases of murder or manslaughter, and in consequence of the doubt which existed as to the authority of justices to hear and determine charges of felony it was provided by St. 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 13, that in all cases of felonies they should take the examination of the prisoner, commit it to writing, accept bail if it be furnished, commit the witnesses, and refer the matter to the justices of assize. 5 Bacon Abr. 405; 2 Hawkins P. b. Penalty Determining Jurisdiction. A justice of the peace, police judge, or other inferior magistrate has no jurisdiction to try one accused of a crime, the maximum penalty or punishment of which exceeds the power of his court to impose.[61] His power under a statute to fine or imprison does not give him juris-

(Danzey v. State, 68 Ala. 296; Adams v. Governor, 22 Ga. 417; Severin v. People, 37 Ill. 414), where no serious injury is inflicted on the person assaulted (Wegener v. People, 36 Ill. C. 660); obtaining goods or money by false pretenses (Dillingham v. State, 5 Ohio St. 280); and violation of town ordinances (State v. Williams, 11 S. C. 288).

The common-law distinction between high and low misdemeanors, depending upon the question whether the misdemeanor was infamous or not, is not recognized in determining the construction of a constitutional provision conferring upon justices' courts an exclusive jurisdiction over misdemeanors, as the power given to the legislature to create courts to try misdemeanors under that section is not limited to misdemeanors of any class. Green v. San Francisco Super. Ct., 78 Cal. 556, 21 Pac. 307, 541.

Offenses held not within the jurisdiction of justices of the peace. Selling lottery tickets (U. S. v. Green, 19 D. C. 230); rescuing a person from lawful custody (Com. v. Hyde, Thach. Crim. Cas. (Mass.) 112); assault with intent to inflict great bodily injury (State v. Carpenter, 23 Iowa 506) or with intent to murder (State v. Odell, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 156); riot (Wakefield v. State, 5 Ind. 195; State v. Furlong, 26 Me. 69; Com. v. Twombly, Thach. Crim. Cas. (Mass.) 222); and aggravated assault (State v. Huntley, 91 N. C. 617) have been held to be crimes which are not within the jurisdiction of a justice's court to try and determine. So a justice has no jurisdiction of the offense of selling liquor to soldiers under the statute except as an examining magistrate (U. S. v. District of Columbia, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,726*b*, 2 Hayw. & H. 392).

Forfeiture of property, payment of costs, disfranchisement, etc.— A statute imposing forfeiture of property as a punishment for a crime ousts the justice of the peace of the jurisdiction of that crime, although the fine and imprisonment imposed in addition are such as he has jurisdiction to impose (Klyman v. Com., 97 Ky. 484, 30 S. W. 985, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 237); but the fact that a statute in addition to a fine and imprisonment requires a defendant to pay the costs of prosecution and recognize for his subsequent good behavior (Com. v. Burns, 14 Gray (Mass.) 35; Com. v. Carr, 11 Gray (Mass.) 463), or simply to pay the costs as the justice shall order (Faulks v. People, 39 Mich. 200, 33 Am. Rep. 374), or prohibits the issuance of a license for a specified period to the person convicted (State v. Larson, 40 Minn. 63, 41 N. W. 363), or provides that the offender shall be disfranchised (Stevens v. Anderson, 145 Ind. 304, 44 N. E. 460) does diction to try a criminal case punishable by a fine and imprisonment.[62] Where the jurisdiction of a justice is limited to cases in which the fine cannot or does not exceed a certain amount, he has no jurisdiction where the fine may exceed such amount, although he imposes a fine of a less amount.[63]

4. Territorial Extent of Jurisdiction. In England each single justice, by virtue of his commission, exercised a jurisdiction to preserve the peace, and with one or more of his associates to hear and determine crimes throughout the whole county.[64] In the United States the territorial jurisdiction of justices generally extends and is confined to the counties in which they reside.[65] But conferring the powers of a justice of the peace upon a municipal court does not alone extend its territorial jurisdiction beyond the city limits,[66] nor exclude the jurisdiction of a justice for the county within the city limits, unless the intention to do so is very clear.[67]

5. Concurrent and Exclusive Jurisdiction. Inasmuch as the jurisdiction of justices is wholly statutory in the United States, the legislature may abolish or transfer such jurisdiction to other minor courts where it is not prohibited by the not oust the justice of jurisdiction to try and determine, where the fine or imprisonment or both imposed are within his jurisdiction to impose. If the punishment imposed by the statute, which is beyond the jurisdiction of the justice to inflict, is simply incidental to that punishment, as would be the case where he imposes costs or takes recognizance (Com. v. Burns, 14 Gray (Mass.) 35), or where it simply involves loss of social or financial standing and reputation, which is a result of a conviction of crime in any case (State v. Larson, 40 Minn. 63, 41 N. W. 363), he retains jurisdiction. A justice generally has no power to inflict the punishment of exclusion from franchise and office (Johnson v. Com., 90 Ky. 53, 13 S. W. 520, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 20; Cheek v. Com., 87 Ky. 42, 7 S. W. 403, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 880), to punish by imprisonment where the statute limits his jurisdiction to punishment by fine only (Jenkins v. State, 78 Ind. 133; Tuttle v. State, 1 Tex. App. 364), or to inflict a fine or imprisonment according to the gravity of the offense, where the statute fixes no limit and leaves the amount of the fine and the term solely in the discretion of the court (State v. Madden, 28 S. C. 50, 4 S. E. 810. Contra, Foust v. State, 12 Lea (Tenn.) 404).

62. State v. Yates, 36 Nebr. 287, 54 N. W. 429.

If two punishments are by statute provided for the same offense, the justice is not deprived of jurisdiction where in the statute providing for the greater punishment it is expressly provided that it shall not be imposed where another is specifically provided for, and another is specifically provided for by another statute. State v. Meek, 112 Iowa 338, 84 N. W. 3, 84 Am. St. Rep. 342, 51 L. R. A. 414.

63. State v. Wiseman, 131 N. C. 795, 42 S. E. 826, holding that where the constitution limited the jurisdiction of justices to cases where the fine could not exceed fifty dollars, and a statute permitted a fine of as much as ten dollars for each hog permitted to run at large, a justice had no jurisdiction where the warrant charged the running at large of ten hogs, although he imposed a fine of two dollars only for each hog. state constitution from doing so.[68] A statute creating a local court, in the nature of a police court, with jurisdiction of crimes usually triable by justices of the peace, does not oust the justices' courts of jurisdiction,[69] unless the intention of the legislature to that effect is expressly stated or arises by necessary implication.[70]

E. Jurisdiction of Offenses Against Different Sovereignties — 1. Against United States and State or Territory — a. General Rule. The criminal jurisdiction of the federal courts is confined to crimes under federal statutes, except as to common-law offenses committed on the high seas or in places or districts within a state which have been ceded by the state to the United States, and which when the crime was committed were under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.[71] Jurisdiction to punish for a crime committed within a state belongs to the state courts, unless it clearly and conclusively appears to be within the jurisdiction of the federal court.[72] State courts have no jurisdiction of offenses against the United States,[73] but offenses which are directed against the sovereignty of a state or affect its population are within the jurisdiction of the state courts, although such offenses may also be directed against the sovereignty of the federal government, and may be thus within the jurisdiction of both the federal and state courts.[74] And where the federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction of one aspect of a crime the state court may have jurisdiction of another phase of the same crime.[75]

See 14 Cent. Dig. tit. "Criminal Law," § 136.

A statute conferring exclusive jurisdiction over criminal offenses on a police court means exclusive jurisdiction not as against all courts, but as against those of the grade of justices of the peace. State v. Jones, 73 Me. 280.

71. U. S. v. Shepherd, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16,274, 1 Hughes 520.

Whether a crime committed within the state boundaries is an offense against the laws of the United States depends on: First, whether there has been such a cession by the state to the United States of the land on which the alleged criminal act was committed as to render it a "place or district of country under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States," within U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 5339 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3627], and this is a question of law; second, if such cession was made, then it is a question of fact whether the act was committed within the territory so ceded. U. S. v. Lewis, 111 Fed. 630.

Ownership of land by government.— The fact that the United States government when Kansas was admitted as a state owned land in fee simple, which was occupied by a fort, was held not to give it exclusive jurisdiction over crimes committed on that land, where the legislature of the state of Kansas never consented to such jurisdiction. U. S. v. Stahl, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16,373, Woolw. 192, McCahon (Kan.) 206. If the land has been ceded by the consent of the legislature of the state to the United States it is immaterial that it has not been purchased. U. S. v. Carter, 84 Fed. 622.

Session of state court in federal building.— The fact that a state court, with the consent and permission of the authorized agent of the federal government, holds its sessions in a building on land which has been ceded to the federal government by the state legislature for a custom-house does not prevent a state court from having jurisdiction of perjury committed while the court was in session. b. Mail Service. A state court has no jurisdiction over the crime of feloniously robbing the mails, which is an offense created by United States statute.[76]

c. Distribution of Public Lands. A state court has no jurisdiction of perjury committed in a proceeding relative to the sale or preëmption of public land under federal statutes,[77] but where congress has not declared that some act done in relation to such sale or preëmption shall be a crime, it may be punished by the state courts when it is a crime under state statutes.[78]

d. Administration of Justice. A state court has no jurisdiction of perjury committed before a notary public in a contest for a seat in the federal house of representatives,[79] or on a trial in the federal court.[80]

e. Collection of Internal Revenue. A state court has no jurisdiction to try an offense created by the internal revenue laws, but a crime which in one aspect is a crime under the internal revenue laws may be tried by a state court, if in another aspect it is a crime against the state.[81]

f. National Banks. The federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction to try the crime of embezzlement of the funds of a national bank by its officers.[82]

g. Ambassadors and Consuls. The original jurisdiction conferred by the constitution on the United States supreme court in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, is not exclusive as regards criminal proceedings.[83] The circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction under the act of Manslaughter by pilot.—A homicide resulting from the wilful negligence of a pilot in navigating a boat on a river within the boundaries of a state is within the jurisdiction of a state court, and such jurisdiction is not ousted by U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 5344 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3629], which provides that every pilot by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his duty the life of any person is destroyed is guilty of manslaughter, as the offense charged in the indictment in the state court was a wilful and felonious assault and differed from that provided for by the Revised Statutes. Persons who conspire to deprive a prisoner in the custody of a United States marshal of his constitutional right to a speedy and public trial are offenders under U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 508, and where under such conspiracy murder is committed by them, they are liable to be tried and punished in the federal court under U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 5509 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3712]. U. S. v. Logan, 45 Fed. 872.

Bribe to federal officer.— U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 5451 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3680], making it a crime to offer to bribe an officer of the United States with intent to influence him to do an act in violation of his duty, does not apply to the offer of a bribe to influence him to set fire to a distillery, and is not triable in a federal court. 83. The Judiciary Act, after providing that the supreme court shall have such exclusive jurisdiction of suits or proceedings against ambassadors, public ministers, and their servants, as a court of law can have consistently with the law of nations, provides that it shall have original but not exclusive jurisdiction of all suits by ambassadors or other public ministers, or in which a consul congress to try a person accused of an assault on a representative of a foreign government.[84]

h. Federal Elections. The United States circuit court has jurisdiction of crimes arising out of the interference with or resisting federal officials in the performance of their duty at a congressional election,[85] but the state courts have jurisdiction of the offense of fraudulent voting and other offenses at elections for presidential electors.[86]

i. Violation of Federal Bankruptcy Act. A state court has no jurisdiction to try a charge of perjury committed in testifying in a bankruptcy proceeding.[87]

2. Offenses Against State and Municipality. Where a statute confers jurisdiction on a court to try and determine offenses against the state, it will be presumed that such jurisdiction is concurrent with a municipal court enforcing an ordinance which provides for the punishment of the same criminal act;[88] but the state courts have no jurisdiction where an offense is only punishable as a breach of an ordinance[89] or where the legislature has expressly given the municipal courts exclusive jurisdiction.[90]

F. Jurisdiction as Determined by Locality of Crime — 1. General Rule. Since a state has no jurisdiction to punish crimes committed beyond its limits, the courts of one state have no jurisdiction to enforce the criminal laws of another state or to punish crimes committed in another state.[91] or vice-consul shall be a party, and a subsequent section provides that the circuit courts shall have exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offenses cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where this act or some other statute provides otherwise. 2. FEDERAL COURTS. So with the exception of the jurisdiction exercised over crimes on the high seas or by treaty stipulation in foreign countries the jurisdiction of the federal courts is limited to the territory of the United States.[92] Other questions as to the jurisdiction of the federal courts are treated in the sections following.

3. LOCALITY OF OFFENSES — a. In General. The locality of an offense is the place where the act or acts constituting the same are committed,[93] but it is sometimes difficult to apply this rule to particular crimes,[94] and to determine the locality of a crime where several persons participate at different places.[95]

b. Offenses by Persons Beyond State Boundaries. Where a person, being beyond the limits of a state, puts in operation a force which produces a result and constitutes a crime within those limits, he is as liable to indictment and punishment, if jurisdiction can be obtained of his person, as if he had been within the limits of the state when the crime was committed.[96] This is true of crimes committed by means of an innocent agent. Where a person outside of a state procures a crime to be committed within the state by means of an innocent agent, he is responsible in such state as a principal.[97] By the weight of authority, where a person outside of a state procures a felony to be committed in the state by a criminal agent, or conspires with others in the state to commit a crime, he is an accessary before the fact and triable as such in the state where he instigates or suggests the crime, and not in the state where the crime is committed by the principal,[98]

unless by express statutory provision.[99] This rule does not apply, however, to misdemeanors in which there are no accessaries, but all who take part are principals, whether present or absent.[1]

c. Offenses Committed by Use of the Mails. The jurisdiction to try an offense committed by means of the United States mail depends upon where the offense was consummated.[2] The crime of causing lottery matter to be delivered by mail is committed in the state where the letter is received, although it was mailed elsewhere.[3] The place of the mailing determines the jurisdiction in the crime of transmitting false papers to the pension office.[4] If a criminal act put in operation by use of the mail outside of the state produces a result in the state constituting a crime, the user of the mail is guilty as principal on the ground that the post-office is an innocent agent.[5]

d. Particular Offenses — (1) Larceny. Some courts have held, independently of statutory provision, that where goods are stolen in one state of the Union and carried into another there is a larceny in the latter, on the ground that each moment's continuance of the trespass and felony amounts to a new taking and asportation, and that the courts of the state into which the goods are brought have jurisdiction to punish as for larceny in such state.[6] Other courts have held

Contra.— State v. Grady, 34 Conn. 118, holding that if a felony is committed in one state by the procuration of a resident of another state, who does not himself personally come into the first state to assist in the felony, such non-resident can be punished in the state where the felony is committed, if jurisdiction can be obtained of his person, although the person actually committing the felony is a guilty agent, and the non-resident is merely an accessary before the fact.

99. In Johns v. State, 19 Ind. 421, 81 Am. Dec. 408, it was held that a statute providing that every person, being without the state, committing or consummating an offense by an agent or means within the state, is liable to be punished in the same manner as if he were present and had commenced and consummated the offense within the state, embraces those persons only who without the state commit a crime which in legal contemplation is to be deemed as having been committed within the state under circumstances making the person committing it a principal in the crime, and does not apply to a person who out of the state becomes accessary before the fact to a felony committed within the state.

the contrary.[7] There is also a conflict of opinion as to whether an indictment for larceny will lie where goods are stolen in a foreign country, as Canada for instance, and brought into one of the states.[8] In a number of the states the bringing into the state goods stolen in another state or in a foreign country is made punishable as larceny by express statutory provision, and such statutes have been sustained.[9] Where this rule obtains at common law or by statute a person outside of a state is guilty of larceny if he steals goods outside of the state and sends them into the state by an innocent agent.[10]

(II) Receiving Stolen Goods. In those states in which by statute or at common law it is larceny to bring into the state goods stolen in another state or a foreign country,[11] one who there receives goods with knowledge that they have been stolen in another state or country is liable to indictment for receiving stolen goods.[12] This does not apply, however, in those states in which it is held that bringing into the state goods stolen in another state or a foreign country does not constitute larceny, for the goods must have been stolen in the jurisdiction in which it is sought to punish for the receiving.[13]

(III) Embezzlement. The jurisdiction of the crime of embezzlement, in the absence of a statute, is in the state in which the money or property was converted, although it may have been received in another state;[14] but the legislature of a state may punish the embezzlement of property received in the state and converted in another state.[15] A person may commit embezzlement in a state while

15. State v. Haskell, 33 Me. 127, sustaining a prosecution under a statute making it an offense for one to receive property

he is himself in another state.[16] Where by the common law or by statute it is larceny to bring into the state property stolen in another state, and a statute makes embezzlement larceny, one who brings into the state property embezzled in another state is punishable in the former.[17]

(IV) False Pretenses. The crime of obtaining money or property by false pretenses is within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state in which the money or property was obtained, although the false pretenses may have been uttered elsewhere.[18] But it has been held that the courts of the state in which acceptances are obtained by false pretenses have jurisdiction, although the money was obtained on these acceptances in another jurisdiction, and that the courts of the latter have no jurisdiction.[19] If a person while in one state makes false pretenses through the post-office or other innocent agent in another, and there obtains money or property by means of such pretenses, he is indictable in the latter state.[20]

(V) Forgery and Uttering. The crimes of forgery and uttering forged paper are within the jurisdiction of the state in which the paper is forged or uttered.[21] Where it is sent through the mail, the offense of uttering is within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state in which it is delivered.[22] A person outside of a state is indictable in the state if he there utters a forged instrument by means of an innocent agent.[23]

(VI) Homicide. At common law it was held that the courts of England had no jurisdiction of a prosecution for homicide, where the injury was inflicted in a foreign country or on the high seas (not on a British vessel), and the person injured died in England, or where the injury was inflicted in England and the party died in a foreign country or on the high seas, since in the first case the courts could not take cognizance of the injury, and in the second case they could not take cognizance of the death.[24] And this doctrine has been recognized in the

within the state, to be carried for hire and delivered to a person in another state, and to fraudulently convert it to his own use out of the state before it has been delivered.

United States.[25] It has also been held in the absence of a statute that the courts of a state have no jurisdiction of a prosecution for homicide, where death resulted within its limits from an injury inflicted in another state or territory,[26] and that the courts of a state have no jurisdiction where the injury was inflicted within its limits and death resulted in another state or territory.[27] Other courts have held that an indictment will lie for the homicide in the state or territory where the injury was inflicted, on the ground that the homicide is committed there.[28] In many jurisdictions this matter is now regulated by statutes, which have been sustained as constitutional.[29] If a person, being in one state or country, mails poison, fires a gun, or does any other act which takes effect and causes the death of a person in another state or country, the homicide is committed in the latter state or country, and its courts only have jurisdiction of the prosecution therefor.[30] near a person in another jurisdiction, so as to constitute an assault and battery or assault, the offense is committed in the latter jurisdiction.[31]

(VIII) ABORTION. Where a person outside of a state delivers to a woman within the state, through the post-office or other innocent agent, a drug sent by him for the purpose of procuring an abortion, and counsels its use for such purpose, and it is so used and the abortion thereby caused, he is guilty of procuring an abortion in the state, and its courts have jurisdiction if they acquire jurisdiction of his person.[32]

(IX) BIGAMY. The crime of bigamy is within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state within which the bigamous marriage took place, and not of another state where the parties have afterward cohabited.[33] But under a statute punishing cohabitation after a bigamous marriage, the courts of the state where the parties cohabit have jurisdiction, although the bigamous marriage took place in another state or country.[34]

(X) LIBEL. The offense of defamatory, obscene, or seditious libel is committed in the jurisdiction or jurisdictions in which the libel is published.[35] It has been held that where it is sent by mail from one state to a person in another it is published and the subject of an indictment where it is mailed,[36] but this is doubtful.[37]

(XI) NUISANCE. It has been held that the offense of creating or maintaining a public nuisance is committed in every jurisdiction in which the act takes effect and creates a nuisance,[38] but there are decisions to the contrary.[39]

(XIII) CONSPIRACY. The courts of the state in which a conspiracy is formed, and in which the conspirators have their headquarters, have jurisdiction of a prosecution for the conspiracy, although they reside elsewhere, and although the conspiracy is carried out or to be carried out elsewhere.[41] And if persons in one state or country enter into a conspiracy to commit a crime in another, and one of the parties in pursuance thereof does an overt act in the latter, all are there indictable for the conspiracy, whether they were present there or not.[42]

channel of a river, which is a boundary between states, and not the center of such river from bank to bank, determines the territorial jurisdiction of crimes committed on the waters of the river;[43] but in many cases by constitutional provision or by compact between states the criminal jurisdiction of states bordering on navigable rivers is concurrent[44] or exclusive[45] over the waters.[46]

5. Offenses on the High Seas, Arms of the Sea, Bays, Etc.— a. High Seas. In the absence of a statute the courts of a country have no jurisdiction of an offense committed on the high seas except in the case of piracy,[47] unless the offense is committed on board a ship belonging to that country.[48] It is probable that congress may confer jurisdiction upon courts of admiralty to try persons accused of crime on the high seas, without reference to their nationality or that of the vessel on which the crime was committed; but this has not been done, and the federal jurisdiction of admiralty over crimes is confined to crimes committed on American vessels, either on the high seas or in foreign or American waters.[49]

b. Three-Mile Limit. It has been said that the jurisdiction of a nation to punish offenses extends into the ocean to the distance of a cannon shot, which is estimated as one marine league from low-water mark on the shore;[50] but it is doubtful whether there is any jurisdiction to punish for offenses committed within this marine league limit, if the place of the offense is not an arm of the sea and within the body of a country, unless the jurisdiction is expressly conferred by statute.[51]

Such jurisdiction, however, can undoubtedly be expressly conferred by statute, and such statutes have been enacted both in England and in the United States.[52]

c. Rivers, Havens, Bays, and Other Arms of the Sea. Rivers, havens, bays, and other arms of the sea extending into a state or country are within the jurisdiction of such state or country, and within the bodies of the counties thereof, and subject therefore to the common-law jurisdiction, to a line drawn between the fauces terræ or furthermost points of land, if they are narrow enough for a person on one shore to reasonably discern what is doing on the other.[53]

d. Vessels as Part of Territory. The high seas being common to all mankind, vessels afloat upon it are regarded as parts of the territory of the nation whose flag they fly and to which they belong, and crimes committed on such vessels on the high seas, whether by foreigners or citizens, passengers, strangers, or crew, are exclusively within the jurisdiction of that nation.[54] An exception to this rule is recognized in the case of piracy, which, although usually committed under a flag of some government wrongfully assumed, is punishable by any nation.[55] The admiralty jurisdiction of a nation extends to offenses committed on its vessels, not only while they are on the high seas, but also while they are in the ports or lishman on an English vessel, caused by the act of the commander of a German vessel (the defendant), who was himself a German, in running into and sinking the English vessel, although at the time the vessels were within two and a half miles of the English coast.

e. Admiralty Jurisdiction of Federal Courts — (1) In General. The constitution of the United States declares that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and it is settled that by force of this provision the civil jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in maritime cases of contract and tort embraces tide-waters within the bays, inlets of the sea, and harbors along the sea-coast of the country, and in navigable rivers.[58] "But it is a fundamental doctrine, in respect to the federal courts of inferior jurisdiction, that they cannot take cognizance of criminal offences of any grade, without the express appointment or direction of positive law. To enable them to exercise the functions bestowed by the constitution over crimes and misdemeanors, there must be a designation, by positive law, both of the offence and of the tribunal which shall take cognizance of it."[59] If an act of congress punishes an offense when committed on the "high seas," the federal courts have no jurisdiction of the offense unless it is committed on the high seas as contradistinguished from mere tide-waters flowing in ports, havens, and basins, that are land-locked in their position and subject to territorial jurisdiction.[60] The term "high seas"

District courts of the United States are, by U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 563, subd. 1 [U. S. Comp. An inclosed dock in a foreign port is not "high seas" within an act of congress conferring admiralty jurisdiction of offenses committed on the high seas. U. S. v. Hamilton, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,290, 1 Mason 152.

Long Island sound is embraced in the term "high seas" in the acts of congress conferring admiralty jurisdiction (Manley v. People, 7 N. Y. 295; U. S. v. Jackalow, 1 Black (U. Offense within jurisdiction of territory. — An offense committed in an arm of the sea, within the jurisdiction of a territory of the United States, but not of a state, is within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, under the act of congress (U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 5339, subd. 2 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3627]) punishing murder "upon the high seas, or in any arm of the sea, or in

(II) American Vessels in Foreign Ports. Under the earlier statutes, which enacted in substance that crimes committed upon the high seas or upon any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, or bay within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States should be punishable in the federal courts, such courts had no jurisdiction to try one accused of a crime committed on an American ship in foreign waters, although where the tide ebbed and flowed.[66] But by later statutes[67] jurisdiction has been conferred upon the federal courts to punish crimes committed on American vessels in foreign ports and harbors,[68] although not to punish a crime committed on a foreign coast where an American vessel has been wrecked within the marine league.[69]

6. Territory Ceded to, or Under Exclusive Jurisdiction of, United States. The jurisdiction of the states over crime within their territorial limits is exclusive, except as to such jurisdiction "as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States," and as to places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state by the federal government for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings;[70] and the jurisdiction of the federal courts over land so ceded or purchased by the consent of the state legislatures is exclusive in the absence of an express reservation by the state legislatures.[71] The fact that land has been used and occupied, under purchase or otherwise, by the federal government for any constitutional purpose, does not give its courts jurisdiction where the state has not consented.[72] Nor has the constitutional provision any application to military reservations in territories, as by express terms it applies only to lands in a state.[73]

7. Jurisdiction as Between Federal Judicial Districts. Under the constitutional provision[74] that the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, the federal courts have jurisdiction only of such offenses as are committed within their respective districts,[75] except as to crimes committed on the high seas or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, which are within the jurisdiction of the courts of the district in which the offender is apprehended or into which he is first brought.[76]

8. TERRITORIAL JURISDICTION OF MUNICIPAL AND COUNTY COURTS. Territorial jurisdiction of municipal and county courts is usually limited to the city or county in which they are located.[77]

G. Jurisdiction of the Person — 1. IN GENERAL. In order that a court may try and punish for an offense, it is not only necessary that it shall be a legally constituted court and have jurisdiction of the offense, but it is also necessary that it shall have jurisdiction of the person of the defendant.[78] Irregularities in obtaining jurisdiction of the person of the defendant may be waived by him, and they are waived if he pleads to the indictment and raises no objection.[79]

2. ARREST AND CUSTODY — a. In General. As a general rule a court has no jurisdiction to hear and determine a charge of crime, unless the accused is in custody, has been admitted to bail, or has consented to the jurisdiction; and statutory provisions in this respect must be observed.[80]

b. Conflict of State and Federal Jurisdiction.[81] Where one has been indicted under a state law for an offense, and the sheriff has made return to the capias issued for his arrest, the state court has jurisdiction to try him, although he is also in the custody of the sheriff, as deputy of the United States marshal, for an offense against the United States, and is in the county jail under a state statute allowing the use of its jails for such purpose.[82] The removal of a prisoner charged with a crime against the state, from the custody of the state court, by a writ of habeas corpus from a federal court, does not affect the jurisdiction of the state court over him.[83]

c. Accused Illegally Arrested or Brought Within the Jurisdiction. The fact that the accused has been illegally arrested, or that he has by trickery, force, fraud, or without legal authority, or by any illegal means, been brought within the territorial jurisdiction of a state court does not oust the jurisdiction of that court, if he is legally in custody in the state.[84]

Y.) 297 (holding, under a statute providing that an indictment for bigamy might be found in the county where the prisoner should be apprehended, an actual arrest before indictment found gave jurisdiction, and that such jurisdiction was not destroyed by a subsequent escape or discharge on bail).

3. Aliens. The state and federal courts have jurisdiction of aliens who commit crimes within their territory,[85] irrespective of the fact that the government of the alien has assumed the responsibility for the crime and is negotiating with the federal government on the subject.[86] But the rule does not apply to the diplomatic agents of foreign governments.[87]

H. Mode of Acquiring Jurisdiction — 1. In General. Jurisdiction to try and punish for a crime cannot be acquired otherwise than in the mode prescribed by law, and if it is not so acquired any judgment is a nullity.[88] A formal accusation is essential for every trial for crime. Without it the court acquires no jurisdiction to proceed, even with the consent of the parties, and where the law requires a particular form of accusation, that form of accusation is essential.[89] Jurisdiction to try offenses is ordinarily acquired by an indictment, or in some jurisdictions by

The court said: "The charge, as made, being a felony, the Constitution of this State requires the presentment or indictment of a grand jury as a pre-requisite to trial; and if the pleading they file with the court could be remodeled by stipulations between the counsel, the defendant would not be tried upon the presentment of the grand jury, but rather upon the consent of the counsel. an information, and where the indictment or information is invalid the court is without jurisdiction.[90] Jurisdiction is in some cases, under statutes, acquired by mere complaint or affidavit,[91] or by appeal from a conviction in a lower court.[92]

2. By Consent. Jurisdiction to take cognizance of an offense or to render a particular judgment cannot be conferred upon a court, where it has none by statute, by the consent of the accused, either direct or inferential;[93] but jurisdiction of the person of the defendant may be conferred by consent or waiver,[94] and a statute may authorize a court to try a criminal case by consent of parties.[95]

I. Transfer of Causes — 1. From State to Federal Court. Several acts of congress provide for the removal of certain classes of cases from the state to the federal courts. Thus a criminal prosecution in a state court against a federal revenue officer on account of any act done under color of his office may be removed to a federal court, where it appears that the act was done in enforcing the federal law.[96] So also it is provided by statute that where the accused cannot enforce in the state courts any rights secured to him by any law providing for the equal rights of citizens of the United States the federal courts have jurisdiction.[97]

If the clerk refuses or neglects to furnish the papers, the petitioner may docket the case, and the federal court shall then have jurisdiction to require the plaintiff to file a declaration or complaint, and if he fails to do so the federal court may dismiss the proceedings, and such dismissal shall be a bar to any other proceedings. By an act of congress[98] when the district attorney deems it necessary,[99] the federal circuit court and the federal district court may remit indictments pending in either to the jurisdiction of the other;[1] and this, under the terms of the statute, carries with it all pleadings and proceedings, and the court to which the cause is remitted has jurisdiction as though the prosecution had originated in it.[2]

3. Transfer Between State Courts of Concurrent Jurisdiction — a. In General. In England, from the earliest times, the court of king's bench could by certiorari remove indictments to itself from courts of inferior jurisdiction;[3] and this power exists in Pennsylvania in the supreme court, which is given the powers of the court of the king's bench in criminal cases,[4] and to some extent in New Jersey.[5] In some states by statute where two courts have concurrent jurisdiction of a crime the trial may be removed from either to the other on application seasonably made.[6]

the clerk does not refuse to furnish the papers, neglects to file them, the circuit court may dismiss the petition and the state court may then proceed as if no petition had been filed. See New Hampshire v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 3 Fed. 887. This statute has been held constitutional (Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 25 L. ed. 664 [overruling State v. Strauder, 11 W. And where the only open question in the court receiving the case is one of law, it may be decided there, although the case might be sent back where the question is one of fact. U. S. v. Haynes, 29 Fed. 691. After a conviction in the district court the indictment cannot be lawfully remitted to the circuit court (U. S. v. Haynes, 26 Fed. 857), nor can an information filed in the district court be remitted to the circuit court as the statute applies only to indictments (U. S. v. Tiernay, 16 Fed. 516, 3 McCrary 308), and it seems only to indictments of which both courts have concurrent jurisdiction (Campbell v. Kirkpatrick, 4 Fed. Cas. No. 2,363, 5 McLean 175).

Except in the case of capital crimes the jurisdiction of the circuit and the district courts is concurrent; but U. S. Rev. St. (1878) § 1039 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 723], requires that all indictments for capital offenses found in the district court shall be remitted to the circuit courts. U. S. v. Holliday, 3 Wall. (U. S.) 407, 18 L. ed. 182.

b. Grounds For Transfer. Some states provide by statute that where the accused, by reason of the interest, relation, or prejudice of a judge, cannot enjoy a fair trial before an inferior court, the judge in his discretion may transfer the case to another court with concurrent jurisdiction.[7] In New York, by statute, a criminal action prosecuted by indictment may at any time before trial, on the application of defendant, be removed from a county court or a city court to a term of the supreme court held in the same county for good cause shown; or from the supreme court, a county court, or a city court, to a term of the supreme court held in another county, on the ground that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county or city where the indictment is pending.[8]

Duty to advise defendant of right.— Under a statute (Va. Code, § 4016) providing that a person may, upon arraignment for a capital felony in a county court, demand trial in the circuit court, it is not required that he be advised of his right by the clerk of the court, if he has counsel. Unconstitutionality of statute.— Where a state constitution directs that in the case of prejudice existing against the accused in one county he shall have a change of venue to an adjoining county, a statute authorizing a city and a county court in the same county to transfer cases from one to the other in all cases of suggestion for removal of criminal causes from these courts is unconstitutional, as it deprives the defendant of the right to a fair and impartial trial, which he would have in the adjoining county. "Good cause" for the removal of an indictment from the court of general sessions to the supreme court exists where the case involves novel and important questions of law (People v. Scannell, 35 Misc. (N. Y.) 558, 72 N. Y. Suppl. 25; People v. Clark, 15 N. Y. Suppl. 79), as questions of railroad law (People v. Clark, 15 N. Y. Suppl. 79); or has attracted great attention and caused much discussion in the press, so that the defendant is in danger of suffering injustice because of public prejudice (People v. Squire, 1 N. Y. St. 534; People v. Sessions, 10 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 192, 62 How. Pr. N. Y. 415); but not where the sole ground for removing the case is the high character and political prominence of the accused (People v. Clark, 15 N. Y. Suppl. 79), or because great public excitement prevails regarding electrocution (People v. Rourke, 11 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 89), or because there may be some difficulty in obtaining a fair trial before the sessions on account of local clamor against the prisoner, as this will not affect the session justices more than the supreme court justices, and the jurors in both courts are drawn from the same body of citizens (People v. Clark, 15 N. Y. Suppl. 79; People v. Rourke, 11 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 89). A party arraigned in general sessions of the city of New York has no vested right to a trial there, and the court may of its own motion, under 3 N. Y. Rev. St. (5th ed.) p. 305, § 7, remit the case to the supreme court, if in the opinion of the court

c. Proceedings For Transfer. The proceedings for a transfer are usually regulated by statutes, which are often construed strictly as against the state and liberally in favor of the accused.[9] But it has been held that the failure of the accused to file a certificate directed to be made by him,[10] or his neglect to forward the original indictment as required by the statute,[11] is fatal, and that the court to which the transfer is attempted to be made does not acquire jurisdiction.[12]

d. Termination of Jurisdiction of Inferior Court. The jurisdiction of an inferior court terminates when the papers are filed in the superior court,[13] on the entry of the order in the inferior court,[14] on the receipt of the indictment by the superior court from the inferior court,[15] or as soon as the inferior court has bound the prisoner over.[16]

e. Proceedings After Transfer. Where a case is transferred to a superior court no new indictment need be found, and the state can proceed on the original papers.[17] If the case has been improperly transferred to the superior court it may be remanded on motion.[18] If the transfer was absolutely without authority mandamus will lie to compel the inferior court to proceed.[19]

4. Transfer Between Justices' Courts. Under statutes in some states, where the defendant shows facts on his arraignment before a justice proving the justice to be prejudiced against him, or so related to the action or to the prosecuting witness that it is not possible for him fairly and impartially to try the accused, the justice must transfer the case to some other justice.[20] Where the statute provides that a justice may transfer a cause to any one of several justices, it should be transferred to the one nearest the home of the accused.[21]

5. TRANSFER BY CREATION OF NEW COURT. Where a new court is created by a statute which confers upon it exclusive jurisdiction of certain crimes, and expressly transfers such crimes then pending in other courts, the jurisdiction of the existing court ceases, and the cases are transferred by operation of the statute. No new indictment or process is necessary.[22]

J. Loss of Jurisdiction — 1. CONVICTION OF OFFENSE BELOW JURISDICTION. Where the court has jurisdiction of the crime for which the accused is indicted, it is not lost if on the evidence he is convicted of a crime of an inferior grade, of which it would not have jurisdiction originally.[23]

2. APPLICATION FOR, OR ERRONEOUS DENIAL OF, CHANGE OF VENUE. It has been held that the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace ceases at once on an application for a change of venue, except for the purpose of transferring the case to another justice;[24] but there is also good authority for the proposition that the mere application by affidavit for a change of venue does not terminate the jurisdiction, although the statute says the justice must grant the change.[25] The erroneous denial of a motion for a change of venue does not oust the jurisdiction.[26]

3. EXPIRATION OF TERM. In the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, a court has jurisdiction to pronounce judgment of conviction or to pronounce sentence at a term subsequent to that in which the verdict was rendered. The expiration of the term does not oust its jurisdiction.[27]

4. UNAUTHORIZED ADJOURNMENT. Where there is no statutory regulation of adjournments in criminal proceedings, the jurisdiction of a court or justice is not lost by an adjournment for a reasonable period.[28] Where an adjournment may be had under a statute for a special cause, an adjournment may be had by consent where this cause does not exist.[29]

5. DETERMINATION OF SANITY OF ACCUSED IN ANOTHER COURT. Where it is alleged that the accused is insane when sentence is to be imposed, the court has discretion to postpone sentence to inquire into his sanity; but the fact that proceedings are then pending in another court to determine the sanity of the accused does not destroy jurisdiction to sentence.[30]

6. CURATIVE STATUTES. Where by statute criminal jurisdiction has been taken from a court, it has no jurisdiction thereafter to indict, and a statute which attempts to confirm and legalize its action is unconstitutional, as in conflict with the United States constitutional provision that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.[31]

2. COURTS OF LIMITED JURISDICTION. The record of a criminal court of limited jurisdiction must show affirmatively such facts as confer jurisdiction, and generally no presumption is indulged in favor thereof.[33] But the presumption that an official did his duty and acted within his authority is recognized in connection with criminal courts, where the record is silent,[34] so that if jurisdiction is obtained the validity of a judgment will not be affected by mere irregularity and want of form in the proceedings.[35]

L. Waiver of Objections — 1. IN GENERAL. The objection that a court has no jurisdiction of the person of the accused may be waived. It must be taken when he is arraigned, and is waived if he pleads and goes to trial.[36] But the objection that the court is not a legal court, or that it has no jurisdiction of the offense, cannot be waived, and may therefore be taken at any time.[37] In order that the appearance of the defendant may constitute a waiver it must be voluntary.[38]

2. BY PROCURING CHANGE OF VENUE. An application for a change of venue by the accused waives all objections to the jurisdiction of the court granting the application and of the court trying the case, if there is jurisdiction of the offense.[39]

3. BY PLEA. The objection that the court has no jurisdiction of the person of court, but doubts as to this may be solved in favor of the tribunal, unless it palpably violates some established rule of law.

the defendant, whether by reason of some irregularity in the proceedings,[40] or because of some defect in the constitution of the court which does not prevent it from being a de facto court,[41] or for other reasons, is waived by defendant by pleading not guilty and going to trial, or by pleading guilty.[42] But the objection that a court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter is not waived by plea or going to trial, and may be raised on motion in arrest of judgment, on appeal, or by petition for a writ of habeas corpus.[43]

favor of the accused, and with a recognition of the principles of the common law, and the legislature cannot authorize a trial in any other county.[45] It has been held, however, that it is not unconstitutional to permit the trial of an offense committed in an unorganized territory in an organized county to which it is attached,[46] or to create a district out of part of a county and limit the selection of grand and petit jurors of that district to the territory comprising the same.[47] And so it has been held of other statutes.[48] Where the constitution contains no provision requiring the accused to be tried in the county of the commission of the crime, the legislature may fix or allow the venue in any other county.[49] A statute providing that an indictment for an offense "may" be found and tried in the county where the offender resides, or where he is apprehended, is not in derogation of the common-law right of trial and indictment in the county where the offense is committed, but merely enlarges the jurisdiction of the court, and it does not prevent an indictment in the county where the offense was committed.[50] The right which the constitution gives to a defendant to be tried in the county in which the offense was committed is a personal privilege and may be waived by him.[51]

3. Venue of Particular Offenses — a. In General. An offense is committed of course in that county in which the acts constituting the same are done, and under some statutes where the acts are done in different counties the offense is committed in that county in which it is consummated.[52]

b. Homicide. Where a mortal blow was inflicted or poison given in one county and death ensued in another, it was doubted at common law whether the homicide could be tried in either.[53] Most of the courts, however, have held that there is jurisdiction in such a case, some holding that the prosecution should be in the county where the blow was given or poison administered,[54] and others holding that it should be in the county where the death occurred.[55] In many jurisdictions the question is now settled by statutes, under some of which the prosecution is in the county where the injury was inflicted,[56] while under others it is in the county where the death ensued,[57] and under others it may be in either county.[58] These statutes have been sustained as constitutional.[59]

c. Abortion. A prosecution for abortion must be brought in the county where the medicine is given, or other acts producing the abortion are performed, although the result of such acts occurs in another county,[60] unless, as in some jurisdictions, a statute allows prosecution in either.[61]

indicted and tried for simple larceny in either county. It is considered that the possession of the stolen goods by the thief is a larceny in every county into which he carries them, because, the legal possession still remaining in the owner, every moment's continuance of the trespass and felony amounts to a new taking and asportation.[62] Statutes to this effect have been enacted in many states, and it is held that they do not violate the constitutional provision guaranteeing to the accused a trial in the county where the offense was committed.[63] The rule applies when certain property is made the subject of larceny by statute.[64] But it does not apply to compound larceny, for all the elements of such offense do not exist except in the first county. The venue of larceny from the person, which is different from ordinary theft, is confined to the county where the property was taken.[65] The same is true of larceny from the dwelling-house, etc.[66]

69. In State v. Hengen, 106 Iowa 711, 77 N. W. 453, it was held that the indictment would lie in the county in which under his contract the accused was to account to his principal, and whence the goods were shipped to him, although they were received by him in another county, and there converted or appropriated. In State v. Bailey, 50 Ohio St. 636, 36 N. E. 233, a contract of employment was made in Lucas county, by which the accused was authorized to canvass for the sale of and sell his employer's goods in Sandusky county, and to account therefor in Lucas county weekly, either by letter or in person; and at his request goods were sent by express from his employer's place of business in Lucas county to him in Sandusky county, where he received and sold the same, converting part of the proceeds to his own use in Sandusky county, and part in the state of New York. After the sale of the goods he wrote a false account of the transaction to his employers, addressed to them in Lucas county, which he mailed to them on the railroad train while absconding, and which they received in Lucas county. It was held that the accused might be indicted and tried in Lucas county for the embezzlement thus committed. See also Campbell v. State, 35 Ohio St. 70; Brown v. State, 23 Tex. App. 214, 4 S. h. Burglary. The offense of burglary is committed in the county where the party breaks and enters,[73] and, where the constitution guarantees to the accused a trial in the county where the offense was committed, the legislature cannot authorize prosecution for burglary in a county in which it was not committed, but into which the accused may have carried property stolen at the time of the burglary.[74]

i. Receiving Stolen Goods. In the absence of a statute the venue of the crime of receiving stolen goods is in the county in which they are received, and not in the county in which they are stolen,[75] nor in a county into which they are subsequently taken.[76] In some jurisdictions this rule is changed by statute.[77]

77. Thus a statute sometimes allows a receiver of stolen goods to be prosecuted either in the county where the goods were stolen, or in the county where they were received. State v. Ward, 49 Conn. 429. Other statutes allow a prosecution either in the county where the property was received, or in any county into which it has been carried by the receiver, or in which he has had possession of the same. Wills v. People, 3 Park. Crim. (N. Y.) 473; Reg. v. Cryer, 7 Cox C. C. 335, Dears. & B. 324, 3 Jur. N. S. 698, 26 L. J. M. C. 192, 5 Wkly. Rep. 738. In Texas the statute provides that the offense of receiving

j. Forgery and Uttering. In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, a prosecution for forgery must be in the county where the instrument was forged, and a prosecution for uttering in the county where the instrument was uttered or passed.[78] In some states, by statute, the crime of forgery may be prosecuted in the county where it was committed or in any county in which the forged paper was used or passed,[79] or where the defendant is apprehended or in custody.[80]

k. Removing Mortgaged Property. Under a statute providing that prosecutions for offenses committed wholly or partly without and made punishable within the state may be carried on in any county in which the offender is found, a prosecution for removing mortgaged property from the state can be maintained in the county from which the property was removed, and to which the defendant is returned on being arrested in another county.[81]

l. Sending Threatening Letter. It would seem that the offense of sending a threatening letter is committed in the county in which it is despatched, as where it is sent by mail, although it is received in another county, since the sending of it completes the offense; and so it has been held.[82] But there are authorities to the effect that if a person by an innocent agent, like the post-office, sends a threatening letter into another county, where it is delivered, the venue may be laid in the latter county.[83]

m. Bigamy. In the absence of a statute bigamy is indictable only in the county where the bigamous marriage took place, as the offense is there committed.[84] In some states statutes authorize indictment for bigamy either in the county where stolen property may be prosecuted in the county where the theft was committed, or in any other county through or into which the property may have been carried "by the thief," or in any county where it may have been received or "concealed" by the offender. Tex. Code Crim. Proc. (1895) art. 237. This statute does not permit one who receives stolen property in one county and carries it into another county to be prosecuted in the latter. county and affects the public in another, the offender may be prosecuted in either.[96]

t. Conspiracy. Indictment and trial for conspiracy, where there are no overt acts, must be in the county where it was formed, but where there are overt acts in execution of the conspiracy it is indictable either in the county of the conspiracy or in the county where the overt acts were committed by any one of the conspirators.[97]

u. Killing Estray. In an indictment for unlawfully killing an estray, the venue should be laid in the county where the act was committed, and not in the county from which the animal strayed.[98]

v. Abandonment. It has been held that the crime of abandoning one's family is properly laid in the county where the accused sent his wife and children, and where they became dependent, although he may never have been in that county.[99]

w. Sale of Adulterated Food. Where a statute provides for punishing the sale of adulterated food, one who through traveling salesmen sells such food can be prosecuted in any county where the sale was made.[1]

x. Sale of Intoxicating Liquors. A statute against selling liquors without a license is not broken in the county where the order is taken, where the goods are in another county, for the sale is only executory until the delivery.[2] Since delivery to a common carrier is a delivery to the consignee, a dealer in one county who sends liquor by express to a buyer residing in another cannot be prosecuted in the latter county for illegally selling therein.[3]

y. Attempts and Solicitation. An attempt to commit a crime is committed and indictable in the county where the offense, if perpetrated, must have been committed, whether the accused was in the county at the time or not.[4] And it has been held that a solicitation to commit a crime, when communicated by letter, is indictable in the county where the letter is received.[5]

z. Crimes on Water. An offense committed on a ship on navigable water below low-water mark is within the jurisdiction of the courts of the county adjoining.[6]

4. Crimes Committed While Personally Absent[7] — a. In General. Where a person, being in one county, commits a crime by means of an innocent agent in another, he is indictable as principal in the latter.[8] This doctrine has been applied for example to uttering forged paper,[9] sending a letter containing a libel[10] or a threatening letter,[11] larceny,[12] obtaining property or money by false pretenses,[13] assault or homicide by administering poison,[14] procuring an abortion by administering a drug,[15] etc. If a person stands in one county, and by throwing or shooting across the line assaults or kills a person in another county, he is indictable for the homicide or assault in the latter.[16]

b. Principals and Accessaries. By the weight of authority in the absence of a statute the county in which the accessary to a felony, either before or after the fact, acted has exclusive jurisdiction over him, although the offense of the principal was committed in another county.[17] But it has been held that where a statute provides that an accessary before the fact may be prosecuted and convicted as for a substantive felony, whether the principal has or has not been convicted, his crime is cognizable in any court having jurisdiction of the principal, so that an accessary who in one county procures a crime to be committed in another is triable in the latter.[18] In misdemeanors all who take part are liable as principals and are indictable in the county where the offense is committed, although their participation may have been in another county.[19]

5. Offenses At or Near County Boundaries. In some jurisdictions statutes provide that where an offense is committed on a boundary between counties, or within a specified distance of the same, jurisdiction shall be in either county.[20] Some of the courts, but not all, have held that these statutes do not deprive the accused of the constitutional right to a trial by an impartial jury of the county where the offense was committed.[21] They apply only to offenses against the state which may be tried in either county, and not to a local offense, where it must be proved that it was actually committed in the place alleged.[22] In the absence of a statute offenses committed near the boundary between two counties must be prosecuted in the county in which they were committed.[23]

6. Offenses Committed Partly in Two Counties. At common law where a crime was committed partly in one county and partly in another, it was doubtful whether it could be punished in either;[24] but the proper view is that it is indictable in the county where it is consummated.[25] It is now very generally provided by statute that where a crime is committed partly in one county and partly in another, that is, where some acts material and essential to the crime and requisite

36. On a trial for enticing away a laborer from his employer, the local jurisdiction is not necessarily the county in which defendant made the contract of hire with the laborer, but where the acts necessary to the consummation of the offense occurred in two counties, the jurisdiction is in either, as provided by Ala. 37. State v. Smith, 82 Iowa 423, 426, 48 N. W. 727, holding, under a provision that "when a public offense is committed in part

7. Organization of New County. Where the territory in which a crime has been committed is created into a new county by a subdivision of an old county or otherwise, the courts of the new county have exclusive jurisdiction.[39] The crime should be charged as having been committed in the old county.[40]

8. Offenses on Public Conveyances. It is a statutory rule in some jurisdictions that where an offense is committed on a railroad car, steamboat, or other public conveyance, and it is impossible to determine in what county it was committed, the accused may be tried in any county through any part of which the vessel or other public conveyance passed on that trip or voyage.[41] It has been held that such statutes violate no constitutional provision.[42]

Jurisdiction of original county.— When a new county is created crimes thereafter committed are not cognizable in the court of the county from which it was created unless the statute continues the prior jurisdiction, but it is proper for the legislature, unless prohibited by a constitutional provision, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the courts, and to continue the jurisdiction of the courts of the old county indefinitely. State v. Fish, 26 N. C. 219.

(Tenn.) 227, where it was held that a statute providing that offenses committed on board a vessel navigating the waters of the state might be tried in any county through which the boat should pass in the course of its voyage was in violation of the constitutional provision for trial in the county or district in which the crime should be committed.

in one judicial circuit and completed in another it is within the jurisdiction of the courts of either to inquire into and try the same as though it had been wholly committed therein;[44] but this is subject to the constitutional provision that the offender is entitled to a trial in the district where the crime was committed as constituted by law, and also to the statute requiring that the trial of offenses punishable with death shall be had in the county where the offenses were committed, when that can be done without great inconvenience.[45]

b. Offenses Beyond Limits of Federal District. The venue of offenses committed on the high seas, or elsewhere out of the jurisdiction of any particular state or district, is in the district where the offender is apprehended or into which he is first brought.[46]

B. Change of Venue — 1. Right to Change — a. Right of Accused. At common law, when a fair and impartial trial could not be had in the county where the crime was committed, and the indictment had been removed into the king's bench by certiorari, that court could on application of the accused change the venue to another county.[47] In the United States the power to change the venue in criminal cases is almost wholly a creature of statutes.[48] A statute conferring the right to a change of venue on the accused is not unconstitutional under the provision that he shall have a trial by an impartial jury of the county.[49] The right to a change of venue is not a vested right, and a constitutional or statutory provision granting it may be repealed or modified.[50]

b. Right of Prosecution. Some cases hold that under a constitutional provision securing to the accused a trial by jury in the county or district in which the crime was committed the trial cannot be transferred to another county on motion of the district attorney over the objection or without the consent of the accused.[51] Where, however, the constitution contains no express provision as to

It must appear that the prejudice against him is so great as to prevent him from receiving a fair and impartial trial, and where evidence before the court is conflicting its decision will not be reversed upon appeal. If the affidavits tending to show prejudice are met by an equal or greater number, the court may properly in its discretion deny the application.[58] On the other hand, where the affidavits show by a preponder-

Decisions to the contrary.—In some states, however, it has been held that a statute empowering the court to hear evidence and from it to determine whether the accused is entitled to a change of venue does not deprive the accused of his right thereto where he makes a case in conformance to the statute or shows reasonable grounds for a belief that he cannot have an impartial trial, and it is the duty of the court to grant his application. of the judge against the accused is not alone a sufficient reason for a change of venue.[61] In many states, however, statutes provide substantially that where it appears that a judge is prejudiced against the prisoner or interested in the case a change of venue may be had.[62] Facts and circumstances very clearly showing the prejudice must be proved by affidavits or other competent evidence, and unless this is done the denial of the application will be sustained.[63]

3. CHANGE ON COURT'S OWN MOTION. It seems that the court has no power of its own motion to change the venue, unless such power is conferred by statute as it is in some jurisdictions.[64]

4. APPLICATION AND PROCEDURE — a. Jurisdiction to Change Venue. The court in which the accused is called upon to plead has the sole jurisdiction to change the venue,[65] unless, as is the rule in England and in some of the states, the proceedings have been removed by certiorari to a superior court.[66]

b. Application — (1) IN GENERAL. A petition and affidavit for a change of venue may be dispensed with and the change may be made by consent.[67] A change of venue may be granted on an oral application, if assented to by the prosecution,[68] unless a written application is made necessary by statute;[69] but where the change is made on formal application and affidavit, the facts on which

63. Prejudice will not be presumed from the remarks of the court in passing sentence (State v. Hale, 65 Iowa 575, 22 N. W. 682), in discussing the testimony (State v. Bohan, 19 Kan. 28), in ruling against the accused on a previous trial (State v. Bohan, 19 Kan. 28), from a refusal to admit the defendant to bail (State v. Alexander, 66 Mo. 148), or from language reprimanding other persons who were indicted with the accused (State v. Stark, 63 Kan. 529, 66 Pac. 243, 88 Am. St. Rep. 251, 54 L. R. A. 910). But the remark by the judge while selecting the jury that "I intend to give the defendant a better jury than he is entitled to" indicates such prejudice as requires a change of venue. State v. Read, 49 Iowa 85. the affiant believes that a fair trial cannot be had must be stated.[70] It is not necessary to state that the motion is not made for the purpose of delay.[71] Where, after an application for a change of venue is granted, a new indictment is found and the accused is arrested thereunder, and the former indictment is quashed, a new application for a change of venue is necessary;[72] and the same is true where a new trial has been ordered on a reversal for an abuse of discretion in refusing a change of venue.[73] An application to change to a particular county may be overruled. The proper practice is to move for a change to any county in which a fair trial can be had.[74]

(II) Time of Application. The application for a change of venue must be made after issue has been joined,[75] but it is not material, if sufficient facts are stated in the affidavit, that an attempt shall have been made to secure a jury.[76] As a general rule a change of venue ought to be applied for as soon after issue joined as possible, after the grounds for the change become known to the applicant;[77] and the application may be denied for lack of diligence, although it is made some time before trial.[78] In some of the states the right to apply for a change of venue continues until the trial begins, but cannot be made thereafter,[79] and the trial begins when the panel is completed and the jury sworn.[80] The affidavit should state when the facts which call for a change of venue came to deponent's knowledge,[81] and if the application is made within a reasonable period thereafter, no reason exists why it cannot be made at a subsequent term to that at which the accused was arraigned.[82]

(III) Notice. On an application for a change of venue in a criminal case the applicant, whether the prosecution or the accused, must within a reasonable time give notice of its filing to the other side, as required by the statutes.[83]

(11) Counter-Affidavits and Other Evidence. In most jurisdictions counter-affidavits are admissible on the hearing of the application for a change of venue.[89] The court also has authority to call and examine other persons as to the existence of the alleged ground of change,[90] but it may refuse to hear oral testimony and require all evidence to be in the form of affidavits.[91] The court may also take[92] or refuse[93] oral evidence to test the credibility of the persons whose affidavits are submitted.[94]

d. Hearing and Determination. It is not error to postpone the determination of the application until after the examination of the jurors,[95] and the fact that a fair and impartial jury has been obtained pending the application may justify the court in denying it,[96] although other facts entitling the accused to it seem to exist.[97] A failure to procure a jury, or delay or difficulty in obtaining impartial jurors, is not conclusive on a motion for a change of venue.[98] The burden of proof is on the applicant to show good grounds for a change of venue.[99] The question should not be determined upon the personal conviction of the court but upon the evidence,[1] and a change should be granted on the ground of prejudice only when the court is satisfied that the prejudice is such as to prevent a fair trial.[2]

e. Second Application. By statute more than one change of venue is often prohibited,[3] and generally, where the statute makes no provision for a second change, a prohibition of more than one change will be implied.[4]

f. Imposing Conditions on Granting. When the granting of a change of venue is within the discretion of the court, it is in the discretion of the court to impose conditions on granting a change of venue,[5] and it may require a plea to be first entered,[6] or, on application by the prosecution, where defendant states that he is unable to defray the expenses of the attendance of his witnesses in another county, the court may direct the prosecution to pay the same.[7]

g. County to Which Change May Be Made. The selection of the county to which the venue shall be changed is within the judicial discretion, where the statute does not in terms direct a change of venue to a particular county;[8] but a statute requiring a change of venue to the nearest county free from exceptions must be strictly obeyed,[9] unless objection is waived by the accused by going to trial in the county to which the change has been made.[10]

h. Order Making or Refusing Change. Unless it is required by a statute, as is the case in some jurisdictions,[11] an order for a change of venue need not specify the cause of removal,[12] particularly where the cause is stated in the application.[13] The order will not be invalidated by mere technical errors,[14] or by delay in Exceptions.— The rule stated in the text seems not to apply to applications to a justice of the peace (State v. Minski, 7 Iowa 336); and where pending an application the judge to whom it was made dies, a second application to his successor on account of prejudice cannot be denied on the ground that a change of venue has been granted (Duggins v. State, 66 Ind. 350). The statutory rule that in no case shall a second removal be allowed does not prevent a defendant from procuring one on a second indictment, although he has obtained one on a former indictment. Where several counties are comprised in one circuit or district, it is improper and generally unconstitutional to transfer the cause to a county outside the district in which the indictment was found (State v. Flynn, 31 Ark. 35; State v. Kindig, 55 Kan. 113, 39 Pac. 1028; State v. Knapp, 40 Kan. 148, 19 Pac. 728; State v. Steen, 115 Mo. 474, 22 S. Recognizance.— Where a statute requires the accused to enter into a recognizance for his appearance before a change of venue is granted, an order granting the change is in-filing.[15] On change of venue in a criminal case, until the prisoner has been transferred, the court granting the change of venue can reopen the proceedings with a view to the modification or rescission of the first order, or the substitution of another order.[16]

i. Presence of Accused. Whether an order changing the venue made in the absence of the accused is valid under constitutional provisions has been decided variously. It has been held that inasmuch as the application for a change of venue is no substantive part of the trial of the accused his presence is immaterial if his counsel is there to represent him,[17] and particularly is this true where the application is made by him.[18] But it has been held that, where an application is made and acted on in the absence of the accused and of his counsel, the order based on it is invalid under a constitutional provision that the accused shall enjoy the right to be heard by himself and counsel.[19]

j. Objections and Exceptions. All objections and exceptions to the sufficiency of the proceedings, or to the propriety of the change on which the order granting change of venue is based, must be made before the court granting it. The order changing the venue cannot be attacked collaterally in the court where the trial is had.[20] Objections to mere irregularities or informalities in the order or in the papers transmitted from the court in which the change was made should be promptly taken on arraignment, and if the accused pleads and is tried, objections to irregularities which might be made on arraignment are waived, and come too late after verdict.[21]

5. Effect of Change and Subsequent Proceedings — a. Record or Transcript — (i) Filing. A full transcript of the record and proceedings of the court in which the change of venue was granted should be filed in the court to which the venue

is changed,[22] but this will be presumed to have been done when nothing appears to the contrary.[23]

(II) Contents. The order, not the record or the certified transcript, confers jurisdiction. The transcript is merely evidence; and where it is defective the remedy is to move for an order directing the clerk to correct it, or to remove the original record by certiorari.[24] What the record or transcript of the proceedings shall contain depends usually upon statutory provision. It ought to show the name of the court,[25] that the grand jury was impaneled and an indictment found[26] and returned in open court,[27] that a statute requiring the original indictment to be transferred has been complied with,[28] and the reasons for the change of venue.[29] It need not include evidence taken on the preliminary examination,[30] the bill of exceptions or charge to the jury,[31] nor the formula by which the grand jury was constituted.[32] Nor need there be an averment that the venue was changed to the nearest county.[33] The certified copy of the indictment must be identical with the original, and contain the names of all persons indicted.[34]

(III) Certification. Inaccuracies in the clerk's certificate may be disregarded,[35] and he may amend it at any time.[36] It has been held[37] and also denied[38] that the clerk's seal may be dispensed with. the original papers from the files, it is sufficient and proper that he send a transcript thereof properly certified;[41] and this is true where a statute requires a transcript to be sent, even though the order directs the originals to be sent.[42] Unless a statute provides otherwise the fact that the certified transcript of the indictment is sent in place of the original, and the accused is tried thereon, is not error.[43]

e. Jurisdiction After Change — (i) In General. It is generally considered that the court granting the change of venue loses jurisdiction, and jurisdiction vests in the court to which the venue is changed, on the entry of the order making the change, and before the original papers in the case have been transmitted to or filed in the latter court,[44] although the court granting the change may, where application is made at the same term and before the papers have been transferred, set aside its own order changing the venue,[45] on notice to[46] or with the consent of the accused;[47] and it may release the accused on bail.[48] Under some statutes requiring the clerk to make and transmit a transcript, the court making the change does not lose jurisdiction, and it does not vest in the court to which the change is made, until the requirements of the statute have been complied with.[49] If the court to which the cause has been transferred has by statute complete jurisdiction of the crime it may allow the indictment to be amended,[50] but generally the new court has no jurisdiction to vacate or amend the records of the court from which the cause has been removed,[51] although it may on application either by certiorari[52] or other appropriate remedy compel the removal of papers to it, or obtain fuller transcripts of the records of the court from which the case came.[53]

(II) Waiver of Right to Trial in County. An application for a change of venue by the accused is a waiver of his constitutional right to a trial by a jury of the county where the offense was committed.[54]

d. Proceedings After Change — (I) In General. It is usually provided that the court to which the change is made shall have the same jurisdiction and proceed in the same manner as though the prosecution had been begun in it originally.[55] The court may at any time during the term order the indictment filed,[56] or the transcript of the record transmitted spread upon its records.[57]

(II) Arraignment. Where the prisoner has been arraigned and has pleaded to the indictment before the change of venue, a second arraignment and plea in the new court are not necessary,[58] but a new arraignment is not reversible error.[59]

(III) Remand. After a change of venue the cause may be remanded to the original county by agreement between the prisoner and the state,[60] but not by the court on its own motion.[61]

VIII. LIMITATION OF PROSECUTIONS.

A. In General. In most jurisdictions there are statutes limiting the time within which prosecutions for crime may be commenced. Such statutes are to be given a reasonably strict construction in favor of the accused and against the prosecution.[62] By the weight of authority they do not apply to crimes previously committed, unless clearly retrospective in their terms.[63] A statute extending the time for the prosecution of certain crimes, although it may not affect cases in which the period of limitation has expired, extends those limitations which have not expired at the date of its passage.[64]

B. Specific Limitations Applicable — 1. In State Courts. The periods of limitation applicable to prosecutions for crime differ widely in the various states according to the statutory provisions existing in each.[65] A limitation applicable to a prosecution for a fine or forfeiture does not apply to a crime punishable by imprisonment,[66] but a fine is barred by a lapse of this period should it be imposed as exclusive punishment or in conjunction with imprisonment.[67]

2. In Federal Courts. By the federal statutes it is provided in substance that no person shall be prosecuted for treason or other capital offense, wilful murder excepted, or for any offense not capital, except crimes under the revenue laws or the slave-trade laws, unless the indictment is found within three years after the offense has been committed. Indictments for crimes under the revenue laws or slave-trade laws may be instituted within five years, as may also be all suits or prosecutions for penalties or forfeitures.[68] An entry of goods at a custom-house by a fraudulent invoice,[69] and attempts to defraud the government of taxes on distilled spirits,[70] or by the prosecution of a false claim or by false testimony,[71] are crimes under the revenue laws to which the five years' limitation is applicable; but an offense arising under the act[72] establishing a money-order system is not an offense under the revenue law, and the limitation applicable thereto is now three years.[73]

C. Commencement of Period of Limitation — 1. Particular Crimes. This is always an important, and sometimes a difficult, point to determine. The period of limitation in homicide runs from the death, not from the wounding;[74] in bigamy, from the date of the bigamous marriage, not from the subsequent cohabitation;[75] in embezzlement or conversion, from the date of the actual misappropriation, not from the date when the accused was called upon to account;[76] in receiving stolen goods, from the actual reception and not from mere possession;[77] in obtaining money under false pretenses, from the date the money was obtained, not from the date of the making of the false statement;[78] and in seduction, from the date of the sexual intercourse and not from the date of the promise made.[79]

2. CONTINUING OFFENSES. Where the offense is continuous, the statute of limitations does not apply where some portion of the crime is within the period, although another portion thereof is not. Thus a prosecution for obstructing a public road may be begun after the statutory period has elapsed, subsequent to the erection of the obstruction, if it still exists within the period of limitations prior to the indictment.[80] The rule also applies to bigamous cohabitation,[81] and according to some of the cases to conspiracy where it continues.[82] It has been held, however, that the crime of withholding pension money, under a statute, is not a continuous one, but is complete on a refusal to pay on demand;[83] and that the crime of deserting one's wife is not a continuous one, but is to be regarded as having been committed when the defendant left his wife.[84]

D. Suspension and Running of Statute — 1. SUSPENSION — a. Absence or Non-Residence of Accused. As a rule where a person after he has committed a crime absconds and absents himself from the state, his absence suspends the running of the statute of limitations.[85]

b. Fugitives From Justice. One who has fled out of the jurisdiction of the court to escape arrest after the statute of limitations has begun to run cannot count the time of his absence as part of the period of limitations;[86] and one is a

People v. Willis, 23 Misc. (N. Y.) 568, 52 N. Y. Suppl. 808. And in Illinois it has been held that the statute of limitations does not commence to run in case of a conspiracy for a criminal purpose, until the commission of the last overt act in furtherance thereof. And in the federal courts, under statutes requiring an overt act as well as a conspiring, it has been held that where a conspiracy is formed, and an overt act done in pursuance thereof, the crime is consummated, that the statute begins to run and that subsequent overt acts do not render it a continuing crime (U. S. v. Owen, 32 Fed. 534, 13 Sawy. 53), and that it cannot be said that there is a new conspiracy for each overt act, or whenever a new party is brought into the scheme, so as to make the statute begin to run from that time (U. a fugitive from justice even though he has not left the state, where he has successfully hidden or concealed himself within its limits.[87]

c. Concealment of Crime. As a general rule the fact that the accused conceals his crime does not prevent the running of the statute;[88] but it is otherwise in some jurisdictions by express statutory provision.[89]

d. Imprisonment of Accused. The fact that the accused is in prison during a portion of the time limited by the statute of limitations does not suspend the running of the statute during the period of his imprisonment.[90]

2. Computation of Time. In computing the time under a statute requiring a prosecution to be begun within a certain period after the commission of the crime the day on which the crime was committed will be excluded.[91] A statute which declares that the time within which an act is to be done shall be computed by excluding the first day and including the last applies to criminal statutes of limitation,[92] and it has been held that the term "months" in a statute of limitations means lunar months.[93]

3. Indictment For Higher Offense Than Is Proved. If on an indictment for a felony the accused is found guilty of some less crime included in the felony and which constitutes a part of it, the conviction cannot be sustained where the crime of which he is convicted is barred by the statute of limitations, although the crime of which he was indicted is not thus barred.[94] Thus where one is

St. (1878) § 1045, means a departure of the offender from the place where the crime was committed to another part of the United States for the purpose of avoiding punishment for any offense (U. S. v. Smith, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16,332, Brunn. Col. Cas. 82, 4 Day (Conn.) 121; U. S. v. White, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,675, 5 Cranch C. C. 38; U. S. v. White, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,676, 5 Cranch C. indicted for murder and found guilty only of manslaughter, or of murder in the first degree and found guilty of murder in the second or third degree, he should be discharged when the crime of which he is convicted is outlawed, although the prosecution for the crime for which he is indicted is not.[95]

4. Commencement of Prosecution. If a statute provides that an indictment must be found within the period of limitation, a failure to find the indictment within such period bars the prosecution of the offense,[96] and making a complaint and procuring a warrant for the arrest of the accused does not take the case out of the statute.[97] On the other hand, where the statute simply provides that the prosecution must be commenced within a specified period, a complaint and warrant of arrest issued thereon and executed without unnecessary delay will constitute a commencement of the prosecution.[98] And such would be the effect of the filing of a valid presentment, where it is the practice to try the accused on a presentment as distinguished from an indictment.[99] Where the facts relating to the commencement of the prosecution are controverted the question is for the jury.[1]

case a new indictment is found, computed as part of the period of limitation, but must be deducted,[2] provided the same offense and the same offender were charged in both indictments.[3] Finding an indictment within a year prevents a bar of the statute from attaching, although the case is afterward prosecuted by information filed after the period of limitation has expired.[4]

IX. FORMER JEOPARDY.

A. In General — 1. Common-Law Rule. It is a universally accepted principle of the common law that no person shall be placed in jeopardy more than once for the same offense. If therefore a defendant has been once fairly acquitted or convicted upon an indictment before any court of competent jurisdiction, he may plead his former acquittal or conviction in bar of a subsequent prosecution for the same offense. The plea in the former case is called a plea of autrefois acquit; in the latter a plea of autrefois convict.[5]

2. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions — a. In General. The principles of the common law providing for pleas of autrefois acquit and autrefois convict have been embodied substantially in the federal constitution and in the various state constitutions, in the form of express provisions that no person shall be subject to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb for the same offense. The provision in the federal constitution[6] to this effect is applicable only to crimes against, and trials under, federal laws, and not to prosecutions by the states;[7] but state constitutions contain a similar provision.[8] involve the loss of life or limb, is not in conflict with the spirit and meaning of the constitutional provision against twice putting in jeopardy for the same offense.[9] So also statutes authorizing an increased punishment for offenses subsequent to a first offense are not in violation of such constitutional provision, as the increased punishment for the later offense is no part of the punishment for the first.[10] A statute authorizing a nolle prosequi to be entered in a trial where a material variance occurs justifying the acquittal of the accused,[11] or permitting the court to detain the prisoner until an information is preferred, where he has been acquitted on the ground of variance, which may be obviated by a new information,[12] is not unconstitutional.

3. Who May Urge Defense. A person who has been placed on trial before a competent court and a jury impaneled and sworn, but who by his own act during the course of the proceedings makes it impossible for a valid verdict or judgment to be rendered against him, is not entitled on a subsequent indictment for the same offense to urge the defense of former jeopardy.[13]

4. Jeopardy of Joint Defendants. Where two or more are jointly indicted, but separately tried, the first trial does not constitute a former jeopardy as to the defendants subsequently tried, and the acquittal of one cannot be pleaded by the other as a bar at his subsequent trial.[14]

5. Offenses and Proceedings Where Former Jeopardy Is a Defense. The constitutional provisions expressly mentioning former jeopardy of life and limb are identical in their spirit and in the protection which they give to the principles of the common law.[15] The provisions of the federal constitution in regard to former jeopardy do not apply to proceedings in rem.[16] Nor do such constitutional provisions have any application to civil actions. making an act a crime, permits the recovery of a penalty for its commission, the trial of the offender for the crime is no bar to an action for the penalty.[17] But the doctrine of former jeopardy and the constitutional guarantees are applicable to trials for misdemeanors as well as to trials for felonies.[18]

B. Nature and Elements of Former Jeopardy — 1. Time When Jeopardy Attaches. The submission of an indictment to the grand jury and the examination of witnesses before them,[19] or even the finding of the indictment,[20] does not amount to a putting in jeopardy; but the accused is placed in jeopardy where he has pleaded and has been put on trial before a court of competent jurisdiction upon an indictment valid and sufficient in form and substance to sustain a conviction, and the jury has been sworn and impaneled and charged with the case.[21] Jeopardy does not attach until an issue has been joined; and therefore a defendant has not been in jeopardy where he has not pleaded[22] or where he has been permitted to withdraw his plea.[23]

a statute allowing the imposition of fines upon public officers for certain illegal acts, is not a bar to an indictment under another statute which makes the act for which the officer was fined a crime.[24]

3. PAYMENT OF COSTS TO OPEN DEFAULT. The payment by the defendant of the costs in a criminal case before a justice in order to open his default does not constitute a former jeopardy or bar a further prosecution.[25]

4. JUDGMENT ON RECOGNIZANCE. And a judgment against the accused on a recognizance for failure to appear is not a former jeopardy, and is no bar to another prosecution for the same offense.[26]

5. FRAUDULENT OR COLLUSIVE PROSECUTION. The general rule is that a former conviction or acquittal procured by the fraud of the defendant is no bar to a subsequent prosecution. Thus where the accused hearing of a pending or threatened prosecution by indictment voluntarily or by a collusive arrest goes before a justice of the peace and is by him convicted of a misdemeanor he cannot subsequently plead former jeopardy to an indictment for the same crime.[27] If the prosecution was controlled and managed by the accused he has never been in jeopardy; and the proceedings being void the state may attack it collaterally.[28]

charged with the consent of the accused, he cannot object on a subsequent trial that he has already been in jeopardy; and where the record is silent his consent will be presumed.[32] The same rule applies where during the trial a juror is discharged on account of sickness, and the trial is begun anew with another juror;[33] but the action of the court in discharging a juror of its own motion without sufficient cause and against the objection of the defendant, after the jury has been sworn, is a bar to a further prosecution.[34]

9. REFUSAL TO ALLOW CHALLENGE. The fact that the court improperly refuses to allow the accused a peremptory challenge and proceeds with the case, so that there is a mistrial on account of the presence of the juror challenged does not entitle the defendant to a plea of former jeopardy on a subsequent trial.[35]

C. Jurisdiction of Court — 1. DISCHARGE OR BINDING OVER BY MAGISTRATE. Where a justice has jurisdiction either to try and finally dispose of a case or to bind over the accused to answer in a higher court, and he acts merely in his capacity as an examining magistrate, his judgment either discharging the accused for want of probable cause to find him guilty, or binding him over to answer in a superior court, cannot be pleaded as former jeopardy.[36]

2. PROCEEDINGS BEFORE COURT WITHOUT JURISDICTION. An acquittal[37] or conviction by a justice of the peace, police magistrate, or other court not having jurisdiction of the offense is not former jeopardy, and is no bar to a subsequent trial in a court which has jurisdiction.[38] So when one is examined on a charge of murder, and the magistrate dismisses the charge of murder but fines the accused for an assault,[39] or holds him on a charge of manslaughter,[40] the accused cannot plead former jeopardy. An acquittal in one county is no bar to an indictment in any other for the same offense, unless it appears that the offense was committed in the former.[41]

3. Verdict Taking Case Out of Jurisdiction. Where the verdict of a jury in a police court fixes the grade of the crime beyond the power of the court to impose sentence there is no jeopardy, for the reason that there is no jurisdiction to enter judgment.[42]

4. Courts of Concurrent Jurisdiction. Where two courts have concurrent jurisdiction of an offense, the verdict or decision rendered in that court which first acquires jurisdiction constitutes former jeopardy and is a bar to a subsequent trial in the other.[43]

5. Character and Constitution of Court. Where the proceedings are void because of the character or constitution of the court, as where the term of the court is not authorized,[44] or one of the judges is related to the defendant,[45] or for any reason incompetent to try the case,[46] there is no jeopardy which can be pleaded in bar to a subsequent prosecution.

6. Discharge on Objection to Jurisdiction. A discharge on an objection that the court has no jurisdiction is of course insufficient to support a plea of former jeopardy.[47]

7. Judgment Arrested For Lack of Jurisdiction. Where judgment is arrested at the prisoner's instance upon the ground that there is no jurisdiction, there is no jeopardy, and the accused may be tried again on the same indictment.[48]

D. The Indictment or Information — 1. Prosecution Under Defective Indictment or Information — a. Acquittal. In England an acquittal upon an indictment so defective that, if it had been objected to at the trial, or by motion in arrest of judgment, or by writ of error, it would not have supported a conviction or sentence, has generally been considered as insufficient to support a plea of former acquittal;[49] and this rule has generally been followed in the United States,[50] except in cases expressly governed by some constitutional or statutory provision on the subject.[51]

b. Conviction. In like manner a plea of former jeopardy cannot be maintained where a former conviction of the defendant for the same offense was based upon an indictment which has been set aside as insufficient, or an indictment which was so defective that the conviction is void, unless the accused has undergone sentence.[52]

c. Defective Allegations. A plea of former jeopardy cannot be sustained where the indictment in the former case did not contain the recitals necessary to charge the offense,[53] or did not charge the defendant with any crime known to the law.[54]

2. Quashing of Indictment or Information or Sustaining of Demurrer — a. No Jeopardy. As a general rule where an indictment is quashed on motion as insufficient or a demurrer thereto is sustained and the accused is thereupon discharged, there is no such jeopardy as will bar a prosecution on another indictment for the same offense.[55]

W. 802, holding that under the Iowa statute, if the demurrer is sustained because the indictment contains matter which is a legal defense to the indictment the judgment is a bar to a subsequent prosecution.

b. Failure of Subsequent Grand Jury to Indict. A statutory provision that if after a demurrer to an indictment has been sustained a new indictment is not found by the next grand jury defendant shall be discharged does not bar a further prosecution where the case was submitted to three consecutive grand juries.[56]

c. Reversal of Decision Sustaining Demurrer. Where a demurrer to a valid indictment is erroneously sustained, and the judgment sustaining the demurrer is reversed, the defendant has not been in jeopardy and may be subsequently tried for the same offense.[57]

3. Dismissal of Indictment or Information — a. Without Consent of Accused. By the weight of authority, where the accused is arraigned upon a sufficient indictment and pleads, and a jury is impaneled, the dismissal of the indictment without his consent is an acquittal and bars another indictment for the same crime.[58]

b. With Consent of Accused. But where the accused has secured a decision that an indictment is void,[59] or has procured its being quashed,[60] or has been granted an instruction based on its defective character directing the jury to acquit,[61] he is estopped when subsequently indicted to assert that the former indictment was valid.

4. Variance. The effect of a material variance between the allegations of the indictment and the proof is to entitle defendant to an acquittal on the particular indictment, but he is still liable to be tried for his crime. If the accused is acquitted by direction of the court on the ground of material variance, he cannot plead the acquittal as a bar, for he has never been in jeopardy, and when tried on a new indictment the crime then alleged is not the same crime as in the former indictment.[62] And it has been held that if the accused on the prior trial maintained that the variance was material and the court directed a verdict of acquittal been arraigned and in consequence has not pleaded, he is not in jeopardy, although a jury is impaneled and sworn.[67] Nor is he in jeopardy when a jury which was impaneled before his plea is discharged and a new jury is impaneled and sworn.[68]

3. ARRAIGNMENT BEFORE JUSTICE. An arraignment before a justice of the peace who has jurisdiction either to try the case or to act as an examining magistrate and bind over the accused, and who acts in the latter capacity, is not a bar to a subsequent indictment.[69]

4. PLEA OF GUILTY — a. In General. Whether a plea of guilty and judgment and punishment thereon shall constitute former jeopardy depends on the circumstances. A plea of guilty to an indictment, in good faith, with its entry on the record, is former jeopardy, although judgment was suspended,[70] or the prosecution dismissed without the consent of the accused.[71] But the accused is not in jeopardy if his plea of guilty is extorted by duress or by fear of mob violence.[72]

b. Plea Before Justice of Peace. A plea of guilty at a preliminary examination and binding over for a higher court constitutes neither a conviction nor former jeopardy;[73] but such a plea with judgment and sentence, if the magistrate has jurisdiction, is a former conviction and may be so pleaded to a subsequent indictment.[74]

c. Withdrawal of Plea. If the accused withdraws a plea of guilty, with the consent of the court, he waives his defense of former jeopardy.[75]

d. Fraudulent Plea. A plea of guilty fraudulently or collusively entered before a justice, with sentence, is not a bar to an indictment.[76] So also a plea of guilty which the superior court is deceived into accepting for a minor offense, with a discharge thereon, is no defense to a subsequent indictment.[77]

F. Nolle Prosequi or Discontinuance — 1. AS TO ONE OF SEVERAL INDICTMENTS OR COUNTS. A nolle prosequi or discontinuance as to one or more counts of an indictment, or as to one of several indictments, is no bar to a prosecution upon the others.[78]

2. TIME OF ENTRY — a. Before Plea. It is a general rule that a nolle prosequi entered before the defendant is called upon to plead or the jury is impaneled is not equivalent to an acquittal, and does not bar a subsequent prosecution.[79]

The constitutional guarantee of a trial by jury includes the right to have the deliberations of the jury continue after they have heard any evidence, until the occurrence of a sufficient legal reason for their discharge with the chance of a verdict of acquittal at their hands during that time. Hence their unauthorized discharge is an acquittal. McCauley v. State, 26 Ala. 135.

Juryman temporarily leaving jury-box.— Where a juror, directed by the court to leave the jury-box, remains in the court and immediately on defendant's objection is directed cause, operates as an acquittal,[88] unless his absence is caused by his flight, in which case the court may discharge the jury and he may be again indicted.[89] It has been both held[90] and denied[91] that his right to be present may be waived by his counsel.

3. Illness of Juror. The illness of a juror which incapacitates him from performing his duty, either before or after the jury has retired, constitutes such necessity as to justify a discharge, and will not be equivalent to an acquittal.[92]

4. Illness of Judge. Where a jury, after being impaneled and sworn, is discharged on account of the illness of the presiding judge, the accused cannot plead former jeopardy.[93]

5. Expiration of Term of Court. The expiration of a term of the court, in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, discharges a jury in a criminal trial not finished at that time; but this is not an acquittal and the accused may be retried at a subsequent term.[94]

Illness of juror's wife.— A dangerous illness of the wife of a juror is not ground for discharging the jury over the objection of the accused, and where this is done without his knowledge or the knowledge of his counsel it is equivalent to an acquittal and will sustain a plea of former jeopardy. Upchurch v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. 624, 38 S. W. 206, 44 L. R. A. 694.

ardy where the jury before which he was first on trial was discharged on his own motion or with his consent.[95] The silence of the accused does not constitute a consent or a waiver of his constitutional right.[96]

7. Defective Indictment or Information. The accused is not in jeopardy if the indictment or the information is so defective that a verdict and judgment could not be sustained,[97] and where the jury is discharged for that reason without his consent it is not an acquittal.[98]

8. Discharge to Try For Higher Offense. Where on the trial the court, without the consent of the accused, discharges the jury because it is of the opinion that the evidence shows him guilty of a higher crime, for which crime he is subsequently indicted, he is twice in jeopardy and should be acquitted.[99]

9. Absence of Witness. If, after the accused has pleaded, the prosecuting attorney, finding himself unprepared with evidence, withdraws a juror against the objection of the accused, the latter cannot be tried again.[1]

10. Separation of Jury. At the common law, where the jury separated after retiring, they might be discharged and a new jury sworn, by whom the accused might then be tried;[2] and this rule has been followed in some of the states.[3] In other states, however, it has been held that where a jury disperse or separate after they have retired to make up their verdict, such circumstance does not authorize their discharge, and if they are discharged, a plea of former jeopardy should be sustained in a subsequent prosecution.[4] Where, even with the consent of the accused, the separation of the jury is permitted before they retire, and on their reassemblage any of them are missing, and the jury is discharged for this reason, he may afterward plead former jeopardy.[5]

11. Disqualification of Juror. Where the jury are discharged after the trial has begun, by reason of the fact that a juror has become disqualified,[6] or because he was disqualified when he was sworn,[7] there is neither an acquittal nor former jeopardy, although the accused offers to waive the disqualification and proceed with the jurors on the panel, or with a jury of less than the legal number.[8]

12. Misconduct of Jurors. If a juror favorable to the accused fraudulently procures himself to be impaneled, he may be directed to withdraw and the jury be discharged, and although the prisoner was not implicated in the fraud, there is no jeopardy.[9] The same rule applies to misconduct on the part of a juror which would justify the court in discharging him,[10] as where he procures liquor for the other jurors or holds communications with outside parties.[11]

13. Misconduct of Officer. The misconduct of an officer having the jury in charge does not necessarily constitute sufficient ground for discharging the jury against the consent of the accused after the trial has begun.[12]

14. Failure of Jury to Agree. Although there have been some decisions to the contrary,[13] it is now generally held that the discharge of the jury, where after full consideration they fail to agree, and there is no reasonable expectation that they will be able to agree, is not a bar to another trial, on the ground that such a condition of affairs constitutes absolute and urgent necessity, and justifies the court in discharging the jury.[14]

H. Acquittal or Discharge — 1. Acquittal — a. In General. An acquittal of a crime is a bar to a further prosecution for that crime, although the court on the trial may have erroneously favored the defendant.[15] So although the court may have prevented the state from entering a nolle prosequi, or may have misdirected the jury, or erred in admitting illegal, or in rejecting legal, evidence, or the verdict may have been against the evidence, the judgment and verdict of acquittal, if fairly obtained, are conclusive and will bar a subsequent prosecution for the same offense.[16]

b. Acquittal as Principal as Bar to Prosecution as Accessary and Vice Versa. The acquittal of one indicted as a principal is not a bar to his trial as an accessary.[17] So, e converso, one tried and acquitted as an accessary before the fact may be subsequently tried as a principal.[18]

c. Acquittal Before Justice as Bar to Subsequent Indictment. An acquittal before a justice having jurisdiction to try the case and impose sentence constitutes jeopardy, and is a bar to a subsequent indictment for the same crime,[19] but not for another crime of which it forms an ingredient, and of which the justice has no jurisdiction.[20]

d. Acquittal on Indictment as Bar to Trial Before Justice. Although an acquittal on an indictment will not bar a subsequent prosecution before a justice for a minor offense of which the defendant could not have been convicted under the indictment, it will bar a subsequent prosecution for the same offense.[21]

e. Acquittal Under Erroneous Directions. A verdict of not guilty on a direction by the court which, under a statute, it was unauthorized to give is an acquittal, and may be pleaded as such.[22]

f. Acquittal Before Justice as Bar to New Trial on Appeal. Where, by statute, the state is entitled to an appeal which does not reverse the judgment, but is merely to obtain a correct exposition of the law, the prosecution cannot, after appealing from an acquittal before a justice, compel the accused to stand a second trial.[23]

g. Acquittal by "Jury." Acquittal by a jury is not usually requisite to constitute former jeopardy, but under a constitutional provision that no person shall be put in jeopardy a second time after having been once acquitted "by a jury" the immunity extends only to those who have been so acquitted.[24]

h. Acquittal by Court-Martial. An acquittal before a court-martial is no bar to an indictment in a court of law for the same offense,[25] but its findings are entitled to weight as an expression of the opinion of the military court on the prisoner's innocence.[26]

i. Failure to Enter Judgment of Acquittal. The failure of the clerk to enter judgment on a verdict of acquittal does not affect its validity as a bar to a subsequent prosecution.[27]

j. Verdict of Acquittal Rendered on Sunday. An acquittal is not deprived of its effect as a bar by the fact that the verdict was received and the order of discharge entered on Sunday.[28]

k. Reversal of Acquittal. At common law the right of the crown to a writ of error after an acquittal was very much in doubt.[29] Generally in the United States a verdict of acquittal cannot be reversed on an appeal.[30] In a few states, however, an appeal from an acquittal has been allowed by statute, and it has been there held that a new trial ordered on an appeal from an acquittal is not a second jeopardy.[31]

2. DISCHARGE — a. On Preliminary Examination. The discharge of the accused by a justice on a preliminary examination is not a bar to another preliminary examination, or to an indictment and trial, for the accused is not placed in jeopardy by a mere preliminary examination, and his discharge is in no sense an acquittal.[32]

b. For Failure to Prosecute. A discharge for lack of prosecution, being merely from imprisonment or bail and not from the penalty, is not an acquittal barring a subsequent indictment,[33] unless it is so provided by statute.[34]

c. Under Habeas Corpus Proceedings. A discharge on habeas corpus, being merely from custody and not from the penalty, does not operate as an acquittal, and is not a bar to a subsequent indictment.[35]

d. To Try on Another Complaint. The discharge of a prisoner by the judge of a police court, after the trial is partly concluded, because he desires to try him on another complaint, is an acquittal.[36]

e. After Conviction Without Judgment. The plea of prior conviction is good where after a verdict of guilty exceptions are filed, the case continued, and after the expiration of the term the indictment is dismissed and the defendant discharged without day.[37]

I. Conviction — 1. Under Defective Complaint. A conviction before a justice of the peace having jurisdiction is a bar to an indictment, although the proceedings before him were so defective or irregular that they might have been set aside for error.[38]

2. In Court of Limited Jurisdiction. A plea of former conviction to an indictment in a court of general jurisdiction is sustained by proving a conviction in a court of limited jurisdiction upon a prosecution instituted and carried through in good faith,[39] unless the indictment was found prior to the prosecution in the lower court and the defendant had been arrested under it.[40]

3. Conviction of Minor Offense as Bar to Prosecution For Greater. In some states it is held that a conviction in a justice's court having competent jurisdiction of a minor offense which is a misdemeanor is a bar to an indictment for any higher grade of offense of which it forms a part, and which constitutes a felony;[41] but in others this doctrine has been condemned on the principle that there is no identity between the two crimes, and the plea of former conviction under such circumstances has been overruled.[42]

And if a statute provides that a conviction in a court of limited jurisdiction shall be a bar in any court of similar jurisdiction, the conviction is by implication no bar to a subsequent indictment. 4. Necessity For and Effect of Judgment. It has been held [43] and also denied [44] that a former conviction cannot be pleaded in bar unless it has been followed by a judgment.

5. Conviction Under Void Statute. A conviction under a statute which is unconstitutional or otherwise void in a court of limited jurisdiction is no bar to a prosecution on an indictment; [45] but a conviction on an indictment under a valid statute, followed by a sentence to be executed under a statute which has been repealed, is jeopardy, and, although the judgment is invalid for want of a statute under which to punish, the conviction is a bar to a subsequent trial.[46]

6. Conviction of Offense Not Recognized by Statute. A conviction of an offense not recognized by statute is no bar to a prosecution for a statutory offense.[47]

7. Conviction of Employer as Bar to Prosecution of Employee. The conviction of an employer for selling intoxicating liquors is no bar to a subsequent indictment of his employee for the same crime.[48]

8. Conviction of Husband as Bar to Prosecution of Wife and Vice Versa. Nor is a conviction of either a husband or a wife for selling liquor a bar to the conviction of the other for the same crime, although the same testimony proves both crimes.[49]

9. Verdict Set Aside on Application of Defendant — a. For Defect in Indictment or Information. An arrest of judgment for a defect in the information or indictment if granted on the application of defendant will prevent him from pleading the former conviction as a bar.[50]

b. For Illegality. And a plea of former jeopardy cannot be sustained on proof that the conviction of the accused on the former trial was set aside by the trial court because of a void or illegal verdict.[51]

c. Grant of New Trial. Where a new trial is granted on motion of the defendant, and the verdict and conviction set aside, the defendant has thereby waived his right and is estopped to plead the former conviction as a bar to a new indictment.[52]

10. Judgment Reversed on Appeal — a. Estoppel to Plead Conviction. The accused is estopped to plead a prior conviction where his conviction has been reversed for error on an appeal or writ of error brought by himself, although he has served a part of his term of imprisonment.[53]

c. New Trial After Reversal. A defendant waives his right to plead former jeopardy by applying for a new trial. When therefore a new trial is granted in the appellate court, and he is reindicted, or tried on the original indictment, he cannot plead the conviction which was reversed on the appeal as a bar to the prosecution.[55] But where there has been an acquittal on one count of an indictment and a conviction on another, and a new trial is granted, he can plead the acquittal, and can be tried upon that count only upon which he was convicted.[56]

d. Reversal as to Co-Defendant. The effect of the acquittal of a defendant as a bar to his subsequent trial is not affected by the reversal of the judgment of conviction as against a joint defendant.[57]

12. Pendency of Appeal. The fact that an appeal from a judgment of conviction is pending does not deprive the accused of the protection of the conviction as a bar to a new indictment.[59]

J. Identity of Offenses — 1. Necessity For. The general rule is somewhat vaguely stated to be that the plea of former conviction or acquittal must be upon a prosecution for the identical act and crime.[60] This is to be qualified, however, by the statement that the two charges need not be precisely the same in point of degree, for it is enough if an acquittal of the one shows that the defendant could not have been guilty of the other.[61]

2. Rules to Determine Identity — a. In General. Several rules have been laid down by the authorities for determining whether the crimes are identical. One test is to ascertain whether the facts alleged in the second indictment would, if given in evidence, have warranted a conviction on the first, and if this is the case, then the crimes are assumed to be identical. Another test is to inquire, where the two crimes are not the same, whether they grow out of the same transaction; but this test is correct only in a general way, as a single act or transaction may contain elements, each of which are crimes at common law or under different statutes.[62] The safest general rule is that the two offenses must be in substance precisely the same, or they must be of the same nature or the same species, so that the evidence which proves the one would prove the other; or if this is not the case then the one crime must be an ingredient of the other.[63]

b. Sufficiency of Facts Charged in Second Indictment to Sustain Former. A test almost universally applied to determine the identity of the offenses is to ascertain the identity, in character and effect, of the evidence in both cases. If the evidence which is necessary to support the second indictment was admissible

Contempt before congressional committee.— A statute which provides that an act which by the inherent powers of congress may be punished by it as a contempt shall be a misdemeanor punishable by indictment is not invalid as putting the accused twice in jeopardy. In re Chapman, 166 U. Murder.— An acquittal on an indictment for a murder committed by shooting with a gun is no bar to an indictment for a murder under the former, related to the same crime, and was sufficient if believed by the jury to have warranted a conviction of that crime, the offenses are identical, and a plea of former conviction or acquittal is a bar.[64]

3. Periods Covered by Prosecution. An acquittal or a conviction of a crime is no bar to a subsequent indictment for the same offense or the same species of crime, where the latter is alleged to have been committed at a different date from that previously tried, unless the offense is continuous.[65] But where a continuous offense is charged between specified dates, if any portion of the time covered by the indictment has been used on or applied under a former indictment and has resulted in a conviction the former conviction is a bar.[66] committed by beating upon the head with a gun. Guedel v. People, 43 Ill. 226.

4. Several Offenses Involved in Same Transaction — a. In General. The legislature may carve out of a single act or transaction several crimes,[67] so that the individual may, at the same time and in the same transaction, commit several distinct crimes, in which case an acquittal or a conviction of one will not be a bar to an indictment for the other.[68]

Illustrations in cases of conviction.—In the following cases a conviction of the crime first enumerated was held no bar to a prosecution for that coupled with it, although both were involved in the same act: Robbery from the person and assault with intent to commit murder (Wilcox v. State, 6 Lea (Tenn.) 571, 40 Am. Rep. 53); robbery and burglary in the same transaction (Copenhaven v. State, 15 Ga. 264); intoxication and profanity, and disturbing religious worship by the same and other modes (Ball v. State, 67 Miss. 358, 7 So. 353); administering a drug with intent to produce a miscarriage and manslaughter (Lohman v. People, 1 N. Y. 379, 49 Am. Dec. 340); breach of the peace and perjury committed at the trial therefor (Wadlington v. Com., 59 S. W. 851, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1108); disturbing a religious assembly by firing a pistol and an attempt to commit murder at the same time with the same pistol (State v. Ross, 4 Lea (Tenn.) 442); bigamy and adultery (Swancoat v. State, 4 Tex. App. 105); and killing an animal with intent to injure its owner and wantonly killing the same (Irvin v. State, 7 Tex. App. 78).

Illustrations in cases of acquittal.— An acquittal on a prosecution for maliciously shooting and wounding a horse is no bar to a prosecution for shooting with intent to kill, the shooting being one and the same. State v. Horneman, 16 Kan. 452. An acquittal on an indictment for stealing money bars an indictment for stealing a national bank-note, both indictments being for the same act. State v. Moore, 66 Mo. 372. A prosecution and acquittal of perjury to procure a continuance does not bar a prosecution for perjury in the same affidavit to procure an attachment. State v. Williams, 1 N. C. 528.

Aiding escape.— A conviction of aiding A to escape from prison is a bar to an indictment for aiding B to escape when the means and time of the escape were the same. Hurst v. State, 86 Ala. 604, 6 So. 120, 11 Am. St. Rep. 79.

Libel.— An acquittal of libel in a specified newspaper article is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for other libelous words in

b. Less Offense Included in Greater. One who is convicted of a crime less in degree than the offense for which he is indicted is by implication acquitted of the greater offense and may plead the acquittal as a bar to a subsequent indictment for it.[69] On the other hand an acquittal or conviction of an offense which necessarily includes a minor crime is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the latter.[70]

c. Assault and Other Offenses[71] — (i) In General. An assault is a necessary element of many felonies and is usually an element of an attempt to commit the same crimes. An assault also frequently accompanies the commission of other crimes of which it is not a necessary element. It is usually held that an acquittal or conviction of a simple assault and battery, where it is an element of another crime, is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the greater crime.[72] A conviction of an assault is a bar to a prosecution for the battery or mayhem in which it terminated.[73]

(ii) Assault in Different Degrees. A conviction of simple assault, or of assault and battery, where one is indicted for aggravated assault, as for assault

Assault with intent to murder, being an offense of a different nature from threats to kill, a conviction for the one is no bar to a prosecution for the other. Lewis v. State, 1 Tex. App. 323.

Breach of the peace and assault.— A conviction of breach of the peace is a bar to a prosecution for the assault, as the breach of the peace is included in the assault. Com. v. Hawkins, 11 Bush (Ky.) 603; Com. v. Foster, 3 Metc. (Ky.) 1; Com. v. Miller, 5 Dana (Ky.) 320. But see State v. Sly, 4 Oreg. 277. with intent to kill or rape, is an implied acquittal of the crime of the higher grade, and will be a bar to a subsequent indictment for it.[74] It has been held in Indiana, however, that a conviction or acquittal of simple assault and battery does not bar a prosecution for assault with intent to commit a felony.[75]

(III) ASSAULT AND AFFRAY. A conviction of an affray is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for assault and battery involved in the same transaction.[76] And vice versa a conviction of an assault and battery is a bar to an indictment for an affray.[77]

(IV) ASSAULT AND RIOT. A conviction of an assault and battery committed in a riot is no bar to a conviction under an indictment for the riot,[78] unless the assault and riot are so inseparably connected that the evidence which would prove the one will prove the other.[79]

(V) ASSAULT AND HOMICIDE. A conviction or acquittal of assault and battery, or of assault with intent to commit murder, or do grievous bodily harm, is not a bar to a subsequent prosecution for murder or manslaughter, where the person assaulted died of the blows inflicted.[80]

(VI) ASSAULT AND CONTEMPT. A fine inflicted for contempt of court in committing a battery in open court is not a former conviction of that crime, so as to bar an indictment for it.[81]

upon the question whether, where the accused, being indicted for murder, is convicted of manslaughter, or of some degree of homicide less than murder in the first degree, and obtains a new trial, he can be indicted and tried for murder. Some cases hold that the conviction of the less degree of homicide is an implied acquittal of the murder, and bars a subsequent indictment for it.[83] Other cases deny this doctrine altogether.[84]

e. Abduction and Kidnapping. A conviction of simple abduction will bar a subsequent indictment for kidnapping or felonious abduction.[85]

f. Larceny and Kindred Offenses. Larceny is usually involved in burglary, receiving stolen goods, and the statutory offenses of false pretenses and embezzlement, and always in the crime of robbery. Whether acquittal or conviction of larceny will be a bar to an indictment for any of these crimes connected with it, and whether, on the other hand, a conviction of any of these crimes will be a bar to an indictment for the larceny which is involved in it, depends upon the circumstances of the case. If the two offenses are identical in time, place, and motive, so that the proof of one is necessary to convict of the other, the conviction of either, in the absence of a statute, is a bar to the prosecution for the other. But generally the fact that these crimes are parts of one transaction does not make them. The cases sustain these general principles with some lack of harmony in applying them to the facts.[86]

a prosecution for the other. State v. Martin, 76 Mo. 337. Larceny and receiving stolen goods.— An acquittal or conviction of larceny is no bar to a subsequent indictment for receiving stolen goods, as the two crimes are separate and independent, require different facts to prove them and the proof of either will not sustain a charge of the other. Foster v. State, 39 Ala. 229. See also Pat v. State, 116 Ga. 92, 42 S. E. 389. Where both are included in one indictment, a conviction of one is an implied acquittal of the other, and bars a subsequent prosecution for it. George v. State, 59 Nebr. 163, 80 N. W. 486; U. H. 36, 6 Am. Rep. 456.

Burglary with intent to steal and receiving stolen goods are not the same crime, nor can the same individual be guilty of both of them so far as the same goods are concerned, and an acquittal of burglary is no bar to a prosecution for receiving the goods which were taken from the house by the burglar. Larceny and false pretenses.— In England, by statute, one convicted or acquitted of obtaining goods by false pretenses cannot be convicted on the same facts of larceny (Reg. v. King, [1897] 1 Q. L. 183); but, generally, in the United States, as the constituents of the two offenses are not the same, a conviction or acquittal of either crime is not a bar to an indictment for the other. Dominick v. State, 40 Ala. 680, 91 Am. Dec. 496. But see State v. Reiff, 14 Wash. 664, 45 Pac. 318.

Larceny and bringing stolen property into state.— An acquittal of larceny in another state is a bar to a proceeding for bringing stolen property into the state. In re Hess, 5 Kan. App. 763, 48 Pac. 596.

Keeping liquors for sale and keeping a place in which they may be sold (State v. Moriarty, 50 Conn. 415; State v. Brown, 75 Iowa 768, 39 N. W. 829; State v. Graham, 73 Iowa 553, 35 N. Ct. 237) are different offenses.

See 14 Cent. Dig. tit. "Criminal Law," § 397.

Separate sales.— A conviction of selling beer without an inspection cannot be pleaded in bar to another sale under the same circumstances, as each and every sale without inspection is a separate offense. State v. Broeder, 90 Mo. App. 169.

h. Violation of Sunday Laws and Other Offenses. A conviction of violating the Sunday law is no bar to a subsequent indictment for maintaining a disorderly house,[88] for the sale of liquors without a license,[89] or for the illegal sale and keeping of liquors,[90] as the evidence differs in each case, and the latter offenses are distinct crimes on whatever day they may be committed.

i. Forgery and Other Offenses. The crime of forgery and the crime of uttering a forged writing are by statute and at common law distinct offenses, and usually an acquittal of one is no bar to a prosecution for the other.[91] But it has been held that an acquittal of the forgery of an instrument will be a bar to a subsequent indictment for obtaining money by its use, where the forgery and the obtaining of the money are parts of the same transaction in point of time,[92] although not where they are separated in point of time, so that the evidence which would convict of one would not convict of the other.[93]

j. Arson and Other Offenses. At common law to constitute arson the house burned must be a dwelling house, but statutes have enlarged its scope so that it includes the burning of other buildings. Hence under an indictment in two counts, one for burning a dwelling, the other for burning a barn, a general verdict of guilty of arson applies to both, and there is no acquittal of either by implication.[94] Where by statute arson is divided into different degrees, a conviction of any degree implies an acquittal of the others.[95] A conviction of arson in burning a dwelling which results in the death of a person living in it is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the homicide.[96]

k. Gaming and Other Offenses. A conviction under a municipal ordinance of keeping a gambling-house is not a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the same act as a nuisance at common law,[97] and as the crimes of keeping a gambling-house or gambling apparatus and of gambling and betting are distinct a conviction of either is no bar to a prosecution for the other.[98]

l. Conspiracy and Other Offenses. Where a conspiracy to commit a crime is a substantive offense, as is generally the case, neither an acquittal nor a conviction of a conspiracy to commit a crime is a bar to a prosecution for the commission of that crime.[99] For the same reason an acquittal[1] or a conviction[2] of a particular crime is no bar to a subsequent indictment for a conspiracy to commit the same.[3]

m. Rape and Other Offenses. A conviction of an attempt to commit rape is a bar to a subsequent indictment for the crime of rape,[4] but a prosecution for the crime of rape is not barred by a conviction of an assault and battery,[5] although doubtless an acquittal upon the charge of assault and battery would be a bar to a subsequent indictment for rape where both charges are based on the same transaction.[6] Under the general principle condemning the splitting of criminal acts into several crimes, it has been held that a conviction of rape is a bar to any offense included in the transaction,[7] but this rule is not universally recognized.[8]

5. Offenses Against Different Sovereignties — a. State and Municipality. Crimes are often punishable under municipal ordinances while also punishable under the state law as offenses against the state. Where the same act constitutes two crimes, one violating a city ordinance and the other violating a state statute, it is generally held that one charged therewith may be tried for both, and that a conviction or an acquittal of either is no bar to a conviction of the other.[9]

b. Different States. A conviction in one state for an act in violation of its laws is not a bar to a prosecution in another for the same act if it violates the laws of the latter,[10] unless by compact between the states it has been agreed that the jurisdiction shall vest exclusively in the state first apprehending and arresting the accused.[11]

3. A defendant who has been acquitted as an accessary before the fact to the commission of a crime cannot be subsequently tried for conspiracy to commit the crime, as the evidence necessary to support the second indictment would have procured a legal conviction on the first. 6. Prosecution For Part of Single Offense. The theft of several articles at one and the same time constitutes an indivisible offense, and a conviction or acquittal of the larceny of any one or more of them is a bar to a subsequent prosecution for the larceny of the others.[13] So where several forged papers are uttered at one time and to the same party it is one transaction, and a conviction of uttering one is a bar to a trial for uttering another.[14]

7. Offenses Committed Against Different Persons — a. Homicide and Assault. Crimes are not usually identical if committed against different persons, but by the weight of authority where the same act or stroke results in the death of two persons an acquittal or conviction of the murder of one bars a subsequent prosecution for the killing of the other, because the killing is but one crime and cannot be divided.[15] The rule also applies where the same blow produces a separate assault and battery on two different persons.[16] But where one assaults[17] or kills[18] two persons by separate shots or strokes, although in the same riot or affray, an acquittal or conviction of one assault or homicide is no bar to an indictment for the other, as they are distinct acts.[19]

b. Larceny. An acquittal or conviction of the larceny of property alleged in the indictment to belong to A is not a bar to an indictment and prosecution for larceny of property at the same time which is alleged to belong to B,[20] unless it is actually proved that A and B are the same person, in which case the former conviction or acquittal is a bar.[21]

c. Arson. An acquittal of burning a dwelling-house and barn belonging to A and B is no bar to an indictment for the same offense which alleges that the property belonged to A and C.[22]

d. Forgery. An immaterial difference in the allegation of the name forged between two indictments does not destroy the identity of the crime,[23] but on an indictment for forging the election returns of one township an acquittal of forging the returns of another is no bar.[24]

X. PRELIMINARY COMPLAINT, AFFIDAVIT, WARRANT, EXAMINATION, COMMITMENT, AND SUMMARY TRIAL.

A. Preliminary Proceedings in General — 1. Modes of Instituting Prosecution — a. In General. Broadly speaking there are four modes by which an offender may be brought to justice. The accuser may give information to the public prosecuting officer, which will result in an indictment being prepared and sent to the grand jury, or he may file a written complaint on oath before the examining magistrate, obtain a warrant of arrest, followed by a preliminary examination, and the binding over of the accused; or the grand jury may act upon its own knowledge that a crime has been committed, or upon information from others, and make a presentment against the offender; or the prosecuting attorney may file an information.[25] By statute minor offenses may be prosecuted summarily on complaint before a magistrate.[26]

b. Definition of "Complaint." "The term 'complaint' is a technical one, descriptive of proceedings before magistrates."[27] It is the preliminary charge or accusation against an offender, made by a private person or an informer to a justice of the peace or other proper officer, charging that the offender has violated the law.[28]

2. Constitutional Provisions — a. In General. The legislature generally has power to prescribe the conditions to be fulfilled before a warrant can be issued,[29] and to regulate complaints in criminal cases. An act which provides for an entry by the clerk on the record of the statement of the offense of which the accused is charged, which shall stand as a complaint, does not deprive the accused of his constitutional right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation.[30]

25. U. S. v. Kilpatrick, 16 Fed. 765. In England there were four modes of prosecuting criminal pleas: Presentment, indictment, information, and appeal. In Connecticut there are four modes, one of which is by complaint or presentment by a grand juror, which is statutory. In that state prosecutions before a single magistrate have long been known by the name of complaints, which term is used in the statutes with reference to accusations not made by the grand jury or the state's attorney, but by a private person. (1882) § 4, to mean the allegation made orally or in writing to a magistrate with a view to his taking action. In re Surendranth Banerjea, L. R. 10 Indian App. 171, 178. It differs from an information, which is a prosecution by the public prosecuting officer, and from a presentment or indictment, which is the method of accusation by the grand jury. Webster Dict. [quoted in Goddard v. State, 12 Conn. 448, 454].

29. Sunderlin v. Ionia County, 119 Mich. 535, 78 N. W. 651, holding that the legislature has power to prescribe conditions to be fulfilled before the issuing of a warrant under a constitutional provision that justices of the peace "shall have such criminal jurisdiction and perform such duties as shall be prescribed by the legislature."

30. State v. Messolongitis, 74 Minn. 165, 77 N. W. 29.

The fact that the information filed by the prosecuting attorney is not verified by him,[31] or that it is verified by him on information and belief,[32] does not violate the constitutional provision that no warrant shall issue but on probable cause supported by oath, if with the information a complaint verified by some credible person is also filed. A statute providing that the clerk may receive complaints, administer oaths, and issue warrants, being construed to require that the clerk when he issues a warrant on a complaint to the court should issue it as the warrant of the court and not as his own warrant, is constitutional.[33]

b. Right of Accused to Confront Witnesses and Have Counsel. The constitutional right of the accused to be confronted by the witnesses against him and to be represented by counsel has reference to the trial only, and is not infringed by preliminary proceedings.[34] Nor will the absence of a preliminary examination be an infringement of his right to confront the witnesses.[35]

c. Discovery of Evidence For Defense. The accused, on the preliminary examination, has the right to a subpœna to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to compel the production of papers which are material to his defense and not in his possession.[36]

3. Courts Having Jurisdiction — a. Justices' Courts. A justice of the peace, police magistrate, or similar judge, usually has jurisdiction by statute to examine the accused on complaint and warrant, and on sufficient cause to hold him to bail or commit him for the action of the court having jurisdiction of his crime.[37]

b. Superior Courts. In some states, by statute, power to conduct preliminary examinations has been conferred upon judges of the higher courts.[38]

B. Preliminary Complaint or Affidavit — 1. Necessity For. As a general rule a justice of the peace or other examining magistrate has no authority to issue a warrant unless upon written complaint or affidavit, verified by oath, showing that an offense has been committed and that probable cause exists to believe the accused committed that crime.[39] He cannot hold an offender arrested on his own personal view without a written complaint.[40] The district attorney or other prosecuting officer may, however, on his own motion present an indictment to the grand jury without the presentation of an affidavit charging the offense.[41]

2. BEFORE WHOM MADE. Generally the complaint or affidavit must be made and verified before a magistrate or judge,[42] and it cannot be made and verified before a clerk of the court[43] or before a notary public,[44] unless the statute permits the oath to be administered by the clerk or by a notary.[45] In the federal courts the oath to the complaint may and must be taken before the judge, the clerk, or some commissioner.[46]

3. WHO MAY MAKE. The person aggrieved or any person having knowledge of an infraction of the law may make the complaint or affidavit.[47] An information signed and verified by the county attorney has been held sufficient in one case,[48] while in another it has been held insufficient, being verified on information and belief.[49] The affidavit of a convicted felon is valid, and confers jurisdiction to issue the warrant, where such person is not incompetent as a witness,[50] and it seems to have been held valid, even where he is not a competent witness.[51]

4. REQUISITES AND SUFFICENCY — a. Certainty Required. A complaint or affidavit made before a magistrate for the purpose of a preliminary examination only does not require the same certainty in the statement of the offense as an information, indictment, or complaint upon which the accused is tried, but it is sufficient if it states the offense in substance.[52]

b. Verification, Signature, and Jurat. The general rules relating to the formal parts and contents of affidavits are applicable to the affidavit or complaint upon which a warrant is granted.[53] An information, affidavit, or complaint filed by an official as part of his duty need not be verified,[54] but one filed by a private person must be.[55] The cases do not agree as to whether it is necessary for the signature of the justice to be attached to the jurat. Some hold that it should be,[56] while others hold it unnecessary.[57] The omission of a justice's seal has been held no ground for reversal.[58] In some jurisdictions a seal is not necessary at all.[59] A complaint duly charging an offense, certified in the usual form by the magistrate to whom it was presented to have been sworn to by the complainant, cannot be affected by evidence that there was no further examination of the complainant on oath before issuing the warrant.[60]

c. Charging Offense — (i) "Knowledge" or "Information and Belief." In some jurisdictions the complaint or affidavit must state the facts on the complainant's positive knowledge, and where it states them upon hearsay or upon information and belief, a warrant cannot be issued, and if the accused has been arrested he must be discharged.[61] But in other jurisdictions this rule does not something more than a mere suspicion of a violation of unspecified statutes.[66] While allegations of crime in the language of the statute are usually safe, it is advisable to state the facts which constitute the offense.[67]

(III) VENUE OF OFFENSE. The complaint or affidavit ought to state the venue, but ordinarily its statement in the caption will be sufficient.[68] An imperfect or improper statement of the venue may be disregarded,[69] particularly where the defect is cured by other papers in the case.[70]

d. Name of Accused. The name of the accused must be stated in the complaint or affidavit if it is known, but it is sufficient to allege the name by which he is commonly or usually known, although differing from his true or baptismal name, and where a person has or is known by two or more names he may be described by either or any one or all of them.[71] In some states a person charged with crime may be held by the examining magistrate to answer, although in the complaint he was given a fictitious name.[72] In others it is provided by statute that the complaint must state the name of the accused if known, and if not it must give some reasonably definite description of him.[73] The title is no part of a complaint made before a magistrate for the purpose of a preliminary examination, and cannot be considered as charging the commission of a crime against one named therein and not charged in the body of the complaint.[74]

e. Sufficiency of Quashed Indictment as Complaint. Although an indictment has been set aside, it may still be good as the sworn accusation on which the court may remand the accused to answer.[75]

Complaints before magistrates should receive a liberal construction, as they are frequently prepared by persons of limited intelligence and education who are unacquainted with the technicalities of criminal pleading. 5. Filing Complaint or Affidavit. Where an information is not filed by the prosecuting attorney on his own knowledge or information, it must be upon a complaint or affidavit filed with the justice by the person making it or by the prosecuting attorney with the information.[76] The omission of the magistrate to indorse the fact of filing on the complaint does not deprive him of jurisdiction.[77]

6. Effect of Defects, Omissions, and Irregularities — a. In General. Misstatements or improper allegations which are surplusage may be disregarded.[78] Failure to punctuate properly,[79] to spell correctly,[80] or the use of abbreviations[81] do not affect the validity of the complaint. But an omission of essential allegations cannot be cured by amendment on the examination.[82] A complaint which charges an offense to have been committed subsequent to the making of the complaint is fatally defective.[83] A mere defect in the affidavit upon which a warrant issues will not deprive the justice who issued the same of jurisdiction to inquire into the charge and take a recognizance from the accused.[84]

b. Time of Making Objections. The accused, by failing to object on his preliminary examination to the sufficiency of the affidavit or complaint, and by pleading not guilty, waives mere defects and cannot object to the jurisdiction of the court to which he is remanded.[85] But a plea of not guilty does not waive the sufficiency of the complaint to charge a crime.[86]

7. Quashing or Striking Complaint From Record. Under a statute which allows a prosecution by affidavit and information, the sufficiency of the affidavit and information may be determined on a motion to quash. A motion to quash reaches all defects apparent on the face of the affidavit and information.[87] But the fact that the warrant issued on a criminal complaint is defective is no ground for quashing the complaint.[88] Where there are two complaints in the record, one of them being filed before, and the other after, the presentment of the information, the latter complaint should be stricken from the record.[89]

8. Amendment or Substitution. A justice of the peace may permit the papers to be amended to correct immaterial errors[90] or new affidavits to be filed in place of those which have been lost.[91] A magistrate has no right to alter an information in any material part of it without the consent of the person who made it. And even when done with his consent it should be reverified before any further step is taken under it.[92]

9. Dismissal or Withdrawal of Complaint. A defective complaint may be withdrawn by the prosecuting attorney and a full preliminary examination had upon another complaint subsequently made.[93]

C. Preliminary Warrant or Other Process — 1. General Character. A warrant is a written mandate in the name of the state, based upon a complaint or affidavit, or an indictment,[94] proceeding from the court and directed to an officer or other proper person, commanding him to arrest and return before the court the person named in it.[95] In some states by statute in the case of minor offenses the accused may be brought before the court by a summons, but generally a warrant and not a summons is the process in criminal cases.[96] A capias has been sustained as the first process against a person for unlawful gaming.[97]

2. Necessity For. The cases in which a warrant is necessary and those in which an arrest may be made without it are elsewhere considered.[98] Where one is arrested without a warrant and brought before a magistrate, the charge against him may be investigated and he may be committed in default of bail without the issuance of a warrant,[99] or he may be tried without the issuance of a warrant,[1] unless a warrant on a sworn complaint is required by statute to confer jurisdiction.[2] A magistrate, if he sees an offense committed, or if he has reasonable grounds to believe that one is about to be committed in his presence, may order the arrest of the offender without a warrant,[3] and where a prisoner after having been arrested escapes he may be pursued and retaken without a warrant.[4]

3. Issuance of Warrant — a. Discretion to Issue. A magistrate has a discretion as to whether he shall issue a warrant, and if upon the allegations of the complaint and the evidence he is satisfied that no probable cause exists, he may deny the application, and a writ of mandamus will not lie to compel him to grant a warrant.[5] But the writ will lie where the magistrate refuses to act in accordance with his duty, and there is no attempt to control his discretion.[6]

b. Who May Issue. When authorized by statute the clerk may issue a warrant in vacation,[7] but at other times it must be issued by the justice himself, in the absence of a statute permitting the clerk to issue it, and in the county where the offense was committed,[8] and should be made returnable before him. The fact that in minor crimes a summons may be issued to the accused does not deprive the justice of authority to issue a warrant in the first instance.[9] A statute may authorize a warrant to be issued and signed by the prosecuting attorney.[10]

c. Time of Issuance. In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary a warrant may be issued at any time of the day or night, and on Sunday as well as on any other day.[11]

d. Preliminary Examination. Where a statute merely requires an examination of the complainant on oath by the justice to authorize the issue of the warrant a complaint sworn to before the justice is sufficient,[12] but it is otherwise where a statute provides that when an information is laid before a magistrate he must examine the informant and his witnesses under oath.[13]

e. Reduction of Evidence to Writing. Where a statute does not require it, it is not usual or necessary to reduce the evidence upon which the warrant is issued to writing.[14] And where it is required, a justice or clerk need not do so

8. Woodall v. McMillan, 38 Ala. 622, holding that a justice of the peace has no authority to act upon a complaint and issue a warrant for the arrest of a party, where the offense was committed in another county and that if he does so the warrant is void.

with his own hand, but it is sufficient if he take the oath of the complainant to a written complaint.[15]

f. Sufficiency of Evidence or Probable Cause. The object of the examination of the complainant and his witnesses by the magistrate before he issues the warrant is to ascertain whether sufficient grounds exist for requiring the examination of the accused, and no stronger evidence should be required for a warrant than is required for holding the accused.[16] The magistrate should require evidence amounting to a direct charge of guilt or creating a strong suspicion thereof,[17] and no warrant ought to be issued based on hearsay or information and belief, or on evidence so insufficient and unsatisfactory that it does not show probable cause for its issuance.[18] An objection that the evidence before a justice of the peace was insufficient to authorize him to issue the warrant of arrest cannot be raised on the trial of the accused in the circuit court.[19]

g. Alias Warrants and Reissue. An alias warrant may issue where the original is lost.[20] A warrant remains in force until it is returned, but after it has been returned it is functus officio, and it cannot be reissued.[21]

h. Alteration of Warrant. No alteration can be made in a warrant by any person other than the magistrate who issued it. Any material alteration by another magistrate before whom it is returnable or by any other person renders it invalid.[22]

4. Requisites and Sufficiency — a. In General. A warrant must state or at least show the time of issuance,[23] and it should contain recitals showing authority to issue it, as that a complaint on oath or affirmation has been made, unless this is rendered unnecessary by statute.[24] It must direct and not merely authorize the arrest of the accused,[25] and must command the officer to bring him before the proper magistrate to be dealt with according to law.[26] The warrant, where it is founded on a statute, must show on its face a compliance with all the requirements of the statute.[27] The complaint and warrant may be upon the same paper.[28] Where they are not, if the complaint sets out the offense in full, it is sufficient that the warrant is "to answer the above charge" without repeating it.[29] The omission of the name of the county from the warrant may render it illegal.[30]

b. To Whom Directed. A warrant is usually directed to any peace officer of a certain class.[31] When it is to be executed by an officer, it must be directed to a proper officer by name or a proper class of officers by the description of their office.[32] The justice may direct the warrant to a private person by name to execute the same,[33] but he should not do so unless it is absolutely necessary.[34]

c. Name and Description of Accused — (i) In General. As a general rule a warrant must be specific and correctly name the person to be arrested, giving his christain name, or if his name is unknown it must so state, and must describe him so that he may be identified.[35] A general warrant to apprehend all persons suspected of a crime, as for instance to apprehend the authors, printers, and publishers of a libel, without naming them is void.[36]

(ii) Warrants in Blank. Warrants signed in blank by a magistrate and warrant of the phrase "to be dealt with according to law," instead of "to answer such complaint," as provided by statute, is a mere informality which does not affect the validity of the warrant.

Direction for custody, etc.— A direction that the officer apprehend a party and keep him in safe custody is illegal, as the police have no power to keep a prisoner in their custody until trial, but he should be either admitted to bail or sent to jail in default thereof. Ex p. Nisbett, 8 Jur. 1071. Amendment.— It has been held, however, that under statutes allowing amendments in criminal proceedings and process, where a person has been arrested under a complaint and warrant giving a wrong name, they may be amended so as to give his name correctly. It was so held where Mary E. Keehn had been arrested under a complaint and warrant against Jenny M. Keehn, and an action was brought for false imprisonment. Keehn v. Stein, 72 Wis. 196, 39 N. delivered to a police officer to be filled up by the latter with the names of persons to be arrested as occasion may require are null and void.[37]

(III) FICTITIOUS NAME. In the absence of a statute, even when an offender's name is unknown, a warrant cannot be issued describing him by a fictitious name, as "John Doe," unless it also contains such a description as will identify him;[38] but in some jurisdictions a statute expressly authorizes the use of a fictitious name, where the real name is unknown.[39]

d. Signature and Seal. The common law requires that warrants shall be under seal,[40] and by the weight of authority unless a statute authorizes them to issue without seal the omission of a seal renders them invalid.[41] The warrant must be subscribed by the justice of the peace,[42] the clerk,[43] or the prosecuting attorney,[44] according to the practice.

e. Description and Venue of Crime. A warrant of arrest before indictment[45] must, generally by express constitutional or statutory provision, state shortly the offense for which the arrest is to be made, or recite the substance of the accusation, and must show an offense for which an arrest may lawfully be made.[46] It should state the place of the offense with reasonable certainty,[47] and the time of its commission,[48] although it has been held that a clerical error in this respect, which cannot mislead, will not render a warrant invalid.[49] A formal and detailed description of an offense, stating all the facts on which the charge is founded, is never necessary in the warrant, but it is sufficient if it describes the offense with sufficient precision to inform the accused, assuming that he is of ordinary intelligence, as to what charge he will have to meet.[50] A statute requiring that a warrant shall recite the substance of the accusation is complied with by making the warrant on the same paper as the complaint and referring to it.[51]

f. Directions as to Return. A warrant ought to contain a command to return the same, although the absence thereof will not excuse the officer from making a return,[52] nor justify the court in discharging the prisoner.[53] The direction may be to return the accused before the magistrate who issued the warrant,[54] or before some other magistrate of the county,[55] or before some court designated by statute.[56] It must be returnable before some magistrate or court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter.[57]

5. Warrants For Escaped or Fugitive Offenders. In misdemeanors the justice of the peace of the county where the offense is alleged to have been committed may issue a warrant for the return of the fugitive, and this indorsed by a justice of the county where he is found is sufficient.[58]

6. Execution of Warrant in Another County. At common law a warrant cannot confer authority to execute it outside of the jurisdiction of the issuing magistrate or judge, and therefore a warrant issued by a judge or justice of the peace of one county must be backed or indorsed by a judge or justice of the peace of another county before it can be executed in the latter.[59] In some states this rule has been more or less changed by statute.[60]

7. Defects in Warrant — a. Effect in General. As a general rule clerical errors, erroneous omission or insertion of words, or other defects in a warrant do not render it invalid, if they are immaterial and cannot prejudice or mislead the accused.[61]

b. Waiver and Cure. A general appearance by the accused and his plea of "not guilty" are a waiver of all objections to matters of form in the warrant. Such objections should be made by plea in abatement before the court in which the warrant is returnable.[62] The same result follows where the accused enters into a recognizance for his appearance on the return of the warrant and is discharged from arrest, as he is held under the recognizance thereafter.[63] So also a waiver of the preliminary examination constitutes a waiver of all defects in the warrant.[64]

c. Amendment. Immaterial irregularities in the warrant may be cured by amendment, but an amendment striking out the offense charged and inserting another cannot be permitted.[65]

8. COMMITMENT FOR PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION. The constitutional right of the accused to a speedy trial demands that he shall have a prompt preliminary examination after his arrest. A commitment for an indefinite time in order that the prosecution may prepare the case against him and procure evidence is improper.[66]

9. REMOVAL TO ANOTHER JUSTICE OR JURISDICTION. Where serious inconvenience and delay would ensue, either to the public or to the prisoner, by taking him before the judge or justice who has issued the warrant, he may be taken before some other justice in the same county.[67] A statute requiring the officer making an arrest under a warrant from another county to carry the accused for examination to the county in which the offense was committed is mandatory, and he must do so, although the accused offers to waive examination and tenders bail for his appearance in such other county for trial.[68] Where a removal is sought, under the federal statute,[69] from the district where the accused is found to the district where the offense was committed, there should be a preliminary examination to establish the identity and probable guilt of the accused before the issue of a warrant for his removal.[70]

D. Preliminary Examination and Commitment — 1. NATURE AND REQUISITES OF PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION — a. In General. The preliminary examination is to ascertain whether the crime charged has been committed, and whether there is probable cause to believe a jury will convict the accused upon the evidence adduced.[71] In many of the states the preliminary examination is purely statutory, and compliance with the statute is requisite to give jurisdiction.[72]

b. Purpose of and Right to Examination — (i) In General. By the English law[73] it was provided in substance that where one was brought on his arrest before an officer such officer should take his examination, and the information of those who brought him, and commit the same to writing. This statute, where it has not been repealed, has been recognized as in force in the United States,[74] but in most states the subject is now regulated by statute. In many states a preliminary examination is expressly required as a prerequisite to a prosecution by information, and an information filed without a previous preliminary examination is invalid[75] unless an examination has been waived.[76] The information therefore can only be for the offense upon a charge of which the accused has had a preliminary examination or for an offense included in such charge.[77] The accused cannot claim that he has had no preliminary examination where a complaint was made charging him with a crime and evidence of witnesses has been taken bearing directly on the crime and sufficient to show probable cause for holding him.[78] The rule requiring a preliminary examination as a prerequisite to an information does not apply to fugitives from justice.[79] Nor does the rule apply where the charge is to be tried and determined by the magistrate himself.[80] A party cannot be committed to jail on an accusation without being heard, and a mittimus to such effect is illegal.[81] In some states by statute an information may be filed by leave of the court without a preliminary examination,[82] and in some states an information may be filed without a preliminary examination and without obtaining leave of the court.[83]

that the interests of justice require an immediate investigation, when he may proceed, although the accused offers to waive examination.[90] A waiver of a preliminary examination will be implied from the fact that the accused, against whom no written complaint was filed, gave bail to answer at the next term of court,[91] or that he stipulated to appear on a future day and was then released on parol,[92] or that on being arraigned before the examining magistrate he voluntarily pleaded guilty and was committed,[93] or pleaded not guilty and submitted to be bound over without an examination, or on being called for trial, entered a plea of not guilty, whereupon the trial was then proceeded with.[94] By waiving the examination either expressly or by implication the accused is thereafter estopped to claim a discharge because none was held,[95] and his waiver may properly be regarded at his subsequent trial as a substantial equivalent for his examination and the finding of probable cause required by the statute.[96] But he is not estopped from claiming in habeas corpus proceedings that he is not detained on sufficient evidence to support the charge.[97]

c. Constitution of Examining Court. The statutes sometimes allow or require examining magistrates to associate with them other magistrates.[98] When a statute provides that one justice cannot commit or hold to bail, but must associate another justice with him, his assumption of the power to act singly renders his committal void.[99]

d. Particular Magistrate or Judge Having Authority. The jurisdiction of particular magistrates and judges of the preliminary examination of persons accused of crime depends upon the statutes in the particular states.[1] The judge of a municipal court who has by statute the powers and authority belonging to justices of the peace may act as a committing magistrate to inquire into violations of state laws.[2]

e. Action of Clerk Under Magistrate's Supervision. When the statute provides that the clerk may examine witnesses applying for warrants, reduce the examination to writing and file it, and issue all warrants, his action in doing so does not render the subsequent examination of the accused by the justice invalid, as the statute assumes that the clerk acts under the justice's supervision.[3]

f. Federal Judges and Commissioners as Examining Magistrates. In the federal courts the preliminary examination for violations of federal laws may be held before any commissioner sitting in the district where the warrant was issued, where for any reason the commissioner before whom it is returnable cannot take the examination and transfers the same.[4] A district judge taking the preliminary examination exercises the powers of a commissioner only.[5]

g. Time For, and Adjournment Of, Examination. In some states the statutes limit the time for which the examination may be adjourned without the prisoner's consent.[6] He is of right entitled to an examination as soon as it can be had consistently with the interests of justice.[7] An adjournment over a holiday,[8] or a short adjournment to enable the prosecution or the accused to procure witnesses or evidence,[9] or to give the accused an opportunity to recover from intoxication or illness,[10] is not objectionable. In the absence of a statute the accused is not entitled to be allowed time to prepare for his preliminary examination, and an indictment or information will not be quashed because he was examined on the same day on which he was committed for examination.[11]

h. Second Examination. Where on a preliminary examination before a justice of the peace a defendant is admitted to bail without the examination of any witnesses as required by statute, it is not a bar to a subsequent examination on the same charge before another officer, conducted according to the statutory requirements.[12]

2. Conduct of Preliminary Examination — a. Rights of Accused. The accused has the right to be present during the preliminary examination,[13] and the constitutional right of a party accused of crime to be represented by counsel includes the right to be represented by counsel at the preliminary examination.[14] The accused, however, may waive his right to counsel by failure to assert the same,[15] and he has no right to ask for an unreasonable delay in order to procure counsel.[16] Where two persons are jointly charged, their separate examination is in the discretion of the court.[17]

b. Counsel For Prosecution. The public prosecuting attorney has a right to appear and examine witnesses at a preliminary examination,[18] but he is not bound to do so unless it is required by statute.[19] The prosecutor may usually be represented at a preliminary examination by private counsel who may examine his witnesses and cross-examine those for the accused.[20]

c. Questions For Determination on Preliminary Hearing. Questions which may be more properly or more conveniently determined on the trial will not be determined on preliminary examination, as for example the plea of former jeopardy,[21] and novel questions of statutory construction.[22]

d. Functions of Magistrate — (i) In General. On the preliminary examination it is for the committing magistrate to hear the testimony of the witnesses for the prosecution and for the accused, and to commit the accused or hold him to bail if the evidence shows probable cause to believe him guilty of the offense charged, or to discharge him if the evidence does not show probable cause; and the question of probable cause is for the magistrate alone.[23] The inquiry is limited to the particular offense charged and minor offenses included therein.[24]

(ii) Reception of Evidence and Examination of Witnesses. For the purpose of determining whether there is probable cause for holding the accused, the magistrate should examine both the witnesses for the state and those offered by the accused;[25] but in the reception of evidence he is not strictly governed by

He ought very seldom to hold a party to bail when the prosecuting attorney in good faith advises him that no crime is made out. In many cases he should seek the advice of the prosecuting attorney in advance of the issue of a warrant, and should refuse it even when the complainant is able to make a prima facie showing of a technical offense, if the prosecuting attorney is of the opinion that the case would fail on full hearing, or that the criminal intent was so far wanting that the cause of justice would not be advanced by the prosecution. Issue of warrant.— The facts constituting the probable cause referred to in U. S. Const. Amendm. 4, as the basis of a warrant of arrest, must be submitted to the committing magistrate, who must judge of the sufficiency of the grounds shown for believing the accused guilty. In re Rule of Ct., 20 Fed. Cas. No. 12,126, 3 Woods 502.

24. The proceedings on a preliminary examination in a criminal case under the state laws must be limited to the specific offense charged in the warrant, or if the offense as charged includes others of lower degree, the magistrate should determine which offense, if any, has been committed, to the end that the accused may not be put upon trial for an offense different or greater than that for which he has been examined and held for trial. The magistrate is not required to weigh evidence as nicely as a petit jury would, nor to discharge the prisoner where there is a conflict of evidence, or on a mere reasonable doubt of his guilt, and his inquiry may extend to all the facts connected with the charge, although they show an offense different or greater than that charged; but if it appear that a higher or different offense has been committed a new warrant should be issued charging the proper offense, upon which an examination may be had. the technical rules applicable on a final trial.[26] Under some circumstances the magistrate may act upon affidavits.[27] A statute which provides that the justice shall examine the complainant and the witnesses on oath is directory as to the quantity of evidence to be taken, and does not require him to examine all the witnesses for the state if he is satisfied with less.[28] Where the accused waives preliminary examination, the state need not introduce any testimony, but the accused may be held for trial on the showing made before the magistrate to procure the warrant of arrest.[29]

(III) EXAMINATION OF ACCUSED. The examination or interrogation of the accused by the magistrate on the preliminary investigation or examination, without his consent, is unwarranted by the principles of the common law, and is contrary to the constitutional provision that no person shall be compelled to give evidence against himself; and statements or confessions made by the accused in response to questions thus propounded by the magistrate are not competent evidence against him.[30]

e. Reduction of Evidence to Writing. In the absence of a statute the justice need not commit the evidence taken at the preliminary examination to writing;[31] but this is sometimes required by statute,[32] and in some jurisdictions a failure to do so, where no waiver is shown, is ground for quashing the information,[33] or for reversal of a judgment of conviction.[34] Where the accused pleads guilty or waives examination he cannot complain that the magistrate does not examine the witnesses and reduce their testimony to writing.[35] Where the statute merely requires the testimony of witnesses at a preliminary examination to be reduced to writing by

Questions and answers.— Under a constitutional provision authorizing an information after commitment by a magistrate, and a statute providing that no information shall be filed until the accused shall have had a preliminary examination as provided by law, the court has no jurisdiction of a prosecution by information where there has been no compliance on the preliminary examination with a statute providing that the depositions on such examination must contain the questions put to the witnesses and their answers thereto. the magistrate or under his orders, the testimony need not be signed by the witnesses or certified by the justice;[36] but where the statute expressly requires that the testimony shall be signed by the witnesses and certified by the justice, a failure to comply with such requirement will avoid all subsequent proceedings.[37]

f. Sufficiency of Evidence. It is sufficient to authorize the commitment of the accused or the holding him to bail if it be shown that probable cause exists to believe that he committed the crime charged,[38] and the sufficiency of the facts from which this may be deduced is for the determination of the magistrate alone.[39] It is not necessary to produce evidence which would convince a jury of the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt.[40] A statute which forbids a conviction on the unsupported testimony of the prosecutrix, as in the case of seduction or rape, does not apply to a preliminary examination, but furnishes a rule of evidence for the trial only.[41] The confession of the accused will justify holding him, although without proof of the corpus delicti or any other evidence.[42] In the federal courts a certified copy of an indictment found in another district is sufficient to justify the commitment of the accused and his removal to such district.[43]

g. Publicity of Examination. An examining magistrate has the power to exclude the public from a preliminary examination,[44] unless there is a constitutional

3. Determination on Preliminary Hearing and Commitment For Trial — a. Discharge or Holding to Answer — (i) In General. After the preliminary examination has begun, the accused has a right to require that it shall be continued to a final determination, and that he shall be either discharged or held. The statutes are mandatory in this respect.[47] Where the offense is bailable and the justice finds that there is probable cause to believe the accused guilty, he must take a recognizance for his appearance before the court having jurisdiction of the offense,[48] but he cannot require him to give sureties to keep the peace where he has no jurisdiction to try the crime.[49] If the justice himself has jurisdiction to try the offense, he must proceed to try and determine, and he cannot shift the responsibility by taking a preliminary examination and holding the accused to answer in a higher court.[50]

(ii) Detention to Institute New Proceedings. Where the accused is acquitted because of a variance,[51] because his arrest was illegal,[52] or because the jury failed to agree,[53] or where judgment is rendered for him on a plea in abatement,[54] he may be detained in custody until a new warrant is obtained or an information or indictment is filed.

(iii) Arrest on One Charge and Commitment on Another. If on the examination charging a certain crime the justice finds that the accused has not committed it, but that he has committed a different crime, he should commit him until the appropriate complaint or affidavit can be filed, and then take his recognizance or commit him upon that charge.[55]

(iv) Commitment For Further Examination. A person arrested on a criminal charge may be committed for further examination and held under such commitment for a reasonable time;[56] but if he is committed for an unreasonable time the commitment and custody are illegal.[57] In the absence of a statute a magistrate on adjourning a preliminary examination has no authority to admit the accused to bail, but must commit him to the custody of the sheriff.[58] By statute in some jurisdictions, however, when a preliminary examination is adjourned, the accused may be admitted to bail where the offense charged is a misdemeanor, but not where it is a felony,[59] and under some statutes he may be admitted to bail whether the offense is a felony or a misdemeanor.[60]

(v) Effect of Determination on Subsequent Proceedings. The dismissal of a prosecution on appeal for lack of a proper preliminary examination,[61] or the discharge or committal of the accused on such examination, is no bar to a second preliminary examination or a subsequent prosecution for the same offense.[62] Where a justice of the peace determines that an offense is of such a grade as to be beyond his jurisdiction and binds the accused over to a higher court for trial, his determination is not conclusive upon the higher court.[63]

(vi) Rehearing or New Trial. The functions of the examining magistrate and his jurisdiction over the accused terminate when he commits or remands him,[64] or takes his recognizance,[65] and he has no authority to grant a rehearing or new examination. An order of committal for trial at once confers jurisdiction of the accused on the trial court,[66] and he can only be discharged or released on bail by a court having power to entertain a writ of habeas corpus.[67]

Offense committed in another county.— Although a statute allows the magistrate or judge to admit the accused to bail on postponement of an examination on a charge of felony, he has no power to do so where the offense is charged to have been committed in another county, and the statute makes it his duty to "commit the defendant to a peace officer, to be conveyed by him before a magistrate of the county in which the offense is charged to have been committed," his authority in such case being limited to the inquiry whether there are sufficient grounds for an examination in the county in which the offense was committed. Under a statute providing that if on a preliminary examination it appears that a public offense has been committed, and there is sufficient cause to believe defendant guilty thereof, the magistrate must make or indorse on the depositions taken on such examination an order to that effect, and that defendant be held to answer to the same, the order must be in writing and signed by the magistrate, and an oral order reduced to writing by the reporter is not a compliance with the statute. People v. Wilson, 93 Cal. 377, 28 Pac. 1061. It has been held, however, that such statute is sufficiently complied with where an order of commitment in due form is filed with the other papers in the case, and refers to the complaint as "the within deposition" (People v. Dolan, 96 Cal. 315, 31 Pac. 107), or where the order is indorsed on the complaint (People v. Sehorn, 116 Cal. 503, 48 Pac. 495). Statute rendering mistake in description of offense harmless.— Under a statute providing that no person should be discharged from an order of commitment on account of any defect in the charge or process or for want of alleged probable cause, it was held that a defendant who had been charged with petit larceny and who had waived examination be-convenient or reasonable certainty.[81] The commitment need not set forth, as in an indictment, all of the facts essential to constitute the offense.[82] It has been held[83] and denied[84] that the committing magistrate must determine and specify in the warrant of commitment the grade of the offense, in order that it may be known whether or not it is bailable.[85]

(c) Indorsing or Fixing Amount of Bail. The neglect of the committing magistrate to fix and indorse the amount of bail as required by statute renders the warrant of commitment invalid.[86] But his neglect to indorse on the warrant in what sum bail ought to be taken does not have this effect if the warrant itself shows the amount of bail required.[87]

(II) Defects and Amendment. Immaterial defects in the order or warrant of commitment, not prejudicing the substantial rights of the accused,[88] or unnecessary matter therein,[89] may be disregarded. A justice may amend his commit-

Review of action of commissioner in fixing bail.— The judge to whom application is made for a warrant of removal to another district for trial may review, without a writ of habeas corpus, the action of the committing magistrate, and reduce the bail required by him, if it appears to be excessive. Notice and opportunity to object.—Upon an application to a district judge for an order for the removal of a prisoner in the custody of the marshal to another district for trial the prisoner is entitled to notice, and if he desires it to be brought before the judge for the purpose of presenting any objections he may have to the making of the order. In re Beshcars, 79 Fed. 70.

Petition alleging affidavit only.— If the petition of the United States district attorney alleges merely an affidavit charging an offense, without showing an examination before a commissioner or other magistrate, or the finding of an indictment in the district to which removal is asked, the prisoner must be released. Complaint on information and belief.— A complaint on which a person is arrested for the purpose of having him removed to another district, to answer to a criminal charge, when made by a district attorney of the United States, is not insufficient because made on information and belief alone, without reference to an indictment or a statement of his means of information or grounds of belief. In re Richter, 100 Fed. 295.

Sufficiency of evidence.— On application for removal of an offender to another district the judge or commissioner is not required to decide absolutely the question of guilt or innocence, nor is he authorized to discharge the accused because he has some doubt as to his guilt. If his identity is shown, and the evidence shows probable cause to believe him guilty, it is incumbent upon the judge or commissioner to issue a warrant for his removal to the proper district, where the jury may determine upon all the evidence the question of his guilt or innocence. In re Burkhardt, 33 Fed. 25.

Latitude in reception of evidence.— The evidence receivable on a hearing before a commissioner in proceedings for the removal to another district of persons charged with the commission of a crime therein is not to be strictly limited by the technical rules applicable on a final trial. Where fraud is charged or a conspiracy to defraud a somewhat wide latitude must necessarily be given in the introduction of circumstantial evidence. U. S. v. Greene, 108 Fed. 816.

bench-warrant,[6] or a duly authenticated copy of a sufficient indictment in the district to which removal is asked, is prima facie but not conclusive evidence of probable cause.[7] There can be no removal unless the offense charged is within the accused is to be tried. Price v. McCarty, 89 Fed. 84, 32 C. C. A. 162 [affirming 83 Fed. 830]; In re Buell, 4 Fed. Cas. No. 2,102, 3 Dill. 116. And see In re Doig, 4 Fed. 193; In re Clark, 5 Fed. Cas. No. 2,797, 2 Ben. 540. The circuit court of the district in which an offender is held for removal to another district in which he has been indicted has authority on habeas corpus to examine the indictment, and to release the accused if in its judgment the indictment should be quashed on demurrer. In re Terrell, 51 Fed. 213. An indictment charging embezzlement, which is a purely statutory crime in a territory where there is no statutory offense by that name, is fatally defective and will not afford a basis for an order for the removal of the accused to such territory for trial, although the acts charged constitute the offense of larceny under its statutes. In re Richter, 100 Fed. 295.

Insufficiency of one or more counts only.— Where one count in the indictment charges an offense for which the accused may be tried in the district to which the removal is sought, and other counts do not charge such an offense, a warrant of removal which recites that the accused is to be tried in such district "upon such counts in the indictment . . . as [he] can be legally tried upon" is not objectionable on the ground that it authorizes trial upon the whole indictment, or on the ground that it is void for indefiniteness. Horner v. U. S., 143 U. S. 207, 12 S. Ct. 407, 36 L. ed. 126 [affirming 44 Fed. 677].

A certified copy of an information filed for an offense against the laws of the United States, without a copy of any oath or affirmation to facts showing probable cause to believe the accused guilty, does not authorize a warrant of arrest or removal. U. S. v. Shepard, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16,273, 1 Abb. 431.

Power to go behind indictment.— The statute invests the judge to whom application for removal is made with plenary power to grant or refuse the warrant of removal, and the fact that an indictment has been found against the accused in the district to which removal is asked is not conclusive. The judge, in determining whether there is probable cause to believe the accused guilty, and whether the court of the district where the removal is asked has jurisdiction of the offense, may go behind the indictment and hear evidence, and may refuse a warrant of removal if he is satisfied that there is not probable cause to believe the defendant guilty or that the offense charged is not within the jurisdiction of the federal court of the district in which the offense was committed. U. S. v. Greene, 100 Fed. 941; U. S. v. Fowkes, 53 Fed. 13, 3 C. C. A. 394 [affirming 49 Fed. 50]; U. S. v. Rogers, 23 Fed. 658.

6. The mere production of a bench-warrant from the United States circuit court for one state by an officer thereof to a United States district court in another state is of itself sufficient to authorize a warrant of arrest in the latter state and removal to the former. Where the indictment charges the defendant as principal of an offense within the jurisdiction of the court for the district where he has been indicted, an objection to the issuing of a writ of removal to such district because defendant was only an accomplice or accessary before the fact, and that whatever he did was done in the district from which it is sought to remove him, is in the nature of a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court, and must be supported by evidence aliunde the record to justify a refusal of the writ. U. S. v. White, 25 Fed. 716.

Sufficiency of indictment.— When a district judge or commissioner is called upon to issue his warrant for the removal of an alleged offender to the district in which the offense was committed, and in which the accused has been indicted, he may look into the indictment and refuse to issue the warrant if the indictment is fatally defective, or if it fails to charge an offense against the United States, or one of which the court of the district to which removal is asked has jurisdiction. Greene v. Henkel, 183 U. S. 249, 22 S. Ct. 218, 46 L. ed. 177; U. S. v. Conners, 111 Fed. 734; U. S. v. Greene, 100 Fed. 941; In re Richter, 100 Fed. 295; In re Belknap, 96 Fed. 614; U. Cas. No. 2,102, 3 Dill. 116; U. S. v. Pope, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16,069. The warrant of removal should be refused if the indictment is so inconsistent or vague in its averments as not to clearly show the commission of an offense against the United States in the district to which removal is asked (U. S. v. Dana, 68 Fed. 886), or if it is so inconsistent that it sets forth an impossible offense (U. S. v. Pope, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16,069). But mere technical or formal defects in the indictment should be disregarded, and the sufficiency of the indictment left to the disposition of the court by which the jurisdiction of the federal court of the district to which removal is asked, and the question of jurisdiction may be raised either before the judge or commissioner to whom the application for removal is made or on petition for habeas corpus.[8] On the application for removal the judge or commissioner acts judicially in determining whether an offense has been committed against the United States, whether there is probable cause to believe the accused guilty, and whether the court of the district to which removal is asked has jurisdiction.[9] The warrant can Irregularity in finding of indictment.— It has been held that evidence which does not form the subject-matter of a defense, but merely tends to show that the indictment has been irregularly found will be heard in defendant's behalf in proceedings for a warrant of removal. U. S. v. Fowkes, 49 Fed. 50 [affirmed in 53 Fed. 13, 3 C. C. A. 394], holding that where a prisoner had been arrested on a warrant founded on an indictment found by a federal grand jury of a district in which he did not reside and was not found, which presumably had not been instructed by the court as to the constituents of the crime charged, and where there had been no previous arrest, hearing, or binding over, the court of the district in which the arrest was made would discharge him on habeas corpus. But in Greene v. Henkel, 183 U. S. 249, 22 S. Ct. 218, 46 L. ed. 177, it was held that where a copy of an indictment found in the district to which it is sought to remove the accused is good on its face, and is certified by the proper officer, a magistrate is justified in treating it as having been found by a competent grand jury, and is not authorized to go into evidence which may show or tend to show violations of the federal statutes in the drawing of the jurors composing the grand jury which found the indictment. A federal court will not, on an application for an order removing to another district for trial persons there indicted, hold the indictment void for irregularity in drawing the grand jury, where the question involved is a new one of statutory construction, which has never been adjudicated, but will leave the accused to raise the question in the trial, where the decision can be reviewed in the regular course of appeal. It is only where there can be no reasonable doubt of the alleged invalidity that removal should be refused on such ground. U. S. v. Greene, 108 Fed. 816.

Evidence to aid indictment.— The finding of an indictment does not preclude the government from giving evidence of a certain and definite character concerning the commission of the offense by the accused in regard to acts, times, and circumstances which are stated in the indictment itself with less minuteness and detail, in order to supply technical defects in the indictment. Greene v. Henkel, 183 U. S. 249, 22 S. Ct. 218, 46 L. ed. 177.

Consent of accused or failure to object.— A federal court will not order a person to be removed to another district for trial on an indictment which does not state facts constituting an offense, although the accused does not resist the removal, or even though he consents thereto. U. S. v. Conners, 111 Fed. 734.

Review of action of commissioner.— Where a prisoner has been held by a United States commissioner upon conflicting evidence as regards identity, or the commission of the offense, or probable cause, for removal to another district for trial, and there is sufficient proof to make out a prima facie case, aside from the evidence in behalf of the prisoner, the court should not examine the evidence as an original question, but is required to issue the warrant of removal. U. S. v. Lantry, 30 Fed. 232. See also Greene v. Henkel, 183 U. S. 249, 22 S. Ct. 218, 46 L. ed. 177; U. S. v. Greene, 108 Fed. 816; Price v. McCarty, 89 Fed. 84, 32 C. C. A. 162 [affirming 83 Fed. 830]. On an application for a warrant for the removal to another district for trial of a person arrested on a commissioner's warrant based on an indictment found in such other district, or on the hearing on a writ of habeas corpus sued out by such person, the only question to be considered is whether the indictment on its face charges the commission of an offense within the jurisdiction of the court in which it was returned. In re Belknap, 96 Fed. 614.

The question of the identity of the accused is a question of fact which the judge or commissioner has full jurisdiction to decide for the purpose of removal, and his decision will not be reviewed on a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Horner v. U. S., 143 U. S. 207, 12 S. Ct. 407, 36 L. ed. 126 [affirming 44 Fed. 677].

Irregularities in arrest, examination, or commitment.— On a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of one held under a warrant for removal to another district for trial, the court can only consider questions going to the authority and jurisdiction of the dis-authorize the removal of the accused for trial on that offense only with which he is charged, and as to which he has had an examination.[10]

c. Record or Certificate of and Return to Preliminary Examination — (I) In General. The record of a committing magistrate or judge must show the preliminary examination and commitment.[11] A record showing a sufficient complaint and warrant, an examination before the magistrate who issued the warrant or a waiver thereof, and a commitment in which is stated the crime charged and that there is probable cause to believe the accused guilty thereof is sufficient.[12] If the accused is discharged on his preliminary examination, and is subsequently indicted, the indictment will not be set aside because the minutes of the preliminary examination were not filed in the trial court, where the statute requires such filing only where the accused is held to answer.[13] The examination of the committing magistrate need not be certified under seal.[14] The absence of statutory formalities in the transcript of the evidence taken at the preliminary examination constitutes no objection to an indictment based on the transcript, where it appears that it was the identical transcript of the examination.[15]

(II) Correction or Amendment. After the justice has certified the record of a preliminary examination he may upon the trial and by direction of the court amend or complete his record where it is deficient by inserting additional or corrected entries consistent with the record as previously made out and certified.[16]

d. Objections and Exceptions — (I) Time of Taking and Waiver. Objection to the preliminary complaint or warrant, or the objection that no preliminary examination was had, or that it was invalid or not properly certified, must be raised before trial or plea of not guilty by motion to quash or by plea in abate-

trict judge to issue the warrant of removal. If there was a proper case for removal, the prisoner should be remanded, notwithstanding irregularities or errors of procedure in his arrest, examination, or commitment. Price v. McCarty, 89 Fed. 84, 32 C. C. A. 162 [affirming 83 Fed. 830].

Finding conclusive on government.— The action of a commissioner in discharging a person in proceedings for his removal to another district for trial on a criminal charge, after a full hearing, should be conclusive on the government, especially where the testimony offered is that upon which an indictment has been found. In re Wood, 95 Fed. 288.

10. U. S. v. Price, 84 Fed. 636. But the fact that a warrant of removal of one accused of larceny directs the accused to be delivered for trial for the larceny of a part only of the property for which he was committed by the commissioner for stealing does not vitiate the warrant. ment, or it will be presumed to have been waived.[17] One who waives examination before the justice and gives bond to appear at the higher court for trial cannot object in the higher court to the sufficiency of the warrant, affidavit, or complaint.[18]

(11) Bill of Exceptions. An examining court has no authority to sign a bill of exceptions to any opinion or act of the court, and if it does so the bill is no part of the record of the case.[19]

E. Summary or Other Trials Without Jury — 1. Nature, Incidents, and Jurisdiction — a. In General. Summary trials without a jury are in derogation of the common law, and the proceedings therefore must be in strict conformity to the statute which authorizes them.[20] Such a statute must be strictly construed, and if an act imposes a penalty, but prescribes no method or form of prosecution, the conviction must be in accordance with the rules of the common law.[21] The right to a trial by jury secured by constitutional provisions is not infringed by statutes providing for the summary trial of small offenses against the state or of violations of municipal ordinances.[22]

b. Offenses Summarily Punishable. By the constitution or by statute justices of the peace and police courts are usually given power to summarily try and determine petty misdemeanors and trivial breaches of the peace, and such offenses only.[23] In some states it seems that justices of the peace have no jurisdiction to try and determine criminal cases, but can only act as committing magistrates.[24]

e. Rights of Accused and Waiver — (i) In General. In summary trials before justices of the peace and other inferior courts the accused should be informed of his constitutional and statutory rights, and as a rule if he is deprived of such rights a conviction may be set aside unless a waiver is shown.[30]

(ii) Election to Be Tried by Jury. Where a justice of the peace or other inferior court has concurrent jurisdiction of a crime triable on indictment, the statutes generally allow the accused to elect whether he shall be tried summarily, or shall give bail to answer and have the complaint go before the grand jury, so that he may be tried on indictment and by a jury in a higher court, and if he is deprived of this right, a summary conviction cannot be sustained.[31] Under some statutes to give a magistrate jurisdiction to proceed summarily, the accused must in writing waive his right to a trial by jury.[32] It has been held that the Right to appeal.— It has been held that failure of a justice of the peace to inform the defendant upon his conviction of his right to appeal, and to make an entry on his docket of the giving of such information, as required by statute, does not deprive the defendant of that right or render the conviction void. Jacoby v. Waddell, 61 Iowa 247, 16 N. W. 119.

Presence of accused.— The right of the accused to be confronted with witnesses against him and to have the evidence delivered to the jury in his presence, secured to him by statute, is a right which may be waived in the case of offenses cognizable by a justice of the peace, at least where counsel for the accused is present for him. State v. Reckards, 21 Minn. 47.

Right to copy of accusation.— In view of the Washington statute (2 Hill Code, § 1223) requiring the clerk of the court to furnish defendant a copy of the indictment, or to permit him to make one, it has been held that the constitutional provision (Wash. Const. art. 1, § 22) entitling the accused "to have a copy" of his accusation is complied with in a justice's court, where the justice hands the accused the original complaint and tells him that he can copy it if he pleases. State v. White, 8 Wash. 230, 35 Pac. 1100.

Opportunity to procure counsel.— N. Y. Code Cr. Proc. §§ 188, 189, relating to the right of defendant to have an opportunity to procure counsel and to be informed thereof do not apply to a prosecution for petit larceny by complaint, of which the courts of special sessions have exclusive jurisdiction. Informing accused of right.— N. Y. Code Cr. Proc. § 211, providing that where the defendant is charged with an offense triable by a jury of special sessions the magistrate must inform him of his right to be tried by jury, after indictment, and must ask him how he will be tried, is complied with where the defendant is asked how he will be tried, and replies that he will be tried by the court without a jury. People v. McCann, 6 N. Y. St. 541. Under some statutes it is not necessary in order to render a summary conviction valid that the justice shall inform the defendant of his right to be tried by a jury, or that the defendant shall expressly waive his right to a jury trial. People v. Goodwin, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 251.

Demand in writing.— Under some statutes demand of indictment by a grand jury must be made in writing. Smith v. State, 63 Ga. 168.

32. See Hanaghan v. State, 51 Ohio St. 24, 36 N. E. 1072.

right to a jury trial is waived by a plea of guilty before the justice,[33] but not, it seems, by a plea of not guilty and adjournments, where the magistrate has not informed the accused of his right to elect, as provided by statute.[34] The right of the accused to have a summary trial is as absolute as his right to a trial by jury, and cannot be defeated by the fact that the state asks only for a preliminary examination.[35]

f. Complaint or Information[36] — (i) Form and Requisites in General. Where a justice or similar officer is empowered to try a misdemeanor on a written affidavit or complaint, provided the accused shall indorse thereon a waiver of his right to be indicted by the grand jury, a valid complaint or affidavit is necessary.[37] The affidavit or complaint must show all the facts which the statute renders necessary to give the magistrate jurisdiction.[38] According to the rule of the common law a summary conviction is illegal and absolutely void unless based upon a complaint in writing verified by oath.[39] In some jurisdictions a written complaint is expressly required by statute,[40] while in others oral complaints will suffice in certain cases.[41]

(ii) Venue. The complaint must state the place where the offense was committed and show that it was committed within the territorial jurisdiction of the magistrate,[42] but it is sufficient if the caption of the complaint properly sets forth

E. 1072, holding that under a statute providing that in misdemeanor cases, where the accused in writing waives his right to a trial by jury, the magistrate may render final judgment, a written plea of guilty is not such a waiver of a jury trial as to authorize the magistrate to render final judgment.

In Alabama under the statute (Acts 1882–1883, p. 214, §§ 3, 12) dividing Sumter county into two divisions for the trial of misdemeanors and requiring that on prosecution by affidavit the affidavit shall state the the venue and the body of the complaint refers to it.[43] Where a complaint sufficiently shows that the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of the court, the fact that it is without any caption or venue in the margin is immaterial.[44]

(III) ALLEGATION OF OFFENSE. A complaint which does not set forth facts with sufficient certainty to constitute an offense will not support a conviction.[45] Describing the offense in the language of the statute or ordinance is sufficient where the statute states all the ingredients of the offense with legal certainty,[46] but not otherwise.[47] The complaint must be certain and particular,[48] although less formal in its allegations than an indictment.[49] It must state with certainty the time when the offense was committed,[50] the place of its commisdistrict in which the offense was committed, but providing further that where a prosecution is commenced in the wrong division it can only be taken advantage of by a sworn plea which if sustained results in the transfer of the cause, it has been held that an affidavit failing to state the locality of the offense, as required by statute, is not demurrable. Henderson v. State, 109 Ala. 40, 19 So. 733.

Offenses near county-line.—Where a statute provides that a crime committed within one hundred yards of the line between two counties may be alleged to have been committed and may be prosecuted and punished in either county, a complaint in one county for an offense committed in the adjoining county within one hundred yards of the boundary may allege that the offense was committed in the county in which the complaint is made, and need not allege that it was committed in the adjoining county within the prescribed distance from the boundary. Omission of year.— A complaint which contains no mention of the year in laying the offense is fatally defective. It must affirmasion,[51] the intent when this is material,[52] and the owner of the property against which the offense was committed;[53] and it must correctly recite the statute upon which it is based.[54] A complaint is no doubt governed by the same rule with respect to duplicity as an indictment and information.[55]

(IV) SIGNATURE AND VERIFICATION. The complaint must generally be subscribed[56] and sworn to[57] by the complainant. Slight irregularities in the jurat and signature may be disregarded.[58] The jurat must usually be signed by the justice,[59] but it need not have the seal of the court.[60] An attestation by a clerk

What constitutes duplicity.— A complaint charging prostitution and lewdness is not objectionable as charging two offenses. State v. Hanchett, 38 Conn. 35. And a complaint charging cruelty to animals is not double because it alleges that defendant cruelly tormented and wounded a horse, and also alleges that he deprived it of necessary sustenance. State v. Haskell, 76 Me. 399. Nor is a complaint bad for duplicity because it charges that the defendant, not being licensed, owned and kept intoxicating liquors with intent to sell them, exposed and offered them for sale, and sold them, although each of the several acts charged is itself specifically forbidden by the statute (State v. Burns, 44 Conn. 149; State v. Bielby, 21 Wis. 206); or because it charges the selling of intoxicating liquor to two different persons at different times (Com. v. Broker, 151 Mass. 355, 23 N. 60. The jurat to an affidavit or complaint charging an offense, made before a justice of pro tempore is prima facie sufficient.[61] The complainant's signature by mark without an attesting witness is sufficient when certified by the justice.[62] It seems that an information prepared and filed by a prosecuting attorney need not be sworn to by him.[63] It has been held in some states that a complaint or affidavit made by a prosecuting witness merely on information and belief is insufficient;[64] but in others the contrary view has been taken.[65]

(v) Conclusion. The complaint before a justice of the peace need not usually conclude with the expression "against the peace and dignity of the state,"[66] or the expression "against the form of the statute in such case made and provided."[67]

(vi) Joinder of Offenses. In prosecutions before justices of the peace two offenses may be charged in one affidavit, and both may be tried together. There is no such thing as different counts in an affidavit.[68] A joint complaint against and conviction of three persons for offenses individually separate and distinct, although all against the same statutory provision, are illegal.[69]

(vii) Amendment. The affidavit or complaint on which a prosecution is based is usually amendable by the justice as to matters of form,[70] but not as to matters of substance so as to affect a substantial right of the accused, as by substituting a charge of another offense.[71]

(viii) Defects and Objections. Not only are affidavits and complaints containing minor defects amendable, but ordinarily, where the rights of the accused are not prejudiced and the intent is clear such minor defects may be disregarded the peace or police judge for use in his court, need not have the seal of the court, unless it is required by statute. Rosenstein v. State, 9 Ind. App. 290, 36 N. E. 652; Com. v. De Voe, 159 Mass. 101, 34 N. E. 85.

by the court.[72] Where, however, the inaccuracy or omission is such that it cannot be disregarded without prejudice to the accused a conviction ought to be set aside.[73] As a rule defects in the complaint will be waived by the accused if he goes to trial on a plea of not guilty.[74]

g. Trial — (I) In General. The mode of conducting the trial is usually regulated by statute. Rules of procedure of the higher courts may be followed unless they are inapplicable or are expressly restricted to trials by indictment.[75] Subject to statutory provisions the justice may grant a reasonable postponement on the application of the prosecution or of the accused, and may commit the accused to custody pending such postponement.[76]

(III) Effect of Discharge. Where a justice has dismissed a case and released the prisoner, even though he may have erred in so doing, he cannot reinstate the case or bring the party before him for trial without commencing anew.[80]

h. Judgment, Sentence, Record, and Commitment — (I) In General. It is the imperative duty of a justice in a criminal case tried by a jury before him to enter judgment and pronounce sentence on a verdict of guilty. He cannot set their verdict aside[81] or entertain a motion in arrest of judgment.[82] Nor can a court exercising the powers of a justice reorganize after the trial to resentence a defendant, where the sentence was defective.[83]

(II) Time of Entry of Judgment. If the accused is convicted the legality of the sentence imposed is in no respect invalidated by a delay of the justice in entering the judgment on his docket, since the delay in doing this merely ministerial act in no way prejudices the accused.[84]

(III) Requisites, Sufficiency, and Contents of Record — (A) Contents in General. The justice before whom conviction is had should make out a record of the conviction,[85] which should contain the information or complaint under oath, giving the date and place where made and the names of the complainant, magistrate, and accused, the time of committing, with an exact description of the crime, the summons or warrant, with the statement that the defendant was duly notified thereof, that he appeared and confessed, or that evidence for and against him was taken and reduced to writing, that it is returned with the record, and the judgment of conviction, which must be expressed in legal form and not in vague and loose terms.[86] Greater certainty is always required in records of

(B) Jurisdictional Facts. The record must set out all the facts enumerated in the preceding section and all other facts, if any there be, which are necessary to give the justice jurisdiction over the offense, and to warrant him in pronouncing judgment.[88]

(C) Distribution of Fine. Where the statute provides that the fine levied shall be paid to certain persons, it is not necessary to specify them in the sentence,[89] but it seems that where the sentence directs it to be paid to the wrong person it may be set aside.[90]

(D) Description of Offense. A conviction will be set aside where the record does not contain such an accurate and complete description of the offense as to show that it is a crime.[91] Where the offense is statutory, a description in the language of the statute is generally sufficient.[92]

(E) Setting Out Evidence. The record of the proceedings and conviction before the justice must contain the substance at least of the evidence taken before him, to enable the appellate court to determine whether the justice has or has not exceeded his jurisdiction. If the record filed does not contain the evidence the sentence should be set aside.[93]

contains several counts for distinct offenses and the finding of guilty is general.[95]

(G) Signature of Justice. The judgment in a summary proceeding before a justice will be set aside where the record is not signed by him.[96]

(IV) Extent of Jurisdiction as to Punishment. The extent of the power of a justice to impose punishment by fine or imprisonment is measured by the character of the penalties which by the statutes are attached to the crimes which he has jurisdiction to try and determine.[97] Justices usually have power to sentence to imprisonment in the county jail,[98] or to imprison as a means of enforcing the payment of a fine.[99] A sentence to jail or to the workhouse for an indefinite time is void at common law,[1] and in the absence of statute a justice cannot impose an alternative sentence.[2] Where a defendant is committed to enforce the payment of a fine, the commitment should have an express limit not to be exceeded under any circumstances, so that the confinement will be required to terminate certainly at the time so fixed, and as much earlier as payment may be made.[3]

(V) Commitment or Certificate of Conviction[4] — (A) Necessity For and Time of Issuance. As a rule, to justify detention of the accused after conviction, there must be a valid mittimus or warrant of commitment,[5] but in some states a mittimus is not necessary where the jailer or other custodian of the accused has a duly certified transcript of the judgment of conviction.[6] Delay of the justice in issuing a mittimus after conviction does not invalidate the conviction. He may issue the same even after adjournment.[7]

tain a statement of a good cause for commitment, expressed with certainty and supported by oath.[8] It must set out concisely all preliminary steps taken,[9] and show on its face that the justice had jurisdiction.[10] It need not include the complaint,[11] or state whether the accused demanded a jury,[12] and it is not invalidated by the absence of a seal.[13] Unnecessary statements of fact or mere irregularities in the commitment, not prejudicing any substantial right of the accused, may be disregarded.[14]

(c) Specification of Punishment. A warrant of commitment or mittimus must specify the punishment imposed or term of imprisonment.[15] Where the sentence is for both fine and imprisonment, a warrant, in the absence of statute, is in proper form where it directs the keeper of the jail to safely keep the prisoner until the expiration of his term of imprisonment, stating the period, and until he shall pay his fine or be discharged by due course of law.[16] On conviction under a statute imposing a fine it is not necessary that the sentence shall be in the alternative to pay the fine or be committed, but it is essential that this alternative be contained in the warrant or mittimus.[17]

(d) Description of Offense. Both at common law[18] and by statute a warrant of commitment must set forth the crime of which the defendant has been convicted and describe it with reasonable certainty.[19] If it fails to do so the officer is not liable for suffering the accused to escape.[20] It is not necessary, however, that the warrant shall set out all the facts necessary to make out the offense or all the elements of the offense.[21]

particular criminal jurisdiction is conferred on an inferior court its decision within its jurisdiction is final, no right to an appeal or writ of error from the decision of a justice is recognized unless provision is made for the same by statute.[22] In most jurisdictions, however, there are statutory provisions allowing review of judgments of a justice of the peace, under certain circumstances, by writ of error or appeal.[23] Where a statute provides for appeal only from a justice of the peace a writ of error will not lie.[24] Although appeals may be allowed from summary convictions by a justice of the peace, it has been held that an appeal will not lie from an order of a justice requiring one to give a bond to keep the peace,[25] or from the dismissal of a complaint asking for such surety.[26]

(II) REVIEW BY CERTIORARI. Where no right to an appeal or writ of error is conferred by statute, an erroneous judgment of a justice of the peace may, in some jurisdictions by express statutory provision, be brought into the superior court for review by writ of certiorari.[27] The fact that the statute allows an appeal from a summary conviction before a magistrate does not exclude the remedy by certiorari in proper cases,[28] unless such an intention on the part of the legislature appears.[29]

29. In New York the statutes abolishing writs of error and certiorari in criminal actions and proceedings and special proceedings of a criminal nature, and making an appeal the only mode of reviewing a judgment or order in such an action or proceeding, and authorizing an appeal from a conviction before a police court, police magistrate, or justice of the peace, render an appeal the only mode of reviewing summary convictions before a justice of the peace or other magistrate, and certiorari will not lie. Code Cr. Proc. §§ 515, 749; People v. Murray, 62 Hun

(III) APPELLATE JURISDICTION. The courts to which appeals or writs of error may be taken from judgments of justices of the peace are designated by statute, and the statutes vary in the different states.[30] If an appeal is properly perfected by taking the steps required by the statute,[31] the jurisdiction of the justice will cease and the jurisdiction of the appellate court attach.[32] The jurisdiction of the appellate court is not divested by the fact that the recognizance required of the appellant was illegal,[33] or because it subsequently appears that on the trial the justice committed errors which divested his jurisdiction.[34] If the justice's court had no jurisdiction an appeal from its decision gives the appellate court no jurisdiction, except to dismiss the prosecution for want of jurisdiction in the lower court.[35] But where the justice had jurisdiction the fact that the judgment as rendered is void and that the defendant may treat it as a nullity does not prevent him from appealing from it.[36] Whether an allowance of the appeal is indispensable depends on the statute.[37]

(IV) RIGHT OF ACCUSED AND OF STATE TO REVIEW. In some jurisdictions the statutes allow the state as well as the accused the right to appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace.[38] Whether an appeal will lie from a judgment of conviction in a justice's court, where the defendant pleads guilty, depends upon the wording of the particular statute. Under the statutes in some jurisdictions an appeal will lie in such cases,[39] and in others it will not.[40] The refusal of Constitutionality of statute.— In jurisdictions where, on an appeal from a justice's judgment, a trial de novo is had, the allowance of an appeal to the state after a judgment of acquittal would be in contravention of the constitutional provisions against twice putting in jeopardy for the same offense. State v. Powell, 86 N. C. 640, holding that a statute allowing "the party against whom judgment is given" in such cases to appeal does not apply to the state, and is solely for the benefit of the accused, although the judgment may be reviewed in so far as it is personal to and taxes with the payment of costs the injured party by whom the proceeding was instituted.

(v) Proceedings For Review on Appeal or Writ of Error. The procedure with respect to notice, hearing, etc., on appeal or writ of error from a justice of the peace or other inferior court, is regulated by statutory provisions.[42] Usually written notice must be served by the appellant on the prosecuting attorney,[43] but sometimes notice of appeal must be given orally in open court and entered on the docket of the justice.[44] shall be tried de novo in the superior court. Under such circumstances the jurisdiction is not properly speaking appellate, and the superior court has no power to review, or to affirm or reverse the magistrate's conviction, but the cause stands in the higher court as though it had been there instituted and must there be tried on the law and the evidence, irrespective of what the magistrate decided.[65] In some states, however, on such an appeal the accused is not entitled as of right to a trial de novo.[66] An appeal from a judgment of conviction before a justice of the peace supersedes, but does not vacate, the judgment, and if the appeal is dismissed for want of prosecution that fact should be certified to the justice and he should then enforce his judgment.[67]

b. Review, Determination, and Disposition of Cause — (I) Assignments of Error, Reasons of Appeal, and Bill of Exceptions. On appeal from a justice of the peace, where the case is to be reviewed and not tried de novo,[68] the statutes sometimes require assignments of errors in the appeal affidavit or otherwise, so that errors not assigned cannot be considered.[69] In some states the reasons of appeal are required to be filed.[70] Assignments of error or reasons of appeal must be filed within the time prescribed by statute.[71] Where the case is to be tried de novo on appeal from a justice of the peace or police court, a bill of exceptions or statement of the rulings in the justice's or police court is not necessary.[72]

(II) Who May Except to Rulings. The state cannot, on an appeal by the accused from a conviction, except to the rulings which may cause his acquittal.[73]

(III) Extent of Review and Waiver of Objections — (A) On Appeal For Trial De Novo. On appeal from a summary conviction by a justice of the peace or other inferior court, where there is to be a trial de novo, the appeal constitutes a waiver of or renders immaterial irregularities and informalities in the proceedings before the justice not affecting his jurisdiction.[74] Objection cannot

(B) On Appeal For Review. Where the appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace or other magistrate is for the purpose of review and not for trial de novo, the proceedings are reviewed, and prejudicial errors or irregularities, if not waived, will be ground for reversal or modification of the judgment. Decision of justice as to jurisdiction not conclusive.— Under a statute (S. C. Gen. St. § 824) providing that trial justices may punish all assaults "when the offence is not of a high and aggravated nature, requiring in their judgment greater punishment" than they are allowed to impose, the determination of the trial justice that a certain case is or is not within his jurisdiction is not binding on appeal to the circuit court. State v. Burch, 43 S. C. 3, 20 S. E. 758.

or if the complaint or warrant on which the accused was tried is insufficient.[81] Ordinarily the appellate court cannot review the evidence before the magistrate and reverse on the ground of its insufficiency,[82] or reverse for rulings on questions within the discretion of the magistrate;[83] and the discretion of the justice in assessing the punishment on a plea of guilty is not reviewable.[84] When the statute authorizes the appellate court to review the evidence, the conclusions of the magistrate will be sustained if the evidence was such that it could be left to a jury on a trial in court.[85]

(c) On Writ of Certiorari or Review. A writ of certiorari to review a summary conviction by a magistrate[86] brings up for review all jurisdictional errors apparent on the face of the record.[87] Some courts have held that it brings up jurisdictional errors only.[88] Others hold that the magistrate must insert in the record and include in his return to the writ of certiorari the evidence on which the accused was convicted, and that, although the court will not review the weight or sufficiency of the evidence, the conviction will be quashed if the record does not show that there was any evidence to sustain it.[89] Where the accused may either appeal from a summary conviction before a justice or remove the conviction by a writ of certiorari, and he elects the latter remedy, he will be concluded by the return of the justice and cannot show error not appearing therein.[90] In some jurisdictions statutes provide for a writ called a writ of review to take the place of the writ of certiorari, for the purpose of reviewing summary convictions before a justice of the peace. The extent of the review under these statutes depends upon their terms. In Oregon it is substantially the same as on certiorari.[91]

(IV) CONCLUSIVENESS AND EFFECT OF RECORD. The recitals and entries in the record of the justice of the facts and details of the proceedings before him are prima facie true and correct, and the burden of proof to show their falsity is upon the party seeking to contradict them.[92] On some questions the record of the justice is conclusive.[93] The statements of the affidavit for an appeal from a magistrate must be taken as true, unless the state controverts them and establishes their falsity.[94] The transcript of a magistrate cannot supply a fatal omission in the complaint.[95]

(V) DETERMINATION AND DISPOSITION OF APPEAL. The disposition which the appellate court must make of the case on appeal from a magistrate depends of course on the statutes in the particular jurisdiction. In some jurisdictions there must be a trial de novo, and the court has no power to affirm or reverse the judgment of the magistrate,[96] while in others the conviction is reviewed and affirmed, reversed, or modified.[97] In some jurisdictions, whether the appeal from a magistrate is solely upon questions of law, or upon questions of fact, or both, the appellate court may render such judgment as according to the law of the case ought to be entered, and if the judgment of the justice is in part valid and in part erroneous, he may reject what is erroneous and affirm as to the remainder.[98] Where the defendant fails to appear in the appellate court and prosecute his appeal, it should in some jurisdictions be dismissed, and a writ of procedendo issued to the justice,[99] while in other jurisdictions the judgment should be affirmed.[1] An appeal will be dismissed, although allowed by the justice, where the accused has failed to give the security required by statute.[2]

(VI) RECOMMITMENT, REMAND, OR PROCEDENDO. Where a conviction is

Oregon statute (1 Hill Anno. Laws (1892), § 582 et seq.) brings up only the record, and that, since the record of a justice's court under the Oregon statutes consists only of the docket and all papers and process filed in such court, the justice is not required to reduce to writing or return with the writ the testimony given on a criminal trial.

affirmed on appeal or certiorari,[3] or where an appeal is dismissed because the appellant fails to prosecute it,[4] the cause is returned to the justice for execution of the judgment.[5] If the appellant has been released pending the appeal he ought to be recommitted when the appeal is dismissed or the judgment affirmed.[6] The commitment need only recite the judgment, the appeal, and the dismissal or affirmance.[7]

c. Trial De Novo — (I) Mode of Trial. In some jurisdictions, as has been shown, the statutes provide that on appeal from a justice of the peace or from a police court the case shall be tried de novo, and the case is to be tried without regard to the decision of the magistrate and as if originally commenced in the appellate court.[8] Generally the only objections to the proceedings before the magistrate that are to be considered are such as relate to his jurisdiction and to the perfection of the appeal.[9] The statutes sometimes provide for a trial by the court,[10] and sometimes for a trial by jury, or for either at the election of the accused.[11]

(II) Arraignment and Plea. Where the accused has been arraigned and pleaded not guilty before a justice of the peace, it is not necessary that he should be arraigned and plead upon his trial de novo on appeal,[12] but where the defendant was not arraigned before the justice, he should be arraigned in the circuit court, and after entry of plea he should be tried de novo, as if he had been arraigned before the justice.[13]

(III) Complaint or Other Accusation — (A) Original Complaint or Affidavit. As a general rule a new complaint or information need not be filed on an appeal from a conviction before a magistrate, where the statute provides that the accused shall be tried de novo in the appellate court, but the original complaint or affidavit used before the justice may be used.[14] The accused need not be indicted,[15] unless an indictment is expressly required by statute, as is the case in some jurisdictions.[16]

(B) Statement of Prosecuting Attorney. Under the Alabama statute the trial de novo on appeal from a summary conviction is on "a brief statement of the cause of complaint" made by the solicitor for the state,[17] but the parties may by agreement dispense with this statement and substitute the affidavit for the warrant of arrest, when it is sufficiently specific in its averments.[18] Such statement cannot be filed and the accused tried thereon, after the appellate court has sustained a demurrer to the affidavit filed in the lower court.[19]

(C) Amendment or Substitution. As a rule, in some jurisdictions by statute, the complaint, affidavit, or warrant used before the justice or other magistrate may be amended, if defective, or a new complaint may be substituted, in the discretion of the appellate court, when the accused is to be tried de novo.[20] In some states, however, the rule is otherwise.[21] Where the complaint or warrant on which the trial is had before the justice fails to charge an offense within his jurisdiction, it cannot be amended in the circuit court so as to charge such offense.[22] The statement of the cause of complaint which the Alabama statute requires the solicitor for the state to file in the appellate court[23] may be amended by leave of court.[24] Where the copy of the complaint made before the justice is incorrect, the appellate court may allow and receive a new and correct copy at any time before the case is given to the jury, or the record of the justice may be amended so as to make the copy of the complaint conform to the original.[25]

used before the magistrate has been lost, a new one, if actually produced and offered to be filed,[26] and if it is an exact copy of the original, signed and sworn to by the same person who signed the original, may be used.[27] But where the original complaint has been quashed by the appellate court for insufficiency, the accused cannot be tried on a new complaint originating in the appellate court, where that court has no original jurisdiction of the offense.[28]

(IV) PLEAS AND DEFENSES. The defendant on the trial de novo may plead the same plea that he pleaded in the justice's court, or any matter subsequent to it which he would have had the right to plead there, but he cannot plead any matter which occurred prior to that pleaded and determined in the court below.[29] He may demur or move to quash or dismiss on the ground that the complaint does not set forth facts sufficient to constitute an offense, or an offense within the jurisdiction of the justice.[30] If the defendant has pleaded guilty in the magistrate's court, he cannot withdraw the plea without the permission of the appellate court.[31]

court below.[35] On appeal from a summary conviction the record from the justice constitutes no part of the evidence on the trial anew.[36]

(VI) CONDUCT OF TRIAL. The conduct of a trial de novo on appeal from a summary conviction is governed by substantially the same rules as an ordinary trial on indictment or information, except in so far as differences in the mode of accusation and trial render such rules inapplicable.[37] The justice who has tried the accused should not be permitted to interfere in any way, or to appear before the appellate court on the trial de novo for the purpose of sustaining his own decision.[38] A statement by the county attorney in his opening to the jury on a trial de novo that the defendant has been tried in the justice's court and there convicted is not reversible error.[39]

(VII) JOINT AND SEPARATE TRIALS. Several defendants separately tried by a justice may be jointly tried by the appellate court,[40] and one of several defendants jointly tried by the justice may in the discretion of the appellate court be given a separate trial de novo.[41]

(VIII) WAIVER OF DEFECTS AND OBJECTIONS. Pleading and going to trial in the appellate court waives all objections to defects or irregularities in formal parts of the papers sent up from the court below.[42]

(IX) POWER TO IMPOSE SENTENCE. On the trial de novo the court cannot exceed the limit of punishment which the magistrate could have imposed, but may within that limit impose a lighter or heavier penalty than was adjudged below.[43]

XI. ARRAIGNMENT AND PLEAS, AND NOLLE PROSEQUI OR DISCONTINUANCE.

A. Bench-Warrant or Other Process After Indictment. By the early common law it was the practice to issue a venire facias for the accused after indictment, where he was not in custody, and a capias if the venire facias was ineffectual, but this was subsequently changed so that in the time of Blackstone, upon the certificate of an indictment found, the court of king's bench issued a capias immediately to bring in the accused. In the case of felony a capias was issued in the first instance.[44] Some of the early cases in the United States followed this practice.[45] At the present time the practice is for the court to issue a bench-warrant for the arrest of the accused, and a warrant of commitment, reciting the fact of indictment and describing the crime.[46] If the accused, when indicted, is in custody,[47] or if he appears in court and submits to the jurisdiction,[48] he cannot object that no process had issued to arrest him.[49] A bench-warrant and warrant of commitment after indictment should state the fact of indictment and the offense,[50] but it is sufficient if it recites the fact of indictment and describes the offense generally.[51] The return of a summons to answer an indictment directed to the sheriff of a particular county is not bad because it omits to state that it was served in that county.[52]

B. Arraignment and Pleas — 1. In General — a. Definition and Manner of Arraignment. The arraignment is the call of the prisoner to the bar, in order that he may answer the charge against him in the indictment.[53] At common law defendant, when brought to the bar, was called upon by name to hold up his hand for the purpose of identifying him, and the indictment was then read to him in the English language and he was asked whether he was guilty of the crime for which he was indicted or not guilty; but the practice of reading the indictment has been generally discontinued and the practice of furnishing the defendant or his counsel with a copy of it substituted for the former method.[54] The object of the arraignment and plea is to identify the accused and to frame an issue upon which he may be tried.[55]

b. Necessity For Arraignment and Plea. An arraignment, unless waived by the accused, and the entry of a plea either by or for him, are absolutely essential on a trial for a felony, and in some jurisdictions on a trial for a misdemeanor; and a conviction cannot be sustained, in the absence of a valid waiver by the accused,[56] where the record does not show that these requirements have been substantially complied with.[57] In some jurisdictions, however, the rule is not so

Trial of issue as to identity.— The issue formed by the denial of the prisoner, when arraigned, of his identity with the person named in the indictment, was at common law tried at once by a jury sworn for that special purpose. Rex v. Rogers, 3 Burr. 1809.

Separate arraignment of co-defendants.— Defendants jointly indicted may be arraigned separately, but are more commonly arraigned together, and as the purpose of arraignment is to establish identity, where each is asked whether he is guilty or not, his answer is a valid plea, and it is not material that a separate trial is not granted. strict in cases of misdemeanor, and arraignment may be dispensed with if a plea is entered.[58]

c. Further Arraignment and Plea. Where a defendant has been arraigned and pleaded not guilty, and a judgment of conviction is reversed and the case remanded, a rearraignment is unnecessary, as the plea of guilty interposed on the first trial remains in full force until the indictment is finally disposed of.[59] Where defendant withdraws his plea of not guilty and substitutes another plea, or demurs or moves to quash the indictment, and the plea, demurrer, or motion is overruled, the plea of not guilty is not thereby reinstated, and it should be reëntered before trial;[60] but it has been held that the plea may be reëntered by order of the court without any rearraignment of defendant.[61] If an information is amended after arraignment and plea, so as to charge the commission of the offense as of another date, a conviction thereon cannot be sustained without rearraignment and plea.[62]

Effect of stipulation.— It has been held that the effect of a stipulation, made on withdrawing a plea of not guilty, that if the motion to quash is overruled the trial shall immediately proceed, is to reënter the plea after such overruling. Morton v. People, 47 Ill. 468.

Plea not stricken from record.— In Gormley v. State, 37 Ohio St. 120, where leave to withdraw a plea of not guilty and to substitute a plea of former conviction was granted, but the plea of not guilty was not stricken from the record, and after the plea of former conviction was overruled a trial was had without further plea, it was held that there was no error.

d. Time of Arraignment and Plea. The arraignment and plea ought to precede the impaneling and swearing of the jury and the hearing of the evidence, for until plea there is no issue. The failure to arraign a prisoner and enter his plea before the jury is sworn is a fatal omission, and an entry of the plea afterward is too late.[63] At common law a demurrer to an indictment, whether for felony or misdemeanor, amounted to a confession, and if overruled the accused could not withdraw it, but judgment followed.[64] But it is now provided by statute in most states that the court after overruling a demurrer must permit the accused to plead not guilty,[65] or enter a plea of not guilty if he stand mute.[66] The defendant should be required to plead before a change of venue is granted,[67] but a conviction will not be reversed because this is not done.[68] In the absence of a statute defendant may be required to plead at once when arraigned; he has no right to a delay.[69]

e. Requisites and Sufficiency of Arraignment and Record. A record showing that defendant was brought into court, appeared by counsel, and pleaded to the indictment sufficiently shows an arraignment.[70] The accused possesses the fundamental right to be represented by counsel, and his arraignment in the absence of counsel is reversible error.[71] An arraignment is not invalid because the accused does not hold up his hand, if he admits his identity;[72] or, unless required by statute, because he is not before his plea informed of his right to have counsel assigned;[73] or because a list of the witnesses is not read to him;[74] or because the court asks him whether he has been convicted before, as alleged in the indictment.[75] Reading the indictment to the accused is indispensable at common law, if demanded by him;[76] but an arraignment is not invalid because the indictment is not read to the accused where the statute requires a copy to be furnished him.[77] The indictment need not be read more than once,[78] and it may be read to the accused by his counsel,[79] or he may be called upon to listen while the prosecuting attorney reads it to the jury,[80] and if he be deaf and dumb it may be read and interpreted to him by a sworn interpreter.[81] The defendant may be arraigned on a certified copy of the record of a lost indictment.[82]

f. Waiver of Arraignment and Plea and Defects Therein. In some states it has been held that one who is indicted for a felony cannot, either personally or by attorney, waive arraignment and plea.[83] Generally, however, arraignment in the case of misdemeanors may be waived, and a waiver will be implied if the accused proceeds to trial in the usual manner without objection.[84] And in some jurisdictions, even in trials for felony, the accused may waive arraignment by pleading, or even without plea if he is identified and consents to or acquiesces in proceeding to a trial on the merits.[85] By voluntarily pleading to an indictment or information without objection, a defendant waives formal arraignment or defects in the arraignment.[86] If defendant when arraigned asks for and obtains time to plead, he waives any defect in the statutory detail of the proceedings constituting the arraignment, such as failure to deliver a copy of the indictment.[87]

2. REFUSAL OR FAILURE TO PLEAD. In England, by the early common law, where the accused on a trial for felony obstinately refused to plead after warning and a respite that he might consider the matter, he could be sentenced to solitary confinement in a dark cell upon bread and water, his body loaded with chains, and there confined until he answered.[88] By a statute of George III[89] it was enacted that every person who should stand mute on arraignment should be convicted, and judgment and execution thereupon awarded as if he had been convicted by verdict or on confession; but by a subsequent statute[90] it was the practice, where a prisoner stood mute, for the court to impanel a jury to try whether he was mute by the visitation of God or whether he was mute of malice, and if the jury found that he stood mute of malice, the court ordered a plea of not guilty to be entered,[91] although it has been held that in such cases sentence might be passed without further inquiry.[92] If the jury found that he was mute by the visitation of God, a plea of not guilty might be entered and he might then be tried and found guilty or acquitted by the same jury.[93] It is now very generally provided by statute that where defendant stands mute the court shall order a plea of not guilty to be entered.[94]

diction, by which the accused denies the authority of the court to try him; (2) declinatory pleas which are now obsolete, but which anciently consisted of the plea of sanctuary and the plea of clergy; (3) pleas in abatement of the indictment, which may be either for defects in the indictment which are apparent of record, or for defects which are not apparent of record, as for example the plea of misnomer; (4) special pleas in bar, by which defendant shows extrinsic facts by reason of which the indictment is not maintainable; and (5) the plea of the general issue by which he claims that he is not guilty.[96] The defendant may also plead guilty or interpose the plea of nolo contendere, which is an implied confession.[97] And he may demur to the accusation as insufficient in law, or move to quash the same, or to dismiss the prosecution.[98] Strictly speaking, however, the latter are not pleas.

b. Duplicity. The rule that duplicity renders a pleading bad applies to pleas as well as to indictments. A plea is bad and demurrable if it sets up two distinct offenses, either in bar or in abatement.[99]

c. Number of Pleas and Successive Pleas. At common law the general rule is that in criminal as well as in civil cases, defendant must rely on one ground of defense and cannot file two or more pleas setting up distinct offenses, which is called double pleading;[1] but the rule was relaxed in case of felonies. In prosecutions for misdemeanor, in the absence of a statute, if defendant pleads in abatement[2] or specially in bar,[3] or if he demurs,[4] he cannot plead not guilty, either at the same time or after the issue on the plea or demurrer has been decided against him, but he may be sentenced as upon a conviction,[5] unless the court in its discretion allows him to do so, as it may.[6] In prosecutions for a felony, however, because the punishment was death, defendant was and is allowed to plead in abatement or specially in bar, or to demur, and also to plead not guilty.[7] In some states double pleading is now allowed by statute whether the offense is a felony or a misdemeanor.[8]

d. Plea of Insanity and Not Guilty. Where the accused files a special plea of insanity, refusing to plead not guilty, it is no error to compel him to plead in addition guilty or not guilty, since the plea of insanity is a part of a plea of not guilty. His sanity may be determined under the latter plea, and he is not bound to plead it specially.[9]

e. Entry or Indorsement of Plea. The plea of defendant should be entered and appear on the record,[10] but in some states it has been held that failure of the record to show the plea is not fatal to a conviction.[11] The statute sometimes requires the plea to be indorsed on the back of the indictment, but failure to do so does not invalidate a conviction.[12]

f. Withdrawal of Pleas. It is wholly in the discretion of the court whether a plea of any sort may be withdrawn. Permission may always be granted, but unless an abuse of discretion is shown the refusal of permission to withdraw a plea is not error.[13] Thus it is discretionary with the court to permit or refuse to permit a plea of not guilty to be withdrawn for the purpose of interposing a plea in abatement, as a plea of misnomer or a plea setting up defects in the grand jury,[14]

a right to withdraw the plea of guilty is given by statute;[21] but abuse of discretion in refusing to allow a plea of guilty to be withdrawn is reversible error.[22] As in the case of a plea of guilty, the court may in its discretion allow a plea of nolo contendere to be withdrawn.[23] A plea of not guilty should be withdrawn before a demurrer, motion to quash, or plea in abatement is entertained,[24] but if it be not withdrawn defendant cannot take advantage of the omission.[25] A plea in abatement or a motion to quash, irregularly permitted to be filed after a plea of not guilty, does not operate as a withdrawal of the plea of not guilty.[26] Where the plea of not guilty is withdrawn by permission of the court for the purpose of allowing some other plea, or a demurrer or motion, it should, upon the overruling of the latter, be reëntered before a trial upon the merits; but it has been held that a rearraignment is not necessary.[27]

g. Demurrer to Pleas. If a plea interposed by defendant is insufficient as a matter of law, either in matter of substance or of form, the state may demur thereto.[28] On demurrer to a pleading in a criminal case judgment is to be given, as in civil cases, against the party who has committed the first fault in pleading.[29]

4. Pleas of Guilty and Nolo Contendere — a. 31. A statute directing that, if to an indictment for murder a prisoner pleads guilty, guilty should be made by him personally and not by counsel;[32] but where such a plea is made by counsel, and defendant, when asked by the court if it is his plea, assents by a sign or gesture, it is sufficient.[33]

(III) Effect of Plea. A plea of guilty is a confession of guilt and is equivalent to a conviction. The court must pronounce judgment and sentence as upon a verdict of guilty.[34] By a plea of guilty the accused simply confesses that he is guilty in manner and form as charged in the indictment, and if the indictment charges no criminal offense, or is otherwise fatally defective, it may be subsequently attacked on that ground.[35] But a plea of guilty waives defects in the indictment which require a plea in abatement,[36] as for example the right to object that another indictment for the same crime is pending against him elsewhere,[37] and is also a waiver of a trial by jury, so that the court may at once, under the statute, proceed to determine the degree of guilt, for the purpose of fixing the punishment.[38]

(IV) Voluntary Character of Plea. To authorize the acceptance and entry of a plea of guilty and judgment and sentence thereon, the plea must be entirely voluntary. It must not be induced by fear, or by misrepresentation, persuasion, or the holding out of false hopes, nor made through inadvertence or ignorance.[39] The court should be satisfied as to the voluntary character of the plea before giving judgment and passing sentence, and in some states such an investigation is required by statute.[40] In some states the statute requires the court to admonish defendant as to the consequences of the plea.[41]

b. Plea of Nolo Contendere. A plea of nolo contendere, which is still allowed in some jurisdictions, is an implied confession of the crime charged, and as regards the case in which it is entered is equivalent to a plea of guilty, except that it gives the accused the advantage of not being estopped to deny his guilt in a civil action based upon the same facts as he would be upon a plea of guilty.[42] If accepted by the court[43] sentence is imposed as upon a plea of guilty.[44]

5. Plea to Jurisdiction — a. In General. A plea to the jurisdiction is proper when the court before which the indictment is preferred has no cognizance of the offense, either because of its nature or because it was not committed within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, or when the court has no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant.[45] The fact, however, that the court is without jurisdiction may usually be shown under the general issue, or, when the want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the indictment, by demurrer or motion in arrest, and where this is so a plea to the jurisdiction is unnecessary.[46]

In Michigan the statute provides that whenever a defendant pleads guilty, the court, before pronouncing judgment or sentence, shall make such investigation as will satisfy him that the plea was made freely, with a full knowledge of the accusation, and without undue influence. People v. Lepper, 51 Mich. 196, 16 N. W. 377; People v. Lewis, 51 Mich. 172, 16 N. W. 326; People v. Ferguson, 48 Mich. 41, 11 N. W. 777; Bayliss v. People, 46 Mich. 221, 9 N. W. 257. And see People v. Luby, 99 Mich. 89, 57 N. W. 1092. It is a sufficient inquiry as to the voluntary character of a plea of guilty to interview defendant's counsel and friends. Henning v. People, 40 Mich. 733. And an examination of defendant by the judge to ascertain whether his plea of guilty is voluntary is not necessarily defective because made in open court and in the presence of the prosecuting attorney and others. People v. Lewis, 51 Mich. 172, 16 N. W. 326; Bayliss v. People, 46 Mich. 221, 9 N. W. 257. But see People v. Stickney, 50 Mich. 99, 14 N. W. 880. Where it affirmatively appears that the judge made inquiry as to the voluntary character of the plea, there can be no assumption that defendant acted in ignorance or under compulsion. b. Sufficiency and Time of Filing. A plea to the jurisdiction must, like other dilatory pleas, be certain to every intent. It must specifically and clearly show the facts necessary to sustain it.[47] And such a plea must precede the plea of not guilty. The court may in its discretion refuse to allow a plea of not guilty to be withdrawn and a plea to the jurisdiction to be filed.[48]

6. Plea in Abatement[49]— a. In General. Any defect apparent on the face of the indictment, or founded on matter extrinsic of the record, rendering the indictment insufficient, may be made the ground of a plea in abatement, and if found for defendant will abate the indictment.[50] Matter in abatement must be so pleaded.[51] A plea in abatement is the proper mode of raising the objection that the indictment was found by an illegal grand jury, or illegally found by a legal grand jury;[52] that a mistake was made by the clerk in indorsing the indictment a "true bill";[53] that there has been no sufficient preliminary examination;[54] that the crime charged is not the crime for which he was extradited;[55] that there is a misnomer of the defendant;[56] and similar objections. The defendant cannot plead in abatement matters which are admissible in defense under the plea of not guilty,[57] or any matter which has been admitted by his previous pleadings.[58] In some states pleas in abatement have been abolished.[59]

b. Form and Requisites. Pleas in abatement must specifically set forth the grounds of objection. Being dilatory pleas they are not favored and are strictly construed, and they must possess the highest degree of certainty in every particular and to every intent.[60] They must anticipate and exclude by proper allegations every legal conclusion that may be made against them, and which might defeat them.[61] A plea in abatement is bad if it is repugnant or contradicts the record,[62] presents two or more issuable facts disjunctively,[63] or alleges facts by way of recital instead of directly.[64] A plea in abatement must be in writing,[65] and signed by defendant[66] or by his counsel,[67] and by the weight of authority it must be verified as to all allegations not of record.[68] The plea should conclude with a prayer that the indictment be quashed.[69] It seems that a plea in abatement is not amendable.[70] Objections to the form of the plea are waived by joining issue thereon.[71]

c. Time and Order of Pleading. A plea in abatement need not be filed at the term at which the indictment is found, but may be filed when the prisoner is arraigned.[72] A plea in abatement should be pleaded on the arraignment and before pleading not guilty or otherwise in bar.[73] The court may in its discretion refuse to allow a plea of not guilty to be withdrawn and a plea in abatement to be filed.[74] The right to plead in abatement is waived by a plea in bar,[75] or by pleading not guilty and going to trial.[76] Where a statute limits the time within which a plea in abatement may be filed, delay beyond such time is not excused by the mere fact that defendant did not know the facts, but he must have exercised reasonable diligence to ascertain them.[77]

true of the objection that the offense charged in the indictment or information differs from that charged in the preliminary complaint or affidavit.[79]

e. Defects in Drawing or Impaneling, or in the Constitution of Grand Jury. In the absence of a prohibitive statute, the accused may and should except to the organization of a grand jury, to the incompetency of the persons composing it, or to any irregularity in summoning them, by a plea in abatement to the indictment. He may base a plea in abatement upon any objection which would have been a good cause of challenge.[80] In some jurisdictions the grounds of objection to the grand jury which may be raised by a plea in abatement are limited by statute,[81] and in others the defendant cannot plead in abatement, but must raise his objection by challenge, unless he has no opportunity to do so.[82] In such a plea the greatest accuracy and certainty are required.[83] It must specifically point out the particular objection or defect relied on,[84] and must negative every conclusion in favor of the legality of the drawing and impaneling.[85]

f. Irregularities in Proceedings of Grand Jury. In some jurisdictions it is held that the fact that an indictment is found without the concurrence of the number of grand jurors required by law or otherwise irregularly may be shown by a plea in abatement,[86] or on a motion to strike the indictment from the files;[87] but in others it is held that an indictment properly returned and indorsed is conclusive of the regularity of its finding, that the proper number concurred therein, and that a plea in abatement based on irregularity in the proceedings cannot be allowed.[88] A plea in abatement will not lie on the ground that the evidence upon which the grand jury found an indictment was insufficient,[89] or because of alleged error in the special charge given by the judge to the grand jury.[90]

g. Misnomer of Defendant. A misnomer of the defendant in an indictment or information may and must be pleaded in abatement,[91] and the accused cannot, after plea of not guilty has been entered and the trial begun, be heard to object to a misnomer in the indictment.[92] A plea in abatement for misnomer must state, not only the true name of the accused, but also that he was not commonly known and called by the name under which he was indicted.[93]

h. Another Indictment Pending. The fact that another indictment is pending against the accused for the same crime is no ground for a plea in abatement.[94]

i. Demurrer to Plea in Abatement. If a plea in abatement is insufficient or defective, it may be demurred to; and this is the proper way of raising the objection, rather than by motion to strike out.[95] On such demurrer judgment should be rendered against the party who has committed the first fault in pleading.[96]

j. Replication and Issue. An issue of fact on a plea in abatement sufficient in form must be raised by replication,[97] and where issue is taken any defects in the plea which would have been a ground for demurrer are thereby waived.[98]

k. Evidence. The burden of proof is on defendant, under a plea in abatement, to show by competent evidence the facts on which his plea is based.[99] On an issue of misnomer the state may show that defendant pleaded in another court to the name under which he is indicted,[1] or that he has been called by that name and has answered to it in conversation.[2]

m. Judgment. At common law the accused could not as a matter of right plead over when an issue of fact was found against him on a plea in abatement to an indictment for a misdemeanor,[7] although under similar circumstances on trial for felony he had a right to plead over to the felony.[8] At the present time under an indictment either for a misdemeanor or for a felony, where the state's demurrer to a plea in abatement is sustained, defendant may plead over.[9]

7. Special Pleas in Bar — a. In General. In a criminal prosecution defendant may and should plead specially in bar any matter in confession and avoidance constituting a defense and not admissible under a plea of not guilty.[10] The defendant need not specially plead any defense which is admissible under the plea of not guilty,[11] and by the weight of authority a special plea setting up a defense which is admissible under the plea of not guilty is bad and should be stricken out,[12] unless the objection is waived by the state.[13] In some jurisdictions, by statute, all pleas in bar except the plea of not guilty have been dispensed with, and under the latter plea defendant may avail himself of any meritorious defense he may have,[14] and under such a statute it has been held that a special plea in bar is demurrable.[15] A special plea is bad if it sets up a fact established by the record,[16] if it presents in different words the same defense and issue as is presented by another plea,[17] or if it does not answer the whole indictment or all of the counts to which it is pleaded.[18] A special plea in bar should be pleaded before a plea of not guilty, and it may be disregarded if a plea of not guilty is on the record, unless the court in its discretion allows the latter plea to be withdrawn.[19] In some states by statute no plea is allowed except the pleas of guilty, not guilty, and former acquittal or conviction.[20]

b. Replication and Demurrer. If the prosecuting officer disputes the facts set forth in a special plea in bar, he should reply thereto and raise an issue of fact.[21] If he denies its sufficiency in law he should demur.[22] By demurring to a plea in bar the state admits all facts well pleaded,[23] but for the purposes of the demurrer only and not for the purposes of the trial, and the overruling of the demurrer does not entitle defendant to a discharge.[24] Where defendant demurs to a replication to his special plea in bar, and the demurrer is overruled, he cannot rejoin to the replication without first withdrawing his demurrer.[25]

c. Judgment and Pleading Over. If a special plea in bar is sustained defendant is discharged.[26] If it is held bad on demurrer or not sustained by the proof, the judgment in case of a misdemeanor is at common law final as upon conviction;[27] but in the case of a felony the judgment is respondeat ouster unless defendant has pleaded over with his special plea, in which case there is a trial on the plea of not guilty.[28] At the present time the judgment is respondeat ouster in all cases, whether the offense is a felony or a misdemeanor.[29]

d. Plea of Limitations.[30] In most of the cases it has been held that the statute of limitations is available under the general issue, and need not be specially pleaded,[31] and in some states this is so by the express provision of a

20. Under a statute, providing that the only pleas to an indictment shall be guilty or not guilty or a plea of former acquittal or conviction, where one is indicted for perjury on his trial for larceny, of which he was acquitted, it is proper to strike out a plea setting out what defendant claimed was in issue on the trial for larceny, and averring that the same matters were in issue under the indictment for perjury. statute,[32] so that a special plea is bad and should be stricken out.[33] Some courts, however, in the absence of a statute, have held that a special plea is necessary,[34] or that it may be pleaded even though the defense may also be proved under the plea of not guilty.[35] If the statute is relied upon, it must be set up at the trial, either by a special plea or under the general issue.[36] It is not a ground for a demurrer to the indictment,[37] and is not available on a motion in arrest of judgment,[38] or on an application for a writ of habeas corpus.[39]

e. Plea of Insanity. In the absence of statute requiring insanity to be specially pleaded,[40] the rule is that evidence of the insanity of defendant at the time the offense was committed is admissible under a plea of not guilty,[41] and a special plea setting up such defense is bad.[42] In the absence of a statute,[43] no plea of insanity at the time of the trial is required. If at any time during the proceedings in a criminal trial a doubt arises as to the sanity of defendant, it is the duty of the court, of its own motion, to suspend further proceedings in the case until the question of sanity has been determined.[44]

f. Plea of Pardon. A pardon, to be available as a defense, must be specially pleaded.[45]

g. Plea of Agreement to Turn State's Evidence. In Texas, and perhaps in other states, a special plea may be filed setting up an agreement by the prosecuting officer not to prosecute in consideration of the defendant's turning state's evidence, and performance of the agreement by defendant.[46]

h. Plea of Former Acquittal, Conviction, or Jeopardy — (i) In General. In most jurisdictions a former acquittal or conviction, or former jeopardy, is not admissible as a defense under the general issue raised by a plea of not guilty, or on demurrer, motion in arrest, or writ of error, but must be set up by a special plea in bar;[47] but in some states, by statute, the defense may be proved under the general issue and a special plea is unnecessary,[48] and according to some of the cases improper.[49] In some states it has been held that a special plea is unnecessary where the former proceeding was on the same indictment and in the same court, or even on a different indictment, as the court in such a case will take cognizance of the record.[50] Of course the plea of former acquittal or conviction can be pleaded only after an acquittal or conviction. It cannot be based upon the fact that another indictment is pending for the same offense.[51]

(11) Form and Sufficiency. The pleas of former acquittal and conviction, being pleas in bar, are favored pleas and do not require so high a degree of certainty as an indictment or as a plea in abatement or other dilatory plea;[52] but they must sufficiently set forth the defense.[53] Such a plea consists partly of matter of record and partly of matter of fact. It must, in the absence of a statute, set forth the record of the former acquittal or conviction,[54] and it must allege and at common law should be verified.[62] In some states the form of pleas of former acquittal, conviction, and jeopardy is prescribed by statute.[63] If the plea sets forth two distinct records of acquittal it is demurrable for duplicity.[64]

(III) TIME AND ORDER OF PLEADING. A plea of former acquittal, conviction, or jeopardy should be pleaded when the defendant is arraigned and before or at the time of a plea of not guilty, and the court may in its discretion refuse to allow a plea of not guilty to be withdrawn and the special plea substituted;[65] but if the defendant's counsel so requests he should be allowed a reasonable time to file the plea,[66] and it may be filed even after trial has been commenced if it could not be filed sooner.[67] Some of the cases hold that a plea of not guilty and a plea of former conviction cannot be pleaded at the same time,[68] while others hold the contrary.[69] The pleas of not guilty and former acquittal or jeopardy, being consistent, may be pleaded at the same time.[70] A plea of former acquittal does not withdraw a plea of not guilty,[71] but filing and going to trial upon a plea of not guilty after filing a plea of former conviction is a waiver of the latter plea, although it has been replied to.[72]

(IV) JOINDER OF ISSUE, REPLICATION, AND DEMURRER. Where the plea of former acquittal or conviction is interposed, the prosecuting officer may join issue by a similiter, or may reply, taking issue upon the averment of identity of the offense or of the person, or setting up facts in avoidance, or reply nul tiel record, if he disputes the fact of the alleged acquittal or conviction.[73] If the plea is

Discharge of jury without verdict.— It is for the court to determine from the record the issue raised by a plea of former jeopardy alleging that the jury at the former trial were discharged without the defendant's consent. Lanphere v. State, 114 Wis. 198, 89 N. W. 128.

A so-called "special plea of former jeopardy" in the form of a motion to discharge the defendant and exonerate his bond, based on former proceedings in the same court, so issue made by a demurrer to the plea, or by a replication setting up that there is no such record as that set forth in the plea.[99] Some of the cases hold that where a former conviction or acquittal and a plea of not guilty are pleaded at the same time[1] the former must be disposed of before the latter is submitted to the jury,[2] while others hold that the two issues may be tried and submitted at the same time for separate findings or verdicts.[3] Failure of the jury to find on a plea of former acquittal or conviction submitted at the same time as a plea of not guilty renders a conviction erroneous, and no judgment can be entered thereon.[4] The issues of not guilty and of former acquittal or conviction may be submitted to the same jury[5] or to a different jury.[6]

(VII) JUDGMENT AND PLEADING OVER. When the plea of former acquittal or conviction is sustained the defendant must be discharged as upon an acquittal.[7] Where the prosecution is for a felony, and the issue on the plea is decided against the defendant, the judgment, even at common law, is respondeat ouster, and the defendant pleads guilty or not guilty, or if he has pleaded over in the plea the jury are charged again to inquire of the second issue,[8] or in some jurisdictions, as has been shown, both issues may be submitted at the same time.[9] In the case of misdemeanors, at common law, the defendant could not plead over, but the judgment against him on the special plea was final and as upon a conviction;[10] but in most states if not in all he is now allowed to plead over in prosecutions for misdemeanors as well as in prosecutions for felonies.[11] Where a demurrer by the state that no evidence is required, and only a question of law is presented, does not require any issue to be joined and may properly be disposed of by the court like any other motion. Peters v. U. S., 94 Fed. 127, 36 C. C. A. 105.

Waiver of objection.— In Alabama, where this rule is established, it is held that if the plea of former acquittal and not guilty are tried and submitted to the jury at the same time failure of the defendant to object is a waiver of the irregularity in the case of a misdemeanor (Moody v. State, 60 Ala. 78; Faulk v. State, 52 Ala. 415), but not in the case of a felony (Faulk v. State, 52 Ala. 415; Foster v. State, 39 Ala. 229).

to a plea of former acquittal or conviction is overruled, the defendant is not entitled to discharge, but the state may reply;[12] but if the state does not reply the judgment must be that the defendant be discharged, for the demurrer admits the facts stated in the plea.[13] The judgment on the issue raised by a plea of former acquittal, conviction, or jeopardy should be entered on the records of the court,[14] but failure to enter a judgment against the defendant on such a plea does not invalidate a conviction on a plea of not guilty entered by him without objection under permission to plead over.[15]

8. Plea of Not Guilty — a. In General. himself ready for trial the defendant in effect enters a plea of not guilty.[19] Where a plea of not guilty has not been entered at the time of the prisoner's arraignment the court may order it to be entered thereafter nunc pro tunc.[20] The plea of not guilty is sufficient, although informal, if it is certain to a common intent.[21] Withdrawal of a plea of not guilty has been elsewhere treated.[22]

b. Defendants Jointly Indicted. Persons jointly indicted for the same crime have a right to plead severally not guilty, but a general plea of not guilty by all is a several plea as to each.[23]

c. Plea by Counsel. It seems that in a prosecution for a misdemeanor a plea of not guilty may be made by the defendant by counsel, even in the defendant's absence,[24] and there are cases sustaining a plea by counsel in prosecutions for a felony, both where the defendant was present[25] and where he was absent.[26] Other cases hold that one accused of a felony must plead in person, and a plea of not guilty by counsel, whether in the defendant's absence or presence, is a nullity.[27]

d. Joinder of Issue. The omission from the record of a similiter or joinder of issue by the prosecuting attorney does not vitiate a conviction on a plea of not guilty, for this plea legally puts the defendant on trial before the jury.[28]

e. Issues Under Plea of Not Guilty. A plea of not guilty is a denial of and puts in issue the whole of the charge, every allegation of the indictment, the criminal intent, and every statement of the witnesses against the defendant.[29] Under the general issue the defendant is entitled to show matters of justification and excuse.[30] The plea of not guilty puts in issue the place of the crime,[31] its degree,[32] the allegation that the name of the person injured was unknown to the grand jurors,[33] and each and every one of the several counts in the indictment.[34]

Some of the cases seem to hold that a nolle prosequi cannot be entered without the defendant's consent after the jury have been impaneled and sworn and before verdict (State v. Davis, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 345; State v. Klock, 48 La. Ann. 140, 18 So. 942; Com. v. Wade, 17 Pick. (Mass.) 395; State v. Smith, 49 N. H. 155, 6 Am. Rep. 480; Rider's Case, 3 City Hall Rec. (N. Com. v. Kimhall, 7 Gray (Mass.) 328. This, however, was not the rule at common law, and the better opinion is that it may be so entered by leave of the court, which has been impaneled and sworn, and the indictment is sufficient, jeopardy has attached, and in most states he cannot be again put upon trial for the same offense.[38]

(II) LEAVE OF COURT. At common law the matter of entering a nolle prosequi rests entirely within the discretion of the prosecuting officer, and leave of the court is not necessary;[39] and by the weight of authority this is still the rule, in the absence of a statute, where the entry is before the trial begins. Leave of the court, however, is sometimes expressly required by statute,[40] and in some states it has been held necessary, even in the absence of a statute, where the nolle prosequi is entered after the jury have been impaneled and sworn and before verdict,[41] or after a verdict,[42] or even before commencement of the trial.[43]

(III) AUTHORITY OF COURT TO DIRECT. In the absence of a statute the court has no power to enter or direct the prosecuting officer to enter a nolle prosequi,[44]

but the court may advise a nolle prosequi, and it is unusual for the prosecuting officer to disregard such advice.[45]

(iv) Private Prosecutor. The private prosecutor cannot withdraw a prosecution without the consent of the prosecuting officer,[46] and the concurrence of the private prosecutor is not necessary to the entry of a nolle prosequi by the prosecuting officer.[47]

(v) Grounds For Allowing. The court may properly allow a nolle prosequi to be entered where the indictment has been lost and a new one is necessary,[48] where the indictment or information is defective,[49] where a misdemeanor has been compounded under a statute permitting it,[50] where it is desired to procure the evidence of one of several defendants, jointly indicted, in order to convict the others,[51] where no evidence can be produced by the state,[52] or where the evidence at most raises only a suspicion of guilt, and the case is apparently without merit and has been pending for a long time.[53] But the defendant is entitled to an acquittal, and a nolle prosequi will not be allowed merely because of a variance between the charge and the proof, or because of the insufficiency of the evidence.[54]

c. Allowance as to Co-Defendants. It is well settled that where several persons are jointly indicted a nolle prosequi may be allowed as to one or more, and a trial had on the merits as to the others.[55] This has frequently been permitted or done for the purpose of rendering one of two or more persons who have been jointly indicted a competent witness against the other or others.[56]

d. Allowance as to One of Several Indictments or Counts, or as to Part of Count — (i) In General. A nolle prosequi may be allowed as to one of two indictments,[57] or as to one or more of the several counts of an indictment, or as to Distinction where there are several counts. — It seems, however, that where several are jointly indicted, and on a plea of guilty a nolle prosequi is entered as to some of them on one count, the others cannot be subsequently tried and convicted on that count (Walker v. State, 61 Ala. 30), and where two are jointly indicted on two counts, it is not proper to permit a nolle prosequi as to one of them on one count and as to the other on the other count (State v. Daubert, 42 Mo. 242).

Conspiracy.— The general rule applies of course to indictments for conspiracy, but with this difference. If only two are indicted, and a nolle prosequi is entered as to one of them, even after verdict, it leaves the indictment as if it charged the other alone, and since one person alone cannot be guilty of a conspiracy no judgment can be rendered against him on the verdict. part of a count or indictment which is divisible,[58] even after defendant's motion to quash,[59] or after his demurrer because of a misjoinder of counts.[60]

(II) AFTER VERDICT. After a general verdict of guilty the prosecuting officer may enter a nolle prosequi as to one or more of several counts in the indictment and move for sentence on the remainder,[61] although the defendant has made a motion in arrest of judgment.[62] He may do the same after verdict as to any count as to which the jury has failed to respond,[63] or as to which they state that they cannot agree,[64] or upon which by implication they acquit the prisoner.[65]

e. Conditional Allowance. The accused cannot claim the benefit of a nolle prosequi conditioned on his payment of costs until he has paid them in full.[66]

f. Entry on Record and Setting Aside. In order that a prosecution may be effectually withdrawn by a nolle prosequi, so as to prevent retraction and subsequent prosecution on the charge, the withdrawal must be entered on the record.[67] It has been held that a nolle prosequi may be set aside after its entry by leave of the court so as to reinstate proceedings on the indictment, if no prejudice to the defendant results,[68] or if he consents;[69] but in other cases it has been held that a nolle prosequi once entered is absolute and cannot be rescinded,[70] unless it was entered by mistake.[71]

g. Proceedings After Entry. Although a nolle prosequi does not amount to an acquittal or entitle the defendant to an absolute discharge from future prosecution, unless he has been in jeopardy,[72] he is entitled to be released,[73] without entering into a recognizance to appear at any other time.[74]

2. Discontinuance — a. What Constitutes. A criminal prosecution as well as a civil suit may be discontinued by the act of the state, of the court, or of the attorney who prosecutes in behalf of the state.[75] A discontinuance is defined to be a gap or chasm in the proceeding after the suit is pending.[76] Its effect is to end the proceeding, and in the absence of a waiver no process or act affecting the accused can subsequently be based upon it.[77] What in any case shall, aside from statute, constitute a discontinuance is difficult to determine. It may result from unexplained delay in taking further steps in the case, or failure to take necessary steps,[78] failure of the prosecutor to appear,[79] the abolishing of the county to which the venue has been changed,[80] or from the continuance of the case by the clerk beyond the period allowed by statute.[81] But it has been held that a discontinuance does not necessarily result from failure to have the case docketed or called,[82] failure to issue process,[83] omission of the case from the docket or failure to proceed therein while it is pending in another court,[84] failure of the judge to appear or dispose of the case,[85] or his omission to continue it after verdict,[86] failure to hold

XII. EVIDENCE.

A. Burden of Proof and Presumptions — 1. Burden of Proof — a. General Rule. The general rule is that every man is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is proved beyond a reasonable doubt,[92] and in a criminal prosecution therefore the burden is on the state to prove every fact and circumstance which is essential to the guilt of the accused,[93] and to prove each item as though the whole issue rested on it,[94] except in so far as a statute establishes a different rule.[95] The burden of proof does not shift on the establishing of a prima facie case by the

b. Constitutionality of Statutes. In the case of statutory crimes no constitutional provision is violated by a statute providing that proof by the state of some material fact shall be presumptive evidence of guilt and shall cast the burden of proof upon the accused.[97] The presumption of innocence[98] is merely a rule of evidence and does not create any vested right in the accused.[99]

Circumstances suspending running of statute.— If the fact that an offense has not been made known to the prosecuting attorney until within one year is relied upon by the state to take a case out of the statute, the accused has the burden of proof to show that it came to the knowledge of such officer before the year. jurisdiction depends on the character of the place where a crime is committed, as is often the case in prosecutions in the federal courts, the burden is on the prosecution to show the fact necessary to give jurisdiction.[15]

i. Alibi. There is an irreconcilable conflict in the cases as to the proof of an alibi. Some regard this as a distinct and affirmative defense, and consequently hold that the burden of proving it is upon the accused and that he must convince the jury that it was impossible for him to have been at the place at the time of the crime.[16] Other cases hold or seem to hold that he must satisfy the jury of the truth of the alibi by a preponderance of evidence.[17] By the weight of Circumstances dispensing with proof of venue.— Proof of venue is not rendered unnecessary by failure to allege the venue in the indictment (Sparks v. State, 59 Ala. 82; Johnson v. State, 32 Ark. 181), or by the fact that the judge and jury may personally know the locus in quo to be within the county (Com. v. Clauss, 5 Pa. Dist. 658, 18 Pa. Co. Ct. 381; Miles v. State, 23 Tex. App. 410, 5 S. W. 250. But see State v. Dent, 6 S. C. 383); but the admission of the accused on arraignment that he is guilty of voluntary manslaughter when he is indicted for murder in a particular county dispenses with the necessity for proof of venue (Hines v. State, 9 Humphr. (Tenn.) 720).

15. On an indictment for murder or manslaughter brought in a court of the United States, if the crime was committed on board a vessel on the high seas or in a foreign port, the burden is on the prosecution to show that the vessel belonged to a citizen of the United States (U. S. v. Imbert, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,438, 4 Wash. 702); and if committed on land that the place where the crime was committed was within the jurisdiction of the United States (U. S. v. Meagher, 37 Fed. 875).

authority, however, although defendant, where the case is otherwise made out against him, is bound to offer some evidence in support of his alibi, the state, in all cases where his presence at the time and place of the crime is necessary to render him responsible, must prove that he was there as part of its case, and if from all the evidence there exists a reasonable doubt of his presence he should be acquitted.[18]

The rule in Georgia consists of two branches. The first is that to overcome proof of guilt strong enough to exclude all reasonable doubt the onus is on the accused to verify his alleged alibi, not beyond reasonable doubt, but to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury. The second is that nevertheless any evidence whatever of alibi is to be beyond a reasonable doubt.[19] The presumption of innocence accompanies the accused until verdict and does not cease when the case is submitted to the jury.[20] It is not destroyed by the fact that the accused was in the company of one who committed the offense,[21] and no presumption arises against one alleged principal jointly indicted with others, because his co-defendants have been convicted on a separate trial.[22] But it has been held that in a prosecution for murder the possession of articles apparently taken from the deceased raises a prima facie presumption of guilt to be rebutted or explained away by the accused,[23] and in many jurisdictions it is held that the possession of stolen property may raise a presumption of guilt in prosecutions for burglary, larceny, and robbery.[24] No added presumption of innocence arises from the relation of the parties, as where a husband or parent is accused of the homicide of his wife or child, as the ordinary presumption of innocence is amply sufficient for all practical purposes.[25]

b. From Failure to Testify or Call Witnesses. There is no presumption of guilt against a defendant merely because he has not taken the stand as a witness in his own behalf.[26] His neglect or failure to call as witnesses those who could testify of their own knowledge as to material facts raises no presumption of law considered on the general case with the rest of the testimony, and if a reasonable doubt of guilt is raised by the evidence as a whole the doubt must be given in favor of innocence. that if called they would have testified unfavorably to him, but the jury may consider his failure to produce or to endeavor to produce such evidence as a circumstance in determining his guilt.[27] This doctrine is to be cautiously applied, and only where it is manifest that the evidence is in the power of the accused to produce and is not accessible to the prosecution.[28] Either side may be permitted to show why a material witness is not produced on the trial.[29]

c. From Suppression or Fabrication of Evidence. The fabrication by defendant of false records and accounts,[30] his failure to produce records and books which are under his control and not within the reach of the state, and which are material to his defense,[31] his destruction or concealment of papers after his arrest,[32] or any attempt to destroy or withhold evidence[33] may justify an inference by the jury that such evidence if produced would have been unfavorable to him.

d. Of Sobriety. A presumption of sobriety arises where facts constituting a crime are proved, and defendant alleges that he was irresponsible because of drunkenness, and the burden of proof in such a case is upon him to show this by a fair preponderance of evidence,[34] or according to some of the cases beyond a reasonable doubt.[35]

e. Of Sanity — (i) In General. The presumption is that all men are of sound mind, and in a criminal prosecution therefore where defendant, admitting the actual commission of the act, claims that he was irresponsible because of insanity, the burden of proof as to the defense, at least to the extent of introducing some evidence where none otherwise appears, is on him.[36] The degree of

(II) Continuance of Insanity and Lucid Intervals. Where insanity of a permanent or continuing character, as distinguished from temporary mania, is shown to have existed, it is presumed to have continued until sufficient evidence to rebut this presumption is introduced, and the state has the burden of proving that the crime was committed in a lucid interval.[41] This rule, however, does not apply to insanity other than to that of a nature liable to be permanent.[42] Where it is shown that defendant had lucid intervals, it will be presumed that the offense was committed in one of them.[43]

f. Of Character. Some of the courts have held that the law presumes that the accused is a man of good character, and if he offers no testimony to prove his character the jury is not at liberty to presume that his character is bad.[44] Other courts have held that nothing is presumed by law as to the character of the accused, and that in the absence of any proof on the subject the jury are not authorized to assume that it is either good or bad, but must base their verdict solely upon the evidence.[45]

g. Official Acts. The well-recognized presumptions as to the legality and proper performance of official acts apply in criminal proceedings.[46]

h. Conflicting Presumptions. In criminal prosecutions the presumption of innocence is often opposed to some other presumption, as the presumption of sanity[47] and of a knowledge of the law,[48] both of which prevail. It is not the rule, however, that the presumption of innocence is stronger than any other presumption except that of sanity and of a knowledge of the law,[49] for it has been held that it may be overcome by the presumption of a proper performance of official duty,[50] or by the presumption in favor of the correctness of books of public account.[51] The question whether the presumption of innocence prevails over a conflicting presumption also arises in prosecutions for seducing or enticing a woman of chaste character,[52] rape,[53] adultery,[54] bigamy,[55] homicide,[56] and libel or slander.[57]

B. Competency, Relevancy, and Materiality — 1. In General. The rules of law determining the admissibility of evidence are substantially the same in civil and criminal cases.[58] But it has been said that the necessity for enforcing the rule that no evidence can be admissible which does not tend to prove or disprove the issue joined is much stronger in criminal than in civil cases.[59] To be admissible either for or against defendant, evidence must be of some fact in issue in the case, or of some fact relevant to a fact in issue, and it must not be so remote as to be immaterial.[60] The remoteness in point of time of facts sought to presumption that ordinance was published as required by law.

be proved may render them inadmissible,[61] and for the court to exclude evidence because of remoteness is not an abuse of discretion where it has no direct bearing on any issue;[62] but evidence which is relevant as directly tending to prove a fact in issue is not incompetent as immaterial merely because of remoteness in point of time.[63] Evidence cannot be rejected as incompetent, if admissible in its nature and relevant to the issues, because it is weak and inconclusive, and because the party might with greater diligence have procured more satisfactory proof.[64]

2. EVIDENCE AS TO FACTS CONCEDED. Evidence of facts which in themselves are relevant to the guilt of the accused are not inadmissible because he admits or offers to admit that such facts are true.[65]

3. EVIDENCE NOT PRESENTED TO GRAND JURY. Evidence tending to prove the guilt of the accused is not incompetent because it was not produced before the grand jury.[66]

4. CONNECTION OF ACCUSED WITH CRIME — a. Inclination or Intention to Commit. Evidence is relevant which shows that prior to the crime the accused had in mind and considered the probability or possibility of its commission.[67]

b. Conspiracy to Commit. A conspiracy among several, of which the accused is one, to commit a crime may be proved on his trial, although no conspiracy is charged.[68]

e. Previous Relations Between Accused and Person Injured or Others. Evidence of the relations existing between the accused and the person injured, prior to the crime,[69] including expressions of ill-will by the accused amounting to threats, is always admissible to prove the motive of the accused;[70] but as a rule evidence of the relations existing between the accused and persons not interested in or injured by the crime is irrelevant and inadmissible.[71]

d. Association of Accused With Criminals. It has been held that evidence is admissible to show that the accused at the time of the commission of the crime was associated with criminals banded together for and engaged in the commission of similar crimes.[72]

e. Identity of Accused — (i) In General. The evidence on the question of the identity of the prisoner is permitted to take a broad range.[73] Any fact which shows the acquaintance and familiarity of the witness testifying to the identity of defendant is admissible.[74] The identification by the witness need not be positive

W. 984, holding that as tending to the identification of the defendant, where the crime was committed on a Thursday, it was competent to show that he had a superstitious belief that Thursday was a lucky day for him and that if he attempted anything on that day he would be successful.

Oregon.— State v. McDaniel, 39 Oreg. 161, 65 Pac. 520, holding that a letter which the deceased had been seen to read and pass to the accused, and which was found in his pocket, might on a trial for the homicide be admitted for the purpose of identifying the accused.

South Carolina.— State v. Martin, 47 S. C. 67, 25 S. E. 113.

See 14 Cent. Dig. tit. "Criminal Law," § 768.

Proof of prior identification.— Evidence is always relevant that a witness saw the defendant after his arrest and then identified him as the person whom he saw commit the crime (Yarbrough v. State, 105 Ala. 43, 16 So. 758; Beavers v. State, 103 Ala. 36, 15 So. 616; Armsby v. People, 2 Thomps. & C. (N. Y.) 157), and that he identified the person now on trial on his previous trial (Ruston v. State, 4 Tex. App. 432).

Standing in court for identification.— The accused cannot object if he is identified in court without being required to stand. State v. Johnson, 67 N. C. 55. On the other hand if he voluntarily stands for identification he is not entitled to a new trial on the ground that he has been compelled to testify against himself. Cross-examination and contradiction of witness.—To refuse to permit the identifying witness to be cross-examined as to the length and character of his acquaintance with the accused is error (Olive v. State, 11 Nebr. 1, 7 N. W. 444); and he may be contradicted and certain,[75] but it is enough for him to testify that he believes[76] or has an impression[77] that the accused is the person he saw commit the crime.[78]

(II) Footprints. Evidence of the comparison of footprints found near the scene of the crime with the measurements of the foot-wear of the accused is relevant to identify the accused.[79] On the other hand the accused may show that a man seen in the neighborhood of the footprints wore a boot which made similar marks to those traced to his house.[80] A witness who has measured the tracks and compared his measurement with the shoes of the accused may testify to the results and that a correspondence exists in size and shape,[81] but he cannot testify that he believes the tracks were made by the defendant, for this is mere opinion.[82]

(III) Evidence Procured by Use of Bloodhounds. Where human tracks were found leading from the place of the crime, evidence that shortly thereafter a dog, if it is proved that he had been trained to and tested in following human foot-tracks,[83] followed such tracks to the defendant's house is admissible.[84] And where the question is as to the recentness of tracks, evidence that a dog scented and followed them by scent for a distance is admissible.[85]

(IV) Identification by Voice. Evidence of identity consisting solely of the recognition of the voice of the accused by the witness is admissible. A witness may testify that the accused was present at the place of the crime, although he did not recognize his features, and may add that he knows it was the accused because he recognized the voice.[86]

Evidence that a witness had mistaken the voice of another person at a different time,

(v) Identification of Accomplice. It is not error to permit a co-defendant of the accused, jointly indicted and present with him at the commission of the crime, to be identified during the trial of the accused.[87]

f. Instruments or Weapons Connected With Offense. Weapons or burglars' instruments found in the possession of the accused or near the place of the crime,[88] or a part of the fastening of a door of a house broken into,[89] or weapons or other articles which appear from other evidence to have been employed in the commission of the crime,[90] are admissible in evidence.[91]

g. Motive and Absence of Motive. Where it appears that a crime has been committed, and the evidence, being wholly circumstantial, points to the accused, evidence of motive is relevant.[92] Thus it is competent to show that the accused had a motive peculiar to himself to commit the crime charged.[93] But the jury should be very cautious with respect to the importance which they may attach to evidence of motive.[94] Where the defendant is indisputably shown to be the criminal, evidence of motive is immaterial.[95] The character of the facts relevant to prove motive will depend upon the character of the motive prompting the crime. Thus if the motive be revenge evidence of threats by the defendant would be relevant;[96] or if the motive be cupidity or avarice, evidence of the defendant's poverty would be received.[97] And generally evidence of the defendant's conduct prior to the crime is admissible to prove motive.[98]

h. Consciousness of Guilt — (i) In General. The conduct and general demeanor of the accused after the crime, his language, oral and written, his attitude and relations toward the crime, and his actions in the presence of those engaged in endeavoring to detect the criminal are always relevant.[99] His actions and behavior when confronted with the consequences, or with the scene or surroundings of the crime with which he is charged, are peculiarly relevant.[1]

(II) Assuming Name. Evidence that the accused after the offense changed his name and lived out of the state under an assumed name is relevant to show a consciousness of guilt.[2]

(III) Flight, Concealment, or Escape and the Like— (A) In General. The flight or concealment of the accused raises no presumption of law that he is guilty, but it is a fact which may be considered by the jury, and from which they may draw an inference, in connection with other circumstances and in the absence of an explanation of the reasons or motives which prompted it, that he is guilty, and evidence of flight or concealment is admissible,[3] whether the other evidence of guilt be direct or circumstantial.[4] It is also relevant to show the steps taken by officers and others to locate and apprehend the accused.[5]

(B) Evidence to Explain Flight. Evidence on the part of the accused must be received to explain his flight. the accused to escape or avoid arrest or of his resistance to arrest is relevant as tending to show consciousness of guilt;[12] and as an innocent person has as a general rule nothing to fear except the annoyance of confinement in jail, which may be avoided by his securing bail, resistance of arrest has been considered strong evidence of the consciousness of guilt.[13]

(D) Escape or Attempt to Escape. Evidence that the accused after his arrest escaped or attempted to escape,[14] or that he had tools in his possession for that purpose,[15] or that he offered a guard or other officer a bribe to permit him to escape,[16] is relevant and may be considered by the jury as tending to show consciousness of guilt.[17]

17. Evidence of an attempt to escape is competent, although its proof necessarily tends to prove a distinct crime (State v. Wrand, 108 Iowa 73, 78 N. W. 788; People v. Petmecky, 2 N. Y. Cr. 450), and although the accused admits that he committed the crime with which he stands charged (State v. Garrison, 147 Mo. 548, 49 S. W. 508. See supra, XII, B, 2). And where the accused is under arrest on a charge of felony and is at the same time in jail under sentence for a misdemeanor, his escape from jail is relevant on his subsequent trial for the felony. (E) Interference With Witnesses or Jurors. Evidence is relevant to show that the accused has threatened[18] or assaulted a witness,[19] has endeavored to prevail on him to abscond,[20] has procured his absence,[21] has endeavored to induce him to testify falsely,[22] or has attempted to bribe a juror.[23] But an attempt to suborn witnesses or jurors by another than the accused is not evidence against the accused unless he is proved to have been connected with it;[24] and acts and statements of third parties in the presence of the defendant, but not authorized by him, to persuade a witness to leave the country are inadmissible.[25]

(F) Falsehoods to Avoid Suspicion. The fact of the utterance of falsehoods by the accused to exculpate himself, the falsehoods being satisfactorily proved, is relevant to show a consciousness of guilt.[26]

(G) Compromise or Offer to Compromise. The same is true of evidence of a compromise or offer of compromise, whether accepted or not,[27] if it was voluntarily made.[28]

i. Finding Property of Accused Near Place of Crime. Evidence is relevant to show that property owned by the accused was found at or near the place of the crime within a reasonable time after its commission.[29]

j. Condition of Clothes of Accused. Evidence is relevant to show the condition of the clothing of the accused after the commission of the crime.[30]

k. Ability and Opportunity. Evidence that the accused enjoyed a particular opportunity to commit the crime,[31] or had a knowledge of the habits of the person injured,[32] or possessed or claimed to possess the particular and peculiar strength, skill, or ability which would enable him to commit the crime, is relevant.[33]

l. Presence of Accused Near Place of Crime. It is also relevant to show that the accused was seen near the place of the crime, although he does not claim an alibi.[34] On the other hand it is error to refuse to permit the accused to show in rebuttal that he was in the habit of frequenting the place of the crime.[35]

m. Possession by Accused — (i) Of Weapons. It is relevant to show that the accused owned or had weapons in his possession prior to[36] or shortly after the commission of the crime.[37]

(ii) Of Implements of Crime. Evidence is relevant to show that the accused owned or had in his possession tools, implements, or any articles with which the particular crime was or might have been committed;[38] and a witness familiar with the use of such tools or implements may testify as to their probable use.[39]

(iii) Of Property of Person Injured. It is also relevant to show that the accused or an accomplice had money or other property in his possession which was the fruit of the crime.[40]

with which the accused stands charged. It has been held that he may show that another actually committed the crime[41] if the evidence incriminating the other is inconsistent with his own guilt.[42] But it is not admissible to show that another person is or was suspected[43] or has been indicted[44] for the crime.[45]

(II) To Establish Guilt of Accused. Where no conspiracy is charged or shown, evidence that a third person was connected with the crime is inadmissible against the accused,[46] unless the evidence shows an act on the part of the third person committed in the presence of the accused.[47]

o. Exculpating Third Persons. Where the theory of the accused is that the crime was committed by another, the prosecution may show any facts which would exculpate the latter.[48]

5. Compelling Accused to Criminate Himself — a. In General. The constitutions of the United States and of most of the states provide in somewhat varying language that no person accused of crime shall be compelled to be a witness against himself or to give evidence against himself, and these provisions render inadmissible all evidence incriminating the accused and obtained from him by compulsion.[49] A statute providing that involuntary confessions may be proved

if corroborated by other evidence does not violate such a constitutional provision ;[50] nor is the accused compelled to furnish evidence against himself where he voluntarily, although reluctantly, writes the name in an alleged forged instrument.[51]

b. Papers and Other Articles Taken From Accused. The exhibition of the blood-stained clothing of the accused in evidence on a trial for murder does not violate the constitutional provision protecting him from incriminating himself.[52] Papers and other articles voluntarily produced by the accused[53] or taken from his room in his absence and without his knowledge[54] may be put in evidence against him without violating his constitutional rights, as he is not thereby compelled to give evidence against himself.[55]

c. Physical Examination of Accused. When arrested the accused may be subjected to a compulsory physical examination to ascertain his identity ;[56] and witnesses who have examined him may, when the marks on his body are relevant, testify to what they saw, state whether he was deformed, and describe his personal appearance.[57]

d. Exposing Person of Accused to Jurors or Witnesses. It has been held[58] and also denied[59] that it is error for the court to compel the accused to exhibit his hand or other portion of his body to the jury as evidence of its condition, on the ground that this is compelling him to give evidence against himself. If the accused voluntarily does so he may be required to allow a physician to examine him, and the physician may then testify to the result of his examination.[60] Directing the defendant to stand up for identification is not compelling him to be a witness against himself,[61] and it is always proper to ask a witness to look about the court and point out the person who committed the crime,[62] or to point out the accused and ask the witness if he is the person who committed the crime.[63]

comparison of footprints in open court,[64] or to admit evidence that the prosecuting witness requested him to make tracks and that he declined.[65] It has also been held that a witness who was present when the accused was forcibly compelled out of court to place his foot in footprints cannot testify as to the results,[66] but there have been decisions to the contrary.[67] Where the accused voluntarily places his foot in the tracks or surrenders his shoes to the sheriff he cannot object to evidence that they seemed to fit;[68] and he may prove his offer to do this in his own favor.[69]

6. Evidence and Articles of Property Wrongfully Obtained. Although evidence, including documents and other articles, may have been obtained in a criminal case by unfair or illegal methods, it is as a general rule admissible if relevant, provided the accused is not thereby compelled to do any act which incriminates him, and a confession or incriminating admission is not extorted from him.[70] It has therefore been held that the fact that evidence was procured by a private detective by an illegal and unauthorized search of defendant's rooms is no ground for excluding it if it is otherwise competent.[71] There would seem to be no difference in the application of this principle between an unauthorized search of the person of the accused and an invasion or trespass upon his premises, and so it has been held ;[72] but there is a late decision to the contrary, in which a paper obtained by an unconstitutional search and seizure was excluded.[73]

7. TESTIMONY AS TO INTENT. Inasmuch as intent is a mental condition invisible to human eyes, it must ordinarily be implied from the actions and language of the person whose intent is in question,[74] but it has been held that where the intention of the accused is material he may testify directly as to the intention with which he did the act complained of.[75]

8. PARTICULAR DEFENSES — a. Insanity.[76] It is proper to allow considerable latitude in the testimony taken to prove insanity. The evidence is not confined to the mental condition of the accused at the instant of the act, although all facts in evidence must tend to show his mental condition at that time. The prior insanity of the accused[77] and his prior mental condition not too remote in point of time[78] are always relevant. The appearance and conduct of the accused while testifying,[79] the hideous and unnatural character of the crime and the absence of motive,[80] the fact that defendant had been subject to epileptic fits[81] or to insomnia and nervousness,[82] his mental condition subsequent to the crime,[83] his coolness and unconcern after its commission,[84] his efforts to escape,[85] his conversations, exclamations, and declarations,[86] letters,[87] and books written by him[88] within a reasonable period of the crime, and generally his previous acts[89] are relevant to prove his insanity. But evidence that the accused[90] or a member of his family[91] was generally reputed prior to the crime to be of unsound mind is inadmissible as hearsay. Insanity in the family of the accused is relevant, if there is independent evidence to show that he is insane,[92] but not otherwise;[93] and the cause of the defendant's insanity is always relevant to show that it was not hereditary.[94]

b. Intoxication. Where the drunkenness of the defendant when the offense was committed is a material issue,[95] it may be shown that he was intoxicated at a time prior to the crime if not too remote,[96] or it may be shown that he was a habitual drunkard;[97] and it may also be shown how he acted on previous occasions when he was intoxicated, as bearing on his condition when he committed the crime.[98] But a witness will not be permitted to testify that his intoxication was or was not sufficient to prevent the formation of an intent, as that is a question for the jury.[99]

c. Alibi. On the question of alibi the relevant facts are the distance between the scene of the crime and the prisoner's alleged whereabouts at the time of its commission, and the time of the crime as compared with that of the alibi, allowing for difference in timepieces and in opinions respecting time and the means of travel.[1] The accused may testify that he conversed with persons at the place where he claims to have been, and may give a general outline of what was said, but not the details.[2] And he may show any fact which tends to prove that he could not have been or was not present at the place and time of the offense.[3] In rebuttal the state may show that acquaintances of the accused who were at the place where he alleges he was did not see him,[4] and may describe by other witnesses incidents which the accused alleges he saw there,[5] and prove any other fact which tends to contradict the accused or to disprove the alleged alibi.[6]

9. Failure of Prosecution to Call Witness. It has been held that defendant cannot show that a witness has been subpœnaed by the state, but has not been called upon to testify,[7] or that a co-defendant has been subpœnaed.[8]

10. Complaint, Indictment, and Record as Evidence. The affidavit or complaint on which an information is based is not admissible as evidence against the defendant,[9] except on a collateral issue, as to show the day when it was made.[10] The same is true of the indictment and other pleadings in the case.[11] Nor in the absence of a statute can the state introduce in evidence the depositions made in defendant's absence before the magistrate on applying for a warrant,[12] or evidence that the examining court refused to admit defendant to bail,[13] or that defendant waived a preliminary examination.[14]

C. Evidence of Other Offenses — 1. General Rule. The general rule is that on a prosecution for a particular crime evidence which in any manner shows or tends to show that the accused has committed another crime wholly independent of that for which he is on trial, even though it be a crime of the same sort, is irrelevant and inadmissible;[15] but to this rule there are several exceptions.

the crime charged. Evidence which is relevant to defendant's guilt is not rendered inadmissible because it proves or tends to prove him guilty of another and distinct crime.[16] It often happens that two distinct offenses are so inseparably connected that the proof of one necessarily involves proving the other, and in such a case on a prosecution for one evidence proving it cannot be excluded because it also proves the other.[17] Evidence of another and distinct crime is admissible if it was committed as part of the same transaction and forms part of the res gestæ.[18]

b. Relevancy to Show Specific Facts — (i) To Prove Identity. It has been said that evidence of other crimes committed by the accused is relevant to prove his identity, but it is more correct to say that where the commission of a crime is proven, evidence to identify the accused as the person who committed it is not to be excluded solely because it proves or tends to prove that he was guilty of another and independent crime.[19]

direct and not merely circumstantial, particularly where the credibility of the witnesses is doubtful.[36]

(II) Admissibility as Affected by Character or Grade of Crime. The evidence of good character offered by the accused must relate particularly to that trait of character which is involved in the crime charged, so that the proof of good character will render it unlikely that he would be guilty of that particular crime.[37] Evidence of good character has been confined by one or two cases to crimes which involve some degree of moral turpitude, and has been declared inadmissible on a charge of statutory crime not malum in se,[38] but the force and effect of such evidence does not usually depend upon the grade of the crime.[39]

(III) Character Subsequent to Commission of Crime. Evidence of the good character of the accused must refer to a period prior to the commission of the crime; the accused cannot prove his good character since the date of the crime.[40]

duced evidence to prove good character.[41] To permit this is reversible error.[42] To render evidence of bad character admissible in rebuttal the accused must have expressly and clearly put his character in issue.[43] But this protection of the accused from attack as to character does not apply where he goes upon the stand as a witness, for if it be provided by statute that he may be examined as any other witness, the prosecution may prove his bad character for veracity to impeach him as a witness, although he offers no evidence of good character.[44] Where defendant introduces evidence of good character, the prosecution may introduce evidence in rebuttal,[45] and may cross-examine the witnesses who testify as to his good character.[46] In some jurisdictions, by statute, the prosecution in such a case may prove a former conviction of an offense.[47]

(ii) Character Subsequent to Commission of Crime. Evidence of bad character in rebuttal must refer to a period prior to the commission of the crime. Hence where the accused has proved his good character, the prosecution cannot prove his bad reputation since the date of the crime, as it is probable that his reputation may have been materially injured by the public discussion of it.[48]

c. Evidence to Prove Character — (i) General Reputation or Disposition. Evidence to prove the good or the bad character of the defendant must as a rule have reference to his general reputation in the place where he has lived or has been known[49] or was in the habit of dealing;[50] but evidence of his reputation elsewhere is relevant when not too remote.[51] By the weight of authority witnesses to prove character cannot testify to what they know of defendant, or as to his disposition, or give their opinion as to his character or disposition, from their personal observation or experience, but their testimony must be limited to general reputation.[52]

(II) Particular Acts. Evidence of particular and specific acts of good conduct is not admissible to prove defendant's good character, but the evidence must be limited to proof of general character or reputation.[53] On the other hand the state as a general rule cannot in rebuttal of evidence of good character prove his specific acts of bad conduct.[54] According to the better opinion, where a witness for defendant testifies as to his good character, he may on cross-examination be asked whether he has not heard that defendant had committed or been accused of particular acts of misconduct;[55] but he cannot be asked questions to elicit his knowledge of particular acts as distinguished from what he has heard.[56]

(III) Negative Evidence of Character. Testimony of a witness that he has been acquainted with the accused for some time and under such circumstances that he would be likely to hear what was said about him and that he has never heard any one speak against his character is admissible.[57]

vide that the number of witnesses which the accused may call to prove his good character shall not exceed a certain limit, unless he shall provide for the payment of the fees for the witnesses called in excess thereof, and such statutes do not violate the constitutional provision that he shall have compulsory process to procure the attendance of his witnesses.[58]

d. Weight and Effect of Good Character. A lack of harmony will be found in the cases upon the question of the weight and effect of evidence of good character. Some of the cases hold that the jury has no right to consider the good character of the accused where, from the other evidence, they are satisfied of his guilt, and therefore that good character is to be considered by them only where they are in doubt as to guilt.[59] Others hold that evidence of good character should in every case be considered by the jury with the other evidence of guilt or innocence, irrespective of the apparently conclusive or inconclusive character of such other evidence,[60] and although there may be sufficient other evidence to warrant a finding of guilt, the good character of the accused may itself create a reasonable doubt of guilt on which the accused must be acquitted.[61]

2. Of Third Persons. As a general rule evidence of the character of third persons is irrelevant and inadmissible.[62] But to this rule there are certain exceptions. Thus in a prosecution for homicide, where the accused sets up self-defense, he may show that the deceased was a violent and dangerous man.[63] And in prosecutions for abduction, rape, and seduction the question whether the female was of chaste character often becomes material.[64]

3. Of Co-Defendants. The accused cannot show the good character of one jointly indicted with him.[65] The admission of evidence of previous bad character of one defendant cannot be assigned as error by his co-defendants.[66]

E. Declarations and Admissions — 1. By Accused — a. Confessions and Admissions Distinguished. The term "admission" is usually applied to civil transactions and to those statements of fact in criminal cases which do not directly involve an acknowledgment of the guilt of the accused or the criminal intent, while the term "confession" is generally restricted to acknowledgments of guilt.[67]

b. Admissibility in General. Statements and declarations by the accused before or after the commission of the crime, although not amounting to a confession, but from which, in connection with other evidence of surrounding circumstances, an inference of guilt might be drawn are admissible against him as admissions.[68] amount to actual duress, whether the threat or promise is that of an officer or of a private individual.[70]

d. Right to Introduction of Entire Conversation. Where admissions of the accused are offered against him, he has a right to have the whole conversation admitted;[71] but evidence of an admission, if complete, is not to be excluded because the witness called to prove it did not hear the whole conversation.[72]

e. Admissions by Representatives of Accused and Others. An admission which would be competent if uttered by defendant is inadmissible when made by his relatives or others, unless made in his presence or expressly or impliedly authorized by him;[73] but the declaration of one who in the particular transaction is the agent of defendant, made within the scope of his authority, is competent against defendant as his admission.[74] Declarations or admissions by defendant's counsel, not expressly or impliedly authorized by him nor made in his presence, are not admissible;[75] but it has been held that the admission of a fact made on the trial by counsel for defendant in open court and in his presence may be read in evidence,[76] if it is assented to by the prosecuting attorney.[77]

f. Relevancy of Silence — (i) In General. Where, on being accused of crime, with full liberty to speak, one remains silent, his failure to reply or to deny is relevant as tending to show his guilt.[78] His silence alone, however, raises no legal presumption of guilt. Its effect is for the jury, and from it, in connection with other facts and circumstances, they may infer that he is guilty.[79]

(ii) Accused Must Have Heard and Understood Charges. In order that silence may be received as an admission, it must be shown either that the accused did in fact hear what was said or that he was in a position to hear.[80] Whether in any case the accused heard the charge is a question of fact,[81] unless it is positively shown that he was within hearing distance and there is no evidence that his hearing was impaired.[82] A statement made in the presence of the accused is not admissible against him where he was unconscious,[83] or where the statement was in a language which he did not understand.[84]

(III) Opportunity For, and Necessity Of, Denying Statements. The silence of the accused is not competent evidence against him, as an admission of the truthfulness of statements of others made to him or in his presence, unless the statements were such as to call for a reply by him;[85] and it must also appear affirmatively that he had an opportunity or right under the circumstances of the case to deny the truthfulness of the charges made against him.[86]

(IV) Silence Under Arrest. Some of the courts have held that the fact that one is under arrest and in the custody of an officer when he is silent under accusation prevents his silence or the statements themselves from being admissible against him, on the ground that under such circumstances he is not called upon to speak.[87] Other courts have held such evidence to be admissible.[88]

(V) Silence at Judicial Proceeding. The doctrine of silence as an implied admission of the truth of statements made in one's presence does not apply to silence of the accused at a judicial proceeding or hearing.[89]

g. Accusation Denied by Accused. Statements charging the accused with the crime and positively denied by him are never admissible merely because made in his presence.[90]

h. Words Uttered in Sleep or While Drunk. Words uttered by the accused while asleep are not competent evidence against him, since he is unconscious of what he says,[91] and it is for the jury to determine whether the accused was awake or asleep when he spoke.[92] Declarations or admissions of the accused are not rendered inadmissible by the fact that he was drunk when he made them, but such fact may be taken into consideration in determining their weight.[93]

i. Admissions by Telephone. The admissions and declarations of the accused are not incompetent because they were received over a telephone, where the witness receiving them can testify that he knew and recognized his voice.[94]

j. Privileged Communications Overheard. Admissions in conversations which would ordinarily be privileged communications, because had by the accused with his attorney[95] or with his wife,[96] are competent evidence against him where a third person was present. The latter's presence destroys the privilege and he may testify to the whole conversation.[97]

k. On What Points Received — (i) In General. The declarations and admissions of the accused are relevant as to all matters material to the issue.[98] Thus they are admissible to prove the corpus delicti, where it is shown prima facie,[99] and to show guilty knowledge,[1] capacity to commit the crime,[2] marriage when that Sanity.— The admission of the accused after the crime that he was sane when it was committed (State v. Kring, 74 Mo. 612), while not conclusive, because of the common delusion of insane persons that they are sane (State v. Reidell, 9 Houst. (Del.) 470, 14 Atl. 550), or his statement that he was simulating insanity (Cogswell v. Com., 32 S. W. 935, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 822), is competent fact is material,[3] identity of accused,[4] or that he fled from justice,[5] attempted to break jail,[6] or assisted a fellow prisoner to escape.[7]

(II) Other Crimes. Admissions of the accused relevant to the crime for which he is on trial are not to be excluded because they involve a confession of other crimes, where the confession is inseparably connected with the admissions.[8] Evidence that the accused has admitted the commission of other crimes is also competent, where the fact of their commission is relevant, as for the purpose of showing guilty knowledge[9] or intent,[10] etc., but not otherwise.[11]

l. Conclusiveness of Admissions on Prosecution. The admissions of the accused are not conclusive on the prosecution when used against the prisoner.[12]

m. Declarations or Admissions in Legal Proceedings — (I) At Coroner's Inquest. The testimony of the accused, taken at the coroner's inquest on the body of the person he is charged to have murdered, voluntarily given before his arrest, although after he had been charged, and after being cautioned that he was not obliged to testify, is competent against him as an admission.[13] This rule is applied generally to voluntary admissions by the accused on a coroner's inquest, whether or not he is under arrest.[14]

(II) Before Grand Jury. Under the constitutional provision that no one shall be compelled to incriminate himself, the accused cannot be compelled to testify as a witness before the grand jury, but where he voluntarily appears as a witness, his testimony then taken, although under oath, if not amounting to a confession, may subsequently be used against him.[15]

(III) At Former Trial or Inquiry. Statements made by the accused in testifying voluntarily on a former trial of himself[16] or of some other per-against him. It may also be shown that the accused admitted that he had set up insanity as a defense before and had been acquitted. Smith v. State, 55 Ark. 259, 18 S. W. 237.

Formalities.—A statute providing that certain formalities shall be complied with by the magistrate taking the examination of the accused as regards a statement made by him pending the examination does not apply to voluntary statements by the accused made to the magistrate before or after the examination. Hardy v. U. S., 186 U. S. 224, 22 S. Ct. 889, 46 L. ed. 1137. And unless the statute absolutely requires it (State v. Hatcher, 29 Oreg. 309, 44 Pac. 584) it seems that the written examination of the accused need not be signed by the committing magistrate (People v. Johnson, 1 Wheel. Cr. (N. Y.) 193).

Waiving statement on preliminary examination.— The right to waive a statutory privilege of making an exculpatory statement implies that the statement if made must be voluntary. Hence it must appear that the accused was informed by the magistrate of his right to waive making the statement. State v. O'Brien, 18 Mont. 1, 43 Pac. 1091, 44 Pac. 399; State v. Hatcher, 29 Oreg. 309, 44 Pac. 584.

Statutes excluding evidence given by the accused on the preliminary examination, or

although the justice certifies that he declined to answer, since whatever the prisoner has said is evidence though the justice may have neglected his duty.[24]

(VI) Offer to Plead or Plea of Guilty. A voluntary offer by the accused before trial to plead guilty on terms to the offense charged is competent as his admission,[25] but a withdrawn plea of guilty in place of which a plea of not guilty has been substituted by leave of the court is not competent as an admission.[26]

(VII) Statements in Civil Proceedings. The admissions of the accused, when testifying in a civil action or proceeding, are received against him in a subsequent criminal prosecution.[27] Statements made by the accused in testifying voluntarily before a commissioner in bankruptcy as to his trade dealings are admissible against him.[28]

n. Whole Conversation to Be Considered by Jury. The conversation containing the admission by accused must be considered by the jury in its entirety.[29] They are not bound, however, to believe the whole statement, but may reject as much of it as they disbelieve.[30]

2. Self-Serving Declarations and Conduct — a. In General. The statements and declarations of the accused in his own favor, unless they are a part of the res gestæ, or unless they are made evidence by the prosecution in producing the conversation in which they are contained, are not competent in his favor on the trial.[31] They are excluded not because they might never contribute to the ascertainment of the truth, but because if received they would most commonly con-in any legal proceeding on his subsequent criminal trial, perjury excepted, exist in some states. Kirby v. Com., 77 Va. 681, 46 Am. Rep. 747; State v. Hall, 31 W. Va. 505, 7 S. E. 422.

sist of falsehoods fabricated for the occasion, and would mislead oftener than they would enlighten.[32]

b. When Admitted as Part of Whole Conversation. When statements constituting admissions are received against defendant, he may prove his self-serving statements in connection therewith, by reason of the rule admitting the whole conversation.[33] Thus, where the prosecution proves that the witness charged the accused with the crime, the accused has a right to prove that he denied the accusation.[34] But the accused cannot prove in explanation self-serving declarations contained in other conversations.[35]

c. Statements at Preliminary Examination. The voluntary statements of the accused in his own favor at the preliminary examination are not admissible on a subsequent trial as evidence for him.[36] But it is sometimes provided by statute that the voluntary declaration of the accused, made to and certified by a magistrate, shall be evidence before the grand and petit jury.[37]

d. Explanation of Matters in Evidence and Res Gestæ. As a general rule the accused is not permitted, in order to explain his intention in doing an act already proved, to show his self-serving declarations, not a part of the res gestæ, as to his reason for or intent in such act.[38] The jury are the judges of the purpose and intent of defendant's action, and ordinarily they should not consider his explanatory statements unless a part of the res gestæ.[39] Declarations of the accused, however, are admissible in his favor if they formed part of a conversation proved by the state, or if they are part of the res gestæ.[40]

e. Conduct of Accused. The conduct or the appearance of the accused after the crime, so far as it indicates facts which would naturally be expected if he were innocent, is not competent in his favor.[41] He cannot show that he appeared surprised when informed of the murder and astonished when charged with its commission,[42] that he refused to compromise the matter with the prosecuting witness,[43] that his conduct in jail has been exemplary,[44] or that he had refused to escape when at large and when he might easily have done so,[45] or according to some cases that after hearing of the crime he voluntarily surrendered himself to the authorities or offered to surrender himself.[46] Evidence that after a mortal wound was inflicted defendant offered to wait on the dying man[47] or went for a physician[48] is incompetent as self-serving.[49]

f. Denials by Accused. The denial of the accused when questioned that he had made a confession or admission is not competent evidence in his favor.[50]

g. Showing Falsity of Statements of Accused. Self-serving statements made by or for the accused out of court, explaining suspicious circumstances, may be proved against him, and their falsity may then be shown. The fact of their falsity admits them as indicating an attempt to explain away incriminating circumstances by falsehoods.[51]

3. Declarations of Person Injured — a. In General. The person injured by the crime, whether alive or dead, is in no sense a party to the prosecution, and his statements and declarations therefore are not evidence either for or against the accused unless made in his presence and not denied by him, or unless they are admissible as part of the res gestæ, as dying declarations, or as threats.[52] Such testimony is generally inadmissible as hearsay,[53] although it is sometimes received to confirm[54] or to impeach or contradict the testimony of the person injured.[55] Declarations of the person injured are admissible in evidence if they were so connected with the crime as to constitute part of the res gestæ.[56]

b. Persons Incompetent to Testify. The statements of the injured person, although otherwise competent, will be excluded if he is incompetent by reason of infancy or imbecility to testify as a witness.[57]

c. To Show Health or Physical Condition. The statements or representations of the person injured as to his ills, pains, and symptoms, whether arising from disease or from injury by accident or violence, are evidence of his physical condition, although not evidence to charge the accused as the cause thereof.[58] Thus the declarations to a physician of the symptoms and effect of a malady or exclamations of present pain,[59] whether or not made for the purpose of securing medical treatment, have been held admissible.[60]

h. Dying Declarations. In prosecutions for homicide the dying declarations of the deceased as to any of the circumstances which resulted in his injury are admissible, if made when he was in actual danger of death and when he had given up all hope of recovery;[68] and under some circumstances they are admissible in prosecutions for abortion.[69] As a general rule, however, the dying declarations of the person injured are not admissible in prosecutions for any other offense than homicide, unless made so by statute, or unless they would be competent if the declarant were living.[70]

4. Declarations of Third Persons — a. In General. The conversations and statements of third persons not made in defendant's presence or hearing, and not constituting a part of the res gestæ, are not competent either for or against him, but are excluded as hearsay.[71] It is otherwise, however, where such statements are so closely connected with the crime as to constitute part of the res gestæ.[72]

ing the witness to repeat his testimony given on the preliminary examination,[73] but if he is permitted to relate detached parts of his testimony then given, the stenographer should be allowed to show all that he said to explain discrepancies.[74]

c. To Prosecuting Officer. A witness should not be permitted to recite a message sent by him to the prosecuting attorney, stating to the latter what the witness would swear to on the trial.[75]

d. Transactions With Accused Relating to Subject of Crime. A statement of a person in whose possession property alleged to have been stolen was found that he received it from defendant is not competent,[76] but on a trial for receiving stolen property defendant may prove the declarations of the person from whom he alleges that he bought it, made at the time, upon the issue of his guilty knowledge, its weight being for the jury.[77]

e. Corroborative Statements. Declarations of a witness out of court are not competent for the purpose of corroborating his testimony,[78] but when they contradict his testimony they may be proved in rebuttal;[79] and a witness may testify to the fact, although not to the language and details, of a conversation which he had out of court with a third person, defendant not being present.[80]

f. Accusations and Expressions of Hostility Toward Accused. A statement by a third person that defendant is guilty is incompetent as being merely an opinion, unless made in his presence and acquiesced in by him.[81] The same rule applies to threats of a mob to lynch the accused,[82] statements or declarations of third persons which show or tend to show their hostility toward him, based upon a belief in his guilt,[83] and to other evidence of declarations which show that third persons believed the accused guilty.[84]

g. Plea of Guilty by Third Persons. Where the character of a house is relevant, as under a charge for keeping a disorderly house, it may be shown that inmates of the house had on a prior occasion pleaded guilty.[85]

h. Where Third Person Is Deceased. A declaration or statement by a third person shortly before his death as to the crime charged against the accused is not competent because the witness is deceased. Such statements are not competent as dying declarations.[86]

i. Books and Writings. The mere fact that statements or declarations of third persons are contained in books or written instruments to which the accused is not a party, and which were not brought to his knowledge, does not render the statements or declarations competent against him. They are hearsay evidence and inadmissible, unless they can be brought under some exception to the rule excluding hearsay.[87]

j. Letters Addressed to Accused. Letters written by the person injured or by third persons, addressed to the accused and received by him, but never answered or acted on by him, are not admissible against him unless they are part of the res gestæ.[88] Nor is his failure to answer them an admission of the truth of the statements contained in them. In this respect they differ from oral accusations, because otherwise the accused would be at the mercy of any letter writer whose name or address he did not know.[89]

k. By Persons Incompetent to Testify. Declarations and statements made in the presence of the accused are not incompetent because made by persons who are themselves incompetent witnesses.[90]

l. Self-Incriminating Declarations. The declarations of a person other than the accused, confessing that he committed the crime, are not competent for the accused, for, although the latter may exculpate himself by proving if he can that someone with whom he was not connected committed the crime with which he is charged, he cannot do so by hearsay;[91] and this rule is not changed by the fact that the declarant is dead,[92] or even by the fact that he confessed on his death-bed.[93]

m. Proof of Age. A witness may testify in a criminal prosecution as to his own age, although all the information he may have on that point has been derived from the statements of others;[94] but a third person cannot testify as to defendant's or another's age from information received from persons who are not dead.[95]

n. Warnings. Evidence that someone not connected with the accused warned the injured person that a crime was about to be committed is incompetent.[96] But where, in a prosecution for homicide or assault, the question of premeditation arises, conversations by the accused with third persons are relevant to show the information on which he acted.[97]

F. Acts and Declarations of Conspirators and Co-Defendants — 1. Admissibility in General — a. General Rule. The general rule is that when two or more persons conspire to commit any offense and the conspiracy is proved,[98] everything said, done, or written by one of them is admissible against the others, if it was said, done, or written during the existence of the conspiracy and in the execution or furtherance of the common purpose, but not otherwise.[99] Acts in the absence of the other, while admissible against the person making the same, are not admissible against the other.[3]

c. Threats. Threats by one of several conspirators, if the circumstances bring them within the rule, are received against his co-conspirators.[4]

d. Conspirators Not Indicted or Not on Trial. The declarations and acts of a co-conspirator, which are otherwise competent against the accused, under the general rule, are not inadmissible solely because such co-conspirator has not been indicted,[5] or because, having been indicted jointly with the accused, he is separately tried.[6] The question is, not who has been indicted or who is being tried, but who with a community of purpose participated in the crime.[7]

e. Acts and Declarations Accompanying Crime. The declarations and acts of any participant in a crime, present at its commission, are competent against all then present. It is sometimes intimated that declarations uttered under such circumstances are received against the accused as the statement of a co-conspirator, but the true rule is that these declarations by one are admissible against all under the rule in relation to res gestæ.[8]

Riot.— One who participates in and incites a riot as a member of a mob is liable for all

tions of the agents and the employees of one of several conspirators are admissible against all, where such acts and declarations were made during the progress of the conspiracy and in furtherance of its purpose.[9]

g. Acts and Declarations Not in Furtherance of Common Purpose. Only those declarations of a conspirator are binding on his fellows which were made in furtherance of the common design or object of the conspiracy. Declarations and statements uttered during the pendency of the plot, which are only narrative or anticipatory, are inadmissible except as against the declarant or as against a conspirator in whose presence they were made.[10]

h. As Against Persons Subsequently Joining Conspiracy. Where a person enters into a conspiracy after its formation, the acts and declarations of the other conspirators before he entered are admissible against him, where he adopts the conspiracy in its original design and purpose, but if he does not so adopt it they are not admissible against him.[11]

i. Acts and Declarations Before Complete Fulfilment of Purpose. Acts or declarations of conspirators are not always excluded because they were done or made after the commission of the crime. If for any reason, as for escape or concealment, the common purpose continues, declarations in furtherance thereof are admissible, although the crime which was the object of the conspiracy has been consummated.[12]

j. Acts and Declarations Before Dividing or Disposing of Proceeds of Crime. Where the conspiracy has for its purpose not only the commission of a crime, but also a division of the profits or the realization of the benefits which are to result therefrom, as in conspiracy to commit larceny or embezzlement, the declarations acts committed by any one in the mob present at that time, and the declarations and threats of any one in the mob uttered in his presence are receivable against him. evidence, as where the latter have made statements which could only be true upon the theory that the declarations or confessions are true.[15]

b. In Presence of Co-Conspirator. Statements and declarations by one conspirator, however, although made after the consummation of the conspiracy or the commission of the crime, are competent against the other where they were uttered in his presence and he by implication or otherwise assented thereto.[16] But the circumstances must have been such as to call for a denial by the accused and to give him an opportunity to make it.[17] against the accused, inasmuch as dying declarations are admissible only where the death of the declarant is the subject of the trial.[19]

e. Acts or Declarations Forming Part of Res Gestæ. Acts done and declarations made by one conspirator after the commission of a crime are admissible against his co-conspirators where they are so connected with the crime as to constitute a part of the res gestæ.[20]

f. Possession of Articles Tending to Identify. While declarations and acts of one conspirator made after the commission of the crime are excluded as against co-conspirators, evidence of the finding of the fruits of the crime in the possession of one of the conspirators,[21] or evidence that the accused when arrested had in his possession property proved to have been in the possession of an accomplice or co-conspirator at the time of the crime,[22] is competent.

admitted in evidence,[29] yet many cases hold that the order of proof is discretionary with the court, and that under particular circumstances the acts and declarations may be admitted before the conspiracy is sufficiently proved.[30] This course is especially proper in a case where the establishing of the conspiracy depends upon proving a large number of facts, or upon circumstantial evidence, where it is inferred from numerous apparently independent facts and circumstances.[31] The prosecution ought to be required to promise to introduce evidence to connect the accused with the conspiracy,[32] and the right to admit evidence out of the regular order should be exercised with great caution.[33] The jury ought to be directed to disregard such acts and declarations unless the prosecution shall subsequently prove a conspiracy.[34]

c. Competency — (1) In General. Direct and positive evidence is not essential to prove the conspiracy. Its existence may be and usually must be inferred from facts and circumstances, including the acts and relations of the parties, which indicate that they are merely parts of some complete whole, and that a common plan or conspiracy exists.[35]

(II) Res Gestæ. Declarations forming a part of the res gestæ are admissible.[36]

(III) Relations of the Parties. Evidence of the relations of the persons alleged to be conspirators, their associating themselves together in an enterprise not connected with the crime, but near it in point of time, and their being frequently seen together are competent as tending to prove the conspiracy.[37]

(IV) Possession of Fruits of Crime. The fact that each of several defendants jointly indicted was found to possess stolen goods which were missed from the place of the crime is competent to establish a conspiracy and to implicate the accused in the crime.[38]

(V) Declarations Showing When Conspiracy Was Begun. Threats against the party injured by one of the defendants, prior to the crime, although not connected therewith, are competent to show when the conspiracy was begun.[39] And the same is true of declarations long prior to the crime, of which some were and some were not made in defendant's presence.[40]

(VI) Other Offenses. The fact that the evidence offered to prove a conspiracy also proves that the same persons were engaged in a conspiracy to commit other crimes of a like character does not exclude it.[41]

d. Weight and Sufficiency — (I) In General. To render admissible against the accused evidence of the acts and declarations of an alleged co-conspirator, only prima facie evidence of a conspiracy is necessary.[42] Mere declarations by alleged conspirators,[43] and even the testimony of such persons[44] to the fact of a conspiracy is not prima facie proof of its existence unless the testimony is corroborated.

(II) Province of Court and Jury. If the evidence of the conspiracy satisfies the court, it may admit the declarations, but if the evidence is open to two constructions, or even where a prima facie case is made out, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury that they have a right to and should reject the evidence of the acts and declarations, if in their opinion upon all the evidence the conspiracy is not satisfactorily proved.[45]

4. Discretion of Court. The extent to which the declarations of conspirators are admissible against others involved in the same conspiracy is to a great extent within the discretion of the trial court.[46]

5. Conviction or Acquittal of Co-Defendant — a. Effect of Conviction. Where two persons have been jointly indicted for the same offense, but separately tried, a judgment of conviction against one of them is not competent on the trial of the other, inasmuch as his conviction is no evidence either of joint action or of the guilt of the accused.[47] The same rule applies where two are separately indicted and tried for the same crime.[48]

b. Effect of Acquittal. The acquittal of one shown to have been engaged in a criminal conspiracy does not exclude his statements against a fellow conspirator made either before or after his acquittal.[49]

6. Motive of Accomplice. When the accused and his accomplice have confessed in each other's presence the joint commission of the crime, evidence tending to show a motive on the part of the accomplice is admissible against the accused.[50]

G. Testimony of Accomplices and Co-Defendants — 1. Who Are Accomplices — a. In General. An accomplice, within the rules of evidence hereafter treated, is one who is in some way concerned in the commission of a crime. The term includes all who are concerned in the crime whether as principals in the first or second degree or as accessaries.[51] The test by which to determine whether one is an accomplice is to ascertain whether he could be indicted for the offense for which the accused is being tried.[52] Whether a witness is an accomplice is a question of fact to be determined by the jury under instruction from the court as to the law.[53]

b. Innocent Agent. The fact that an agent or employee of defendant, acting under his orders, did an act which aided defendant to commit the crime does not make him an accomplice if he had no knowledge of the criminal purpose of defendant.[54]

c. Knowledge or Concealment of Crime. The fact that one who is a witness at the trial knew of the crime or for a time concealed the fact of its commission does not make him an accomplice if he did not aid or participate in the crime.[55] The fact that the person knowing of a crime conceals its commission for his own safety and not to shield the criminal raises a presumption that he is not an accomplice.[56] A person who knows or has reasonable grounds to suppose that a crime is about to be committed, but who does not aid in or advise its commission and is not present thereat, is not an accomplice.[57]

d. Accessaries. All the courts agree that an accessary before the fact is an accomplice within the rule requiring corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice.[58] The cases, however, are not harmonious upon the question whether an accessary after the fact is an accomplice within this rule. It has been held in some jurisdictions that he is,[59] and in others that he is not.[60] Where a statute abrogates the difference between an accessary before the fact and the principal, it by implication preserves the distinction between accessaries before and after the fact, and according to the decisions last referred to the accessary after the fact is not an accomplice.[61]

e. Detectives and Informers. One who as a detective associates with criminals solely for the purpose of discovering and making known their crimes, and who acts throughout with this purpose and without any criminal intent, is not an accomplice,[62] and it is immaterial that he encourages or aids in the commission of the crime.[63]

f. In Specific Crimes — (i) Sale of Intoxicating Liquors. The purchaser of liquor sold in violation of a statute is not an accomplice of the seller;[64] but it has been said that his testimony should be received with caution and distrust.[65]

(ii) Receiving Stolen Goods. A thief is not an accomplice of one who receives the goods knowing them to have been stolen, for the larceny and the receiving of the goods are separate and distinct offenses;[66] but it has been held that the receiver is an accomplice of the thief within the rule requiring corroboration,[67] provided of course guilty knowledge on his part is shown.[68]

(iii) Abortion.[69] By the weight of authority a woman upon whom an abortion has been committed is not an accomplice of the one committing the abortion, so as to require her testimony to be corroborated, unless it is so provided by statute,[70] but it has been said that where her moral guilt is clear her testimony should be received with caution,[71] and in some states by statute she is required to be corroborated.[72]

voluntary and with guilty knowledge, is an accomplice;[74] but it is otherwise if the participation is not voluntary and with guilty knowledge.[75]

(v) Escape and Rescue of Prisoners. A prisoner aided to escape by outside persons is not an accomplice of the persons who furnished him with the means of escape,[76] but one who while he is a prisoner assists in liberating others and then escapes is an accomplice in the crime of rescue.[77]

(vi) Gaming. According to some authorities persons engaged in a game of chance are not accomplices of one another,[78] while according to others they are.[79] One who joins in a game of tenpins with others who are betting upon it, but without betting himself, is not an accomplice.[80] The stakeholder of an election bet is not an accomplice, although such a bet is forbidden by law.[81]

(vii) Sale of Lottery Tickets. One who purchases a lottery ticket is not an accomplice of the seller, where the latter is charged with the selling only.[82]

(viii) Perjury and Subornation. In perjury all persons having a knowledge of the falsity of the statements and aiding in the crime are accomplices.[83] It has been decided that the person solicited to commit perjury is not an accomplice of the suborner, and although it is proper to consider the fact that he has committed perjury in weighing his evidence, yet this will not, if the jury believe him, prevent the conviction of the suborner.[84] There are decisions, however, to the contrary.[85]

(ix) Forgery and Uttering. Persons who participate in forging an instrument are accomplices of the one who utters it.[86]

(x) Bribery. One who gives an officer a bribe to permit a breach of the law is an accomplice of the officer who is bribed,[87] even where a statute makes bribery or an offer to bribe and the acceptance of a bribe distinct offenses.[88]

h. Witness Against Whom Indictment Is Dismissed. Where several persons are indicted and the indictment is dismissed as to one of them, who testifies for the state, he is an accomplice, although he denies his guilt, and his testimony must be corroborated.[90] But it has been held that a separate indictment pending against the witness, and under which he has been granted immunity by the prosecuting attorney, cannot be proved against him to show that he is an accomplice, as nothing but a plea of guilty or a conviction on such indictment would establish that fact.[91]

i. Opinion of Accomplice. The opinion of one accomplice that he does not consider another person an accomplice is not competent evidence.[92]

j. Question For Jury. The question whether the participation of a witness in the crime makes him an accomplice is one of fact for the jury to determine from all the circumstances, but under instructions from the court as to the necessity for a criminal intent and other elements which are necessary to constitute one an accomplice.[93]

2. Admissibility of Accomplice Testimony — a. For the State — (I) General Rule. Subject to the qualifications hereinafter enumerated, the general rule is that an accomplice is competent to testify as a witness for the prosecution.[94]

that the testimony of an accomplice shall in no instance be used against him in a criminal prosecution for the same offense, he may be compelled to testify.[95]

(III) Promise of Immunity. The fact that an accomplice expects a lighter sentence for his testimony or has been promised mitigation of punishment or a full pardon does not affect his competency as a witness, although such facts may be considered by the jury in determining his credibility.[96] The reception of an accomplice as a witness for the prosecution under promise of immunity is not in the discretion of the public prosecutor,[97] but is to be determined by the court in its discretion.[98]

(IV) Accomplices Jointly Indicted — (A) In General. At common law persons jointly indicted and jointly tried are not competent witnesses against one another,[99] but in some jurisdictions this rule has been changed by statute.[1]

competent witness for his co-defendants,[7] unless he is made so by statute.[8] In some jurisdictions it is held that a statute permitting a defendant in a criminal case to become at his own request a witness in the case does not make him a competent witness for a co-defendant with whom he is jointly indicted and tried,[9] but in others it is held that when he voluntarily becomes a witness, he is a witness for all purposes, and that his testimony is competent for a co-defendant.[10]

(B) Separate Trial. In some jurisdictions the fact that persons jointly indicted are tried separately is regarded as sufficient to make them competent witnesses for one another.[11] This was the English rule at common law, and is the rule by statute in some states.[12] In other jurisdictions the fact that a separate trial is had does not make one of several accomplices jointly indicted a competent witness for the other, unless the case against him has been disposed of, in which case he is competent.[13] An accomplice jointly indicted with the accused, but acquitted,[14] or convicted,[15] is a competent witness for him. Where there is but little evidence against one jointly indicted, his case should be presented to the jury, and if acquitted he is then competent.[16]

(II) Persons Separately Indicted. One accomplice, separately indicted, is a competent witness for the other,[17] unless there is a statute to the contrary.[18] Under a statute excluding accomplices testifying for one another, although separately indicted and tried, an accomplice is competent after he has been acquitted.[19]

3. Credibility and Corroboration of Accomplices — a. Necessity For Corroboration in General. In the absence of a statute the credibility of an accomplice is for the jury, as is the case with all evidence.[20] No common-law rule forbids a conviction upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, if his evidence satisfies the jury of the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt. Hence, although the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice should be received and considered by the jury with caution, and the court should and usually does instruct

b. Accomplice Giving Evidence Against Two. Where an accomplice gives evidence against two persons jointly tried, the corroboration of his testimony, as to the guilt of one of them does not obviate the necessity for corroboration of his testimony against the other.[23]

c. Directing Verdict Where Accomplice Is Not Corroborated. Under a statute which provides that a conviction cannot be had on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, the court should, in the absence of corroboration, direct an acquittal.[24] And even if there be no statute, if the evidence of the accomplice is contradictory and uncorroborated in important particulars, the court may and perhaps should instruct the jury not to convict.[25]

d. Order of Corroboration as to Time. The testimony of an accomplice for the state need not be first attacked by the defense to admit corroboration, but the corroborative testimony may and usually of necessity must be given as part of the prosecution's case.[26]

e. Character, Scope, and Sufficiency of Corroboration — (i) In General. It is not essential that the corroborative evidence shall cover every material point testified to by the accomplice, or be sufficient alone to warrant a verdict of guilty. If he is corroborated as to some material fact or facts, the jury may from that infer that he speaks the truth as to all.[27]

(II) Connecting Accused With the Crime. It is necessary, however, that the evidence corroborating an accomplice shall connect or tend to connect defendant with the commission of the crime. Corroborative evidence is insufficient where it merely casts a grave suspicion on the accused. It must not only show the commission of the offense and circumstances thereof, but must also implicate the accused in it.[28] Hence corroboration relating exclusively to the corpus delicti and the circumstances thereof will not sustain a conviction.[29]

(III) Circumstantial Evidence. The corroborative evidence need not be direct, but may be circumstantial,[30] and where the accomplice is strongly corroborated by facts and circumstances connecting the accused with the crime a conviction will be sustained.[31] But where the circumstances when proved, taken separately or collectively, are consistent with the innocence of the accused, there is no corroboration, and a verdict of conviction based thereon will be set aside.[32] What facts constitute a sufficient corroboration of an accomplice in any particular case depends of course upon the character of the crime and the character of his testimony, keeping in view the rule that corroboration must tend to connect the accused with the crime.[33]

(iv) Association of Accused With Accomplice. Evidence which shows no more than that the defendant and the accomplice were seen together shortly before the crime is not such corroboration as the law requires,[34] but evidence that they were seen together in the vicinity of the crime, and were afterward together, with the fruits of the crime in their possession, is sufficient corroboration.[35]

(v) Presence of Accused at Place of Crime. The fact that the accused shortly before the crime was seen going toward the place of its commission,[36] or that he was seen near there at or about the time of its commission,[37] does not alone constitute corroboration.[38] But being seen near the place of the crime in

f. Province of Jury. If the evidence offered in corroboration of an accomplice, if true, tends to connect the accused with the commission of the crime, whether it sufficiently corroborates such accomplice is for the jury to determine; but if the evidence offered in corroboration in no wise tends to connect the accused with the crime, or is consistent with the hypothesis of his innocence, the court may refuse to permit the evidence to go to the jury and direct an acquittal.[51]

H. Confessions — 1. What Are Confessions — a. Definition and Classification. A confession, as distinguished from an admission, is a declaration made at any time by a person, voluntarily and without compulsion or inducement, stating or acknowledging that he has committed or participated in the commission of a crime.[52] The chief importance of determining whether a given statement is or is not a confession arises from the fact that if it is a confession it must have been voluntarily made, and as a rule the accused must have been cautioned,[53] while if it is not the state need not show caution, and in many jurisdictions need not show

Who is an accomplice.— In consequence of the rule of the text it becomes necessary to determine whether the person testifying in corroboration is an accomplice. The same rules apply here as in determining whether the witness to be corroborated is an accomplice. See supra, XII, G, 1. One charged with a similar crime, not connected with that charged against defendant (U. S. v. Van Leuven, 65 Fed. 78), or one who has aided the accused to elude punishment, but not to escape capture or custody (People v. Dunn, 53 Hun (N. Y.) 381, 6 N. Y. Suppl. 805, 7 N. Y. Cr. 173), is competent, not being an accomplice. The wife of an accomplice who knew that a crime was to be committed and protested against it is not an accessary before the fact at common law, and her subsequent concealment of the offense to protect her husband does not make her an accessary after the fact, where a statute exempts husbands and wives from being regarded as such because of mere concealment. its voluntary character.[54] Confessions are divided into judicial confessions, which are chiefly those made in court at a trial or at an inquest or before an examining magistrate, and extrajudicial confessions, which are those made out of court to any person.[55]

b. Particular Statements and Acts — (i) In General. Statements made by one accused of a crime, which merely tend to show a connection on the part of such person with the crime committed, and are not acknowledgments of guilt, are not to be regarded as confessions.[56] Nor are exculpating statements in any sense confessions within the rule requiring confessions to be voluntarily made and the accused to have been cautioned.[57] The submission of a defendant to a medical examination of the person is not a confession, although the result is to disclose facts of a criminative character.[58]

(ii) Prior Plea of Guilty and Demurrer. Where a judgment on a plea of guilty in a prior trial is reversed, the plea is a confession to be proved by the record;[59] and the same rule applies to a plea of guilty on preliminary examination.[60] A demurrer to an indictment, however, although it admits the facts alleged for the purpose of its determination, is not a confession.[61]

(iii) Signature of Accused to Prove Handwriting. The signature of the accused attached to a writing of record, as an application for an attachment, is not a confession of guilt, and hence may be introduced as a standard for comparing handwriting, although he was in custody and was not warned when he signed it.[62]

(iv) Confession Written by Another and Signed by Accused. Where the prisoner's confession was reduced to writing and signed by him after being read to him, it is as much his as though he had himself written it, since by adopting the language he makes it his own.[63]

Illustrations.— A statement made by one arrested for an assault that he was sorry he did not kill the person assaulted is not a confession (Corporal v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1893) 24 S. 2. ADMISSIBILITY — a. In General. A confession of guilt by the accused is admissible against him if it was free and voluntary,[64] but not otherwise. It must not have been induced by the expectation of any promised benefit, nor by the fear of any threatened injury. If it was prompted by either of these motives, rather than by a desire on the part of the accused to relieve his conscience or to state the truth, it is regarded as involuntary and incompetent.[65]

b. After Proof of Facts Confessed. The confessions of an accused person should not be excluded because the facts themselves have been proved by the direct testimony of witnesses who were present when they transpired.[66]

Voluntary character of confessions see infra, XII, H, 2, h.

66. Austin v. State, 14 Ark. 555.

c. Motive of Confession. If the confession was free and voluntary, the motive which prompted it is as a general rule immaterial as affecting its admissibility.[67] Thus a voluntary confession is not inadmissible because it was made to free another person from suspicion,[68] or with a view of compromising the matter with the injured party.[69]

d. Confession Contained in Prayer. A confession contained in a prayer by the accused, testified to by one who overheard it, is competent, and its admission is not contrary to public policy.[70]

e. Proof of Entire Conversation. Where a confession is introduced by the state, the accused has the right to require that the whole of the conversation containing it shall go to the jury,[71] although if the witness does not recollect all the conversation he may state what he does recollect, and its weight and sufficiency is for the jury.[72] Where the prosecution puts in evidence a confession which is part of a conversation, the accused is entitled to prove as part of his case the entire conversation.[73]

f. As Regards Persons to Whom Confession Is Made.[74] A confession is admissible if affirmatively shown to have been voluntary, whether made to a private individual or to a person in authority,[75] although in the latter case the voluntary character should be very stringently examined into.[76] Thus the fact alone that the confession was made to the police officer who arrested the accused,[77] or to the sheriff who had him in charge,[78] is not sufficient, if the confession was voluntary, to render it inadmissible. So also confessions to the examining magistrate,[79] to the trial judge,[80] or to the prosecuting attorney[81] are not incompetent, provided they were voluntary, and provided the accused was warned or cautioned when this is required.[82] Voluntary confessions made to the members of the same church can be given in evidence, their admission not being an infringement of the rights of conscience.[83]

g. Caution or Warning — (I) Necessity For. The fact that a voluntary confession is made without the accused having been cautioned or warned that it might be used against him does not render it incompetent,[84] unless a statute invalidates a confession made where the accused is not first cautioned. In Texas, by statute, a confession made by a prisoner while in custody is inadmissible, unless he was warned that what he should say might be used against him,[85] and there are similar provisions in other states.[86] It is not the duty of a police officer, in the absence of a statute, to caution a prisoner as to the consequences of making a statement, if the statement is voluntary, but merely to refrain from inducing him to make a statement.[87]

(II) Time of Giving. Under a statute requiring caution to render a confession admissible, the confession must have been made within such reasonable time after the caution as to indicate that defendant remembered and was impressed with the caution.[88] An interval of an hour, or even of a day or two, between the caution and the confession does not exclude the latter,[89] but if the accused is young the caution should be repeated when the confession is made.[90]

(III) Language. Where a statute requires that defendant shall be cautioned or informed that anything he may say may be used against him, or that his refusal to answer questions cannot be used against him, it is not necessary that the officer or magistrate shall employ the precise words of the statute in giving the caution or information.[91] Under a statute excluding a confession unless the accused was cautioned that it might be used against him, a caution that so much of the statement of the accused as is inculpatory[92] or anything he may say[93] may be used against him, is sufficient; but a warning that anything he may say can be used either for or against him is not in accordance with the statute, as it holds out an inducement to speak.[94]

(IV) Collateral Facts. Statements of collateral facts not involving a direct admission of guilt are admissible regardless of the fact that the accused was not previously cautioned,[95] unless a statute expressly requires that he shall be first cautioned that what he says may be used against him.[96]

(V) Effect. The general effect of a caution to the prisoner, whether given by an officer, by the court, or by a private person, that what he says will or may be used against him on his trial is to render admissible any confession made by him thereafter,[97] even though inducements to confess may previously have been offered, if it does not appear that the prisoner was influenced by such inducements.[98]

h. Voluntary Character — (I) In General. As has been shown, a confession, to be admissible against defendant, must have been voluntary.[99] Whether a confession is voluntary depends largely upon the facts of the particular case. If it is obtained by reason of oral threats of harm, by promises of benefit, or by actions of those in control of the prisoner which are equivalent to such threats or promises, it is involuntary and incompetent, and in determining whether it was obtained by such means the sex, age, disposition, education, and previous training of the prisoner, his mental qualities, his physical health, and his surroundings are elements to be considered.[1]

The theory of some of the early English cases, which held that a statement made to a prisoner that his confession would be used against him on the trial, was an inducement to him to confess (Reg. v. Harris, 1 Cox C. C. 106; Reg. v. Furley, 1 Cox C. C. 76) has been expressly disapproved by the later decisions (Reg. v. Baldry, 5 Cox C. C. 523, 2 Den. C. C. 430, 16 Jur. 599, 21 L. J. M. C. 130).

(II) Confessions After Unsuccessful Threats or Promises. It is not necessary to prove, in the absence of suspicious circumstances, that from the moment of the prisoner's arrest to that of his confession no inducement was offered or promise made.[2] A confession will be received, if it was in fact voluntary, although it appears that prior thereto and even after his arrest, the accused had been threatened or promises had been made, without success, for the purpose of procuring a confession;[3] but it must appear that the confession was not made because of the inducements previously offered.[4]

(III) Effect of Prior Involuntary Confession. Although a confession may have been obtained by such means as would exclude it, a subsequent confession of the same or like facts may and should be admitted if it appears to the court from the length of time intervening or other facts in evidence that the influence of the promise or threat had been removed.[5] But where a confession has been obtained under circumstances rendering it involuntary and incompetent, a presumption exists that any subsequent confession arose from a continuance of the prior influence, and this presumption must be overcome before the subsequent confession can be received in evidence.[6] The controlling influence which produced the prior confession is presumed to continue until its cessation is affirmatively shown, and evidence to overcome or rebut this presumption must be very clear, strong, and satisfactory. If there be any doubt on this point the confession must be excluded.[7]

(IV) Different Offenses. If a prisoner confesses to one crime upon threats or promises of an officer, and afterward, without any threat or promise, confesses a different crime, as in the case of two larcenies, the latter confession is admissible in evidence.[8]

(V) Confessions While in Custody. A confession otherwise shown to have been voluntary is not rendered incompetent by the fact that the accused was under arrest or in custody at the time, and that it was made in answer to questions put to him by the officer having him in custody,[9] even though the arrest or custody may have been under invalid process or without any process or legal right,[10] unless the circumstances of the illegal restraint are such as to show that the confession was obtained by duress.[11] The fact that when the confession was made the hands and feet of defendant were tied,[12] or that he was handcuffed or in chains,[13] or had been placed in the stocks for safe-keeping,[14] does not exclude a confession which appears to have been free and voluntary.[15]

(VI) CONFESSIONS AFTER BEING SUSPECTED. A fortiori the fact that a confession was made by a person while he was under suspicion and before arrest does not render the confession incompetent.[16] A statutory requirement that the accused shall be cautioned when in custody does not apply to such a person.[17]

other cases hold that an exhortation of this character does not exclude a confession otherwise admissible.[19]

(VIII) CONFESSIONS IN ANSWER TO QUESTIONS. The fact that a confession is elicited by a more or less persistent questioning by police officers or others is not enough to exclude it, if it be voluntary, for the fact that a confession is not spontaneous, while relevant as to its credibility, does not affect its competency.[20] But the custom of police officers to persistently question the accused when under arrest is not to be encouraged, for the reason that he is rarely questioned with fairness.[21]

(IX) QUESTIONS ASSUMING GUILT. A confession otherwise competent is not rendered incompetent by the fact that it was elicited by questions assuming the prisoner's guilt.[22]
