I. AT COMMON LAW.

The remedy by interpleader was not unknown to the common law, but its application was confined to very narrow limits. The right existed in detinue,[1]

1. The only personal action in which the right of interpleader existed at common law was detinue which arose out of the joint bailment of property by the claimants to await the performance of covenants. When one of the bailors conceived that the covenants had been performed and brought detinue to recover the property, the bailee might then plead the fact of such bailment, that it was claimed by a third person in privity with plaintiff and that he was willing to deliver it to the party who was legally entitled to it. Thereupon a monition or notice called a process of garnishment might issue to compel such third person to appear and defend, or else disclaim his title. Russell v. Pottsville First Presb. Church, 65 Pa. St. 9, 14; 3 Reeves Hist. Com. L. c. 23, pp. 448–455; 2 Story Eq. Jur. § 801. The holder of title deeds cannot apply for protection against opposing claims. But trover for title deeds is within the Interpleader Act (1 & 2 Wm. IV, c. 58). Smith v. Wheeler, 3 Dowl. P. C. 431, 1 Gale 15, 163.

This practice was early adopted by the courts of Pennsylvania and extended to other forms of action. It is said that the want of a court of chancery rendered this necessary in order to prevent a failure of justice. Hence the practice was introduced of compelling a third person who claimed the property to become a party by rule or scire facias, founded on a suggestion of defendant. and was applied to a few other cases, such as quare impedit, and writs of right of ward.[2]

II. IN EQUITY.

A. Definition and Nature of Bill. A bill of interpleader is defined to be a bill exhibited where two or more persons severally claim the same debt, duty, or thing from the complainant under different titles or in separate interests; and he, not claiming any title or interest therein himself, and not knowing to which of the claimants he ought of right to render the debt or duty or deliver the property, is either molested by an action brought against him or fears that he may suffer injury from their conflicting claims, and therefore prays that they may be compelled to interplead, and state their several claims so that the court may adjudge to whom the matter or thing in controversy belongs.[3] A bill of inter-

It is defendant, however, who is to be protected, and he must in due time make the suggestion, show that the claimant is in privity with plaintiff, state his willingness to pay the money to the one found entitled to recover it, and pray for the substitution. B. Conditions Precedent to Filing Bill — 1. No Other Adequate Remedy. It should be made to appear that the complainant has no adequate remedy at law, for a bill of interpleader will not be entertained where he has a clear and unembarrassed legal remedy.[5] If a party sued can show a valid assignment of the fund he may set it up as a complete defense and need not file a bill of interpleader.[6] It is not necessary to file a bill of interpleader where the holder of the fund is already a party to a suit in chancery, brought by one of the claimants against the other to settle the right to the funds in his hands.[7] Where the fund is sufficient to meet the demands of all claimants there is no occasion for an interpleader.[8]

2. Conflicting Claimants. It is essential to the right to file the bill that there be two or more claimants to the fund or thing in dispute capable of interpleading and settling the matter between themselves.[9]

3. Complainant Without Interest and Neutral. A complainant cannot have an order that defendants interplead when one important question to be tried is

Effect of appearance by a non-resident in interpleader proceeding see Appearances, 3 Cyc. 507.

A bill of interpleader by a benefit society to determine conflicting claims to the proceeds of a certificate, the money being paid into court, is not a proceeding in rem; and a judgment by default against a claimant who is served outside the state, and who does not appear in the suit, is a nullity. Gary v. Northwestern Masonic Aid Assoc., (Iowa 1891) 50 N. W. 27.

whether by reason of his own act he has rendered himself liable to each of them.[10] It is an undeviating rule that, where the complainant raises any question as to the amount of the claim which is the subject of litigation, this alone will be fatal to the right to maintain a bill of interpleader.[11] The position of the complainant should be one of continuous impartiality between the claimants, and it is essential that he claim no personal interest in or title to the subject-matter of the litigation;[12]

In other words complainant cannot bring defendants into a court of equity to settle a dispute with him under the pretense of compelling them to settle one between themselves. See cases cited supra, this note.

The amount due from a plaintiff cannot be the subject of controversy in an action of interpleader, which can only be maintained when plaintiff admits liability for the full amount claimed to one or the other of the claimants. Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Arthur, 90 N. Y. 234.

An interpleader as to the excess could not be awarded where one of defendants in his answer to a bill of interpleader made a claim against complainant beyond the amount admitted to be due, and which was not claimed by the other defendant. City Bank v. Bangs, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 570.

An order substituting a party as defendant in place of another should not be granted as to a sum which is only a portion of the amount of the alleged fund which plaintiffs seek to recover, since a defendant cannot have a person substituted in his place as to a part of plaintiffs' demand and interpose a defense as to the residue. Bender v. Sherwood, 15 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 258.

Stakeholder, seeking to retain part of stake, cannot file interpleader. If an action is brought against an auctioneer for a deposit, he cannot file a bill of interpleader if he insists upon retaining either his commission or the duty. ant's right to file the bill if he himself has brought into existence the rival claim.[17] But the fact that the holder of the fund has denied the right of one of the claimants in an action brought against him by the latter does not preclude him from filing a bill of interpleader.[18] It is no objection to a bill of interpleader that the complainant's chance of success in litigation respecting other property not in suit might be increased by the success of one of the parties rather than the other.[19] The object of a bill of interpleader is to protect a complainant standing in the situation of an innocent stakeholder, and when a recovery against him by one claimant of the fund might not protect him against a recovery by another claimant.[20]

8. Complainant Without Laches.[27] A stakeholder should use reasonable diligence to bring the contending claimants into court.[28] It is no objection, however, to a bill of interpleader that other suits in equity or actions at law are pending against the complainant where none of the pending suits or actions could determine the rights of all parties.[29] But if he suffers one of the claimants to take judgment against him his liability has been adjudicated and he cannot compel the judgment creditor and other claimants of the fund to interplead.[30] And after judgments are obtained by two claimants of a fund against the debtor, it is too late for him to file a bill of interpleader. He is liable on both judgments.[31]

9. Privity of Title or Rights — a. In General. The doctrine of interpleader is essentially founded on the privity of rights or contracts between the parties. One of the essential elements of this equitable remedy is that all the adverse titles or claims to the thing or debt in dispute must be dependent on or derived from a common source. The remedy is not available where one of the claimants asserts a title paramount and adverse to the claims of the other parties.[32]

is a mere stakeholder exposed to conflicting claims by different persons claiming to be the owner of the property, and he may have them called into court to litigate their respective rights,[40] unless he is a stakeholder for an illegal enterprise.[41]

(B) Of Bailor Who Has No Possessory Title. Where a person is in possession of property as bailee to which the bailor himself has no possessory title but is merely a tortious possessor, and the rightful owner demands it of the bailee, the latter cannot compel the rightful owner and the bailor to interplead. He is himself liable to be deemed a wrongful possessor, if he should, after notice, withhold the property from the rightful owner. He must defend himself as best he can at law and is not entitled to the assistance of a court of equity to try merely legal titles in a controversy between different parties where there is no privity of contract between him and the alleged rightful owner.[42] The hardship of the case has frequently been adverted to by the authorities,[43] and in England a remedy has been provided by statute.[44]

(v) As to Garnishees—(a) In General. An impartial stakeholder summoned as garnishee may file a bill of interpleader to bring in other claimants of the fund in his hands.[47] But it is too late to do this if he answers and suffers judgment to go against him as garnishee,[48] and of course interpleader will not lie where the fund is not subject to garnishment.[49]

(b) Simplified Practice Under Statutes. In many jurisdictions the practice has been simplified by statutes providing in substance that where the disclosure of a garnishee or trustee shows that the whole or some part of the fund in his hands is claimed by a person other than the principal defendant, it is the duty of plaintiff, under the direction of the court, to take the necessary steps to make the claimant a party to the suit in order that his rights may be adjudicated.[50]

Interest in proceeds.— On a bill of interpleader to determine who was entitled to the proceeds of a certain note, it appeared that one defendant claimed the note as a gift from a decedent, of whom complainant was administrator, and had placed it in complainant's hands, to be collected and applied to a debt due from such defendant to complainant. The other defendants claimed that the note belonged to the estate of decedent, who was their mother. It was held that complainant had such an interest in the proceeds of the note that he could not maintain the bill. Wing v. Spaulding, 64 Vt. 83, 23 Atl. 615. See also Holmes v. Clark, 46 Vt. 22.

Building contractors, although required under the terms of their contracts to protect the owner from mechanics' liens, cannot maintain a bill of interpleader against the administrators of a deceased subcontractor to whom they owed a balance, and materialmen who furnished the deceased subcontractor

(x) As to Executors and Administrators. An executor or administrator cannot file a bill of interpleader or a bill in the nature of a bill of interpleader against the creditors and distributees of the estate and an adverse claimant of the assets, since a bona fide defense against the claim, although unsuccessful, will protect him against the creditors and distributees.[57] If a legatee is not described with exact accuracy in a will, and the description may in some respects be applicable to different persons each of whom claims the legacy, the executor may maintain a bill of interpleader for the determination of the person to whom the legacy is payable.[58] And where a decree ordering distribution would not protect the executor against adverse claimants it seems that he may file a bill of interpleader.[59]

(xi) As to Sheriffs — (a) In England. According to the English cases a sheriff is entitled to call upon an execution creditor and claimants of the property seized or its proceeds to interplead, unless he has acted dishonestly, or unless his conduct has prejudiced some of the parties;[60] but he cannot maintain his bill until with materials for the building, where the subcontractor made no assignment of the sum due him, and created no lien thereon enforceable against it in the hands of the contractors, since the materialmen furnishing materials to a subcontractor are not entitled to mechanics' liens under the mechanics' lien law in force in this district. An executor has such an interest in property which came into his hands as executor, and for which he issued by a person claiming by title paramount to his testator's, as to preclude him from calling on parties claiming under the will to interplead. Adams v. Dixon, 19 Ga. 513, 65 Am. Dec. 608.

A bill in the nature of a bill of interpleader, brought by the executor of a will to obtain instructions of court as to the execution of his trust, is not a proper mode to try the rights of creditors of a deceased person to collect their demands. Bradford v. Forbes, 9 Allen (Mass.) 365. An administrator filed a bill of interpleader against the next of kin of his intestate, and a person claiming to hold, as assignee, a policy of insurance issued to the intestate on his life, the proceeds of which were in plaintiff's hands, and defendants agreed that the court might take jurisdiction. It was held that, although the case was not properly one for interpleader, the court would entertain it as of a bill seeking instruction and protection from the court. Relief refused.— Where an under-sheriff, who was acting as attorney for certain creditors of defendant, informed them of a fieri facias at the suit of plaintiff having been placed in his hands to execute, by which means the issuing of a fiat in bankruptcy against defendant was accelerated, and plaintiff's execution thereby defeated, the court refused to grant the sheriff relief. Cox v. Balne, 2 D. & L. 718, 9 Jur. 182, 14 L. J. Q. B. 95. If, having seized goods in execution, which are claimed by another party, the sheriff delivers up part of the goods to the claimant, he thereby precludes himself from relief. he has made a seizure of goods;[61] neither can he apply for relief after the goods have been sold and the proceeds paid over to the execution creditor;[62] and where the sheriff is placed in circumstances which give him an interest in either side, the court will not relieve him.[63] The sheriff need not wait until proceedings are commenced against him,[64] but he must not apply before a claim is made.[65] He should, however, apply immediately upon receiving notice of an adverse claim.[66]

(B) In United States. By statute in some jurisdictions the sheriff may compel the contesting claimants of the fund to interplead;[67] and so of the execution debtor and a third person who claims the property seized upon execution.[68] But it is doubtful if he can do this without statutory authority.[69]

A sheriff notified by a third party, after levy of an execution on certain chattels, that they are subject to the lien of a mortgage given to such party, is not entitled to a rule for an interpleader, since his proper course is to sell the interest of the execution defendant in such chattels. Brill v. West End Pass. R. Co., 4 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 139.

It is not imperative upon the sheriff, when the ownership of goods taken by him under execution is disputed, to ask for an interpleader issue. In clear cases he should not demand it. When the goods are exclusively in defendant's possession, he may presume the goods to be defendant's property, and runs no risk in levying on them as such. Bank v. Allen, 1 Del. Co. (Pa.) 277.

Where, after levy, the property was purchased by another without notice that a levy had been made, and a claim made by such purchaser against the sheriff, the latter could not have a bill of interpleader, since a title acquired subsequent to the levy could not be the subject of an interpleader. Rodgers v. Douglass, 9 Wkly. Notes Cas. (Pa.) 191.

Where third persons present to the sheriff an affidavit that they are the mortgagees and bailees of certain goods levied on as the property of defendant, and that as such they are entitled to possession of such goods, such persons and plaintiff will not be required to interplead. Manning v. Boothe, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 95.

See also Deposits in Court, 13 Cyc. 1030 et seq. A sheriff may relieve himself from responsibility to claimants by paying the money into court, making a full return of the facts out of which the controversy arose, notifying all the parties interested in the fund, and leaving them to apply to the court to determine the priority of their respective claims; and he should not be allowed to maintain a bill of interpleader. A mere stakeholder is justified if there is the slightest doubt or risk arising from conflicting claims, in calling upon the person really interested on either side to indemnify him against such risk, and, if he refuses or neglects to do so, in filing a bill of interpleader in equity. Nelson v. Barter, 2 Hem. & M. 334, 10 Jur. N. S. 611, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491 [affirmed in 10 Jur. N. S. 832, 33 L. J. Ch. 705, 12 Wkly. Rep. 999]. Plaintiff in interpleader is not bound to show the existence of an apparent title in each of defendants claiming the property, and a stakeholder is entitled to relief by suit of interpleader, and is not bound to accept an indemnity from either of the claimants, although the claimant offering it shows an apparent title. East India, etc., Dock Co. v. Littledale, 7 Hare 57, 27 Eng. Ch. 57.

Where a defendant has been indemnified by a third person for not delivering up property in his possession, he has no right to relief. Tucker v. Morris, 1 Cromp. & M. 73, 1 Dowl. P. C. 639, 2 L. J. Exch. 1.

Collusion.— The objection that a stakeholder has, by merely taking an indemnity from one of two rival claimants to property in his hands, disentitled himself to relief under the Interpleader Acts because he had identified himself with and must be taken to "collude" with the claimant who gave the indemnity, cannot be raised by that claimant himself, and the decisions in Tucker v. Morris, 1 Cromp. & M. 73, 1 Dowl. P. C. 639, 2 L. J. Exch. 1, and Belcher v. Smith, 9 Bing. 82, 1 L. J. C. P. 167, 2 Moore & S. 184, 23 E. C. L. 495, do not apply. Thompson v. Wright, 13 Q. B. D. 632, 54 L. J. Q. B. 32, 51 L. T. Where an incorporated mutual benefit association is liable to one of two or more claimants for a death benefit, the treasurer of such association cannot file a bill of interpleader to have defendants litigate their claim, but such bill must be filed by the corporation itself. D. Frame of the Bill[78] — 1. Necessary Averments — a. In General. b. Complainant's Interest and Status. Complainant should state in his bill that he claims no interest in the subject-matter himself, and should show affirmatively that he stands in the position of a mere stakeholder and is wholly indifferent between defendants.[80]

c. Claimants and Nature of Their Claims. The bill should show on its face that there are two or more persons in esse, making adverse claims to the fund or thing in dispute, capable of interpleading and litigating their respective rights; and should also state the nature of their several claims.[81] But complainant need not set out the opposing claims with particularity;[82] and he is not obliged to show that a bona fide controversy exists between the rival claimants.[83] He should

A bill by a common carrier, setting up a lien for freight, the correctness of which, however, is not shown to have been assented to, and asking that a delivery of the property be conditioned on its payment, does not show such a negation of interest in the matter as to allow complainant to demand the interpleading of the vendor of the consignee under the exercise of his right of stoppage in transitu, and of attaching creditors. Crass v. Memphis, etc., R. Co., 96 Ala. 447, 11 So. 480.

However, a bill in the nature of a bill of interpleader which states substantial grounds of equitable jurisdiction other than the mere fact that there are conflicting claims set up to a fund in the complainant's hands need not allege or assert by affidavit that the complainant is indifferent between the contesting parties and does not collude with either of them. Rule illustrated.— Accordingly a bill founded on a rumor or a mere expression of belief that there are adverse claimants is fatally defective (Kreiser v. New York, 46 N. Y. App. Div. 16, 61 N. Y. Suppl. 329; State Ins. Co. v. Gennett, 2 Tenn. Ch. 82; Metcalf v. Hervey, 1 Ves. 248, 27 Eng. Reprint 1011); and it is equally defective if it does not state facts showing the court that there is a reasonable doubt as to which of the claimants is entitled to the fund or thing in dispute (Crass v. Memphis, etc., R. Co., 96 Ala. 447, 11 So. 480; Franklin v. Southern R. Co., 119 Ga. 855, 47 S. E. 344; Varrian v. Berrien, 42 N. J. Eq. 1, 10 Atl. 875; Hinsdale v. Bankers' L. Ins. Co., 72 N. Y. Suppl. 814; East India Co. v. Edwards, 18 Ves. 376, 34 Eng. Reprint 359). A mere pretext of a conflicting claim will not support the bill; the court is bound to see that there is a question to be tried. Michigan Sav. Bank v. Coy, 45 Misc. (N. Y.) 40, 90 N. Y. Suppl. 814; Stephenson v. Burdett, 56 W. Va. 109, 48 S. E. 846; Desborough v. Harris, 5 De G. M. & G. 439, 3 Eq. Rep. 1058, 1 Jur. N. S. 986, 4 Wkly. Rep. 2, 54 Eng. Ch. 348, 43 Eng. 82. It is sufficient to state the claims made to him in such manner as to satisfy the court that there are opposing claims against which he is in equity entitled to protection until the rights of the claimants can be settled and he can pay with safety. Byers v. Sansom-Thayer Commission Co., 111 Ill. either allege that he is ignorant of the respective rights of the claimants or at least state facts showing that there is a reasonable doubt as to which claimant he may safely pay the debt or render the duty.[84] Where only one of the claimants is in a position to enforce the demand against the complainant a bill of interpleader will not lie;[85] and where it appears that the claim of the third person is frivolous or invalid an application for an order to interplead should be denied.[86]

3. Verification.[91] A bill of interpleader should be verified by the affidavit of complainant,[92] but the omission of the verification is an amendable defect.[93]

4. Affidavit of Non-Collusion. When a bill of interpleader is filed it should be accompanied by an affidavit of the complainant that there is no collusion between him and any of the parties defendant.[94]

Proc. 269, holding that where it appears that one interpleading in an action in the place of the original defendant as claiming a portion of the fund in suit can in no event be entitled to more than one third thereof, plaintiff, on making a proper application at special term, should be allowed to receive the remainder without awaiting the termination of the action.

a bill of interpleader is filed by the officer of a company on behalf of the company, the affidavit annexed ought to state, not that plaintiff does not collude, but that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, the company do not collude with defendants. Where in an interpleader suit there are several plaintiffs residing in different parts of the country, and there is evidence that they all conducted their business through the same agent and solicitor in London, the court will allow the bill to be filed upon an affidavit of no collusion by such agent and solicitor only, but will not thereupon grant the ordinary injunction till the hearing, but merely an interim order for a reasonable time upon an understanding that plaintiffs will themselves in the meantime make the requisite affidavit. defendants is entitled to the debt or duty, both defendants may demur; the one on the grounnd that the complainant has a perfect defense at law against his claim, and the other on the ground that the complainant has neither a legal nor an equitable defense to his claim, and has therefore no right to call upon him to interplead with a third person who claims without right.[1] Where the bill shows affirmatively that neither of defendants is entitled to the money, a demurrer by either of them will be sustained which will virtually decide the cause as to both.[2] If defendants interplead without objection and go to trial on the issues, it is too late to raise the objection that the case is not a proper one for interpleader.[3] But a party is not always obliged to challenge the sufficiency of the bill by demurrer. There are cases in which he may safely answer and rely on the insufficiency of the evidence.[4]

2. MOTION TO DISMISS. Where the bill shows affirmatively that the case is not a proper one for interpleader, and it appears that it is not amendable so as to state a proper case, it may be dismissed on motion for want of equity.[5]

3. MOTION TO MAKE MORE DEFINITE AND CERTAIN. Where the allegations of the complaint are not as full and clear as could be desired, the remedy is not by demurrer but by motion that the complaint be made more definite and certain.[6]

Soc. v. Staples, 23 Conn. 544; Nash v. Smith, 6 Conn. 421; Nofsinger v. Reynolds, 52 Ind. 218). The fact that the money has not been paid into court and the bill contains no offer to bring it in has been considered ground for demurrer (McGarrah v. Prather, 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 299; Barroll v. Foreman, 86 Md. 675, 39 Atl. 273; Home L. Ins. Co. v. Caulk, 86 Md. 385, 38 Atl. 901; Parker v. Barker, 42 N. H. 78, 77 Am. But see Snodgrass v. Butler, 54 Miss. 45).

Demurrer too broad.— If the bill states a proper case for interpleader as between two of defendants, but fails as to a third, a demurrer to the whole bill is too broad, it should be confined to the defective part of the bill. State Ins. Co. v. Gennett, 2 Tenn. Ch. 82.

General demurrer when insufficient.— Although a bill cannot be maintained as a strict interpleader, yet, if there are other grounds for equitable relief stated in the adjustment of which a court of equity can give more adequate relief than a court of law, a general demurrer for want of equity is properly overruled. Hatfield v. McWhorter, 40 Ga. 269. So the omission to offer to bring fund into court must be specifically assigned in order that the proper amendment may be made. A general demurrer will not do. 4. Answer.[7] Defendants may by answer disclaim all interest in the fund, admit the complainant's right to file the bill, deny every averment upon which the bill rests for relief as a bill of interpleader, or set up distinct facts in bar of the relief prayed.[8] Any defendant may in his answer deny the allegations of the bill or set up new matter in bar of the relief sought.[9] But it seems that the amount of the fund or matter in the hands of the complainant, upon which hostile claims are alleged to have been made, must be taken to be as stated by the complainant, and cannot be controverted by the answers for the purpose of having it adjudicated.[10] Defendants are entitled to aver and prove any facts which show that the complainant is not entitled to maintain his bill; but upon a strict bill of interpleader any part of an answer calling for specific relief against the complainant should be stricken out on motion.[11]

5. Cross Bill.[12] Where no affirmative relief is sought against complainant a

Disclaimer.— The proper way to set up the fact that the subject of plaintiff's action is not claimed by one who has been made a defendant by interpleader is by answer, disclaimer, or failure to plead at all, and not by motion to set aside or modify the order of interpleader. Such order may be made by the court on the affidavit of the principal debtor, and it is not for any alleged claimant to question that order. Franklin Bank v. Cincinnati, 10 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 545, 8 N. P. 517.

Counter-claim.— Where a complaint in the nature of a bill of interpleader alleged that a deposit was made in plaintiff's bank subject to depositor's order, with the privilege in E to draw on the fund for the completion of a certain building, a counter-claim alleging that plaintiff had accepted an order drawn by E in defendant's favor on the fund is demurrable for failure to show that the order was given for payment of bills due on the house, or any consideration for the order or its acceptance. National Sav. Bank v. Cable, 73 Conn. 568, 48 Atl. 428.

Every averment upon which the bill rests for relief as a bill of interpleader may be denied. When the answer denies the facts upon which the bill depends as a bill of interpleader, plaintiff is put to his proof before the case is ready for a decree as to whether the respondents should be required to interplead. Cress v. Memphis, etc., R. Co., 96 Ala. 447, 11 So. 480.

Immaterial denials.— Denial of the allegations of the complaint as to the facts on which the claims of defendants are based is immaterial, since this is a matter to be litigated between them in case they are decreed to interplead. Atkinson v. Manks, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 691.

Pleading contract.— Where a party, sued as having funds in his possession belonging to plaintiff, answers that the fund is claimed by B under a contract with plaintiffs, and pleads such contract, it is not necessary for the other claimant in his answer to make such contract a part of the pleading. Amount of the fund in the hands of plaintiff, as stated in the bill, cannot be denied in the answer, except for the purpose of showing fraud or collusion on the part of plaintiff. Atkinson v. Manks, 1 Cow. (N. Y.) 691.

Where one defendant makes a claim beyond the amount admitted to be due and paid into court, and which is not claimed by the other defendants, he will be permitted to proceed at law to establish his right to that part of his demand which is not in controversy with the other defendants. 12. Cross bill generally see Equity, 16 Cyc. 324 et seq.

cross bill is not admissible, for each defendant may have all the relief to which he is entitled without it upon his answer alone.[13] But where a defendant claims a larger sum than is admitted in the bill and seeks affirmative relief against the complainant, it is proper to file a cross bill in order to bring all the equities of the parties before the court.[14]

6. WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS TO BILL. Objections to a bill of interpleader that the complainant did not annex an affidavit that there was no collusion between him and any of the claimants;[15] that complainant did not offer to bring the property in controversy into court;[16] that the respective claims of defendants were not set out,[17] and that after defendants had interpleaded no replication was filed[18] are formal objections which should be taken by demurrer, and are waived by going to a hearing on the merits.

G. Replication.[19] Until the complainant is discharged he is more than a mere nominal party, and a decree in relation to his right to file the bill is first to be made. He has no right in the matter in controversy, but still there is something to be settled between him and defendants before the latter can litigate together. Hence if defendants admit the right of the complainant to file the bill and set up no defense which requires the taking of testimony, he should file a replication and then set down the cause for hearing and for a decree that they interplead and settle the matter between themselves; and the court then discharges the complainant with his costs and orders that defendants interplead.[20] But when the answers deny the facts upon which the bill depends as a bill of interpleader, the complainant is put to his proof before the case is ready for a decree as to whether defendants should be required to interplead.[21] Consequently if defendants put in answers denying the allegations of the bill or set up new matter in bar of the proceeding, the complainant must file a replication, where by the rules of pleading a reply is necessary, and the issues raised must be tried, in order to determine the preliminary question of the complainant's right to file the bill.[22]

In a strict interpleader suit defendant cannot have relief by cross bill against the complainant. The only relief which can be given to a defendant in such a suit, as against the complainant, is a dismissal of the complainant's bill, and that a defendant may always obtain on answer alone and without a cross bill. Wakeman v. Kingsland, 46 N. J. Eq. 113, 18 Atl. 680.

H. Bill in the Nature of a Bill of Interpleader. A bill in the nature of a bill of interpleader is distinguished from a bill of interpleader proper in that there are grounds of equitable jurisdiction other than the mere right to compel defendants to interplead, and the complainant may seek some affirmative equitable relief.[23]

I. Injunctive Relief.[24] In a proper case for a bill of interpleader the complainant may have an injunction restraining the claimants from further prosecution of their actions at law pending the litigation under the interpleader, provided he brings the fund in dispute into court.[25]

properly filed, the payment of the money into court stops the running of interest;[27] but if the fund is not paid into court it is proper to compute interest up to the rendition of the final decree.[28]

K. The Hearing and Relief Granted[29] — 1. Complainant Cannot Be Heard as to His Liability. On a bill of interpleader complainant cannot be heard as to his liability, since it assumes that he is merely a stakeholder and stands impartial between the claimants.[30]

2. Effect of Disclaimer or Default. A bill of interpleader necessarily admits the indebtedness of complainant, and if one of two parties defendant withdraws all claim to the fund a decree that it be paid to the other is a matter of course.[31] Where one of defendants fails to interplead and is defaulted, the other, if he has answered, is entitled to the fund deposited in court and the complainant has no right to dispute his claim.[32] But when an execution creditor summoned by the sheriff to interplead does not appear, although the property seized may be released to the claimant, the court cannot bar the creditor's claim against the judgment debtor.[33] And where a defendant has appeared and admitted the complainant's right to file the bill, his claim cannot be barred without directing an issue between the claimants unless he disclaims.[34]

4. DECREE[36] — a. Preliminary. Where a bill of interpleader is filed the better practice is first to determine whether such bill will lie. If it will not, it is useless to go further.[37] If it will, then upon bringing the property in dispute into court, the complainant is discharged from further liability, with his costs,[38] and the court orders that defendants interplead and litigate the matter in dispute between themselves, which in effect becomes a new and independent proceeding, as between a complainant and a defendant.[39]

b. Final. If the issues between defendants are ripe for decision, the court may at a single hearing dispose of the whole controversy, including as well the issues between the complainant and defendants as the issues between defendants themselves,[40] and make a final decree settling the rights of all parties at once;[41] and where sufficient appears on the pleadings to enable the court to adjudge between defendants it will proceed at once.[42] If, however, upon the discharge of the complainant the case is not ripe for hearing between the claimants the court should order an action or an issue formed between defendants as to their respective rights to the fund, and may order a reference to a master to ascertain and settle their rights, and upon the trial of this issue a final decree as between defendants is rendered.[43]

"Costs of petitioner herein."— In an action against a savings bank for a deposit, on an application by it under N. Y. Laws (1875), c. 321, § 25, to interplead adverse claimants to the deposit, the order of interpleader allowed "the costs of the petitioner herein." 8. REVIEW.[57] An order of interpleader puts an end to the case so far as the complainant is concerned and is appealable,[58] and an appeal from a final decree opens for consideration all prior orders and preliminary decrees made in the case.[59] Orders finally dismissing interpleaders, also dismissing an auxiliary petition by plaintiff to enjoin them from enforcing a judgment, and vacating an injunction previously granted, embody final decisions and are appealable, although the suit between the original parties is still pending.[60]

III. INTERPLEADER UNDER CODES AND SPECIAL STATUTES.

Under the code system of pleading a debtor may bring an action of interpleader under the same circumstances that justified the filing of a bill of interlowed his costs out of the fund, these costs will be charged against the party whose claim to the fund is found to be invalid.

"The principle enunciated by Horne Tooke in his Diversions of Purley, that a word has 'one meaning and one only,' has no application to cases arising under statutes where construction or interpretation is required, except, perhaps, in scientific matters. Worcester, in the preface to his dictionary, says: 'Though there may be found in Johnson's Dictionary many instances in which a distinction is made where there is little or no difference, yet the principle stated by Horne Tooke, that "a word has one meaning and one only" cannot be admitted without numerous exceptions. Take, for example, some very common words . . . the nouns law, letter, line, post; though the different senses in which these words are used may be, in some measure, in accordance with one original meaning of each, yet a single definition of each of the words would afford but very inadequate explanation. The original or etymological meaning of many words has become obsolete, and they have assumed a new or more modern meaning; many which retain their etymological meaning have other meanings annexed to them; many have both a literal and metaphorical meaning, and many both a common and technical meaning, all of which need explanation.' The primary general sense of a word often ramifies into different senses, as Webster illustrates in the preface to his dictionary. He says, in substance, that by attention to the different uses and applications of the word, we become able, in most cases, to arrive at a satisfactory explanation of the manner in which the same word comes to be used with different significations. Professor Whitney says that, 'both historically and with regard to present usage, it is impossible to draw a hard and fast line between these two sides of the language, either with respect to words or to their individual senses.'" Close interpretation (interpretatio restricta) is adopted if just reasons, connected with the formation and character of the text, induce us to take the words in their narrowest meaning. This species of interpretation has generally been called "literal," but the term is inadmissible. Black L. Dict. [quoting Lieber Leg. & Pol. Hermeneutics 54].

Extensive interpretation (interpretatio extensiva, called, also, "liberal interpretation" adopts a more comprehensive signification of the word. Black L. Dict. [quoting Lieber Leg. & Pol. Hermeneutics 58].

Extravagant interpretation (interpretatio excedens) is that which substitutes a meaning evidently beyond the true one. It is therefore not genuine interpretation. Black L. Dict. [quoting Lieber Leg. & Pol. Hermeneutics 59].

Free or unrestricted interpretation (interpretatio soluta) proceeds simply on the general principles of interpretation in good faith, not bound by any specific or superior principle. Black L. Dict. [quoting Lieber Leg. & Pol. Hermeneutics 59].

Limited or restricted interpretation (interpretatio limitata) is when we are influenced by other principles than the strictly hermeneutic ones. Black L. Dict. [quoting Lieber Leg. & Pol. Hermeneutics 60].

Predestined interpretation (interpretatio predestinata) takes place if the interpreter, laboring under a strong bias of mind, makes the text subservient to his preconceived views or desires. This includes artful interpretation (interpretatio vafer), by which the interpreter seeks to give a meaning to the text other than the one he knows to have been intended. Black L. Dict. [quoting Lieber Leg. & Pol. Hermeneutics 60].

I. TERMINOLOGY.[1]

A. Intoxicating Liquors — 1. IN GENERAL. In the absence of a statutory definition, this term is understood to include any liquor intended for use as a beverage or capable of being so used which contains such a proportion of alcohol that it will produce intoxication when imbibed in such quantities as it is practically possible for a man to drink.[2] It is therefore permissible to show the proportion of alcohol contained in any liquor in dispute.[3] If this is very great, the courts may hold, without further evidence, that the liquor is "intoxicating";[4] if extremely small they may hold that it is not within the meaning of that term.[5] But otherwise the question must be determined upon testimony as to whether or not the liquor in question can and does actually produce intoxication when taken as a beverage.[6] When this term is defined by statute, the courts are bound by it and can neither enlarge nor restrict its signification; and any liquor which is named or plainly included in the statute must be held intoxicating as a matter of

A mixture of liquors is an intoxicating liquor, within the meaning of the statutes, if it may be taken in sufficient quantity to produce intoxication, and it is reasonable to presume that it may be used as a substitute for the ordinary drinks. law, without inquiry into its actual properties, and even though, as a matter of fact, it is not capable of producing intoxication.[7]

2. Medicinal Preparations. A compound which is distinctively known and used as a drug, medicine, or toilet preparation, and which cannot practically be taken as a beverage for the sake of the alcohol which it contains, because of its repulsive taste or smell, because the effect of the alcohol is counteracted by the other ingredients, or because of its systematic effects if taken in excessive doses, is not within the statutes relating to intoxicating liquors, no matter how large a proportion of alcohol it may contain; and on the other hand, a medicinal preparation which is capable of being used as a beverage, and which contains such a percentage of alcohol that it will produce intoxication if drunk to excess, is within the meaning of such statutes, although it may contain other constituents which, either separately or in conjunction with alcohol, possess useful medicinal properties.[8] Although this is the generally accepted rule, some decisions have made the determination of the question depend upon the intention of the buyer, as to the use to be made of the compound, or upon the knowledge and intention of the seller.[9] And it must be observed that the applicable statute may be so broad in its terms as to include drugs and medicines which are entirely unfit to be used as beverages, provided only they contain alcohol.[10]

3. Bitters. The various infusions called "bitters," containing alcohol together with bitter herbs, barks, or other medicinal ingredients, are subject to the laws regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, if, notwithstanding the presence of the medicinal ingredients, they are capable of being used as beverages and contain sufficient alcohol to produce intoxication when so used; but not if they are incapable of being used as drinks and where the alcohol is merely a necessary preservative or vehicle for the other constituents.[11]

Where the statute expressly includes in the definition of intoxicating liquors "any composition of which spirituous liquor is a part," it is held to be a violation of the law

4. Fruits Preserved in Spirits. The sale of fruit, preserved or flavored with a small proportion of brandy or other liquor, as a confection or preserve, and not so prepared with intent to evade the liquor laws, is not within statutes prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor.[12] But the sale of "brandy peaches," "brandy cherries," or the like, where the article really sold is the brandy or other liquor, and it is intended to be used as a beverage, and the addition of a little fruit is merely a device to evade the law, is within such statutes.[13]

B. Spirituous Liquors. The term "spirituous liquors" is not synonymous with the term "intoxicating liquors," nor can the two expressions be used interchangeably. All spirituous liquor is intoxicating; but there are varieties of intoxicating liquor which cannot properly be described as spirituous.[14] The latter term is properly restricted to such liquors as are produced by the process of distillation, and does not include wine, ale, beer, or other liquors which are not the product of the still,[15] unless the terms of a statute extend its signification so to sell, as a beverage, "bitters" thus compounded, notwithstanding a United States excise tax has been paid thereon (showing that the article is classed as a medicine), and although the federal law requires no license for the sale of the same. In instructions.— Where an information charged defendant with unlawfully selling "spirituous liquor," and the evidence showed the liquor sold to have been whisky, it was held that the fact that the court, in an instruction, referred to the liquor as "intoxicating," instead of spirituous," gave defendant no just cause for complaint. In title of statute.—A statute entitled "an act to prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors," which declares that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell intoxicating liquors, contains matter different from that expressed in its title, the term used in the body of the act being wider in its scope than the title. In North Carolina it is held that the term "spirituous liquor" includes all liquors which contain alcohol and are capable of producing intoxication, whether distilled or not, and hence the term is applicable to such beverages as wine and lager beer. State v. Giersch, 98 N. C. 720, 4 S. E. 193.

as to make the term cover liquors which are not etymologically within its meaning.[16]

C. Fermented Liquors. This term is applicable to liquors which contain alcohol produced by the process of alcoholic fermentation, such as wines, ale, and beer. As stated in the preceding section, these liquors are not properly described as "spirituous," but it is a presumption of law that fermented liquors are intoxicating.[17] But if a statute forbids the sale of "fermented" liquor, it is not necessary, for the purposes of such statute, that the liquor sold should actually be intoxicating; it is enough to show that it was fermented.[18]

D. Malt Liquors. This term, in its common and popular usage, includes such liquors as beer, ale, porter, and stout, but not distilled liquors, although malt may enter into their composition, and is clearly inapplicable to wines and cider.[19] The courts decline to take judicial notice of all the varieties of liquor which may be thus designated, and are not willing to rule judicially that all malt liquors are intoxicating, unless it is so declared by statute.[20] It is a question for the jury, upon the evidence, whether or not the particular malt liquor was intoxicating.[21] But if the statute specifically forbids the unlicensed sale of "malt liquor," the question of the intoxicating properties of the liquor sold is immaterial; it is only necessary to determine whether it was a malt liquor.[22]

E. Vinous Liquors. Vinous liquor means liquor made from the fermented juice of the grape.[23]

16. In New Hampshire the statute provides that the words "spirituous liquors" shall be equivalent to "intoxicating liquors," and under this provision it is held that intoxicating wines and any malt liquor which is shown or admitted to be intoxicating may be described as "spirituous." F. Liquor or Liquors. Either of these terms, standing alone, is too wide to have a precise legal signification, unless explained by the context or by necessary inferences from the subject-matter of the statute. When thus explained, however, the terms are commonly understood as including all varieties of intoxicating beverages, whether spirituous, vinous, or malt.[24]

G. Dram-Shop, Etc.[25] A dram-shop is a place where spirituous liquor is sold by the drink,[26] and is commonly called a saloon;[27] but the latter word has a much broader meaning.[28]

II. JUDICIAL NOTICE.[29]

A. As to Intoxicating Quality of Liquor. Under the well known doctrine of judicial cognizance the courts take judicial notice that whisky,[30] brandy,[31]

Cider.— Com. v. Roese, 1 Wilcox (Pa.) 253, holding that cider which has undergone the process of vinous fermentation, by which it has become possessed of the alcoholic quality of wine, is a "vinous liquor," within the meaning of the statute prohibiting the sale of such liquor without a license.

gin,[32] rum,[33] porter,[34] ale,[35] wine,[36] and alcohol [37] are intoxicating liquors. The rule or test is this: If the compound or preparation be such that the distinctive character and effect of intoxicating liquor are gone, that its use as an intoxicating beverage is practically impossible, by reason of the other ingredients, then it is outside the statute. III. POWER TO CONTROL TRAFFIC.

A. United States[58] — 1. In General. The general government, in the exercise of its authority to raise revenue for its proper purposes, has power to impose a license-tax or duty upon the manufacture and sale of intoxicants, although the same business is a subject of police regulation by the states.[59] Further, congress has power to enact police regulations applicable in those districts and places over which it has direct or exclusive jurisdiction, such as the territories, and hence has constitutional authority to regulate or prohibit the traffic in intoxicating liquors therein.[60]

2. Licenses and Their Effect. A license granted under the United States internal revenue laws to carry on the business of a liquor dealer in a particular state named, although it has been granted in consideration of a fee paid, does not give the licensee power to carry on the business in violation of a state prohibitory law, nor does it relieve the holder from the necessity of taking out any license required by the laws of the state, if that is the system prevailing therein.[61]

B. States[62] — 1. Police Power. Laws prohibiting, regulating, or restraining the manufacture and sale of intoxicants, enacted by the several states, are referable to, and are justified by, the police power of the state.[63]

Duty to use impartially.— The police power of the state is to be used impartially and without unjust discrimination, and while, as between liquor selling and other callings less harmful to the public, the former may be discriminated against, there is no warrant for unjust discrimination as between individuals engaged in the same business.

2. Legislative Regulation. The several states, in the exercise of their power, and subject to the limitations and restrictions contained in the constitution of the United States or of the particular state, have full authority to enact any and all laws for the suppression of intemperance and minimizing the evils resulting from the traffic in intoxicating liquors, whether by totally prohibiting, or by restricting and licensing, the manufacture and sale of such liquors.[64] There is no inherent right in the people to engage in the traffic in intoxicants, in any such sense as to remove it from the legitimate sphere of legislative control.[65] Nor is there any vested right acquired by those already engaged in the liquor traffic which prevents its being afterward forbidden by statute.[66]

3. Dispensaries and State Agencies. Several of the states have adopted laws entirely prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors by any private individual within the state, but vesting the exclusive right to sell such liquors in the state itself, acting through designated officers or public agents, or in its municipalities, at public offices called "dispensaries," the profit of the business accruing to the state or municipality, and the conduct of the dispensaries being surrounded with more or less severe restrictions. The validity of these statutes has generally been sustained,[67] although there are some decisions in which their constitutionality has been denied.[68]

Limitation upon power.— The power of a state to prohibit the sale of liquors, as a regulation of domestic commerce, is not analogous to or coextensive with the power of congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, since the latter is unlimited, while the former is subject to the restrictions imposed by the state constitution. Beebe v. State, 6 Ind. 501, 63 Am. Dec. 391.

68. Beebe v. State, 6 Ind. 501, 63 Am. Dec. 391; Donald v. Scott, 67 Fed. 854.

In Alabama a statute was held unconstitutional which gave to the commissioners and managers a direct personal, pecuniary interest in the business, and which conferred on the commissioners power to suspend the dispensary, thereby prohibiting the liquor traffic entirely or discontinuing it permanently, thereby putting in operation the license laws of the state and city. Mitchell v. State, 133 Ala. 65, 32 So. 132. See also Harlan v. State, 136 Ala. 150, 33 So. 858.

In Vermont a statute was held unconstitutional in so far as it authorized a public agent, appointed by the county commissioners, to purchase liquors at the expense of the

C. Territories. Under the congressional grants of legislative power to the territories, it is within their power to license and regulate liquor dealers, or to enact a local option law.[69]

D. Municipal Corporations — 1. Delegation of Power to Local Authorities. In the absence of specific constitutional restrictions, it is competent for the legislature of a state to empower its various municipal corporations to enact ordinances, each operative within the corporate limits, for the prohibition, licensing, or regulation of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Such delegation to the municipalities of legislative control over this subject is not unlawful.[70] But limitations upon the legislative power in this regard may be found in the constitution of the state,[71] as, where it forbids the legislature to pass any act regulating the internal affairs of cities or towns,[72] or requires that all laws of a general nature shall be uniform in their operation.[73]

2. Delegation of Municipal Authority. Power granted by the legislature to a municipal corporation to prohibit, regulate, or license the sale of liquor, cannot be delegated by the municipality to any other body or individual. Thus, if the power is conferred upon the council of a city, it cannot be delegated by the council to the mayor.[74]

Regulating sales beyond corporate limits.— It is a general rule that the legislature cannot confer upon a municipal corporation powers which are to be exercised beyond the limits of the municipality; but a grant of authority to require licenses from persons selling liquor within one or two miles from the limits of a city is held to be a police regulation, having regard to the peace and good order of the city and therefore valid. 3. Extent of Powers Granted — a. In General. In respect to the enactment of ordinances prohibiting or regulating the traffic in liquors, municipal corporations have only such powers as are expressly conferred upon them by their charters or by statute, or such as are necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted,[75] and their charters or enabling acts will be construed with a reasonable degree of strictness in this particular, the rule being that the power claimed must be shown to exist either explicitly or by proper implication, and that it is not sufficient to show merely that its exercise has not been forbidden.[76] If the statute designates the municipal board or officers who are to be vested with the authority of the municipality in this regard, its terms are to be taken as absolutely exclusive.[77] And if express power to control the sale of liquor is given to a city, village, or town, this will exclude any similar authority on the General welfare clause.— A clause in the charter of a city giving it power to make ordinances to provide for the "general welfare" of the city, to "suppress immorality," or to secure the public "health, order, and peace" does not give it authority to prohibit, regulate, or license the sale of intoxicating liquors. In re Sullivan, 21 D. Henderson v. Heyward, 109 Ga. 373, 34 S. E. 590, 77 Am. St. Rep. 384, 47 L. R. A. 366. A city, by reason of such a clause, has no right to exact an exorbitant tax or license from a person engaged in the sale of spirituous and fermented liquors at a place remote from the settled portion of such city, when it appears that no police supervision was ever taken over such place other than to demand and collect such license or fee. Salt Lake City v. Wagner, 2 Utah 400.

part of the county in which it is situated.[78] If the statute confers upon the municipality power either to prohibit or to license and regulate the sale of liquor, it is a matter wholly within the discretion of the municipal authorities whether the one or the other form of ordinance shall be adopted.[79] When a municipal corporation is invested with power to license or regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors, it has implied authority to make all such ordinances as may be necessary to make the grant of power effectual, and to preserve the public peace, good order and security against dangers arising from the traffic in such liquors.[80] Thus it is competent to pass an ordinance prohibiting not only the sale but also the bartering or giving away of liquor without a license,[81] or forbidding the sale of certain liquors in less quantities than a gallon, or the drinking of the same at the place of sale,[82] or designating the districts or precincts of the city within which the business of liquor selling shall be confined,[83] or prohibiting the giving of bogus prescriptions for liquor by physicians,[84] or its sale by druggists for other than medicinal purposes,[85] or providing that police officers shall have authority at any time to enter upon the premises of a licensed dealer to ascertain the manner in which he conducts his business and to preserve order.[86] It is only required that such ordinances should be within the scope of the powers granted,[87] and not unreasonable, unjust, or unduly oppressive.[88] It is clearly competent for a munici-

Decker v. Sargeant, 125 Ind. 404, 25 N. E. 458.

88. Arbitrary discrimination as to place of sale.— An ordinance is not valid if it makes an arbitrary and unreasonable distinction between different parts of the city, or different places within the city, not founded on any public necessity or any inherent difference of suitability for the business, or if it improperly discriminates between persons. Ex p. Theisen, 30 Fla. 529, 11 So. 901, 32 Am. Excluding proprietor and agents.— A city cannot enact by ordinance that it shall be "unlawful for any barkeeper, clerk or agent, pality, under such a general grant of authority, to ordain that all bar-rooms and saloons shall be closed on Sunday, and to prohibit, under penalties, the sale of liquor on that day,[89] and also on election days,[90] and to require that all such places shall close their doors and cease doing business at a designated hour of the night, and remain closed until a designated hour of the following morning.[91]

b. Power to Prohibit Sale — (I) In General. The grant to a municipal corporation, by charter or general statute, of power to "regulate," "license," or "tax" the sale of intoxicating liquors within its limits does not confer authority to adopt an ordinance totally prohibiting such sale.[92] And although the munic-or any person whatever, to keep open or be or remain in such bar room, or other place where spirituous or intoxicating liquors are sold, between the hours of 10 o'clock p. m. and 4 o'clock a. m." State v. Thomas, 118 N. C. 1221, 24 S. E. 535. A city ordinance providing that it shall be unlawful for the proprietor of any saloon or place where liquor is sold and dispensed, and his clerks, agents, or employees, to enter such saloon on Sunday for any purpose whatever, without first obtaining a written permission from the mayor or recorder of the town in writing, stating the length of time he may remain in the saloon, is unreasonable and void. Newbern v. McCann, 105 Tenn. 159, 58 S. W. 114, 50 L. R. A. 476, opinion of the court being delivered by Wilkes, J.

Unreasonable regulation as to time of sales. — An ordinance forbidding licensed retailers to sell between the hours of six in the evening and six in the morning is unreasonable and invalid. Ward v. Greeneville, 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 228, 35 Am. Rep. 700. And see Grills v. Jonesboro, 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 247. And where the board of police commissioners of a city were authorized to order the closing of saloons "temporarily," whenever in their judgment the public peace required it, it was held that they had power to close the saloons only for a short and definite interval, and consequently an order that all saloons "be so temporarily closed until further notice" was void. ipality may be given power to "restrain" the sale of intoxicants, this term is construed as equivalent to "restrict," and not as equivalent to "suppress," and hence does not authorize a prohibitory ordinance.[93] Such an ordinance, however, may be authorized by the express terms of the charter or statute.[94]

(II) POWER TO PROHIBIT PARTICULAR SALES. Under the ordinary grants of power to municipal corporations to make ordinances to license, regulate, or control the traffic in intoxicating liquors, it is competent for such bodies to prohibit the sale of liquor to minors, habitual drunkards, or other persons whose protection is deemed specially necessary;[95] to forbid sales to be made in unlicensed places;[96] and to provide that no liquor shall be kept or used in any refreshment saloon or restaurant.[97]

c. Power to License or Tax — (I) IN GENERAL. A municipal corporation has no inherent power to license or tax the business of liquor selling, and an ordinance to that effect is invalid, unless the necessary power is conferred by the charter of the municipality or by some general law of the state.[98] But it is competent for the state legislature to confer such power on the municipalities, and if

But see Smith v. Warrior, 99 Ala. 481, 12 So. 418, holding that a statutory provision authorizing towns to license, tax, regulate, and "restrain" the retailing of intoxicating liquors within their corporate limits empowers them to prohibit such sale altogether.

94. "License and prohibit."— Where municipal authorities are specifically empowered to "license, regulate, and prohibit" the sale of intoxicating liquors, they may, by ordinance, provide for the issuing of licenses in one part of the municipality and prohibit the sale of liquor in another part, if the discrimination as to places is not arbitrary or unreasonable. Emporia v. Volmer, 12 Kan. 622. But see State v. Fay, 44 N. J. L. 474.

"Restrain or prohibit."— A city charter which authorizes the passage of ordinances to restrain or prohibit the sale of intoxicating drinks supposes that the usual means by penalty will be resorted to; and the passage of an ordinance which declares that liquor shall not be sold is not within the spirit of the charter. adequate authority is granted, they may provide for the issuing of licenses to suitable persons and prohibit unlicensed sales.[99] But a statute granting such powers will be strictly construed in respect to the kinds or classes of municipal corporations included in it,[1] and in respect to the particular officers, boards, or corporate authorities who are empowered to grant the licenses.[2] Although the word "license" is the appropriate term to use in making such a grant of power, yet the intention to confer such authority upon municipal corporations may be inferred from the employment of other terms, such as "regulate," "restrain," or "tax."[3] Possessing authority to license the traffic, a municipal corporation may prescribe the procedure for obtaining a license, the terms on which licenses shall be granted, and the qualifications of the persons to whom they shall be granted.[4]

authority to the municipality,[7] and to provide for the collection of the license-fee, as by designating the person to whom it shall be paid.[8] Further the exaction of license-fees by a municipality, although primarily intended only as a measure of police regulation, may legitimately be made a means of raising revenue for general purposes, if nothing to the contrary appears in the state laws, and if the fees exacted are not unreasonably great.[9]

(B) Amount of Fees. The amount which a municipal corporation may exact as a license-fee is not limited to the mere expense of issuing the license, but may include the cost of municipal supervision of the business, and be such as to place a reasonable restriction upon the number of saloons and the character and responsibility of the licensees.[10] But if the authority of the municipality is to license the traffic only, and not to prohibit it, it is not competent to fix the license-fee at so great an amount as to make it practically prohibitive.[11]

(C) Differential and Discriminating Rates. A municipal ordinance for licensing liquor dealers is not invalid because it fixes differential rates for license-fees, based on a reasonable and proper principle of classification, provided it does not discriminate between persons so as to make the burden of the tax fall unequally upon dealers in the same class.[12]

(III) Providing For Revocaton of License. A municipal corporation has authority to provide, as a condition to granting licenses, that the same shall be subject to forfeiture or revocation on the violation by the licensee of any of the statutes or ordinances regulating the sale of liquors.[13]

d. Power to Penalize Unlawful Sales. Authority to license and regulate the sale of liquor includes the power to provide that a sale without license, or in violation of the ordinances regulating the traffic, shall be subject to a penalty or shall be punishable as a misdemeanor.[14]

4. Concurrent Regulation by State and Municipalities — a. In General. in conformity therewith.[15] Hence a municipal ordinance and a state statute relating to the sale of liquors may both be operative and effective, although they cover the same ground, define the same or similar offenses, or make similar regulations as to the conduct of the business, if there is no irreconcilable repugnancy between them.[16] But if the grant of authority to the municipality is in terms made exclusive, its exercise will suspend or supersede the general laws so far as regards that municipality, so as to cut off any extraneous right to interfere in the management of the subject;[17] and also so that a compliance with the provisions of the municipal ordinance will furnish a complete protection against any provisions of the state statute, while a compliance with the terms of the statute may not suffice as a protection against the consequences of disobeying the ordinance.[18]

b. Concurrent Licenses or Taxes. The grant of a license by one jurisdiction as a state or county is not necessarily exclusive of the power of another jurisdiction as a municipal corporation to exact a license; and hence, although a state statute may make it an offense to sell liquor without a license from the state or county, this does not interfere with the power of a municipality, if duly authorized, to provide a license system of its own, and enact penalties for its violation.[19]

And on the same principle the fact that the state imposes a tax on the sale of intoxicating liquor does not preclude it from authorizing a city to impose an additional tax.[20]

c. Concurrent Penalties. Where the power to regulate the traffic in liquors is concurrent in the state and a municipal corporation (the grant of authority to the latter not having been made exclusive), the same unlawful act may constitute a punishable offense both under the state statute and the municipal ordinance, and proceedings may be taken against the offender under either,[21] unless in cases where the general law of the state expressly forbids such a duplication of criminal responsibility,[22] or where the municipal ordinance would be contrary to, or inconsistent with, the general statute.[23] A municipal corporation cannot, however, in the absence of express legislative authority so to do, enact a valid ordinance for the punishment of an offense against the liquor laws which constitutes an offense against a penal statute of the state.[24]

5. Conflict of Ordinance With General Law. No municipality can enact an ordinance, under claim of legislative authority, which would contravene or be inconsistent with the constitution of the state. Thus, if the constitution entirely prohibits the manufacture and sale of intoxicants, a city cannot lawfully license or authorize their sale.[25] Such ordinances must also conform to the constitutional guaranties of due process of law and protection of private rights.[26] Further municipal ordinances on this subject cannot set aside, limit, or enlarge the statute law of the state, unless the power of the municipality to do so can be shown in express terms or by necessary implication, as by the grant to it of exclusive power to regulate the traffic.[27] Where the legislature has conferred on a city power to pass an ordinance for the regulation and sale of intoxicating liquors, and prescribing what shall constitute the penalty for a violation thereof, an ordinance for the regulation of intoxicating liquors, failing to prescribe penalties within the limits fixed by the legislature, is void.[28]

6. Revocation of Grant of Power. The fact that a delegation to municipalities of authority to regulate and prohibit the sale of liquor was made by the permission of a state constitutional provision does not deprive the legislature of power to recall the authority.[29] The adoption of prohibition by constitutional enactment, or by statute, or the passage of a new statute providing a general system for licensing or regulating the traffic in liquors, repeals all inconsistent provisions in municipal charters and the ordinances adopted under them.[30] And where the provisions of a local option law are adopted in a county, a city in said county, previously invested with full and exclusive power to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors, is thereby divested of all authority to make ordinances regulating or legalizing such sale.[31]

IV. Constitutionality of Liquor Laws.

A. Power of States as Limited by Federal Constitution — 1. Fourteenth Amendment. State statutes prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, or submitting the question of their sale to a popular vote under the local option system, or requiring dealers in such liquors to obtain a license for their sale, and vesting officials with a reasonable discretion in the selection of licensees, or imposing an occupation tax upon dealers, and regulating the time and manner of their sales and the conduct of their business, do not violate the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States,[32] since the right to engage in the sale of intoxicating liquors is not one of the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States which the states are thereby forbidden to abridge, nor can such restrictive statutes be said to deprive persons of liberty or property without due process of law, nor, if not entirely arbitrary in their discrimination between persons, do they deprive any one of the equal protection of the laws.[33]

2. Obligation of Contracts.[34] A state statute prohibiting, licensing, or regulating the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors is not obnoxious to the constitutional prohibition against laws impairing the obligation of contracts, although it may injuriously affect the business or the privileges of corporations or others possessing the right, by charter or legislative grant, at the time of its enactment, to manufacture or sell such liquors,[35] or cause the revocation or forfeiture of licenses for such manufacture or sale, previously granted by lawful authority,[36] or operate to prevent the performance of contracts previously made between individuals.[37]

3. Regulation of Commerce. The constitutional provision vesting in congress exclusive power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states operates in some instances as a restriction upon the authority of the several states in enacting laws for the regulation of the traffic in intoxicating liquors.[38]

4. Rights of Citizens of Other States.[39] Under the provisions of the federal constitution that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states," it is held that a state cannot impose, for the privilege of doing business within its limits, a heavier license-tax upon non-residents than is required of its own citizens, and this applies to the traffic in intoxicating liquors.[40] And a state tax which necessarily discriminates in favor of the products and manufactures of the taxing state, and against the introduction and sale of goods produced in other states, is within the constitutional inhibition and void.[41] And so is a statute providing that no action of any kind shall be maintained, either in whole or in part, for intoxicating liquors sold in another state or country, since it assumes to deprive citizens of other states of rights of action to redress injuries to property.[42] But on the other hand a state law requiring dealers in liquor to take out a license is not invalid, as in conflict with this provision of the constitution, although it excludes non-residents from the privilege of obtaining a license, by limiting it to certain classes of its own citizens.[43]

B. Prohibition — 1. By Constitutional Enactment. The adoption of a constitutional provision entirely prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors repeals and annuls all existing laws which permitted such manufacture and sale under licenses or other restrictions.[44] It limits the power of the legislature so that a statute disregarding the constitutional prohibition and enacting a licensing system would be void.[45] But an act prohibiting the sale of liquor under a penalty until the seller has given bonds is not a licensing act,[46] and a statute permitting the sale of liquor for medicinal and mechanical purposes is not repugnant to a constitutional provision forbidding the grant of licenses.[47] Where the constitution prohibits the manufacture and sale of liquors "to be used as a beverage," this does not impliedly license such manufacture and sale for other purposes, and the legislature has power to go beyond the terms of the constitution, and prohibit the traffic for other purposes.[48] In Ohio the constitution provides that "no license to traffic in intoxicating liquors shall hereafter be granted in this state, but the general assembly may by law provide against evils resulting therefrom." It is held that this applies as well to the wholesale as to the retail trade.[49] It does not by implication prevent the enactment of prohibitory legislation.[50] It does prohibit any statute authorizing licenses to be granted; but a law which provides for an assessment or tax on the business of trafficking in intoxicating liquors is not a license law.[51]

2. By Statute. A state statute absolutely prohibiting, within the limits of the state, the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage is a lawful exercise of the police power of the state, and is not open to constitutional objection, either on considerations of natural right or of the specific limitations of state power.[52] Such a statute, although it may deprive persons of the right to pursue a business which was previously lawful, and diminish the value of property devoted to brewing or distilling, cannot be said to deprive them of their liberty or property without due process of law,[53] nor does it, for similar reasons, violate the prohibition against impairing the obligation of contracts,[54] nor that which forbids discrimination against citizens of other states or citizens of the United States.[55] Neither is such a statute, if confined to persons and property fully within the jurisdiction of the state, invalid as a regulation of foreign or interstate commerce,[56] nor for conflict with the United States internal revenue laws, although it prevents persons holding government licenses from continuing in the business for which they were licensed.[57] And such a law, in so far as it prohibits the sale of liquors in existence at the time of its passage, is not an ex post facto law, since, if it lessens the value of such liquors, such civil consequence does not make it retroact criminally in such sense as to bring it within the constitutional prohibition against laws of that character.[58]

C. Local Option — 1. In General. A "local option" law, authorizing the municipal divisions of the state to decide by popular vote whether or not a prohibitive or restrictive liquor law shall be in force in their limits, if it is a complete enactment in itself, requiring nothing further to give it validity, and depending upon the popular vote for nothing but a determinaton of the territorial limits of its operation, is a valid and constitutional exercise of the legislative power.[59]

Keeping liquor in one's possession, not for the purpose of making an illegal sale of it, nor for any other improper purpose, cannot be detrimental to the public in any way, and therefore is not subject to police regulation; and hence a statute which makes it unlawful for any person to "keep in his possession, for another, spirituous liquors" is unconstitutional. unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power to the people, the reference to the voters not being for the purpose of enabling them to make a law, but merely to accept or reject its provisions for their particular locality.[60] But the statute must be complete and perfect when it leaves the legislature; its terms or details cannot be left to the popular vote. It would not be competent for the legislature to leave it to the people to decide what kind of a liquor law they chose to have; only the question whether they will adopt a particular enactment can be referred.[61]

3. UNIFORMITY. Although a general local option law may be adopted in some parts of the state and rejected in others, it is not for that reason lacking in the "uniformity" required by the constitution, provided it was submitted in the same way to all the counties or other divisions of the state; nor does it fall within the inhibition of private, local, or special laws.[62] And in the absence of constitutional restraint, there is no great underlying principle of natural right and justice which forbids the legislature to enact laws for a particular locality different from those applicable to other portions of the state, or which prohibits it from suspending the operation of general laws as to any particular locality, and hence a local option law cannot be declared invalid on any such ground; on the contrary, it is in furtherance of the right of local self-government.[63]

D. Licensing Laws — 1. In General. In the exercise of its power to regulate the traffic in intoxicating liquors, the legislature of a state may lawfully provide a system for the granting of licenses to sell at retail, imposing proper conditions and restrictions upon the granting of such licenses, prescribing the qualifications necessary to secure them, making it a punishable offense to sell without a license, and providing for the forfeiture or revocation of licenses for due cause. Such statutes do not violate the constitutional guaranties securing the just rights of the individual.[64] But there must be no unjust or arbitrary discrimination as to the privileges granted by the license or the amount of the fee payable therefor between individuals of the same class or doing business in the same locality.[65] The amount to be paid as a license-fee rests in the discretion of the legislature. It may be made so high as to operate as an effective restriction on the business,

Classification of towns.— A statute fixing the amount of a license-fee at five hundred dollars a year in cities and towns whose voting population exceeds a certain number, three hundred dollars a year in all other cities and towns, and one hundred dollars a year for hotel or tavern keepers three or more miles distant from any city or town, is a reason-or even so as to be practically prohibitive.[66] And since the licensing of persons to sell liquor is not an exercise of the taxing power of the state to raise revenue, but of the police power, it follows that the fixing of the fees for licenses is not governed by the constitutional provisions regulating taxation, such as those requiring equality and uniformity.[67] It is also competent for the legislature to require that licensed liquor dealers shall furnish bonds.[68] In regard to the revocation or forfeiture of licenses, it is to be observed that such a license is not a contract between the state or municipality and the licensee, in any such sense as to be within the constitutional prohibition against laws impairing the obligation of contracts.[69]

2. Requiring Assent of Neighbors. A statutory provision that a license shall not be granted unless the applicant obtains the recommendation or consent of a certain number of persons residing in his neighborhood, or of a majority or other proportion of the citizens or voters in the ward or district where he proposes to carry on business, is a lawful and proper police regulation, and is not objectionable on constitutional grounds.[70]

3. Discriminating Against Non-Residents. A statute which debars non-residents of the state from procuring a license for the sale of liquors, as by restricting that privilege to citizens of the state or to those who have resided for a certain length of time within its limits, is not obnoxious to those provisions of the federal constitution which secure the rights of citizens of the United States and of the several states.[71] able graduation, and does not, in thus establishing a police regulation of the sale of liquors, discriminate unjustly between licensees. State v. Doherty, 3 Ida. 384, 29 Pac. 855.

Limiting number of licensed saloons.— A statute providing that in cities the number of saloons licensed shall not exceed one for each one thousand of population does not violate Mass. Discouraging employment of women in saloons.— An ordinance providing that the license-fee for keeping a saloon or bar shall be thirty dollars per quarter, but raising it to one hundred and fifty dollars a month in all cases where any woman is employed in the saloon or bar as a bartender, actress, dancer, etc., is not in conflict with a constitutional provision that "no person shall, on account of sex, be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business, vocation, or profession." Ex p. Felchlin, 96 Cal. 360, 31 Pac. 224, 31 Am. 4. Restriction to Particular Classes. A license law is not invalid or unconstitutional because it restricts the right to obtain licenses to such persons as are shown to be of good moral character and of good reputation in the community,[72] or to male citizens,[73] or to persons who have not previously employed women as waitresses in their saloons or bars.[74]

E. Regulation of Sale of Liquor — 1. In General. If the state allows the sale of intoxicating liquors, the legislature has power to regulate the business by such reasonable and proper restrictions and requirements as are necessary to protect the public safety, health, and morals against the evils likely to result from the traffic,[75] provided of course that such regulations do not contravene any provision of the constitution of the state,[76] or conflict with the constitution of the United States.[77]

2. Restrictions Upon Right to Sell — a. As to Particular Places. It is competent for the legislature to provide that a licensed dealer in liquors shall not sell in any other place than that specified in his bond.[78] And a statute prohibiting the sale of liquor in certain specified localities is not to be held unconstitutional merely because its application is limited and not general.[79] So the legislature may prohibit such sales in places where, by reason of the character of the place itself or of the neighborhood, the traffic is likely to be unusually dangerous or detrimental to the morals or good order of the community.[80]

b. As to Quantity Sold. It is competent for the legislature, as a measure of police regulation, to forbid the sale of liquor by the small measure, or in quantities less than a certain minimum.[81]

c. Sales to Particular Persons. The legislature may validly prohibit the sale of intoxicants to those classes of persons who are peculiarly liable to be injured or demoralized by their use, such as minors, habitual drunkards, and persons already under the influence of liquor.[82]

d. Days and Hours For Closing. No constitutional objection can be successfully urged against laws forbidding the sale of liquor on Sundays, election days, and other holidays,[83] or restricting the sale to certain hours of the daytime, or requiring saloons to be closed during the hours of the night.[84]

3. Conduct of Business — a. In General. Persons licensed to sell intoxicants may be subjected to such supervision and control, in the conduct of their business, as will tend to preserve good order, prevent violations of the law, discourage intemperate drinking, and minimize the dangers to the community or the harm to individuals resulting from the traffic in liquors.[85]

b. Inspection. On this principle the courts sustain the validity of laws providing for the official inspection of liquors, and the exaction of a fee for such inspection,[86] and laws subjecting liquor dealers to police surveillance, so far as to give police officers the right and power at all times to enter upon their premises for the purpose of ascertaining the manner in which the business is conducted.[87]

c. Displaying License. It is competent to require that a dealer in intoxicating liquors shall have his license posted and displayed in a conspicuous place on the premises.[88]

d. Screen Law. A law providing that on Sundays, and at other times when liquor saloons are required by law to be kept closed, no screen, curtain, or other obstruction shall be so placed as to prevent a clear view of the interior of the premises is a valid police regulation, and not open to objection on constitutional grounds.[89]

e. Employment of Women in Saloons. It is held to be a reasonable and proper exercise of the power of police regulation to forbid the employment of women in bar-rooms or drinking saloons, as waitresses, dancers, or otherwise.[90]

f. Excluding Women From Wine-Rooms, Etc. On similar principles it is held that a statute or ordinance prohibiting the presence of women, or the serving of liquor to them, in wine-rooms, bars, or saloons, especially if it applies only to the late hours of the evening or night, is a valid and constitutional police regulation.[91]

F. Taxation of Liquor Traffic — 1. In General. As a measure for the regulation or restriction of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, the legislature of a state has constitutional power to impose a tax upon the business of manufacturing or selling such liquors,[92] to enforce the collection of such taxes from the persons upon whom they are assessed, by distress, by the imposition of penalties for delinquency, or by the arrest of the delinquent,[93] and to make it a penal offense for any person to engage in the business without first paying the tax imposed.[94] Such a statute is primarily a regulation of a business deemed noxious or dangerous, and not a revenue law, and hence is to be considered, with reference to constitutional provisions, as a police regulation rather than as a tax law proper.[95]

95. Ex p. Marshall, 64 Ala. 266; State v. Hudson, 78 Mo. 302; Senior v. Ratterman,

From the standpoint of constitutional restrictions or limitations such a law is to be regarded as imposing the tax on the business or occupation of liquor selling, and not on the individuals who may engage in it,[96] or upon their stock in trade or other property,[97] or upon the sales which they make.[98] Further, such a statute is to be distinguished from a licensing law. Although the constitution of the state may prohibit the grant of licenses to sell liquor, this will not prevent the legislature from laying a tax on the business, with the primary object of raising revenue and the secondary object of restricting or discouraging the business.[99]

2. Uniformity. The constitutional requirement of uniformity in taxation does not prevent the classification of occupations; and a statute imposing a tax on the business of liquor selling is not unconstitutional because the state permits other occupations to be pursued without taxation, nor because the liquor dealer is required to pay his tax in advance, while milder terms are imposed upon other vocations which also are taxed.[1] And while it is necessary that all persons pursuing the same occupation in the same way should be taxed alike, it is permissible for the legislature to divide liquor dealers into different classes, and discriminate between them in respect to the amount of taxation imposed, if the classification is based upon proper and reasonable grounds of distinction, such as the difference between manufacturing and retail selling,[2] or as to the character of the liquors dealt in,[3] or with reference to the locality where the business is carried on,[4] or to the relative volume of business done, the tax being graduated according to the amount of sales made by the particular dealer.[5] Similar distinctions may be made

Tax additional to license.— Unless restrained by constitutional provisions, it is competent for the state or a municipal corporation to impose an occupation tax upon liquor dealers in addition to the amount exacted from them for a license. where the tax is imposed directly on the goods dealt in, but not so as to discriminate against the products of other states,[6] nor so as to grant a total exemption to some classes of liquors while others are taxed.[7]

G. Criminal and Penal Statutes — 1. Penalties For Illegal Traffic. It is constitutionally competent for the legislature of a state to provide for the enforcement of its prohibitive or restrictive liquor laws by declaring the punishment of persons illegally engaging in the traffic, or conducting it in an unlawful manner, by fine, imprisonment, or other penalties.[8]

2. Rules of Evidence. Statutes intended to facilitate prosecutions under the liquor laws, by admitting indirect proof, or making given facts presumptive evidence of the essential elements of the crime charged, are not invalid, if they do not infringe the constitutional rights of the accused by depriving him of his right of trial by jury, or of his exemption from being compelled to testify against himself, or of his right to be confronted with the witnesses against him, or otherwise.[9]

Delegation to municipality.— The unlawful retailing of intoxicating liquors, or the keeping of tippling-houses, is an offense the punishment of which may constitutionally be delegated by the legislature to a municipality, as an offense cognizable by it under the police power. Keeping with intent to sell.— Although the mere possession of the instruments of crime is not an overt act punishable at common law, a statute is valid which makes it an offense to keep intoxicating liquors with intent to sell the same in violation of law. State v. Wheeler, 62 Vt. 439, 20 Atl. 601.

Heavier punishment of second offense.— A statute imposing a more severe penalty for a second offense of illegal liquor selling, or keeping liquor contrary to law, is not ex post facto as applied to a case where the second offense was committed after the passage of the law. State v. Woods, 68 Me. 409. But if both the first and second offense preceded the enactment of the law, then it would be unconstitutional, as applied to such a case, for it would aggravate the punishment of a crime already past. In re Ross, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 165.

Forfeiture of license.— The legislature may lawfully provide that conviction of a licensed liquor dealer, for any offense against the laws regulating his business, shall work a forfeiture of his license. Forfeiture of bond.— A provision in a liquor law that a conviction of the licensee for a violation of the law shall work a forfeiture of his bond is not unconstitutional as taking the property of the surety without due process of law, the bond being entered into in view of this provision of the law and therefore including it as a part of its obligation. Welch v. McKane, 55 Conn. 25, 10 Atl. 168.

Lien on property of third person.— A law providing that a judgment for a fine for a violation of the liquor law shall be a lien on the property of a third person used with his consent for the unlawful sale of liquor is not unconstitutional. 9. Delivery as evidence of sale.— A statute that, in prosecutions for illegal sales of liquor, delivery in or from any place other than a dwelling-house shall be prima facie evidence of a sale, is not unconstitutional. Com. v. Rowe, 14 Gray (Mass.) 47; Com. v. Wallace, 7 Gray (Mass.) 222; Com. v. Williams, 6 Gray (Mass.) 1. And so of a statutory provision that, when a delivery is proved, it shall not be necessary to prove payment, but the delivery shall be sufficient evidence of a sale. State v. Hurley, 54 Me. 562; State v. Day, 37 Me. 244.

Notorious character or bad reputation of premises.— It is competent for the legislature to provide by law that it shall not be necessary to prove an actual sale of intoxicating liquors in any tenement, in order to establish the character of such premises as a common nuisance, but that the notorious character or reputation of the premises shall be evidence of that fact. State v. Thomas, 47 Conn. 546, 36 Am. Rep. 98; State v. Waldron, 16 R. I. 191, 14 Atl. 847; State v. Wilson, 15 R. I. 180, 1 Atl. 415.

Drinking on premises.— A statute is valid which enacts that, when a person is seen to drink liquor on the premises of one whose license only permits him to sell for consump-

3. Laws Relating to Pleading. The legislature has power to simplify the forms of indictment or complaint under the liquor laws, by authorizing the omission of such particulars or averments as are not necessary to inform the accused substantially of the nature and cause of the charge against him.[10] But this cannot be carried so far as to deprive him of his right to know of what he is alleged to be guilty and the exact nature of the charges against him.[11]

4. Rule as to Place of Sale. It has been held that a statute providing that the place where a delivery of liquor is made in the state shall be construed to be the place of sale thereof, and that any place to which any person shall ship any liquor for the purpose of delivering the same to a purchaser shall be construed and held to be the place of sale, is not unconstitutional as to shipments within the state.[12]

5. Right of Trial by Jury.[13] A trial by jury is not claimable as of right in prosecutions for petty offenses under the liquor laws, such as violations of municipal ordinances or police regulations restricting or limiting the traffic.[14] Nor is a jury constitutionally necessary in proceedings, as for contempt, for the punishment of a person who has violated an injunction restraining him from selling liquor.[15] And a statute is not unconstitutional which authorizes a magistrate or other inferior court to try offenses against the liquor laws, without a jury, in the first instance, provided it also gives the accused a free and unhampered right of appeal to a court which tries by jury.[16]

6. Measure of Punishment. In prescribing punishments for violations of the liquor laws, the legislature is limited by the constitutional provisions against excessive fines and cruel and unusual punishments.[17]

H. Search and Seizure Laws. Statutes authorizing the issuance of warrants to search for liquors alleged to be illegally kept for sale, and directing their seizure when found, and their forfeiture or destruction when the substance of the offense is established, after notice to and hearing of claimants, are not invalid tion off the premises, it shall be prima facie evidence that the liquor was sold by the occupant with the intent that it should be drunk on the premises. Auburn v. Merchant, 103 N. Y. 143, 8 N. E. 484, 57 Am. Rep. 705.

Illegal keeping open.— The legislature has power to enact that, on a trial for a violation of the liquor laws in keeping open a saloon on Sunday or other prohibited days, it shall be considered prima facie evidence of the guilt of the accused if it is shown that his place was lighted up on such day (Piqua v. Zimmerlin, 35 Ohio St. 507), or that persons were permitted to be and remain in the saloon or bar (State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, 44 N. Forfeiture of liquor.— A statute regulating the transportation of intoxicating liquors, when framed with a due regard to the constitutional protection of persons and property against arbitrary and unreasonable proceedings.[18] And a statute which, without giving the right of search, authorizes the summary seizure of intoxicating liquors, without a warrant, when unlawfully kept or in process of illicit sale or transportation, is valid and constitutional.[19] Further, the provision commonly found in such statutes that if it shall be established, upon hearing, that the liquors seized were illegally kept for sale, or illegally transported, or otherwise as the case may be, the same shall be adjudged forfeited to the use of the state or municipality, or shall be destroyed, is not objectionable on constitutional grounds.[20]

I. Laws For Abatement of Liquor Nuisances. Statutes declaring that all buildings, tenements, or other places used for the illegal sale or keeping of intoxicating liquors shall be deemed common nuisances and treated as such, or abated by due proceedings, are valid and constitutional.[21] And if the corporate powers conferred upon a municipality are broad enough to authorize an ordinance declaring the selling of spirituous liquors a nuisance, and imposing a fine for the offense, such ordinance is valid.[22]

J. Civil Damage Laws. The so-called "civil damage" laws, which provide that certain classes of persons, relatives or personal representatives, upon sustaining injuries from the acts of an intoxicated person, or in consequence of his intoxication, habitual or occasional, shall have a right of action in damages against and providing that a violation of its provisions shall cause a forfeiture of the liquor concerned, does not impose an excessive or unusual punishment. Com. v. Intoxicating Liquors, 172 Mass. 311, 52 N. E. 389.

the person or persons who, by selling or giving him liquor, produced such intoxication, or contributed thereto, have always been sustained by the courts as constitutional enactments.[23]

K. Laws Affecting Property and Contracts. A law restricting or entirely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor cannot be said to take away or destroy any vested right of property, in the constitutional sense; for the right to sell an article is not an essential element in the ownership of it.[24] And although the enactment of such a law may depreciate or destroy the value of property already devoted to the traffic in liquors, such as the plant of a brewery or the fixtures of a saloon, such incidental damage to individuals is not regarded as a valid objection to the constitutionality of the law.[25] It is within the power of the legislature to provide by law that no action of any kind shall be maintained for the recovery of the price of liquors illegally sold, or for the recovery of possession or for the value of liquors kept for sale in violation of law.[26] But it is doubtful whether a statute should be held valid which closes the courts of the state to all actions for the price of liquors sold in another state or country, particularly in its application to cases where the vendor was ignorant of the buyer's intention to make an illegal use of the goods sold, or, if he knew of it, did nothing to further or facilitate its execution.[27]

V. LOCAL OPTION.

A. In General — 1. NATURE AND EXTENT OF OPTION. The enactment of a local option statute does not give the people of any section or division of the state an unrestricted right to determine what kind of liquor law they will have or the limits of its operation; both in respect to the terms of the law and the boundaries of the election districts, the legislative permission must be strictly followed.[28]

2. STATUTORY PROVISIONS. A local option statute is generally framed as a law for the prohibition or severe restriction of the sale of liquor, under penalties, with a provision that the various counties, towns, or other divisions of the state may severally hold elections to determine by popular vote whether they desire the law to be in force in their limits. Such a statute prescribes the precise form of the question or questions to be submitted to the voters,[29] and directs the manner of conducting the election and the proceedings preliminary thereto,[30] and provides that such elections shall not be held oftener than at certain intervals.[31] It is commonly made applicable to the entire state, although particular municipal divisions may be excepted from its operation, in order to save local laws already in force.[32] A constitutional provision requiring the legislature to frame and submit such a statute is not self-executing, and does not repeal existing laws, although it may leave the form of the statute to be enacted to the discretion of the legislature.[33] The right to hold an election on the question of permitting the sale of liquor may also be granted to a municipality by its charter or by a special law, where that is not forbidden by the constitution.[34]

3. LAWS SUBJECT TO ADOPTION. A local option election is not valid, nor its result effective, unless the question to be voted on was submitted to the people in the same form in which it was enacted by the legislature, any material variation being fatal to the proceedings.[35] Thus if the limitation of the prohibition

Consent of or petition by voters.— The laws in force in Iowa embody a modified form of the principle of local option, it being provided that privileges for the sale of liquor may be granted in cities and towns upon the filing of a statement of general consent, signed by a certain proportion of the resident voters, which statement shall be canvassed by the county board of supervisors and its sufficiency determined, and that their finding in the premises shall be effectual for the purposes contemplated, until revoked, and shall be entered of record. under the election is fixed by the law, it cannot be changed by the submission of a different proposition to the vote of the electors.[36]

4. EVIDENCE OF ADOPTION. In some jurisdictions it is held that the courts may take judicial notice of the fact that the local option law has become operative by popular vote in a particular district.[37] Generally, however, the statutes prescribe what shall be competent or sufficient evidence of that fact.[38] It is a general rule that in proceedings under a local option law, such as a prosecution for a violation of it, the fact of the law being in force being duly proved, it is not necessary for the state to present evidence that each of the necessary preliminary steps was taken, or of their regularity, this being presumed from the proof of the general result,[39] although it is open to defendant, in such a case, to impeach the validity

In others it is provided that an order of a court prohibiting the sale of liquor, as the result of an election, shall be prima facie evidence that all the requirements of the law have been complied with, and this, in connection with evidence of the publication of the order, shows the law to be in force in the district. Cantwell v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1905) 85 S. W. 18. The original minutes of the commissioners' court containing the orders going to make a valid local option law are admissible to prove the existence of the law. Holley v. State, 46 Tex. In Texas the order for holding the election is prima facie evidence that all the steps necessary to give validity to such order have been taken. Morton v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. 131, 38 S. W. 1019. But this is not so where the order is invalid on its face, as when it shows that the election was ordered to be held more than thirty days from the date of the order, contrary to law. Curry v. State, 28 Tex. App. 475, 13 S. W. 752. It was formerly held that a person could not be convicted of violating the local option law unless the state proved that the required petition was first filed, and also that the result of the election was promulgated, the order of court for holding the election and that announcing the result being insufficient to show the adoption of the law. Henry v. State, (Tex. App. 1891) 16 S. W. 342; Carnes v. State, 23 Tex. App. 449, 5 S. W. 133; McMillan v. State, 18 Tex. App. 375. But it is now provided by statute that an order of court prohibiting the sale of liquor as the result of an election shall be prima facie evidence that all provisions of the law have been complied with. So that, at least in regard to the giving of the required notice, and the due conduct and holding of the election, a pre-

of the law by a successful attack upon any of the proceedings which were essential prerequisites to the due putting of the law in force.[40]

5. Operation and Effect of Adoption — a. In General. Where an election on the question of local option results in favor of its adoption, the effect is to put the prohibitive or restrictive liquor law into active operation in the district or territory affected,[41] so that thereafter any sale of liquor made within the district, save in accordance with such exceptions as may be set forth in the act, becomes a punishable offense.[42]

b. Effect on Existing Licenses or Privileges. The adoption of prohibition in any district or municipality, under the local option law, will revoke and annul any existing and unexpired licenses or privileges for the sale of liquor, so that a license or permission granted before the adoption of the law will be no protection to one who makes a sale after it.[43] If the law contains an express saving of vested rights, this will embrace previously acquired rights to sell by virtue of licenses already taken out and paid for, but will give no right either to obtain a new license or to sell without a license.[44]

c. Effect on Prior Liquor Laws. A local option law, when duly adopted and put in force in any given district, constitutes the exclusive system for the regula-sumptive case is made out by showing the order of its court and its promulgation. Tex. Rev. Civ. St. (1895) art. 3390. And see Nelson v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1902) 75 S. W. 502; Davidson v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. 586, 73 S. W. 808; Sebastian v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. 508, 72 S. W. 849; Ex p. Schilling, 38 Tex. Cr. 287, 42 S. W. 553; Shields v. State, 38 Tex. Distillers' privilege.— A special privilege given to distillers of spirits by a previous statute, allowing them to sell their own products in quantities of not less than a quart, is revoked and annulled by the adoption of the local option law, which, when put in force in any district, exclusively governs the sale of liquors therein. Com. v. Jarrell, 5 S. W. 763, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 572.

Home-made wines.— The adoption of the local option law revokes and repeals a special privilege previously given to persons making wines from grapes or berries of their own cultivation. Boldt v. State, 60 Ark. 600, 31 S. W. 460.

License suspended.— In New York it is held that a privilege to traffic in intoxicating liquors, where the business was lawfully being carried on at the time of an election under the local option law, is suspended, but not destroyed, by a vote cast in favor of prohibition, and that the privilege will be revived when the vote is reversed at another election, unless the owner thereof has by some act shown his intention to abandon the liquor traffic at that place. tion of liquor selling in that locality, and has the effect to repeal, or at least to suspend during its continuance, all previous laws and provisions of laws which are inconsistent with its terms.[45] Thus if the licensing system was in force at the time of the adoption of local option no person thereafter has a right to obtain a license, and all authority previously existing in corporate bodies or boards of officers to grant licenses is taken away.[46] The penal clauses of prior laws are also suspended or abrogated; and hence no act in relation to intoxicating liquors, done after the adoption of the local option law, can be held a violation of any prior statute; if punishable at all, it must be punished as an offense against the local option law.[47] But if the law provides that it shall not affect localities in which the sale of liquor is already prohibited by law, it saves from repeal or suspension any prohibitory statutes in force in those places.[48] Where the law

Suspension or repeal.— Where the local option law does not expressly repeal former liquor laws, and where it permits the holding of another election, after an interval of time, which may result in reversing the former vote, the doctrine is that its adoption does not annul or abrogate former laws, but merely suspends their operation, so that if thereafter local option ceases to be operative in the given locality, the former statutes will resume their vitality and force, without being reënacted. Offenses committed before local option.— Where persons, before the adoption of the local option law, had committed acts which would be punishable as offenses under the previously existing statutes, it is held that the coming into force of the local option law will exempt them from prosecution and punishment. contains exceptions in favor of certain classes of persons, such as druggists, their rights and responsibilities remain as under the existing statutes, unaffected by the adoption of the local option law.[49] If the election results in favor of licensing, it has no effect on any prior law; the general liquor law of the state is not abrogated by the mere holding of such election.[50]

d. Time of Taking Effect. The statute may provide that the local option law shall go into effect immediately upon an election being held and resulting in a majority in its favor,[51] or, as is more commonly the case, after due promulgation or publication of the result of the election, in which event a due and sufficient publication is a condition precedent to the taking effect of the law.[52] It is also competent for the local authorities to decide that the law shall take effect, as to their district, at some future time, if authority for such a course can be found in the statute.[53]

e. Territory Affected. Where a local option election is held in one of the larger divisions of the state, such as a county or a parish in Louisiana, the result is binding in all the smaller divisions included within its limits, such as cities or towns. Hence if the vote in the county as a whole results in favor of adopting the law, prohibition must be enforced in the cities and towns, although their votes, if separately considered, would show a majority against it.[54] But the converse of this rule is not everywhere accepted, and it has been held that where local option is in force in the lesser division, by virtue of an election held there, a subsequent election, held for the entire county, resulting against prohibition, will not repeal the law in effect in the smaller district.[55] Where the boundaries of an election district are unsettled or so uncertain that the limits of the territory supposed to be included cannot be ascertained, the election in such district is invalid and has no effect on the law.[56]

6. Effect of Change of Boundary. Where a local option law is in force in an entire district, and a portion of the district is cut off and joined to other territory under a new name, the law still remains operative through the part not thus severed.[57] And also, where a new district is carved out of one where prohibition is in force, the same law will continue in force in the new district.[58]

7. Effect of Rejection. If the election results in the rejection of the local option law, the previously existing statutes, regulating the sale of liquor, remain in full force and effect without being affected by the mere fact of the election.[59]

B. Submission of Question to Popular Vote — 1. Authority in General. The statutes on the subject generally provide that, upon the performance of certain preliminary conditions, usually including the filing of a sufficient petition, an order for a local option election shall be made by a designated authority, commonly a local court, but in some states the county commissioners or board of supervisors.[60] As a rule this authority has no discretion in the matter, beyond a determination of the legal sufficiency of the petition; but there is no constitutional objection to a statute which makes it the duty of such authority to decide whether the circumstances have arisen which require an election to be held.[61]

2. Application For Election — a. Necessity For Application. The application or petition for an election required by a local option law is a jurisdictional prerequisite; without such a petition, sufficient in respect to form and signatures, the authorities have no power to order an election and none can be legally held.[62]

b. Filing Application. Where the statute requires the application for an election to be filed with the town clerk, the county officers, or some other desig-

Premature petition.— A statutory provision that a second election on the question of local option shall not be held in less than two years from the first election does not prevent the voters from preparing a petition and presenting it to the proper authorities, within the two years, or the making of an order for the election, provided it is not to take place until the proper time. Keefer v. Hillsdale County, 109 Mich. 645, 67 N. W. 981.

Withdrawing petition.— After a petition for a local option election has been presented and an election ordered, the petition cannot be withdrawn and then presented again, so as to justify another order appointing a different day for the election. State v. Webb, 49 Mo. App. 407.

In Texas the statute expressly confers authority upon the commissioners' court to order a local option election, on their own motion and without a petition, whenever they deem it expedient; hence if a petition was filed, but was insufficient in substance, or lacked the requisite number of signatures, it may be disregarded as immaterial, and the order for the election will be presumed to have been made in the exercise of the court's discretion. Williams v. Davidson, (Civ. App.

nated authority, and especially where it provides that this must be done a certain number of days before the election, or before the making of an order therefor, the due filing of the application is a condition precedent to the holding of a valid election.[63]

c. Signers of Application. When the statutes prescribe that the petition shall be signed by a certain number of persons, or by a given percentage of the voters of the district, its sufficiency in respect to signatures is essential to the validity of the election, and it is generally held that compliance with the law in this particular must appear affirmatively in the proceedings.[64] The provisions of the statute are mandatory in respect to the qualifications of the persons signing the petition,[65] and their number, whether it be a fixed number or a certain percentage of the qualified voters.[66]

d. Form and Contents. If the statute prescribes the form of the petition, or what statements it shall contain, it must be exactly followed in all essential par-

Sufficiency of the petition in this particular is to be judged and determined by the authorities charged with the duty of making the order for the election. Ferguson v. Monroe County, 71 Miss. 524, 14 So. 81.

The petition may be impeached for insufficiency in the signatures, by one interested in avoiding the election; but if it is regular and sufficient on its face, he must assume the burden of proving that it was not actually signed by a sufficient number of duly qualified persons. Ex p. Douthitt, (Tex. Several petitions.— The names need not all be signed to the same petition. Two or more petitions, identical in terms, and together signed by the requisite number or percentage of voters, will answer the purpose of the statute, although neither one of them alone has the requisite number of signatures. Women signing.— Where the law requires the petition to be signed by a majority of the "adult residents" of the county, it is held that this includes women as well as men, and adult females may sign it, although they are not voters. Blackwell v. State, 36 Ark. 178.

Officers signing.— Officers, or members of an official board, whose duty it will be to order the election upon a proper petition being presented, may themselves sign the petition and canvass for other signers, and are not thereby disqualified from acting on it. ticulars.[67] But if the law does not prescribe the requisites of such a petition, it is sufficient if it expresses in an intelligible manner the desire of the petitioners that a local option election be held.[68] An election will not be invalidated by trifling errors or omissions in the petition or by unimportant irregularities.[69]

e. Proceedings on Application. The directions of the statute as to the proceedings to be taken upon a petition, when it is duly filed, such as the requirement that it shall be entered upon the records, or that the authorities charged with the determination of its sufficiency shall make a record of their finding, are mandatory and disregard of them will invalidate the election.[70] And the same is true of statutory directions to govern the officials in their examination of the petition or in finding and declaring the result.[71]

f. Review of Proceedings. In Michigan the finding and determination of the board of supervisors as to the sufficiency of the petition for a local option election, and as to the requisite number of electors having signed the same, is final and conclusive and not subject to review.[72] But in other jurisdictions it has been held that the decision of the board of officers charged with this preliminary determination may be reviewed, at the instance of parties who have a proper standing for that purpose, either on appeal[73] or certiorari.[74]

3. Order For Election — a. Authority and Duty to Make Order. The power to make the order for a local option election must be exercised by the person or board to whom it is confided, and cannot be delegated; but the mere fact that the order recites that it was made by the court, while the statute confers the authority on the judge, is not enough to avoid the election, where the order is signed by the judge.[75] If the statute requires the order for election to be issued at the term of court next succeeding the filing of the petition, this is imperative, and an election held under an order issued at any other term of court is void.[76] But where the local authorities have power to order an election without any petition, their order so made is conclusive and unimpeachable.[77]

b. Form and Contents of Order.[78] The order for holding a local option election should show the facts essential to jurisdiction, at least so far as concerns the existence and sufficiency of the petition on which it is based,[79] and should set forth the question or proposition to be submitted to the voters, in such exact accordance with the statute that no false or misleading issue may be presented to them.[80] It should designate with precision the district or division in and for which the election is to be held,[81] and should be directed to the officers authorized by law to hold the election.[82] It should also direct the proper officer to post notices of the election, unless this duty is already imposed upon him by the statute.[83]

c. Signing and Recording Order. The statutes commonly require that the order for election shall be duly signed by the court or officers making it and entered of record, and compliance with such provisions is essential to its validity.[84]

4. Notice of Election — a. Necessity For Notice. Local option statutes commonly provide that notices of the election shall be posted by the sheriff or other proper officer at certain places throughout the district, or published in certain newspapers, within a prescribed period preceding the election.[85] And where such statutory notices are not given the election should be set aside,[86] unless it fairly appears that no injury arose from the failure to give them.[87] It has been held that, although the law may have been partially complied with, yet if a less number of notices were posted than the statute expressly requires it is fatal defect.[88]

78. Interlineations.— The order is not invalidated by an interlineation made for the purpose of supplying an omission, where the minutes were approved by the commissioners with knowledge on their part that the order had been so completed. Bruce v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. 53, 35 S. W. 683.

b. Form and Contents of Notice. The notice of a local option election should designate, with reasonable certainty, the question or proposition to be voted on,[89] the district or territory to be affected,[90] and the time and place of holding the election,[91] and should bear the signatures of the court or officers ordering the election.[92] But it need not recite preliminary jurisdictional facts, if they have already been judicially found and determined.[93]

c. Posting or Publication of Notice. The statutory requirement for the posting of notices of the election is not duly observed unless the whole number of notices required are actually posted, by the proper authority, in the designated places, for the requisite number of days before the day fixed for holding the election.[94] Where the statute directs the giving of notice by publication in a newspaper, its directions as to the number of insertions and the length of time the publication must continue are mandatory, and their due observance is essential to the validity of the election.[95] It is also necessary that the newspaper in which the publication is made should have been selected by the proper authority.[96]

d. Proof of Notice. After an election has been held and the result declared, the courts will presume that the notices were duly posted for the required length of time;[97] but evidence is admissible to prove the contrary, for the purpose of invalidating the election.[98] And if the statute does not make any provision for recording the notice, a record entry of the notice is incompetent and immaterial to prove the publication of such notice.[99]

Destruction of notice.— The fact that the notices or some of them, after having been properly posted, were torn down or blown away would not affect the validity of the election. Nelson v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1902) 75 S. W. 502; Bowman v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. 14, 40 S. W. 796, 41 S. W. 635.

void if held on any other day.[1] So if the law requires the election to take place within a designated number of days after the reception of the petition or after the date of the order an election held prematurely or after the prescribed time has expired, although regular in all other respects, is entirely invalid.[2] And the same result follows the disregard of a statutory provision that the local option election shall not be held within sixty days of any municipal or state election in the same city.[3] But a provision of the general election law of the state, requiring special elections to be held on Tuesday, does not apply to an election under the local option law.[4]

b. Conduct of Election. The formality and regularity of a local option election are to be tested by the terms of the statute under which it is held,[5] and by the general principles of the law relating to elections, where applicable.[6] There must be a strict compliance with any special provisions of the local option statute in regard to the officers who are to hold the election and their duties,[7] the hours for keeping the polls open,[8] the nature and scope of the question submitted to the voters,[9] the form of the ballots to be used,[10] the majority required to deter-

In Kentucky the law provides that, upon proper petition, a local option election may be held at the next regular state, town, city, or county election. And it is held that an election, under this provision, to take the vote of a city on the question of local option, held by the sheriff or coroner at a state election, is unauthorized and void, the act intending that, in a city or town, the vote shall be taken at a city or town election, under the control of those directly interested in municipal elections. mine the result,[11] and the qualifications of the voters.[12] But minor irregularities, not violating mandatory provisions of the statute, will not vitiate the election, unless it is shown that they changed the result.[13]

c. Contesting Election. The local option statutes commonly provide a method of contesting the declared result of an election held thereunder,[14] and make specific provisions as to the courts or boards which shall have jurisdiction of such proceedings,[15] the parties who may institute and defend such a contest,[16] and the grounds on which a contest may be made.[17] It has been held that the method of contesting the election, prescribed by the statute, is the exclusive remedy, so that an action at law will not lie, under the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts, to have the election declared void.[18] But in any case, where the contest is based on a claim that votes were illegally received or illegally excluded, the election will not be avoided unless it is shown, upon specific allegations and by an enumeration of the voters and votes, that the result would have been different but for the frands or irregularities of which complaint is made.[19]

d. Collateral Impeachment of Election. The validity of an election held under the local option law is not open to impeachment or attack in collateral proceedings,[20] such as an application for the grant of a license to sell liquor,[21] or a proceeding to revoke or cancel a license,[22] nor on a bill in equity to restrain the authorities from declaring the local option law to have been adopted at the election, or from putting it into force, on the ground that the complainant, a licensed dealer, would be injured in his business by the enforcement of local option.[23] In some states also it is held that a defendant, prosecuted for violating the local option law, cannot set up a defense attacking the validity of the election adopting the law;[24] but in others, such a defense is permissible, although the election is presumed to have been regular and valid, and the party attacking it must assume the burden of proof.[25]

6. Determination and Declaration of Result — a. Canvassing Votes. It is essential to the validity of an election under the local option law that there should be at least a substantial compliance with the statutory directions as to canvassing the votes and as to the officers who are to perform that duty.[26] But the election is not vitiated by minor irregularities, such as the fact that an officer who had no right to take part in the canvass of votes was present at it and signed the statement in regard to it, where he did not actually participate in the counting of the votes.[27] And it is held that a canvassing board cannot be ordered to reconvene and recanvass the votes cast at the election, and reject for irregularities the returns from certain districts, unless they were wholly void.[28]

b. Majority Required. A tie vote, at a local option election, will not cause a change of the existing law;[29] that can be accomplished only by a majority vote,[30] after excluding ballots too informal or irregular to be counted.[31] Whether the majority required is a majority of the registered voters of the county or township, or a majority of those actually voting at the election, will depend upon the language of the statute.[32]

c. Certifying and Recording Result. Local option statutes commonly provide that a certified statement of the result of the election, prepared by the officers charged with the conduct of the election, or by the canvassing board, shall be filed in the local court, or with the officers having charge of the grant of licenses.[33]

The requirement of the statutes that the result of the election shall be recorded is imperative as to the fact of recording, but directory merely as to the time of making the record, the only essential being that the record shall have been made before proceedings are taken under the law.[34]

d. Order Declaring Result. Where the statute requires the local court to make and promulgate an order declaring the result of a local option election and putting the law in force if adopted by the voters, an order duly made in conformity thereto is presumptive evidence of the regularity and legality of the election and that the law was duly adopted and is in force.[35] It need not be in the precise words and form prescribed by the statute, a substantial compliance being sufficient,[36] and it is not vitiated by mere clerical errors, not affecting its substance,[37] nor by failure of the court to make the order at the precise time indicated.[38]

7. Publication of Result — a. Necessity For Publication. If the local option law makes no provision as to how the result of the election shall be announced, a verbal proclamation by the clerk at the court-house door will be sufficient.[39] But as a rule it is required that the result shall be published in all the newspapers in the district, or in certain designated papers; and such publication is a condition precedent to the taking effect of the law.[40] Under a statute requiring the result

Form and contents of order.— The order, putting prohibition into force, need not specifically mention the exceptional cases in which the law allows liquors to be sold (as, for sacramental and medicinal purposes), for the law ingrafts these exceptions on the order; and if it declares that the sale of liquor is prohibited "absolutely," the last word may be treated as surplusage. of the election to be publicly announced by one of the judges at the close of the polls, it will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the result was duly declared in conformity with the law.[41]

b. Sufficiency of Publication. Where the law requires the notice to be published in all the newspapers of the county, a notice which is not published in all of them is ineffectual; but where the proper notice is published as soon as the invalidity of the former has been determined, the law will take effect after such second publication.[42] Where the statute requires the publication to be made in a paper to be designated by the local authorities, this provision must be strictly observed.[43] And where it is provided that the publication shall be had for four successive weeks, the law intends that the notice shall be published for four full consecutive weeks, or twenty-eight days, from the day of its first publication.[44] Where the direction of the statute is that the municipal body ordering the election shall publish the result, a notice signed by the mayor of a city, in compliance with an ordinance, will be sufficient.[45]

c. Proof of Publication. Where the statute requires the local judge to make a certificate of the fact of publication of the notice, and to enter the same on the minutes or records of the court, such entry is prima facie proof that the publication was duly made in compliance with the law.[46] But where the statute does not provide for the manner in which the publication shall be proved, oral testimony of the publisher of the paper in which the notice was printed is competent and sufficient.[47]

C. Repeal of Local Option — 1. By Subsequent Statute. A local option law, in force throughout the state or in certain districts only, is repealed and annulled by a subsequent general statute enacting a different system for the regulation of liquor selling,[48] or, as to a municipality, by the grant of a new charter authorizing the issue of licenses,[49] except in so far as the provisions of the new law may be consistent with the continued operation of the local option law,[50] or unless the new statute saves to the people of districts where local option is in force the right to vote on its continuance or repeal.[51]

52. A constitutional provision directing the legislature to enact a local option law to be voted on "from time to time" by the people of counties, towns, cities, and certain

after a certain interval of time, an election held before the expiration of that period is inoperative and void.[53] Moreover the requirement that the new election shall be called for by a petition of the electors of the district, signed as directed by the statute, is jurisdictional.[54] As to the form of question submitted at the new election, it is considered that a vote taken on the question whether liquor shall be sold in the district sufficiently complies with the statutory direction for taking a vote on the question whether or not the prohibitory liquor law "shall become inoperative."[55] Where the prohibitory law has been put in force in an entire county or other division of the state, it is generally held that a city or town therein cannot hold a separate election to repeal the law as to itself; that is, the election to repeal the law cannot be called for a territory forming only a part of that for which the first election was held.[56]

3. Operation and Effect of Repeal. The effect of a second election, resulting in favor of allowing the sale of liquors within the district affected, is to abrogate, or at least suspend, the prohibitory law therein, and renew the force of such laws as were effective upon the subject before the adoption of local option.[57] But the rejection of the local option proposition, by a vote of the people, at a second election, is not considered to be technically such a "repeal" of the prohibitory law as will save previous offenders from punishment. Hence one who has committed a criminal offense under the prohibitory law, while it was in force, may be indicted and punished therefor after the new election which results in its rejection.[58]

VI. LICENSES AND TAXES.

A. Nature and Effect of License — 1. Definition of License.[59] A liquor license is a formal grant of permission or authority from the government or a state or municipality acting through its appointed agents to a selected individual, to engage in the sale, or manufacture for sale, of intoxicating liquors, that right other named municipal subdivisions, and guaranteeing to voters, should they adopt local option, the right to hold another election after the expiration of a certain time, constrains the legislature to preserve the autonomy of the localities named, in order that the right to vote again upon the question may be conserved. Ex p. Wells, (Tex. being at the same time denied to the general public, and which exempts him from responsibility for certain acts incident to the business which, if done by unlicensed persons, are criminal offenses.[60]

2. Power and Authority to Grant Licenses — a. Statutory Authority in General. If there were no statutes prohibiting or restricting the sale of liquors, no license would be required, for any person might lawfully engage in the business; but on the other hand, where such statutes exist, licenses cannot be granted except on the authority of some statute, valid and operative in the particular community.[61] The enactment of a general license law, if intended to regulate the entire subject of the traffic in liquors, will by necessary implication repeal previously existing laws prohibiting such traffic,[62] and may repeal prohibitory laws locally in force in particular communities or parts of the state, and authorize them to grant licenses, if clearly so intended or specially made applicable to them,[63] although otherwise the rule should be applied that a general law cannot by implication repeal a local statute.[64]

b. Municipal Ordinances. The power and authority to grant licenses for the sale of liquors may be confided by the legislature to the several municipal corporations of the state.[65] And the enactment of an ordinance providing for the grant of licenses is a legislative function not a judicial act.[66] But authority thus delegated to the municipalities is a dormant power, and affords no authority to issue licenses until it is called into life and put into operation by appropriate legislation by the municipal authorities.[67] The power to enact a licensing ordinance includes the power to make reasonable and proper regulations, and to impose reasonable conditions as to the localities or parts of the municipality where saloons may be established,[68] or as to the necessity of obtaining the consent of adjoining property-owners;[69] to fix the amount of the fee or tax to be paid, provided it is not so unreasonably high as to be prohibitive,[70] and to prescribe penalties for sales by unlicensed dealers.[71] But the ordinance must be a complete and certain enactment,[72] not in excess of the powers specifically granted to the municipality by the statute,[73] and not in conflict with the general laws of the state,[74] although an ordinance which contains invalid provisions is not to be accounted wholly void, if enough remains, after eliminating the invalid portions, to constitute a complete and effectual enactment.[75]

60. "Three leading ideas are involved in the definition of a license under the liquor laws. First, it confers a special privilege or franchise, upon selected persons, to pursue a calling not open to all. Second, it legalizes acts which, if done without its protection, would be offenses against the statute. Third, it is a privilege granted as part of a system of police regulation, and herein is distinguishable from taxation." Black Intox. Liq. § 117.

c. Boards or Officers Authorized. The authority and duty to grant liquor licenses, whether on behalf of the state or of a municipality, is intrusted by law to certain designated officers or boards of officers.[76] And it is a general rule that whatever court, officer, or board is invested with this power by the statute possesses it to the exclusion of all others,[77] and must exercise the authority personally, not being permitted in any circumstances to delegate it to any others.[78] Further the authority to grant licenses conferred by statute upon one board or officer may divest another of similar authority formerly possessed by him.[79] When the licensing authority consists of a board of officers, any statutory directions as to the majority required for the grant of a license, or as to the number of concurring votes, must be strictly observed.[80] A license issued by de facto officers is a sufficient protection to a person doing business under it.[81] In any case, however, the officer or board cannot exercise authority in regard to the grant of licenses without a statute or ordinance giving him the right to issue such licenses and prescribing the essential elements of the procedure to be followed,[82] or exceed the terms of the statute or ordinance in respect to the kinds of licenses to be issued,[83] although it is proper and permissible to invest him with a measure of discretion in passing upon applications for license, not amounting to an arbitrary power to grant or refuse.[84]

d. Repeal of License Laws. The repeal of a licensing statute, either directly or by implication from the enactment of an entirely different system for the regulation of the liquor traffic, takes away from all persons the right to apply for and obtain licenses, and from all municipal and other authorities the right to grant them.[85] And in this way particular municipalities may be deprived of the authority to issue licenses, previously granted to them by their charters or by special statutes.[86] But this is not the case where the new statute is intended only as a modification of the existing law, as by imposing additional restrictions or conditions,[87] or where the absence of any necessary incongruity between the two acts, or the effect of exceptions or saving clauses, may leave the power of granting licenses untouched as to a particular municipal corporation,[88] or as to particular classes of dealers or kinds of sales.[89]

3. Form and Validity of License — a. Formal Requisites — (I) In General. A license for the sale of intoxicating liquor must be in writing and signed by the officer or officers having authority to grant it.[90]

(II) Recitals. The license should recite such facts as will show with reasonable certainty the name of the licensee, the place of sale, the class of license, the kind of liquor permitted to be sold, and the authority granting it, together with any special recitals directed by the statute to be incorporated.[91]

(III) Designation of Place of Sale. Usually a license must designate the place where the licensed business is to be carried on, including, in some states, not only the street or part of a city where the licensee proposes to establish himself, but identifying the particular house,[92] and sometimes even the particular room or rooms in the house.[93]

b. Not Created by Parol or Implication. The law intending that licenses shall be in writing, a verbal permission, even from the officer authorized to grant licenses, and upon performance of all the requisite conditions, is not equivalent to a license.[94] Nor can any license be created, or the necessity of obtaining it be dispensed with, by mere inference or implication from the statute.[95]

Estoppel to dispute validity.— City authorities who have granted a liquor license, received the fee, approved the bond, and at-prosecution by a license which is void on its face, as from an evident want of authority to issue it,[97] or where it is affirmatively shown to have been issued without compliance with the statutory requisites.[98] But a license is not invalidated by mere irregularities in the proceedings leading to its issue,[99] nor, it seems, by fraud, unless practised by the party to whom it is issued.[1]

d. Collateral Attack on License. A license which appears on its face to have been regularly and duly issued cannot be impeached collaterally, as, in an action on the bond, or a prosecution for illegal selling, on the ground that it was improperly granted. So long as it remains unrevoked and not appealed from, it must be regarded as a valid license.[2]

4. Nature of Rights Conferred by License. A license for the sale of liquor is not a contract between the state or municipality granting it and the person to whom it is issued, in any such sense as to be within the protection of constitutional guaranties.[3] It gives no vested rights, such as cannot be abridged or abrogated by the legislative authority in the interests of the public,[4] nor is it in itself property or a right of property, in the ordinary meaning of those terms.[5] Hence a tempted to revoke the license are estopped from setting up informalities in its issue. Oshkosh v. State, 59 Wis. 425, 18 N. W. 324.

license is not capable of being the subject of a chattel mortgage,[6] nor can it be attached or levied on and sold under execution.[7] It is not assignable, unless by statute, and with the consent of the licensing authorities,[8] and does not pass to the executor or administrator of a deceased licensee as assets of his estate;[9] but if a license has an actual commercial value, and can be sold, the purchaser taking the chances of obtaining the consent of the proper authorities to its transfer, it may constitute an asset of the licensee's estate in bankruptcy.[10] It is in effect a mere permit, affording protection to the holder against legal animadversion for acts which without its sanction would be illegal and punishable,[11] and all its privileges, although yet unexpired, are canceled and revoked by the repeal of the law which authorized its grant.[12]

5. RETROACTIVE EFFECT OF LICENSE. A license takes effect from the day of its issue; it does not relate back to the date of the petition, or of the order granting permission to obtain it, or to the date when the statutory conditions were complied with, so as to condone offenses against the statute prior to its actual issue.[13] And a license cannot be antedated so as to cover offenses already committed.[14]

Liquor-tax certificates in New York.— Under the present statutes in New York a liquor-tax certificate differs materially from a license granted under the former laws. It is not regarded as a mere permit or privilege, but is a contract with the state, and is recognized as a species of property. It is consequently protected by the general rules of law relating to property and property rights, and those rules may be invoked in any proceeding for the forfeiture or revocation of the rights which the certificate confers. In re Lyman, 160 N. Y. 96, 54 N. E. 577; Matter of Cullinan, 82 N. Y. App. Div. 445, 81 N. Y. Suppl. 567; Hilliard v. Giese, 25 N. Y. App. Div. 222, 49 N. Y. Suppl. 286; Frank v. Forgotston, 30 Misc. 816, 61 N. Y. But since the certificate is only made property by virtue of the statute, its character as property is subject to all the provisions attached to it in its creation, including the provisions of the act for the revocation and cancellation of such certificates without a jury trial; and the constitutional prohibition against the taking of property without due process of law does not apply. Release of penalties.— Where the penalty for illegal sales consists in a fine to be paid to the municipality, it is held that antedating a license will operate as a release of such penalties incurred before its actual issue. Charleston v. Corleis, 2 Bailey (S. C.) 186. But this rule does not apply where an action for the recovery of the any valid law; they are such only as can be exercised in conformity with, and in subordination to, the laws already in force. Hence the license is always impliedly subject to such statutes, ordinances, and police regulations as are lawfully in existence at the time it is granted, without words in the license expressly referring to such laws.[15] Thus it will not protect the licensee in selling to prohibited persons, such as minors and drunkards,[16] or at prohibited times,[17] or in prohibited places.[18]

b. Effect of Subsequent Laws. A licensee takes his permit subject to the contingency that there may be changes in the laws, adopted in the exercise of the police power, which will render his privilege less valuable or his responsibilities greater; and the fact of his holding a valid license, or of his having paid money for it, does not exempt him from the operation of statutes or ordinances subsequently passed imposing additional burdens upon licensed dealers, or subjecting their business to new restrictions or limitations.[19]

c. Restriction as to Place of Sale. The privileges conferred by a liquor license are restricted to the particular place designated in the license.[20] When that place is a house or building particularly described, the license may cover all parts of such house or building, so as to justify sales made in any of its rooms or apartments, or in several parts of it concurrently;[21] but this is not true as to

d. As to Character or Quantity of Sales. A license to sell liquor for certain purposes therein specified, or in certain quantities, or restricted to certain kinds of liquor, cannot protect the licensee from prosecution for violating the laws of the state by sales made in excess of the permission which it grants, or contrary to its terms.[23]

e. Conditions Imposed on Licensee. The legislature of a state has full power to impose such conditions upon those licensed to sell liquor as may be deemed proper and requisite for the good of the community.[24] Such are the restrictions as to the persons to whom sales may be made, the days and hours for closing, the requirement that the license shall be conspicuously displayed in the saloon,[25] and the "screen law."[26] But the licensing authorities have no power to insert in a license any restriction, limitation, or condition which would be repugnant to the existing statutes, or in excess of the conditions which they impose.[27]

force is usually fixed by the statute, either at one year from its date or until the end of the current excise year.[28] Whatever be the term fixed by the statute, the local authorities have no power to grant a license for any other period, whether shorter or longer.[29] A licensee who sells or offers to sell after his license expires, and without procuring its renewal, is liable to prosecution.[30] But where a statute repealing or changing the license laws contains a saving of the rights of existing licensees, they will be permitted to continue their traffic until the expiration of the period for which their licenses were granted.[31]

8. PERSONS PROTECTED BY LICENSE — a. Principal and Agent. A licensed vendor of intoxicating liquors may employ an agent to carry on his business, and the agent will be under the protection of the license.[32] But where it is apparent that a pretended appointment of a person as a liquor seller's agent was in reality intended as a sale or transfer of the privilege granted by the license, it will be ineffectual, and the license will afford the pretended agent no protection.[33] And the removal of the licensee from the state, whereby he loses the required qualification of residence, will forfeit his rights under the license, so that he cannot thereafter continue the business by means of an agent.[34]

b. Servants. One who acts as the servant of a licensed dealer, in the sale of liquors, is not required to take out a license in his own name; the master's license protects the servant, provided he keeps within the law and makes no unlawful sales.[35]

c. Partners. A license granted to an individual, who is then a member of a firm, or who afterward associates a partner with him in the business, will confer

B. Subjects of License or Tax — 1. In General. As a general rule all persons who engage in the business of selling intoxicating liquors, or who make such selling a part of their business, or who follow a business which customarily includes such selling, must procure a license.[38] But only such persons and places can be made subject to the license laws as are within the rightful control and local jurisdiction of the licensing authorities.[39]

As a general rule, under the laws obtaining in most of the states, a manufacturer of liquors cannot engage in the retail trade, even though he sells only his own products, without taking out a license as a retailer.[40] But exceptions are sometimes made in favor of those who sell directly at the place of manufacture,[41] or who make the goods from the products of their own farms.[42]

b. Wholesalers. The statutes generally make a distinction between wholesale and retail licenses, in respect to the qualifications of the applicant, the amount of the fee required, and other particulars.[43] But if the statute prohibits the sale of

Who are wholesalers.— Properly speaking the distinction between wholesale and retail trade should be made to depend not liquor in any quantity without a license, or taxes the business of trafficking in liquors, wholesale dealers are subject to it equally with retail dealers.[44]

c. Brokers and Agents. A broker in liquors, who negotiates sales of liquor between other persons, or who solicits and forwards orders to a jobber or manufacturer, but who neither buys nor owns the liquors so sold, is not subject to the license laws nor to a statute taxing persons trafficking in liquors.[45] And a foreign brewer or distiller is not required to be licensed when he sells directly, or through a resident broker or agent, to customers within the state,[46] unless he maintains a depot or storehouse within the state, from which deliveries are made and where bills are collected.[47]

d. Physicians and Druggists. It is a general rule that druggists are not permitted, unless regularly licensed, to sell intoxicating liquors except distinctly in the character of medicines, or mixed with other ingredients and intended for medicinal use.[48] And the same rule applies to physicians.[49]

e. Public Agents. Public officers appointed to conduct the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a governmental agency, under the dispensary system or the system solely upon the quantity sold, but also upon the purpose of the sale and the character of the purchaser. Black Intox. Liq. § 23. Thus in Tennessee it has been ruled that a wholesale liquor dealer is one who sells to purchasers in packages or quantities for the purposes of trade or to be resold, while a retail dealer is one who sells to consumers for the purposes of consumption. Webb v. Baird, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 667. And see State v. Lowenhaught, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 13. And in Minnesota it has been held that the statute regulating the sale of liquor and requiring licenses does not apply to persons doing a wholesale business exclusively and who sell only to other dealers. State v. Orth, 38 Minn. 150, 36 N. W. 103. But a later decision in that state is to the effect that the necessity for having a license depends solely on whether the sale is of a quantity less than five gallons, and not at all on the character of the seller's business. State v. Schroeder, 43 Minn. 231, 45 N. W. 149, 45 Minn. 44, 47 N. W. 308. And as a general rule the statutes make an arbitrary distinction by providing that all sales of less than a given quantity shall be considered sales at retail, and all sales above that quantity sales at wholesale. And even in the absence of such a statutory classification some courts have been willing to rest a distinction upon quantity alone. See Harris v. Livingston, 28 Ala. 577.

In Pennsylvania, under the acts governing the granting of licenses for the sale of liquor, a person may be granted a wholesale license to sell malt or brewed liquors only. of town agents, are not regarded as liquor dealers or dram-shop keepers, in such sense as to require licenses or be subject to the tax imposed on such persons.[50]

3. Clubs or Associations. According to some authorities a bona fide club organized for the usual purposes of such an association, to which the furnishing of liquors to its members is merely incidental, need not take out a license or pay a liquor tax.[51] But according to others it is considered that such an association, whatever be its purpose or composition, must take out a license or pay such tax in order to be justified in furnishing liquor to its members, and that if it does not do so it becomes liable to criminal prosecution,[52] and an unlicensed club is certainly not justified in selling its liquors to any other persons than the members and their guests.[53]

4. Hotels. Where statutes provide for the grant of licenses, or of a special kind of licenses, to keepers of "hotels," this word is to be understood as equivalent to the common-law term "inn," that is, it designates a public house kept for the entertainment and accommodation of travelers and strangers, open to all proper persons who apply, but in the character of transient guests, not as permanent lodgers.[54] intoxicating liquors to which the license laws apply, not to the mere transfer of property in liquors.[55] Hence, while no person can with impunity engage in the business of liquor selling without compliance with those laws,[56] they do not apply to isolated sales, not within the spirit and purpose of the statute, as where an officer levies upon a quantity of liquor and sells it under an attachment or execution,[57] or where a similar sale is made by an assignee in insolvency,[58] or by an administrator of a deceased licensee, disposing of the stock in hand as a whole or in large quantities, and not in the way of retail trade,[59] or where a saloon business is sold en bloc.[60]

2. NUMBER OF LICENSES REQUIRED — a. Different Kinds of Business — (I) IN GENERAL. If a person conducts a business which is required by law to be licensed, but which is not mainly concerned with the selling of liquor, or to which the sale of liquor is merely incidental, his license to pursue the business in question will not authorize him to retail intoxicants, if such retailing by itself is made a subject for a separate license.[61] And where the statute provides for different kinds of liquor licenses, according to the nature of the business carried on, as where it distinguishes between hotels, bar-rooms, restaurants, and so on, the possession of a license of one kind will not protect sales made in another branch of the business.[62]

(II) WHOLESALE AND RETAIL. Where the statute discriminates between the wholesale and retail trade in liquors, and provides a different form of license for the two occupations, a wholesaler cannot sell at retail without having a retailer's license and vice versa.[63]

(III) TAVERN LICENSE. In several states it is held that a license to keep a tavern necessarily includes the privilege of furnishing liquor to guests and others seeking the accommodation of the tavern, that being a customary part of the business.[64] But elsewhere it is considered that no such privilege is implied in a tavern-keeper's license, and he cannot sell liquor without a retailer's license.[65]

b. Different Jurisdictions — (i) Federal and State Laws. The possession of a liquor license, obtained under the United States internal revenue laws, does not authorize the licensee to carry on the business in violation of the laws of the state, or relieve him from the necessity of taking out a license under the state laws also.[66]

(ii) State and Municipalities. The grant of a liquor license by a municipal corporation having authority therefor does not prevent the state itself from imposing a tax or license-fee concurrently upon the same dealer; and conversely the possession of a state license will not relieve him from the necessity of taking out a license from the city or town where he does business, if that also is required.[67]

(iii) Different Municipal Corporations. The fact that a liquor dealer holds a license from the county or other subdivision of the state does not exempt him from the duty of taking out the license required by another jurisdiction in the same territory, such as a city or incorporated town; for the requirement of a license, being in the nature of a restraint on the traffic, is equally and concurrently within the power of the two jurisdictions.[68]

c. Different Places. Where the same person maintains two or more bars, saloons, or other places for the sale of liquors, he must take out a separate license for each.[69]

3. WRONGFUL REFUSAL OR NEGLECT TO GRANT. The fact that the officers charged with the duty of issuing licenses have wrongfully or arbitrarily refused or neglected to issue a license to an applicant, he being eligible and having complied with the preliminary conditions, is no excuse for his engaging in the business without actually obtaining a license, and no defense to a prosecution for unlicensed selling.[70] And the refusal of the licensing authorities to grant any licenses whatever for the sale of liquor, within the territory of their jurisdiction, does not operate as a general license to all persons to pursue the traffic.[71]

4. IMPOSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING LICENSE. It is no justification to one selling liquor without a license, and no defense to a prosecution for unlicensed selling, that it was impossible for him to obtain a license, either because there was no provision for granting licenses in the particular district, or no officer competent to issue it, or for other reasons.[72]

5. PERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS WITHOUT LICENSE. Compliance with all the conditions necessary to obtain a license is not equivalent to the actual issue of a license. Although a person may have presented a proper and sufficient application, executed the required bond, and tendered the proper fee, he cannot legally begin selling until he has received the license.[73]

Place for storage.— A liquor dealer who pays the tax or assessment for his regular place of business has the right to store all or a part of his liquors in a cooler or building apart from his place of business, without paying a second tax, provided no purchases or sales of liquors are made at such cooler. D. Eligibility For License — 1. Who May Obtain License — a. In General. No person has a vested right to have a license for the sale of intoxicating liquors issued to him.[74] The licensing authorities are justified in refusing the privilege to an insolvent or irresponsible party,[75] or one who cannot give his personal attention to the business.[76] And the qualifications prescribed by the statute must be taken as a strict limitation upon the right to grant such licenses.[77] Unless the statute forbids[78] licenses may be granted to married women,[79] corporations,[80] or partners.[81]

subject the licensee to prosecution for subsequent sales; but if he has not paid his money into the treasury, nor filed his bond, he is subject to prosecution. Dudley v. State, 91 Ind. 312; Schwarm v. State, 82 Ind. 470; Houser v. State, 18 Ind. 106. And pending an appeal from the order of court granting a license, the applicant may sell, if he tenders a proper bond and the license-fee, although the county auditor unlawfully refuses to issue the license. Padgett v. State, 93 Ind. 396. But where an ordinance prohibits the sale of liquors in a residence portion of a city, and provides that a city license shall be no defense, the payment of the license-fee, and the retention thereof by the city, do not create an estoppel against the enforcement of the ordinance. Retail merchants.— Under a statute giving a licensed retailer of goods, wares, and merchandise an opportunity, under certain conditions, to secure a license to sell liquor at wholesale, such license cannot be granted to one who does not claim to be such a trader, but who is a hotel-keeper, and seeks to combine hotel-keeping and wholesale liquor selling. In re Mundy, 3 Pennew. Parlor-car company.— Where a company's charter authorized it to construct and purchase railway cars, with all convenient appendages and supplies for passengers traveling therein, which it might sell or use on such terms as it deemed proper, it was held that such company, under a proper license from the state, had the right to sell intoxicating liquors to its passengers. Moreover, in the absence of a statute forbidding it a license may be granted to two persons jointly.[82]

b. Moral Character, Etc. Under statutory provisions that licenses may be granted only to persons of good moral character, the question of the fitness of the applicant must necessarily be determined by an examination of his conduct in particular instances. Unless otherwise provided by statute, there is no single and absolute criterion, but the licensing authorities must judge whether the acts and conduct shown are sufficient in themselves or as an index to character to disqualify him.[83] Specific disqualifications are, however, sometimes enumerated. Thus some statutes provide against the grant of a license to any person who has previously been convicted of crime,[84] particularly of violations of the liquor laws,[85] who is in the habit of becoming intoxicated,[86] or who does not keep an orderly law abiding house.[87]

c. Requirement as to Residence. A statutory requirement that the applicant for license shall be a citizen of the state, or a resident of the county or other district where he proposes to do business, is jurisdictional in its nature, and unless the petitioner satisfies the licensing authorities that he possesses this qualification they have no power to grant the license.[88]

Illustrations.— If it is shown that the applicant is a common gambler, or is in the habit of frequenting gambling houses, this is sufficient ground for refusing a license, although such conduct is not specified in the statute as a disqualifying cause. Groscop v. Rainier, 111 Ind. 361, 12 N. E. 694. Ouachita County v. Rolland, 60 Ark. 516, 31 S. W. 144.

Burden of proof.— When a remonstrance against the grant of a license, based on objections to the moral character of the applicant, is filed, and the question thus brought into issue, the burden is cast upon the petitioner of proving, by a preponderance of evidence, that he is not disqualified from obtaining the license by immorality or previous illegal conduct. 2. As to Places — a. In General. When the statute limits the districts for the grant of licenses, or makes restrictions as to the particular places or localities where bars or saloons may be licensed, its provisions are mandatory, and the licensing authorities have no power to grant licenses in disregard of them.[89]

b. Vicinity of Churches, Schools, or Dwellings. The authority to grant liquor licenses is sometimes further restricted by statutory provisions.[90] Thus some statutes relating to the authority to grant licenses provide that no license shall be granted for any place which is within a certain designated distance of a church,[91] school,[92] or Foreign corporation.— That an applicant for a liquor license is a foreign corporation is a good reason for refusing to grant the license, even though the corporation be registered to do business in the state in which the application is made. In re Peter Schoenhofen Brewing Co., 8 Pa. Places of amusement.— Where the statute prohibits the grant of a license to sell liquors in any place of amusement, premises containing such a place cannot be licensed as a whole, although it would not be unlawful to grant a license in a certain part of the building, if there was no communication of any kind between the two parts. In re Martz, 12 Pa. Super. Ct. 521.

Separate rooms.— In Massachusetts a license may be granted to sell liquors in any room in a building, or in a back room, notwithstanding the statute forbidding partitions. Com. v. Barnes, 140 Mass. 447, 5 N. E. 252.

House not yet built.— Where the law requires the application for license to state the "building or place" where the business is to be carried on, a license cannot be granted for a building to be erected in the future. Warren Street Chapel v. Trenton Excise Com'rs, 56 N. J. L. 411, 29 Atl. 150.

Direct entrance.— In a statute forbidding the grant of licenses to sell liquor in any place "to which an entrance shall be allowed other than directly from a public traveled way," the word "direct" means straight and immediate, and an entrance to a bar-room requiring a circuitous or crooked route of travel from the highway thereto is such an entrance as the statute intends to prohibit. State v. Conley, 22 R. I. 397, 48 Atl. 200.

Residence of manufacturer.— A statute providing that licenses may be granted to manufacturers of wine and distillers of peach and apple brandy to retail at the place of manufacture or distillery does not authorize the designation of the distiller's residence as the place of sale. Character of occupation.— A building, the main floor of which is used exclusively for church purposes, although other religious, charitable, literary, or patriotic societies, composed wholly or principally of members of the congregation, meet at times in other parts of the building, is "occupied exclusively as a church" within the meaning of the law. Matter of McCusker, 23 Misc. (N. Y.) 446, 51 N. Y. Suppl. 281; Matter of Zinzow, 18 Misc. (N. Y.) 653, 43 N. Y. Suppl. 714. But a building, the first floor of which is used for religious meetings, the rest being used as offices for directors and physicians, dormitories, and store-rooms, the whole constituting a mission for the reformation of fallen women, but not connected with any church, and with which no clergyman is associated, is not a "church." People v. Dalton, 9 Misc. (N. Y.) 249, 30 N. Y. Suppl. 407. And see Matter of Vail, 38 Misc. (N. Y.) 392, 77 N. Y. Suppl. 903. A Jewish synagogue devoted to religious uses, although also used as a meeting place for fraternal and benevolent societies composed of Jews, although not limited to members of the congregation, is "exclusively occupied as a church." court-house,[93] or (in New York) unless certain conditions are complied with, within a limited distance of a building occupied exclusively as a dwelling.[94] As to how the prescribed distance is to be computed, the authorities are not uniform. Some hold that it must be measured by the nearest mode of access,[95] while others rule that it is to be measured in a straight or air line.[96] Under the New York statute the distance is to be measured between the "principal entrance" or "nearest entrance" of the saloon and of the church, school, or dwelling.[97] The New York statute, in so far as it makes the proximity of a church or school an impediment to the grant of a license, saves from its operation places where the liquor traffic had been lawfully carried on under licenses issued prior to its passage.[98]

E. Powers and Liabilities of Officers — 1. In General. Except in so far as they may be vested with a measure of discretion, officers charged with the grant of licenses must keep strictly within the limits of their powers and authority as prescribed by the statute.[99] Members of a board whose duty it is to pass on applications for liquor licenses disqualify themselves from acting on an application by signing the petition on which it is based.[1]

2. Fees and Compensation. The fees or compensation of licensing commissioners or boards are usually provided for by statute.[2]

3. Responsibility For Grant or Refusal of License. Licensing officers are not to be held answerable for mere mistakes or errors of judgment; but they are subject to indictment when their action in granting or refusing licenses was prompted by corrupt motives, or amounts to a gross abuse of discretion or a plain dereliction of duty.[3] They are not personally liable in an action at law against them to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by their refusal to grant a license to plaintiff; the latter, if clearly entitled to a license, may enforce his rights by mandamus, but the proceeding on his application is so far judicial as to protect the officers from civil actions for damages,[4] and as they do not act as agents of the city or town but as public officers, in the absence of any statute to the contrary, the municipality is not answerable for their acts.[5]

F. Proceedings to Obtain License — 1. Application For License — a. Form and Requisites. While the petition for a license should contain all that the statute requires to appear in it, its substance is mainly to be regarded, and its form should not be judged by the strictest rules; and mere informalities in the application are not sufficient ground for refusing the license.[6] It should set forth the name and place of residence of the applicant,[7] the name of the owner of the premises where the liquor is to be sold,[8] the kind of business the applicant proposes to engage in, and the kind of liquors he asks leave to sell,[9] and should contain a reasonably certain and explicit description of the premises where it is proposed to carry on the business.[10] If required to contain the names of sponsors or sureties for the applicant, or the consent of adjoining property-owners, the application is fatally defective without this.[11] It should of course be signed by the applicant,[12] and must be filed the requisite length of time before the meeting of the court or board which is to pass upon it.[13]

b. Withdrawing and Renewal. A petitioner for license cannot withdraw his application without leave, and this will not be granted where the effect would be to block the application of a fit and suitable person.[14] But an order of the licensing authorities denying the application does not estop or prevent the petitioner from renewing his application or filing a new petition,[15] except in so far as the statute may forbid this to be done within a limited time after action taken on the first.[16]

c. Affidavit of Applicant. Where the law requires the applicant to file an affidavit, promissory in its nature, of his intention duly to observe all the requirements of the law, the license is void if issued without such an affidavit or if it does not contain the material statements required.[17] And the same is true of a provision requiring an affidavit that the signatures of persons joining in the petition or recommending it are genuine, and were not procured by fraud, bribery, or deception.[18]

d. Notice of Application. It is generally provided, by statute or ordinance, that notice shall be given, in some public manner, of all applications for liquor licenses, for a prescribed period of time, in order that persons interested in contesting particular applications may be fully informed when and where to take action. Compliance with such requirement is a jurisdictional requisite and essential to the validity of a license.[19]

e. Form and Contents of Notice. The notice is ordinarily required to set forth with reasonable certainty and without ambiguity the precise location of the premises where its privilege is to be exercised,[20] the right name of the applicant,[21] and the character of license he applies for.[22]

f. Publication of Notice. A statutory requirement that the notice shall be published for a certain length of time in one or more newspapers is jurisdictional, and a license cannot be lawfully granted without compliance with it.[23] Where the law leaves it to the applicant to select the paper in which the notice shall be published, the licensing board has no authority to select or designate it.[24] If he is required to have the notice published in the newspaper having the largest circulation in the county, the publication will not be declared invalid, on a dispute as to the circulation of the paper selected,[25] unless bad faith can properly be imputed to the applicant in making choice of the paper.[26]

2. Assent to or Recommendation of Application — a. In General. Where the statute requires the applicant's petition for a license to be indorsed or accompanied by a recommendation or petition signed by a certain number of qualified persons, or by a certain proportion of the voters or residents of the district, the licensing authorities have no power to issue a license unless this requirement has been complied with, and a license granted in disregard of it is void.[27] And ordinarily an annual renewal of a license cannot be granted without a new recommendation.[28] It has been held that the petition should bear the requisite number of signatures before its presentation to the licensing authorities, although the subsequent addition of signatures is no more than an irregularity.[29] In respect to substance it must contain each and all of the statements or representations required by the statute.[30]

b. Who May Sign Recommendation. The signers to such a recommendation must be such as the statute requires, whether adults, freeholders, taxpayers, citizens, residents of the district, heads of families, or otherwise according to the terms of the law.[31] Unless restrained by statute, one is not disqualified from signing such a petition by the fact that he has already signed the petition of another applicant, or a recommendation for a different kind of license.[32] One signing such a petition or recommendation may withdraw his name from it after the paper has been filed, but not after the licensing authorities have entered upon the consideration of it, nor where the effect of such withdrawal would be to deprive them of jurisdiction to consider the petition.[33]

c. Number of Signers Required. A statutory requirement that an application for a license shall be indorsed or recommended by a designated number of persons, or by a majority of the voters or taxpayers, is imperative; and a license issued without compliance with this provision is without jurisdiction and invalid.[34]

Fraud in qualification.— A deed of land, made by the petitioner for license to one or several persons, not in good faith or for value, but merely with a fraudulent intention to qualify them to sign his petition as freeholders, is a fraud on the law and will be held ineffective for that purpose. Bennett v. Otto, (Nebr. 1903) 94 N. W. 807; Colglazier v. McClary, 5 Nebr. (Unoff.) 332, 98 N. W. 670; Austin v. Atlantic City, 48 N. J. Where the requirement is that the petition shall be signed by a majority of the assessed taxpaying citizens, this description includes married and single women who own property in their own right and pay taxes assessed thereon and minors under guardianship who own property.[35] It seems there is no objection to uniting the signatures on several papers, recommending the same applicant, if they are exactly alike; but this cannot be done if there are material differences between the several petitions.[36]

d. Consent of Property-Owners. The statute at present in force in New York requires the applicant for a liquor-tax certificate to obtain the consent of the owners or agents of at least two thirds of the buildings occupied exclusively as dwelling-houses within two hundred feet of the location of the proposed saloon or liquor store.[37] In Iowa the statute provides that a written statement of consent from all the resident freeholders owning property within fifty feet of the building where the business of selling intoxicating liquors is carried on shall be filed.[38]

cases specified in the law;[40] but within those limits must be freely allowed by the licensing authorities without further conditions or restrictions.[41]

b. Filing Remonstrance. A remonstrance against the grant of a license cannot be considered unless filed as directed by the statute,[42] and within the time limited thereby.[43] On application to compel the authorities to grant a hearing on the petition and remonstrance, the court will not inquire into the truth or falsity of the facts alleged in the remonstrance; for that purpose it is sufficient if one is filed.[44]

c. Form and Requisites. The remonstrance should show that the persons signing it are qualified to do so, by being residents of the district, or registered voters, or whatever else the statute may require,[45] and should set forth the grounds on which objection to the grant of a license is based,[46] in such a specific manner and with such particularity as may inform the applicant precisely of the charge he is expected to meet, and raise an issue of fact for the consideration of the licensing authorities.[47] It should be directed against some individual applicant, and not join opposition to two or more.[48] But the names of the remonstrants need not all be signed to the same paper; they may exercise the right to remonstrate by separate papers directed against the same applicant.[49] Signatures to a remonstrance made by mark and not attested cannot be considered.[50] If the statute requires the remonstrance to be verified by affidavit, it cannot be considered unless sworn to.[51]

d. Who May Remonstrate.[52] As a rule any person who desires to contest an application for a license must follow the course prescribed by statute, as to filing a remonstrance, and take such other steps as may be required, else he cannot be heard; and an unnamed party cannot be permitted to appear by attorney and oppose the application.[53] The statute may limit the right of remonstrance to certain classes of persons or to persons having a certain interest in the issue;[54] but in the absence of such restrictions it is competent for any person to file objections who has personal or property interests which might be affected by the grant of the license asked for.[55] The right of remonstrance may be exercised through an agent or attorney in fact duly appointed by power of attorney for that purpose.[56]

e. Withdrawing Remonstrance. Remonstrators against the grant of a license have no right, after the expiration of the time within which a remonstrance may be filed, to withdraw their names therefrom, so as to leave a less number of objectors than is required by law, or otherwise to defeat the object of the remonstrance.[57]

4. Hearing or Trial — a. In General. When an application for a license is met by a proper and sufficient remonstrance or counter petition, it is the duty of the licensing board to grant both parties a hearing and to receive relevant evidence on the issue presented. If they ignore the remonstrance and issue the license without a hearing, or if they reject the application without hearing the applicant, their action is illegal and reversible by the courts.[58]

b. Time For Hearing. Disregard of statutory directions that hearings on applications for licenses shall be had only at certain terms of court, meetings of the licensing authorities or on certain days, may invalidate licenses.[59] So, where the statute provides that on the filing of a remonstrance the licensing board shall appoint a day for a hearing, the board is bound to grant a hearing and fix a day for the same in the future,[60] the intention being that both sides shall be given a fair and reasonable opportunity to prepare and present their evidence.[61] Ordinarily it is within the power of the licensing authorities to continue or adjourn a hearing for a reasonable time.[62]

c. Questions Considered. On the hearing of an application for a license, the questions to be considered are the compliance of the applicant with the preliminary conditions, including the form and regularity of his petition, its recommendation by third persons, if that is required, and the publication of notice; the statutory qualifications of the applicant; and any issues of fact properly raised by remonstrances filed in the case;[63] and where the licensing authorities possess a certain measure of discretion, they are permitted to go further and consider the propriety and expediency of granting the license asked for in the particular case.[64] In Pennsylvania, by statute, licenses may be granted to citizens of temperate habits and good moral character; but only when the court is satisfied that the place to be licensed is "necessary" for the accommodation of the public. The question of this necessity is therefore to be considered and determined at the hearing on the application.[65]

Issues of fact, raised by the petition and a remonstrance against it, are to be determined on competent evidence, under the rules governing civil trials in courts of law.[66] Evidence may be received bearing upon the personal fitness and moral qualifications of the applicant,[67] and upon the question of his being debarred from receiving a license by previous violations of the criminal laws,[68] as also with reference to the proximity of churches or schools, if that fact is made material by the statute.[69] The facts as to the number or sufficiency of the persons consenting to the application or recommending it, or the genuineness or good faith of their indorsement, or the truth of the facts which they certify, may also be brought into issue, and should be determined upon competent evidence.[70]

e. Burden of Proof. The applicant for a license must sustain the burden of proving every material fact necessary to entitle him to receive the privilege which he seeks.[71] But it seems that if a remonstrance affirmatively charges a previous violation of the law, or a previous revocation of the license, the remonstrants must sustain their allegations by evidence.[72] If the application is for the restoration or renewal of a license which had previously been revoked, it must be treated as a new application, throwing the burden of proof on the applicant.[73]

f. Procedure on Hearing. Where the hearing on an application for a license is held before a court, or before a board which acts in a judicial capacity, the proceedings are governed by the ordinary rules of judicial procedure in civil actions.[74] In some states the applicant must bear all the costs of an unsuccessful applicautory requirement that the place to be licensed shall be necessary for the accommodation of the public does not apply in the case of a brewer's or distiller's license, and hence an application for such a license cannot be denied on the ground of a want of public necessity. In re Gemas, 169 Pa. Witnesses.— A license board has power to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers, and to commit for contempt a witness who refuses to answer questions or to produce books or papers called for before the board. Rose-tion ;[75] but in others, each of the parties (petitioner and remonstrant) bears his own costs.[76]

g. Grounds For Refusing License. It is proper for the court or licensing board to refuse to grant a license on proof that the petition has not been signed in good faith by the requisite number or majority of persons ;[77] that the applicant is not a person of good moral character ;[78] that he has been guilty of violations of the liquor laws,[79] as by selling to minors or drunkards, or keeping open at prohibited times ;[80] that he has maintained a disorderly house, has permitted the visits of prohibited persons,[81] or has violated the statute against the sale of adulterated liquors ;[82] or that his application is not made in good faith.[83] But it seems that covenants in deeds against the sale of intoxicating liquors on the premises will not prevent the granting of licenses for such sale.[84] And although in some states the licensing authorities are vested with a wide measure of discretion in this regard, yet even there they cannot refuse generally to grant any licenses at all, on account of their personal views as to the validity or propriety of the license law.[85]

h. Judgment or Decision. When the court or board for the hearing of applications for licenses consists of two or more members, a license cannot be issued except upon the concurrence of a majority; if they are equally divided the application fails.[86] The court or board need not, unless specially required by law, set forth in writing the grounds of its refusal to grant a particular application.[87]

Rule as to majority required.— Where the aldermen of a city, by a vote which has the effect of a standing rule, decide that no liquor licenses shall be granted unless six aldermen assent thereto, this rule, while in force and acted upon, determines the effect of any vote upon granting a license, and if only five aldermen vote in favor of the applicant a license cannot be granted. It has been held that an order granting a license is insufficient where it does not appear affirmatively upon the face of the proceedings that the licensing authority has considered the application and petition, where one is required, and investigated and found that the statutes have been complied with in every particular and that the applicant possesses the requisite qualifications to be licensed.[88] As to the conclusive effect of a decision, it is held generally that if the hearing is before a court its judgment conclusively determines all the points which it is required to consider, so that these matters are res judicata on an application for a renewal of the license, unless fresh issues are raised by a remonstrance.[89] But no conclusive effect attaches to the decision when made by a board of municipal or other officers.[90]

5. Discretion as to Grant or Refusal of License. A few decisions hold that if a person who desires a liquor license brings himself within the terms of the law, by complying with all the statutory preliminaries and possessing the requisite moral and other qualifications, he is entitled as a matter of law to be licensed, and the license cannot be withheld from him.[91] But in most jurisdictions the doctrine is now well settled that the court or board charged with the duty of issuing licenses is invested with a sound judicial discretion, to be exercised in view of all the facts and circumstances of each particular case, as to granting or refusing the license applied for.[92] But this discretion is a sound judicial discretion and must be based upon solid legal reasons and not exercised arbitrarily or capriciously.[93] Thus the licensing authorities have no power to refuse all applications for license, without regard to the qualifications of the several applicants, on their personal views as to the wisdom or expediency of the law, or their personal attitude toward the liquor traffic.[94] But it is no abuse of discretion to refuse a license on the ground that the place where it is proposed to open the saloon or bar is not suitable for that purpose,[95] or that it has become a place of bad repute and a resort for disorderly persons,[96] or where, as between petitioners and remonstrants, there is an overwhelming majority against the grant of the license.[97]

refused to a properly qualified person, without any reason whatever, or without any reason which is valid and sufficient in law, but in the arbitrary or capricious exercise of the power vested in the licensing authorities redress may be had by mandamus.[2] Such is also the case where the only discretion vested in the licensing officer is as to the sufficiency of the surety,[3] or where the only duty he has to perform is merely ministerial, such as affixing his signature to the license.[4] But in any case the applicant cannot have this writ unless he shows that he possesses the statutory qualifications and has complied with all the statutory preliminaries to the grant of a license.[5]

8. RESTRAINING GRANT OF LICENSE. In some states it has been held that an injunction cannot be granted to restrain the licensing board or officers from granting a license to any particular applicant.[6] In others it appears that the writ may issue at the instance of the proper public officer, but not at the suit of a private individual who does not show that he will suffer any special damage by reason of the license being granted.[7] And when, in the particular district or municipality, the grant of licenses is prohibited by law, so that a license issued there would be nugatory and void, no writ of prohibition is necessary to restrain the grant of such license.[8]

circuit court, generally the judgment of that court is final, so that no further appeal can be taken to the court of last resort.[11] If the statute authorizing an appeal from the grant or refusal of a license omits to make special provisions as to the manner in which the appeal shall be taken and perfected, it must conform to the provisions of the general law on the subject; as, in regard to the bond required to be executed,[12] the time within which the appeal must be taken,[13] and the contents of the record on appeal.[14] The refusal to grant a license will not be disturbed on appeal, where the record shows that the denial of the application was in consequence of the fact that the applicant did not possess the qualifications required by law.[15] Upon appeal, the presumption arising from a regular record is that the court below had due regard to the number and character of the petitioners for the license, and that the license was refused for a legal reason, and not arbitrarily.[16]

(II) Parties to Appeal. An appeal from a decision refusing a license may be taken by the applicant.[17] And if the license is granted, those who have filed remonstrances or counter petitions may appeal.[18] In the latter case the municipal corporation or official board granting the license must be made a party.[19] Ordinarily the right of appeal is restricted to those who are thus necessary parties to the proceedings before the licensing board, or who have connected themselves with those proceedings by intervening in opposition to the application.[20] But in some states the right to appeal is accorded to any resident taxpayer.[21]

(III) RIGHTS PENDING APPEAL. In some states, where the licensing board grants a license against a remonstrance filed, it must revoke or recall the license upon an appeal being taken, until the appeal shall be determined; and this duty may be enforced by mandamus.[22] In Indiana it is provided by statute that an appeal taken from an order granting a license shall not estop the licensee from selling liquor thereunder until the close of the next term of the court at which such cause might lawfully be tried, and that he shall not be liable as a seller without license for sales made pending such appeal.[23]

(IV) QUESTIONS CONSIDERED ON APPEAL. As to the matters proper to be considered on the appeal the law varies in the different states. In some the case is tried de novo in the appellate court.[24] In others both the law and facts may be reviewed, but the reviewing court is restricted to the issues raised, and the evidence presented, before the licensing board.[25] In Pennsylvania an appeal from an order of the court of quarter sessions granting or refusing a license brings up nothing but the record; neither the evidence, the rulings of the court below on questions of evidence, nor the reasons for its judgment are before the reviewing court.[26]

b. Certiorari to Review Proceedings. Where the action of the licensing court or board is regarded as judicial in its nature,[27] and not merely ministerial,[28] certiorari will lie to review its action in granting or refusing a license. But the investigation will not generally include a reëxamination of the evidence or a review of the decision on questions of fact, the purpose of the writ being confined to the correction of errors apparent on the record,[29] or the determination of disputed questions of jurisdiction.[30] Nor generally can this writ be brought where there was no objection or remonstrance against the grant of the particular license.[31] The right to sue out certiorari is given not only to the parties immediately involved in the contest, but also in several states to owners of property near the place asked to be licensed, or to any citizen or taxpayer.[32]

G. Bonds of Dealers[33] — 1. Necessity and Duty to Give.[34] Where the statutes require licensed liquor dealers to give bonds, conditioned for their due observance of the laws or for the payment of fines, penalties, or damages recoverable against them, the giving of the required bond is a condition precedent to the issue of the license, and a license granted without the bond being given is not valid.[35] Such bonds are commonly required of all persons engaged in the liquor traffic, although exceptions are sometimes made in favor of druggists and others.[36] It is of course essential that the conditions of the bond should contain nothing repugnant to the constitution, and no bond can be exacted under a statute which is not constitutionally valid.[37] Where a second bond is demanded and received by the licensing officer, under a mistaken belief that the bond first furnished was void, the second bond is not valid.[38]

2. Form and Requisites. A liquor dealer's bond must contain all the conditions required by the statute to be inserted,[39] but cannot impose any additional or more onerous conditions or duties upon the licensee.[40] It must recite or describe the laws which the obligor promises to obey, with such certainty that they may be clearly identified, and also the penalties or damages recoverable against him which it is intended to secure.[41] Particularity in regard to the correct designation of the obligee,[42] the amount of the penalty,[43] and the qualifications of the sureties[44] is essential. But although the bond of a liquor dealer does not conform strictly to the statute under which it was given, it may be enforced as a common-law obligation.[45] And such a bond is not invalidated by reason of mere clerical errors appearing on its face,[46] because it is not dated,[47] because of the failure of the principal to sign it,[48] because of a failure to particularly designate in the bond or license the house in which the liquors are to be sold[49] or because of omission

inal penalties prescribed for violations of the liquor laws, to require a bond conditioned for the observance of the liquor law by the licensee. Cullinan v. Burkard, 93 N. Y. App. Div. 31, 86 N. Y. Suppl. 1003.

3. Approval and Filing. Where the statute requires a liquor dealer's bond to be approved by a local court, board, or officer, the provision is mandatory, and his license is not effective without such approval.[52] And this is also true of the filing or recording of the bond, if that is directed by the statute.[53] The approval of the bond cannot be delegated by the court or board charged with this duty.[54] The authorities required to pass upon the bond are vested with a considerable measure of judgment and discretion, particularly in regard to the sufficiency of the sureties; and unless it is shown that this discretion was unreasonably or arbitrarily exercised, or that they were actuated by illegal or improper motives in rejecting the bond,[55] the process of mandamus will not be used to compel their approval and acceptance of it.[56] And conversely their action in approving the bond will not be reviewed by the courts where they had jurisdiction, and no fraud is shown, and particularly where third persons have acted on their decision.[57]

4. Breach of Condition. The bond of a liquor dealer is broken by the commission of any offense against the laws for the observance of which it is conditioned,[58] by an abuse or misuse of the privilege which it confers, or by selling in

Permitting minor to enter and remain in saloon.— To render a liquor dealer and the sureties on his bond liable under a statute giving a cause of action to a parent whose minor child is permitted by the saloon-keeper to "enter and remain" in the saloon, it is necessary that such minor both enter the saloon and remain in it. 5. Liability of Sureties. In order to fix the liability of the sureties on a liquor dealer's bond, it is not necessary to show a strict compliance with the statute in regard to the approval of the bond by the proper authorities,[61] or in regard to the justification of the sureties,[62] or the filing of the bond.[63] The extent of the liability of the sureties — whether to the full penalty of the bond or only to the amount of a particular fine or recovery — will depend upon the provisions of the statute under which the bond is executed;[64] and this is true also in regard to the particular kinds of fines, penalties, or recoveries against the principal for which the sureties may be held bound.[65] An action on the bond against the sureties may be defended on the ground that the bond does not comply with the statute in some matter of substance,[66] that the sureties were not notified (as required by law) of the prosecution or proceeding against their principal,[67] that the alleged unlawful sale was made at a place other than that covered by the license and the bond,[68] or that the statute authorizing such recoveries has been repealed without a saving clause.[69] So, where the principal obtained his license by means of false representations or deceit practised upon the licensing officers, this may invalidate the license and make any sale made by him a violation of the law, yet it does not warrant a recovery against his sureties, for the bond is intended to protect the public against violations of law under a license legally issued, but not against fraud in securing it.[70] But it is no defense to an action against a surety that his cosurety is dead,[71] that he himself has removed from the corporate limits,[72] or that the principal has sold his business to another, although without transferring the license or certificate.[73] And where the bond is conditioned for the payment of any judgment recovered against the principal, under the liquor laws, the sureties are bound by the judgment, and cannot retry the merits of the original suit.[74]

6. Actions For Breach — a. In General. An action on a liquor dealer's bond may be prosecuted in debt, trespass on the case, scire facias, or otherwise according to the nature of the obligation and the directions of the statute.[75] And in Action is upon contract.— A bond conditioned for the observance of the liquor law is in the nature of a contract for the obedience of the licensee to the provisions of the law; and the sum named in the bond is fixed as liquidated damages, and the action to recover the same is upon a contract obliga-

such an action neither the dealer nor his bondsmen can be heard to deny that the license was issued to him in conformity to law.[76] The previous conviction of the principal for a violation of the liquor law is not a prerequisite to a suit on the bond unless made so by statute.[77] Where the obligor has been prosecuted for the violation of law which is alleged as a breach of the condition of the bond, and has paid the fine and costs imposed upon him in such prosecution, no action can be maintained for the same cause on the bond.[78] Unless limited by its own terms or by the statute, the efficacy of a liquor bond is not exhausted by one recovery under it, for a fine or penalty, less than the penal sum of the bond, but it may stand for successive recoveries in distinct actions.[79] Where an action has been brought on the bond alone, and it has been determined that no recovery could be had on the bond, no recovery against the dealer individually can be sustained.[80] An action on the bond of a liquor dealer to recover fines against him for the illegal sale of liquor is a civil action, and therefore the state may take an appeal from the judgment therein.[81]

b. Persons Entitled to Sue — Parties. An action on a liquor dealer's bond may be prosecuted in the name and behalf of the state,[82] of the county,[83] by some public officer invested with authority in that behalf,[84] or by any private person aggrieved by the breach complained of, according to the directions of the statute.[85]

c. Pleading. The declaration or complaint in an action on a liquor dealer's bond should set forth all the material facts constituting the cause of action.[86]

In Connecticut, where the statute provides that, whenever a licensed liquor dealer shall be convicted of a violation of the law, and no appeal is pending, his bond shall become forfeited upon suit in such an action it is no defense to say that no sentence had been pronounced upon defendant in the criminal suit, where a verdict of guilty had been rendered. It is sufficient to set out the substance of the condition alleged to have been broken, without copying the whole language of the bond;[87] and it must be alleged that they occurred after the execution of the bond and while it continued in force;[88] but the particular acts assigned as a breach of the condition must be charged with certainty and without duplicity, and in such terms as to bring them clearly within the scope and intent of the condition,[89] and at the place covered by the license.[90]

d. Evidence. The bond sued on being one given by a licensed liquor dealer, it is necessary either to put the license in evidence or to show facts from which it may be conclusively inferred.[91] If the breach of condition complained of is a violation of law amounting to a criminal offense, the record of defendant's trial and conviction therefor is prima facie evidence of the breach, although probably not conclusive.[92] On questions as to the admissibility, weight, and relevancy of evidence the rules governing ordinary civil actions should be applied.[93]

e. Trial and Judgment. Instructions to the jury should be carefully framed, so as to leave to their determination all questions of fact, while placing clearly before them the legal conclusions from the terms of the bond and of the statute.[94] In an ordinary action on a liquor dealer's bond, judgment can be rendered against the sureties alone, without the principal.[95]

under authority of its charter or a general law.[96] But on the other hand the state has power to tax the liquor traffic, although it be carried on in violation of a municipal ordinance.[97] Liability for the payment of the tax or fee will depend upon the terms of the statute or ordinance, in respect to the kinds of liquor taxable,[98] the persons or corporations who are subject to the assessment,[99] and as to the classification of occupations and the exemption of particular persons or kinds of business.[1] Under a statute providing that dealers shall pay a license-tax, amounting to a certain percentage, on the total amount of their purchases, the tax is payable on the full cost price of the liquor taxed, without deduction of the amount of the internal revenue tax paid by the distiller.[2]

2. AMOUNT — a. Power to Fix Amount of Fee. The amount of a liquor tax to be assessed by municipal corporations, or of the license-fees which they may exact, may be fixed absolutely by their charters, by a general statute,[3] or by a legislative provision that it shall not exceed or shall not be less than a certain limit,[4] in either of which cases the municipal corporation will have no power to charge more or less than the sum fixed by the statute.[5] On the other hand it may be left to the discretion of the municipality, to fix by ordinance,[6] by

Time of fixing.— A statute empowering city councils to license the sale of liquor, and providing that a license shall not extend beyond the year in which it is granted, and giving them power to determine the amount of the fee, does not require that the amount of the fee shall be fixed every year, but the amount once fixed will remain until changed. popular vote, or otherwise,[7] the amount of the tax which may be assessed or the amount of the fee which may be exacted.

b. Reasonableness of Amount. The legislature of a state, having unlimited control over the liquor traffic, may, if it chooses to license the business, fix the amount of the license-fee at any sum in its absolute discretion, and no one can complain that the amount so fixed is excessive or prohibitive; and the same rule applies in the case of a municipal corporation which, by its charter or a general statute, possesses full control over the traffic.[8] But if a municipality is given authority only to license the business, not to prohibit or suppress it altogether, its discretion as to the amount of the fee to be charged is limited, and an ordinance fixing such a fee as would be unreasonably great or practically prohibitory would be invalid.[9]

c. Pro-Rata Fee For Short Term. In several states provision is made by statute for a proportional reduction in the annual license-fee or tax in case the dealer obtains his license or permit after the beginning of the year or discontinues his business before its expiration.[10]

d. Classification of Municipalities. It is competent for the legislature to classify the municipal corporations of the state, according to their form of organization, or according to their population, fixing different rates of taxation or license-fees for the several classes, so that such fees shall be higher in cities than in villages, or shall increase in proportion to the number of inhabitants.[11] And where the statute provides that the population of a municipality shall be ascertained for this purpose, by the last preceding state or federal census, this method of fixing the population is exclusive, and the number of inhabitants cannot be shown by parol or by any unofficial enumeration.[12]

must be assessed as the law directs, in respect to the time of making the levy,[13] as to the persons or property to be assessed for taxation,[14] and as to the amount or rate of the tax.[15] Where a tax for carrying on the liquor business has by mistake been assessed against the wrong premises, it cannot several years thereafter be assessed against the premises actually used for the business, the property having in the meantime been sold for general taxes to one who had no notice of the liquor tax.[16]

4. Lien on Property. The legislature has power to make a liquor tax a lien on the premises where the business is carried on, although owned by another person and merely leased by the liquor seller, provided the owner leased his property for that very purpose or had actual or constructive knowledge that it was used for that purpose.[17] Moreover it is competent to make the lien of the tax paramount to all other liens or encumbrances, whether created by mortgage or otherwise,[18] although, in the absence of such a statutory provision, the tax lien will take rank merely from the time of its assessment, not displacing prior charges.[19]

5. Payment and Collection — a. Payment in Advance. Where the license law requires the fee for a license to be paid in advance, no valid license can be issued without full payment of the fee at or before its issuance; the law is peremptory, and leaves no discretion to the licensing officers to waive or modify its terms.[20] Further the whole amount must be paid. The payment of a less sum than that fixed by law as the price of a license is not to be regarded as good pro tanto, and does not authorize any license to be issued.[21]

b. To Whom Payment Made. The power to license the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and to impose a tax or license-fee on dealers, includes the power to provide for its collection by designating some public officer to whom the tax or fee shall be paid.[22] This officer is usually the treasurer or other fiscal agent of the municipality issuing the license.[23]

c. Medium of Payment. As a general rule officers charged with the collection of license-fees can receive nothing but cash in payment. A note given in payment of such a fee is void; and if the statute requires the fee to be paid before the license is issued, a license granted upon receipt of such a note is likewise invalid.[24] In a few states, however, it is held that, while the taking of a note in such cases is not regular, yet it does not invalidate the license, and the note may be collected by suit.[25] State or municipal obligations, such as warrants or certificates of indebtedness, may be receivable in payment of license-fees, if the terms of the law authorizing the tender of such obligations in payment of public charges are broad enough to include license-fees.[26]

d. Enforcing Payment. A license tax or fee is not a "debt" in the ordinary sense of the word; the methods of collecting such tax or fee are those only which are authorized by the statute; and if the law does not provide for its collection by a civil action or suit, no such action can be maintained.[27] In several states, however, the statutes on this subject are so framed as to authorize, either directly or by necessary implication, the collection of unpaid license-fees by ordinary suit or action.[28] In other states the collection of delinquent license-fees is to be enforced by execution and levy on property,[29] or by distress.[30] If an action for such a tax or fee is brought unlawfully or without authority, equity may take cognizance of a bill to restrain its prosecution.[31]

6. Disposition of Moneys Collected. The fund created by licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors is under the absolute control of the legislature, unless restrained by some provision of the constitution.[32] Thus license-fees do not necessarily belong exclusively to the municipalities issuing the licenses, but it is competent to provide, as has been done in several states, that a certain proportion of such moneys shall be paid over to the state for the general uses of the state,[33]

or, if collected by a city or town, to the county treasurer for the use of the county.[34] In other states the money is to be collected by the county officers and distributed, wholly or in part, to the municipalities severally issuing the licenses.[35] And this duty may be enforced by mandamus,[36] or by appropriate action.[37] In others such moneys are collected by the local authorities to be used wholly for local purposes.[38] The legislature may direct that moneys raised in this way shall be exclusively appropriated[39] to specific public, educational, or charitable uses.[40]

7. Refunding or Recovering — a. Recovery of Excessive or Illegal Fee. Where a person applying for a liquor license voluntarily pays the whole amount demanded of him, although the charge is illegal, or the amount demanded, in consequence of a misapprehension of the law, or of the invalidity of a particular statute or ordinance, is in excess of the sum which might lawfully be exacted, he cannot recover back the amount paid or the illegal excess.[41] But the rule is otherwise where the payment was not voluntary, but was obtained by extortion, fraud,

Voluntary payment.— The rule is that if the payment is made without protest, and not to procure the release of plaintiff's person or property from arrest or seizure, and not compelled by the exhibition of compulsory process or its actual or threatened enforcement, and without the use of any force, fraud, duress, or intimidation on the part of the municipality or its officers or agents, then the payment is considered as made voluntarily. force, or moral or legal compulsion, as in such a case he may recover back the amount or the illegal excess.[42]

b. Refunding Money on Refusal or Cancellation of License. As a general rule a person who has paid the fee for a liquor license on making his application therefor cannot recover it back upon the subsequent refusal of the license, in consequence of his failure to comply with other conditions, or for other sufficient reasons;[43] nor where an appeal from the order of the licensing authorities results in a decision adverse to his right to obtain the license;[44] nor where a license already granted is revoked or canceled by those having authority to take such action,[45] nor where the privileges which the license confers are abrogated by the adoption of a law or ordinance prohibiting all sales of liquor within the territory covered by it.[46] And a fortiori a person who voluntarily pays the liquor tax, and afterward abandons the business because he is unwilling or unable to furnish the required bond, cannot recover the amount of the tax so paid.[47]

c. Rebate on Surrender of Certificate. In New York it is provided by statute that the holder of a liquor-tax certificate may voluntarily surrender the same for cancellation and receive a rebate of the amount paid for the unexpired terms provided the certificate has at least one month to run at the time of the surrenders and that the holder has ceased the selling of liquor under it,[48] and provided that no arrest or indictment or other prosecution provided for by the statute is pending against him at the time of the surrender or within thirty days thereafter,[49]

or that if he has been indicted or prosecuted the proceedings have been discharged or dismissed on the merits.[50] This right of rebate on surrender is in the nature of a chose in action,[51] and while it inures to the benefit of an assignee of the certificate, the latter cannot enforce it when his assignor has disabled himself from doing so.[52] It cannot be claimed in any case where the certificate was originally void because obtained by fraud or false statements in the application,[53] nor after proceedings have been commenced to revoke the certificate.[54] The method of applying for and obtaining the payment of the rebate provided by the statute is exclusive, and all the conditions must be complied with.[55]

I. Transfer of Rights — 1. License Not Assignable. A license to sell liquor is not assignable or transferable, unless by the aid of a statute, and even where one takes an assignment of the license, on buying or leasing the licensee's business, and continues to sell at the same place, and otherwise in obedience to the law, he is not protected by the license.[56]

2. Statutes Authorizing Transfer of Licenses. In some of the states it is provided by statute that the holder of a liquor license may sell and assign the same, transferring his rights under it, with the consent and approval of the licensing authorities.[57] Application for a transfer of a license should be made by a petition, setting forth the facts essential to a full understanding of the case on the part of the authorities and to enable them to exercise an intelligent judgment on the propriety of consenting to the proposed transfer.[58] Opposition to the transfer may be made by any person having a real interest in the matter and who would be aggrieved by the granting of the application.[59] The licensing authorities are vested with a discretion to grant or withhold their consent to the application, and unless it appears that their refusal was arbitrary or an abuse of such discretion, they will not be compelled, by mandamus, to approve the proposed transfer.[60] But generally an appeal is allowed from their decision, not for the purpose of reviewing the facts, but to determine questions of jurisdiction and procedure, and to test the legality of their action with reference to an alleged arbitrary or unlawful refusal of the application.[61]

3. Death of Licensee. Upon the death of a licensee, the privileges conferred by the license do not pass to or vest in his personal representatives, nor are they authorized to continue the business at retail, although they do not require a transfer of the license to enable them to dispose of the stock as a whole.[62]

4. Rights of Creditors of Licensee. A liquor license, being in the nature of a trust personal to the licensee and not transferable except with the approval of the licensing authorities, is not an asset which can be subjected to the claims of his general creditors by the ordinary processes of law.[63]

J. Revocation of Licenses — 1. Power and Authority to Revoke. A license to sell liquor being neither a contract nor a right of property, but merely a temporary permit to do that which would otherwise be unlawful, the authority which granted it always retains the power to revoke it, either for due cause of forfeiture, such as a violation of the laws regulating the traffic, or upon a change of policy and legislation in regard to the sale of liquors; and such revocation cannot be complained of as a breach of contract, or as unlawfully divesting the licensee of his rights or his property.[64] But justice and reason alike deny the power to Reconsidering action on application.— The excise commissioners, in granting an application to transfer a liquor license, completely perform the judicial duty imposed on them, leaving only the ministerial duty of issuing their certificate of transfer; and they cannot afterward reconsider their action on the ground that they had overlooked certain objections which had been interposed to the application. People v. Wells, 11 Misc. (N. Y.) 239, 32 N. Y. Suppl. 973.

Imposing conditions.— The licensing authorities cannot impose upon the parties conditions to their approval of the proposed transfer, other than such as may be authorized by the statute. Class' Appeal, 6 Pa. Super. Ct. 130.

2. Effect of Subsequent Legislation. A license to sell liquor is revoked or annulled by the repeal of the law authorizing the grant of such licenses, or by any change in the legislation of the state or district inconsistent with the further exercise of the rights conferred by the license, such as the adoption of a prohibitory statute or a local option law.[66]

3. Grounds For Revocation. A liquor license may be revoked for fraud practised upon the licensing officers in obtaining it,[67] as where the application for license contained material false statements or false representations,[68] or a materially erroneous or false description of the premises intended to be licensed,[69] or ration does not render itself liable in damages by revoking a license, although the licensee has given no cause for revocation. Ison v. Griffin, 98 Ga. 623, 25 S. E. 611.

where the applicant did not, when so required by the statute, obtain the consent of the owners of adjoining property,[70] or if he has failed to pay the license-fee or otherwise to comply with the conditions imposed upon him.[71] Moreover the license may be revoked when the licensee has been guilty of a breach of its conditions or an offense against the criminal laws, more particularly the laws regulating the sale of liquor.[72] If the statute directs the revocation of the license upon his "conviction" of such an offense, there must first have been a final judgment, conclusively establishing guilt, rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction;[73] but when the cause of revocation is specified as a "violation" of the laws, the licensing authorities may act upon other evidence than a judgment of conviction.[74] In such a proceeding it is no defense that the alleged unlawful act was committed by the bartender or other employee of the licensee, without the knowledge of the latter and contrary to his general orders, for it is his duty to exercise such a close supervision of his business as will render the commission of unlawful acts impossible.[75] And where the same person holds several licenses for as many different places, they may all be revoked for a violation of law committed at any one of such places; for the law deals with the person of the licensee, and will not allow a person who breaks the law at one place to enjoy its protection at another.[76]

4. Notice to Licensee. If the statute directs that the holder of a license shall be notified of the institution of proceedings to revoke the same, and be summoned to appear and show cause against the complaint, the proceedings will be void unless these requisites are complied with.[77] But if the license itself contains the conditions of forfeiture, as prescribed by the law or ordinance under which it was granted, the licensee, on conviction of a violation of the law, is not entitled to notice of the forfeiture or revocation of his license.[78]

5. Proceedings Before Licensing Officers — a. In General. As a general rule the jurisdiction for the revocation of a license is vested in the same board, court, or officer possessing the power and authority to grant licenses.[79] Proceedings for the revocation of a license before the licensing board or officers must be founded on a complaint, setting forth with reasonable certainty the grounds alleged for forfeiting the license,[80] and be supported by competent evidence,[81] and the holder of the license must be given an opportunity to be present and be heard,[82] and to obtain and present witnesses in his behalf.[83] The law does not, however, require the same strictness of proceedings or proof in these cases that is

Disqualification of officer.— Where one of the members of the board hires a minor to buy liquor, so as to obtain evidence against the dealer, he is incompetent to sit as a member of the board on a hearing to revoke the license, so that if he sits the action of the board revoking the license is void. necessary in actions or special proceedings in courts.[84] It is no bar to such a proceeding that it is founded on some act or offense for which a criminal prosecution is pending against the licensee, or for which he has already been convicted.[85]

b. Restraining or Compelling Action. Mandamus may issue to compel a licensing board to convene and take action on a petition for the revocation of a license,[86] or even to compel them to make an order revoking the license, if it is plain that their refusal to do so is unwarranted by the proven facts and an abuse of discretion.[87] And conversely a writ of prohibition may be used to restrain the board from revoking a license, if it is shown that they have no power to take the contemplated action.[88] A stay of proceedings cannot be granted by a circuit court to prevent a city council from revoking a license pending an appeal from an order of that court refusing a temporary injunction against the council in such proceedings.[89]

c. Review of Proceedings. The decision or order of a licensing board revoking a license may be reviewed by the courts on proper proceedings,[90] as upon a writ of certiorari.[91] But this writ does not bring up the facts, or authorize a review of the decision on the merits. It is only concerned with questions of jurisdiction, abuse of discretion, or erroneous conclusions of law.[92]

6. Judicial Proceedings — a. Parties. Under the liquor tax law in New York judicial proceedings for the revocation of a certificate may be instituted by any citizen who is a taxpayer of the county,[93] against the holder of record of the certificate,[94] joining also the county treasurer who issued it, in cases where he is a proper party.[95] But an application to discontinue the proceeding may not be made by the respondent, but only by the party who instituted the proceeding.[96]

b. Pleading. The petition must show the complainant's right to bring such proceeding,[97] and state with reasonable certainty and precision the facts on which the application is based,[98] and be properly verified.[99] The answer should conform to the ordinary rules of pleading, and contain an explicit denial of the allegations which the respondent means to controvert.[1]

c. Evidence. A liquor license will not be revoked for a breach of its conditions or a violation of the laws unless the evidence in support of the charges is clear and convincing.[2] The essential fact that the respondent holds a license must be proved by the complainant or petitioner.[3] But if the respondent claims to be within any exception in the statute which would save him from the ordinary consequences of the act complained of he must assume the burden of proving this contention.[4]

d. Trial and Judgment. On proceedings for the revocation of a license, it is the duty of the court to give the respondent a full and fair hearing.[5] But he is not entitled to a trial by jury as a matter of constitutional right.[6] It is no bar to Formal pleadings not necessary.— Proceedings under the statute to vacate a liquor license do not call for formal pleadings, nor are they within the purview of the rules regulating pleadings under the Practice Act. Burns' Appeal, 76 Conn. 395, 56 Atl. 611.

Allegations on information and belief.— Under a statute which requires the petition to state the facts on which the application is based, a petition merely averring that the petitioner "believes" that certain facts exist, or that the respondent has committed an act in violation of law, without stating the grounds of his information and belief, is insufficient, and will not justify an order revoking the certificate. In re Peck, 167 N. Y. 391, 60 N. E. 775, 53 L. R. A. 888. But the statute is sufficiently complied with, although the application merely states the grounds on information and belief, when it is accompanied by affidavits, made a part of it, which state, on the personal knowledge of the affiants, facts justifying the cancellation of the certificate. Matter of Cullinan, 76 N. Y. App. Div. 362, 78 N. Y. Suppl. 466 [affirmed in 173 N. Y. 610, 66 N. E. 1106]; Matter of Cullinan, 40 Misc. (N. Y.) 423, 82 N. Y. Suppl. 337.

Grounds not alleged.— The certificate can be revoked, if at all, only on the grounds alleged in the petition. It is immaterial that the evidence, taking a wider range, may disclose other grounds which would have been sufficient if pleaded. Nor can the petitioner, on an appeal, urge matters not presented in his petition. Matter of Plass, 71 N. Y. App. Div. 488, 76 N. Y. Suppl. 2; Matter of Purdy, 40 N. Y. App. Div. 133, 57 N. Y. Amendment on appeal.— The original petition cannot be amended on appeal by the addition of grounds for the revocation of the license shown by the evidence but not alleged. Matter of Plass, 71 N. Y. App. Div. 488, 76 N. Y. Suppl. 2.

Default for want of answer.— Under the statute providing that after service of a petition to revoke a liquor tax certificate and an order to show cause, the judge may revoke the certificate, unless the holder files a verified answer raising an issue as to some material point in the petition, in which event the judge must take proof, otherwise the order may be granted by default, this does not dispense with the petition stating jurisdictional facts, and authorize the court to revoke the certificate on default, as the legislature cannot raise a presumption of guilt from an omission of the accused to testify. In re Peck, 167 N. Y. 391, 60 N. E. 775, 53 L. R. A. 888. And see Matter of Cullinan, 41 Misc. (N. Y.) 392, 84 N. Y. Suppl. 1075 [affirmed in 89 N. Y. App. Div. 613, 85 N. Y. the prosecution of the proceedings that an action is already pending on the licensee's bond,[7] that the license has expired by lapse of time since the commencement of the proceedings,[8] or that a former application for the revocation of a license issued for the same place, but to a different person, based on the same grounds, was denied.[9] The right to costs, except in so far as expressly regulated by the statute, rests in the discretion of the court.[10]

e. Appeal and Review. On appeal from an order revoking a liquor license the appellate court will not review the facts or retry the issues of fact, but will presume that the court of first instance based its decision on proper and sufficient evidence.[11]

7. Effect of Revocation. The revocation of a liquor license extinguishes all rights and privileges acquired or held under it, and makes all future sales by the former licensee unlawful.[12] It does not bar a criminal prosecution against him for the same statutory offense which constituted the ground for revoking the license.[13]

VII. Regulation of Traffic.[14]

A. In General. The traffic in intoxicating liquors is not malum in se. The sale of such products is not an offense at common law, but, in the absence of a prohibitive or restrictive statute, is lawful and free to all persons. Hence punitive or restrictive measures against any individual engaging in the traffic can only be based upon the terms of some valid and operative law or ordinance.[15] In determining what statute is operative at a given time, attention should be paid to the general rule that a general statute relating to the traffic in intoxicating liquors, intended to cover the whole ground and to contain the entire law on the subject, and which establishes a different system, or adds new offenses or prescribes different penalties, will repeal by implication, if not expressly, all existing laws on the same subject in force in the same jurisdiction.[16] And a general liquor law, containing no exceptions, will be operative in all parts of the state, including all of its cities or other municipal corporations, unless there is something showing an intention to exempt them.[17] And conversely a local statute regulating the liquor traffic in a city or district may operate as a repeal or suspension of the general law of the state on the same subject so far as concerns the particular locality.[18] Statutes on this subject are to be construed by the same rules which are applicable in statutory interpretation in general, unless particular principles for their construction have been ordained by law,[19] and while their criminal or penal provisions cannot apply retroactively, they may take effect upon rights existing under licenses already issued, or limit or forbid the future sale of property already in existence at the time of their enactment.[20]

B. Particular Regulations — 1. Quantity Sold. In many of the states statutes are in force prohibiting the sale, by unlicensed dealers, of intoxicating liquors in quantities less than a certain minimum, or classifying dealers into wholesalers and retailers and providing that the former shall not be permitted to sell less than a certain quantity at a time,[21] or providing for different kinds of licenses or permits, the one permitting the sale of liquor to be drunk on the premises, and the other authorizing its sale only when it is not to be consumed at the place of sale.[22]

2. Purpose of Sale. Statutes entirely prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, or subjecting the traffic to severe restrictions, frequently contain exceptions permitting such sale, under certain regulations, for medical, mechanical, chemical, and sacramental purposes;[23] and if such exceptions are not expressly

Dispensary law.—A special act establishing a dispensary in a town does not repeal the general statute making it a misdemeanor to retail liquor without a license, although it prohibits the county commissioners from issuing a license to retail in said town, and provides that such a license, if issued, shall be no protection to one selling under it. Meaning of "wholesale."— A statute permitting the sale of liquor in "wholesale quantities," but without specifying the amount, is not incapable of execution; and where the legislature has fixed the quantity which a manufacturer may sell at one gallon or more, in the same or another statute, that quantity may be deemed to be the intent of the legislature in the use of the word "wholesale." made, it has been held that they will be implied by the courts in proper cases.[24] Under another system a special form of license is issued, permitting the licensee to make sales for these purposes only.[25]

3. PURITY AND QUALITY OF LIQUORS.[26] Laws have frequently been enacted against the adulteration of liquor, sold or intended for sale, with any substance that is poisonous in its nature or deleterious to human health.[27] Some statutes make such adulteration of liquor a criminal offense.[28] Others provide that the impure, vitiated, or adulterated condition of any liquors sold shall constitute a full defense to an action for the recovery of their price or value.[29] Others provide for a system of inspection of liquors offered for sale,[30] or require dealers to take an oath that they will not adulterate the liquors which they offer for sale, and to furnish a bond conditioned upon their due observance of this promise,[31] or require all bottles or packages containing liquor to be stamped with a certificate of its purity.[32]

4. SALES TO PROHIBITED PERSONS. It is an important feature of systems for regulating the traffic in intoxicating liquors that dealers should be forbidden to sell such liquors to certain classes of persons especially liable to be injured, morally or physically, by their use, such as minors, habitual drunkards, persons intoxicated at the time, and idiots or insane persons.[33]

5. SALES ON CERTAIN DAYS. Laws regulating the traffic in intoxicating liquors frequently forbid their sale on Sunday or the keeping open of saloons or bars on that day.[34] In many states this regulation is left to the care of the different

Michigan.— Kurtz v. People, 33 Mich. 279, holding that a statutory provision that all saloons for the sale of liquor shall be "closed" on Sunday means that sales of liquor shall be entirely stopped on that day, and the traffic shut off effectually, so that municipalities; and generally a grant of exclusive power to a municipal corporation to regulate the liquor traffic, when executed by the enactment of an ordinance forbidding sales on Sunday, will supersede or suspend the operation of the general law of the state on the same subject.[35] Sales of liquor on Sunday may also be prohibited by the general laws relating to the cessation of business on that day, although not specifically forbidden by the liquor laws.[36] And although the statute may not make it an offense to sell on Sunday, yet if it limits the rights of a licensed dealer, by excepting sales so made from the protection of his license, then a sale on Sunday is punishable as an unlicensed sale.[37] And conversely if the license laws do not prohibit sales on Sunday, such a sale is not punishable as an unlicensed sale, although it may be a criminal offense under another and distinct statute.[38] Sales of intoxicating liquors on holidays[39] and election days[40] are often prohibited by statute.

6. HOURS OF CLOSING. A further regulation commonly found in statutes relating to the traffic in intoxicating liquors is that saloons and bars shall be closed during certain hours, although this matter is frequently left to the control of the municipalities.[41]

7. Character and Arrangement of Premises. The business of a licensed dealer in intoxicating liquors is subject to public regulation and control, in respect to the character and arrangement of the premises where the business is conducted.[42]

8. Orderly Conduct. It is a common requirement that licensed dealers shall keep good order in their houses;[43] and where this is required, and the dealer placed under bonds to fulfil this obligation, he has the right to eject from his premises persons creating a disturbance therein.[44] And where in addition the statute prohibits music and the presence of lewd women in premises used for the sale of liquor, the authorities of a city have no power to authorize balls to be conducted on such premises.[45]

9. Registration of Sales. A statute requiring liquor dealers to keep a record of their sales and to make periodical reports of the same to designated officers within a specified time is mandatory as to the time of making the report.[46] It is not necessary that the report should be in the exact form prescribed by the statute, if it contains all the items and details which the law requires.[47] Such a statute, when applicable to druggists, includes liquors dispensed by them on the prescription of physicians.[48]

10. Screens and Other Obstructions to View. In several of the states statutes provide that during the days and times when licensed saloons are required by law to be kept closed, or, in some states, at all times, all screens, curtains, blinds, or other obstructions which might prevent a clear view of the interior of the premises from the outside shall be removed, or that no such obstructions shall be "placed or maintained."[49] Statutes containing such provisions have been construed as apply-

Stalls, booths, or inclosures.— A municipal ordinance directing that no licensed liquor dealer shall construct any stall, booth, or other inclosure in or in connection with any room or place in any building where liquor is sold, which could be used as a place for lounging or drinking or for any immoral purpose, is valid and proper, and cannot be held unreasonable or oppressive. View from street or alley.— Where the law requires the removal, during prohibited hours, of all screens which may obstruct a view of the bar from the street or alley, it is sufficient to show, in the case of a saloon situated on an alley, that the alley was at the time open to the use of the general public, and a dedication need not be proved. ing to all persons,[50] and places coming within the scope of the purpose for which it was enacted;[51] and it is immaterial what purpose may have influenced the party in putting up the obstructions complained of, if they have in fact the effect of cutting off the view.[52] The law intends that there shall be a clear view of the whole of the room or place used for the selling of liquors, and an obstruction concealing any part of it is within the prohibition of the statute.[53] But it is necessary that the screen or other obstruction should materially interfere with the view of the interior of the premises, or of the business conducted there; and whether it does or not is a question of fact.[54] If the particular statute is not restricted to any days or times, it is violated by the placing or maintaining of a screen or other obstruction on Sunday, as well as on any other day, although the law requires the dealer to close his saloon entirely on that day and cease doing business.[55] Generally the violation of a statute of this character constitutes an indictable offense,[56] and the mere fact that a person indicted under the law holds a license is no defense.[57]

C. Applicability to Druggists and Physicians. Statutes prohibiting or regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors are applicable to druggists and physicians, unless exceptions or special provisions are made in their favor.[58] But the statutes usually allow them to dispense liquors for medicinal use, either by way of exception to the general prohibitions of the law, or under a special form of license or permit,[59] or it may be left to the municipal corporations of the state to make such exceptions or give such special permission.[60] In either case the privileges of such persons, being exceptions to the general law, are to be strictly construed.[61] Where a druggist is authorized to sell only on the prescription of a physician, a druggist who is himself a duly qualified physician cannot lawfully sell on his own prescription.[62]

Sales made in bad faith.— Where the intention of the statute is that sales shall be

D. Public Agents — 1. Appointment and Tenure. An agent appointed in a city or town to purchase intoxicating liquors for the municipality, and having the exclusive right to sell the same for permitted purposes, is not considered a city or town officer. His situation is not an office, but an employment, which ceases if not renewed at the end of the year, and he does not hold over until his successor is chosen.[63] Where the statute imperatively requires the selectmen, councilmen, or other municipal officers to appoint such an agent, they may be compelled to take action in that behalf, and are punishable for their neglect or refusal to do so.[64] They should not appoint one of their own number to act as such agent.[65] Such an agent cannot act at all until he has given the bond and received the certificate provided for by the statute.[66] And to support an action by the town against the agent, it must be shown by legal evidence that the latter was duly appointed as such agent.[67]

2. Powers and Duties. The powers of a town agent are strictly limited by law. If authorized only to sell, he cannot buy on behalf of the town.[68] The agent is held to a strict compliance with the law in respect to keeping a record of his sales and the accounts of his agency.[69] Although in possession of liquor purchased under his agency, he is not the owner of it, both the liquor and the money received from the sale of it belonging to the town.[70] He must keep strictly within the bounds of his authority[71] in regard to the terms of his purchases and sales, not being allowed to buy or sell on credit, unless the statute so permits.[72] And if a town agent violates the law by making sales for forbidden purposes, or to persons to whom he is not allowed to sell, he is liable to indictmade by druggists only for medicinal, mechanical, or chemical purposes, such sales are illegal if made with the knowledge or belief that the liquor is to be used as a beverage; and the fact that it was furnished on a prescription is not necessarily a defense to the druggist, for he is punishable if he sells in bad faith, knowing or believing that the prescription was false. Com. v. Gould, 158 Mass. 499, 33 N. E. 656; Com. v. Joslin, 158 Mass. 482, 33 N. E. 653, 21 L. R. A. 449.

Discretion of druggist.— Under a statute providing that druggists "may" sell intoxicating liquors on proper application, such sale is discretionary with the druggist, and if he refuses to make such a sale he is not required to give a reason for his refusal, nor is he liable in an action for damages for such refusal. ment and punishment, his official character being no protection to him, and notwithstanding that he is also liable to have his agency revoked and to a suit upon his bond.[73]

3. LIABILITY ON BONDS. Public agents for the purchase and sale of liquor are liable on their bonds for any violation of the laws restricting their right to sell or for a failure to account for the goods bought or money received by them in their official capacity.[74]

VIII. PENALTIES.

A. Actions and Defenses — 1. RIGHT AND GROUNDS OF ACTION. To sustain an action at law for the recovery of a penalty for a violation of the liquor laws, it must appear that defendant is amenable to a valid statute or ordinance, in force at the time of the act complained of,[75] and not repealed at the time of suit brought, unless the repealing act saves pending rights of action.[76] A municipal corporation or public officer is not precluded from maintaining such an action by the fact that the unlawful sale was made to a police detective or "spotter" employed and sent to defendant for that purpose, provided the sale was not specially induced by anything he said or did.[77] A criminal prosecution, resulting in the imposition of a fine or penalty, which is paid, will be a bar to a subsequent action at law to recover a penalty for the same illegal act.[78]

2. FORM OF ACTION. Generally a penalty for a violation of the liquor laws is recoverable in a civil action,[79] but under some statutes it may be recovered in a criminal proceeding.[80] Where a remedy is provided by statute a penalty can be enforced only by a strict pursuance of such remedy.[81]

3. JURISDICTION AND VENUE.[82] Such an action must be brought before a court or magistrate having jurisdiction thereof, that is to say jurisdiction not only with respect to the nature of the suit and the amount of the fine or penalty recoverable,[83]

but also territorial jurisdiction of the place or locality where the alleged offense was committed.[84]

4. PARTIES. Under some statutes an action of this kind is to be brought in the name of the state,[85] under others, by municipal authorities,[86] and under others by public officers specially appointed or specially clothed with authority for that purpose.[87] If such officers refuse or neglect to perform their duty, the suit may be brought in their names by a private individual,[88] and in some states, irrespective of such refusal or neglect, the right to sue is given to any citizen.[89] A parent can maintain an action for the penalty given by a statute for selling liquor to a minor child, although the minor was emancipated, and may maintain it after the child reaches his majority.[90] As to defendants in such an action, it is properly brought against any person who is within the terms of the statute or ordinance under which the penalty is sought.[91] If two or more joined in the commission of the offense, the action may be brought against them jointly or severally.[92]

5. DEFENSES. An action to recover such a penalty may be defended on the ground of the invalidity of the statute or ordinance under which it is brought,[93] but not on the ground of ignorance or mistake of fact,[94] or because defendant holds a license from another jurisdiction,[95] or because the authorities wrongfully refused to grant him a license,[96] or on the ground that the same offense exposes him to indictment or to another and different ground of action,[97] or that he acted in the transaction only as the servant of another, or that the unlawful sale was made by his barkeeper.[98] In an action to recover a penalty for selling liquor to minors, an answer alleging that the action was not brought in good faith, but for the purpose of blackmail, is demurrable.[99]

6. PROCESS AND APPEARANCE. An action to recover a penalty under the liquor laws, being generally civil in its nature, may be commenced by summons or complaint in the ordinary form.[1] The process should be indorsed with the title of the statute or a sufficient description of it.[2]

7. PLEADING. The declaration or complaint should show the authority of plaintiff to sue,[3] and that the statute or ordinance under which it is brought is in force,[4] and should designate with certainty the particular law under which a recovery is claimed.[5] Its allegations should be certain and specific,[6] particularly with reference to the time and place of the alleged offense,[7] the kind and quantity of liquor sold, if an unlawful sale is the gist of the offense,[8] and the name of the person to whom the sale was made, if it is known to plaintiff.[9] But it need not negative exceptions,[10] or allege knowledge or intent on the part of defendant where that is not an essential element of the offense.[11] It has been held that in debt to recover a penalty for selling liquor without a license, an allegation that the offense was committed "against the law in that behalf made and provided" is sufficient, the usual and better form, "against the form of the statute," not being essential.[12]

8. EVIDENCE. In an action of this kind it is not necessary to prove the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt,[13] nor is direct evidence required in all instances, circumstantial evidence being generally admissible,[14] and its weight and sufficiency being tested by the ordinary rules.[15] There should, however, be positive evidence to bring the case within the prohibition of the statute in respect to the time and place of sale and the purchaser.[16] And the intoxicating quality of the liquor sold must be proved if that fact is controverted.[17] If the ordinance prohibits the sale of liquor entirely, except for specified purposes, defendant has the burden of proving that the sale in question was for such a purpose.[18] And if the charge is selling without a license, the burden is on him to prove that he has a license, if such be the fact.[19] In an action to recover a penalty for selling liquor without a license, evidence is admissible of sales prior to the earliest day named in the complaint.[20] Where two persons are engaged as partners in selling liquor without a license, a sale by one is the act of both, and may be given in evidence against the partner who did not make the sale in an action against him alone for the penalty.[21]

9. Trial. Instructions by the court in an action of this character are governed by the ordinary rules.[22] It is not improper to direct a verdict for plaintiff, if the evidence justifies and requires it,[23] and it has been held that a verdict of "guilty" is substantially responsive to the issue.[24]

10. Amount Recoverable. Where the unlawful act alleged is a breach of some specific provision of the liquor laws, such as selling without a license, plaintiff can recover only one penalty, although he may prove several distinct transactions within the prohibition of the law.[25]

11. Judgment. In a civil action for a penalty under the liquor laws, the judgment against defendant can be only for a sum of money; it cannot include a sentence of imprisonment, or other coercive measures against his person.[26] A judgment imposing the penalty prescribed for a second offense, when the complaint does not allege it to be a second offense, is erroneous.[27]

12. Costs. It is sometimes required by statute that a person prosecuting for penalties in the name of a municipal officer shall give a covenant to both the officer and the municipality to pay all costs and indemnify them.[28] But security for costs is not always required in actions brought to recover penalties.[29] In an action by a city to recover the penalty for violating an ordinance as to sales of intoxicating liquors, a sum as attorney's fees cannot be incorporated in the judgment as costs, unless the law makes provision for such costs.[30]

13. Appeal and Review. In actions of this kind, unless special provision is made by statute, the ordinary rules will be applicable, in respect to the right of appeal and proceedings to secure an appeal;[31] and in respect to the action which the reviewing court may take on questions concerning the sufficiency of the process and pleadings,[32] and the admissibility and weight of the evidence presented at the trial.[33] actions accrue, according to the direction of the statute, to the use of the state, the municipality, or public institutions,[34] reserving in some states a share, usually one half, for the informer or prosecuting witness.[35] This share cannot be remitted, after judgment, by a pardon from the executive.[36]

IX. CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.

A. Criminal Offenses — 1. In General — a. Nature and Elements of Offense. Offenses against the liquor laws, such as illegal sales of intoxicants, keeping liquor in possession with intent to dispose of it unlawfully, illegally transporting liquor from place to place, and the like, are statutory crimes, not being indictable or punishable at common law.[37] It is therefore a general rule that if a sale of intoxicating liquor, or any other act in relation to it, is made the basis of a prosecution, the act complained of must be shown to be within the terms of some valid and operative statute.[38] And if the law simply prohibits the act under penalty of a fine, to be collected by suit, it does not create an indictable offense.[39] But as the statutory offense is committed by the doing of the prohibited act, a guilty or criminal intent is not a necessary part of the offense,[40] and defendant cannot Statutes strictly construed.— For this reason the offense must be brought plainly within the terms of the statute. Thus, if the law requires each "dealer" in liquors to pay a tax to the state, the act of making a single sale of an entire stock of liquors, without paying the tax, is not a violation of the law, for a "dealer" is one who makes successive sales as a business. Overall v. Bezeau, 37 Mich. 506.

Grade of offenses.— The offense of selling intoxicating liquor in contravention of a state statute, although punishable by imprisonment, is not an "infamous crime," in such sense that it must be prosecuted by presentment or indictment, within a constitutional provision in that behalf. excuse himself by showing that he acted through oversight, forgetfulness, or mistake ;[41] and conversely if his acts do not amount to a violation of the statute, they will not be rendered unlawful by the motive or purpose which actuated him.[42]

b. Applicability of Laws and Ordinances. It being necessary to bring the prosecution within the terms of some existing and operative statute or ordinance,[43] it should be noted that the operation of a law may be suspended or repealed, so far as to prevent prosecutions under it, by the enactment of a later statute, especially if the new law is more comprehensive in its terms, or prescribes different or more severe penalties.[44] Moreover if the law or ordinance under which the prosecution is instituted is of recent adoption, or has been repealed and reënacted, or suspended and then revived, it must be made clearly to appear that the alleged offense was committed at a time when it was in force.[45] Again, an act which would be punishable under the general law of the state may be within the terms of a municipal ordinance also, and then the question under which law the prosecution must be brought depends upon whether or not the municipality had exclusive power to regulate the traffic and prescribe penalties for illegal acts.[46] And two or more offenses may be created and defined by the same statute, consisting of different acts, although grouped together in general language, and especially where the terms employed are in the disjunctive.[47] Further the terms of two statutes may be mutually exclusive. Thus one cannot be convicted of the offense of selling liquor without a license in a county where the sale of liquor is entirely prohibited under the local option law, adopted and in force in that county.[48]

2. Liquors Prohibited. The liquors against which the various prohibitive or restrictive statutes are aimed are such as are capable of producing intoxication when used as a beverage, and which are commonly used for that purpose.[49] They may be described in the statutes by the use of such general terms as "intoxicating" or "spirituous" liquors, or more specifically as "vinous," "fermented," "malt," "brewed," or "distilled" liquors, or even by their individual names.[50] In the latter case no issue can be raised as to the intoxicating properties of the particular liquor; the only question is whether it comes within the terms of the statute.[51] Also it is competent for the legislature to define the term "intoxicating liquor" by directing that all liquors shall be included within that term which contain more than a certain proportion of alcohol.[52]

3. SPECIFIC OFFENSES AGAINST LIQUOR LAWS — a. Manufacture of Liquors. If the manufacture or brewing of liquors has not been prohibited by law, it is a lawful pursuit, and sales of the product in packages or casks, according to the custom of brewers and distillers, are lawful, the authority to make implying the authority to sell.[53] But in most states the manufacture of liquors is not permitted except by persons who have obtained a license and who comply with certain conditions.[54]

b. Illegal Transportation.[55] Statutes prohibiting the transportation of liquors from place to place within a state[56] apply to the conveyance of liquors from one place to another in the same city or town, as their carriage from wholesale to retail dealers.[57] These statutes are primarily directed against express companies and other common carriers, but may include all persons doing the prohibited acts.[58]

c. Illegal Possession. In some of the states the statutes are so framed as to make it a punishable offense to keep or have in one's possession intoxicating liquors at certain times or places, or without complying with certain conditions, although he may intend them for his own use, or although his purpose in regard to them is not otherwise unlawful.[59]

No obligation to transport.— Common carriers and express agents, when criminally prosecuted for the transportation and delivery of liquor, under these statutes, cannot allege in defense that they acted merely as agents or carriers and were compelled to do what they did; for the law neither requires nor permits common carriers to do illegal acts, and they are not bound to transport any particular commodities, if thereby they incur a penalty. intent to sell the same[60] unlawfully is an entirely distinct crime from the illegal sale or offer for sale of such liquors, and the liability of the offender to prosecution for the one offense, or the fact that he has already been convicted for it, will not prevent his prosecution and punishment for the other,[61] and to complete the offense of unlawful keeping it is not necessary to show a sale or attempt to sell, or that the liquors were exposed or offered for sale.[62] And although defendant is licensed or otherwise authorized to sell the liquors, under certain conditions, yet his actual intention to dispose of them unlawfully or in violation of those conditions will expose him to prosecution under the statute.[63] It is not necessary that he should own the liquor in question; for he may keep it for unlawful sale, although it is the property of a third person;[64] and he is equally guilty, although he does not intend that the unlawful sales shall be made by himself, but by his clerk or servant or some other person.[65] The place of unlawful keeping must of course be within the jurisdiction, but the place of intended sale is not generally material, except on the question whether it was within or without the state.[66] Where the statute specifies the different liquors which it shall be unlawful thus to keep, separate offenses may be committed by the concurrent keeping of several kinds of the designated liquors.[67] But in any case the unlawful purpose or intention is of the essence of the offense and must be clearly made out.[68]

e. Carrying on Business of Liquor Selling. To constitute the offense of engaging in or carrying on the business of liquor selling without a license, or without the payment of the tax, there must be both an intention to traffic in liquors as a business and also one or more actual transactions in pursuance of that intention; neither of these elements is sufficient without the presence of the other.[69] And an occasional sale of liquor by one pursuing a different occupation, although it may be incidental to his business, does not make him an offender against the statute;[70] although, on the other hand, it is not necessary to a conviction to show that the traffic in liquors was his sole occupation or the principal part of his business.[71] A single unlawful sale is not enough to constitute this offense,[72] unless it is shown to have been made in pursuance of an intention to engage in or to continue the business, or unless it is shown to be part of an actual and continuous business.[73]

f. Being a Common Seller. In several states it is made an offense to be a "common seller" of intoxicating liquors.[74] If the statute does not declare how many separate sales must be shown in order to convict of this offense, it is sufficient if the jury are satisfied from the evidence that selling liquor was the common and ordinary business of defendant, and they will be authorized to find him guilty without proof of any particular or fixed number of sales.[75] But in some states the law provides that three several sales of liquor shall be sufficient evidence of the character of defendant as a common seller.[76] This provision is valid and constitutional,[77] and under it it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury that proof of three sales is enough evidence to warrant a verdict of guilty.[78] It should also be noticed that the separate sales and the "being a common seller" are distinct offenses, so that one may be convicted and punished for each illegal sale which he makes, and if he makes three or more such sales, he may also be punished for being a common seller.[79]

g. Maintaining Liquor Nuisance. Statutes making it an indictable offense to maintain a liquor nuisance[80] are primarily directed against the place rather than the acts done there; that is, criminality under these statutes lies not so much in making illegal sales of liquor, or the like, as in the use or maintenance of a building or place for such unlawful purposes.[81] And it is not necessary that the sale of liquor should be the main purpose of the place or one of its main purposes.[82] But defendant must be connected with the nuisance by showing that he owned or controlled the place.[83] And it is essential to constitute the offense that unlawful or forbidden acts should have been performed at the place in question, which may consist, according to the various statutes, in sales of liquor in violation of some law or ordinance,[84] or in sales for an unlawful purpose by one who holds a license or permit authorizing him to sell for lawful purposes,[85] or sales by a licensed dealer at prohibited times, as on Sunday,[86] or in the illegal storage or keeping of liquors for sale,[87] or in permitting the assembling of vicious persons or other disorderly conduct on the premises.[88] The offense may be committed by one who permits his servants to make illegal sales of liquor,[89] or by a landlord who knowingly permits his tenant to use the premises in such a manner as to constitute a nuisance.[90]

h. Keeping Place for Unlawful Sale. In many states the statutes[91] make it an offense to keep or maintain a tenement for the unlawful keeping or sale of liquor,[92] or to keep a "public bar,"[93] or a "place of public resort" for illicit selling or drinking,[94] or a place "where it is reputed that intoxicating liquors are sold or kept for sale,"[95] or the like.[96] If the statutory offense consists in keeping a place "for" the unlawful sale of liquor, there must be a purpose to use it in that manner,[97] although that need not be the sole or the main purpose of the building.[98] But if the statute is directed against the maintenance of a place "where" liquors "are" unlawfully sold, the fact of selling at such place is the essential thing, not the intent in regard to the use of the place.[99] The charge cannot be successfully met by anything less than a proper license or authority to sell.[1] And the "keeping" of a place for the unlawful sale of liquor is a distinct offense from any act of unlawful selling.[2]

i. Employment or Admission of Prohibited Persons. By statute[3] in several jurisdictions, it is an indictable offense to permit minors to enter and remain in, or loiter about, a saloon or bar-room,[4] or persons of bad character to assemble there, at any time,[5] or to suffer any person at all to enter during prohibited days or hours,[6] or to employ women in such places as waitresses or otherwise.[7]

j. Keeping Disorderly House. A person who sells liquor and permits it to be drunk on his premises is liable to indictment for keeping a disorderly house, when those to whom he sells it behave in such a manner as to disturb the neighborhood.[8] A house may be disorderly by reason of a habitual violation of the law regulating the sale of liquor.[9] Keeping a place where liquors are sold in a disorderly manner is sometimes by statute a criminal offense.[10]

k. Keeping Tippling-House. It is sometimes made a statutory offense to keep a tippling-house.[11]

n. Unlawful Sales — (i) Sale in General — (a) Elements of Offense. To constitute the offense of making an illegal sale of liquor, there must have been a "sale" within the ordinary meaning of that term, unless it is associated, in the statute, with other words which may have the effect of broadening its scope.[14] But to establish an illegal sale it is not necessary to show that defendant was the owner of the liquor sold,[15] that he made any profit out of the sale,[16] that he made the sale in person, if another acted for him with his authority or consent,[17] that the liquor should be the only article transferred between the parties, or that the price paid for it should be severable from that paid for other things included in the same purchase.[18] If the statute is specifically directed against unlawful sales, it is not necessary to show an engaging or continuing in the business; a single sale, without legal justification, constitues the offense.[19] But the sale may be deprived of criminality by the character of the person to whom it is made.[20]

(B) What Constitutes a Sale. The offense of illegally selling liquor is not committed by a bargain or executory contract for a sale. There must be a completed sale, which passes the property,[21] consummated by the act of the parties as distinguished from the operation of the law,[22] and amounting to a vending and purchasing of the particular commodity.[23] It is not necessary that the liquor should have been paid for by the purchaser.[24] But there must have been a delivery of the liquor to him,[25] which, however, is sufficiently established by proof that the purchaser helped himself to a drink or a bottle of liquor, in the presence of the owner, and handed the latter the price or left it in a place accessible to him.[26]

(C) Sale on Credit. An illegal sale of liquor is none the less a violation of law because it is made on credit, instead of for cash. It is not a gift, if there is an understanding or expectation that payment shall be made; and it is immaterial that the law furnishes no means of enforcing payment.[27]

(D) Barter or Exchange. As a "sale" is a transfer of property for a price in money, an indictment for selling liquor unlawfully is not sustained by evidence which shows an exchange or barter, whether of the same or some other commodity.[28]

(E) Payment in Services or in Kind. In some states the courts have stretched the meaning of the word "sale" to make it include the giving of liquor in return for the grain or fruit out of which it was distilled,[29] or in payment for services rendered.[30]

(F) Gift or Loan. A "gift," as distinguished from a "sale," means a gratuitous transfer of property without any equivalent. Hence, if the statute prohibits merely the "sale" of liquor, it is not an indictable offense to give it away.[31] A gift of liquor is, however, sometimes specifically forbidden by statute,[32] or may be included in such broad terms of prohibition as "selling or disposing of," or "sell or furnish."[33] Even under such statutes, it is no offense to give liquor in one's own house to his family, domestic servants, or invited guests, as a mere act of kindness or hospitality, and with no purpose to evade or break the law.[34] A loan

Where a saloon-keeper invites others to his saloon on Sunday, unlocks the door and admits them and gives them beer, which they drink, it is a violation of the statute. Johnson v. Chattanooga, 97 Tenn. 247, 36 S. W. 1092.

of liquor with the understanding that it is to be repaid in other liquor of the same kind is not a sale.[35]

(G) Devices to Conceal Sale. In any case where a sale or gift of liquor would be contrary to law, the courts will discountenance any trick, artifice, or subterfuge intended to evade its terms. No matter what the disguise or pretense, it is enough to sustain a conviction if liquor was actually sold or given in violation of the law.[36]

(H) Acting as Agent For Another. Where one person assists another in procuring liquor, either by conducting him to the place where it is sold, or acting as his messenger in going there and bringing back the liquor, he is not guilty of selling the liquor to his principal, notwithstanding both the money and the goods may pass through his hands, provided he had no interest in the liquor or in the price, and acted as the agent or intermediary of the buyer, and not of the seller.[37]

Furnishing ale and wine to boarders at an inn or boarding-house, as a part of their meals, constitutes a sale of intoxicating liquors, and not a giving away of the same at one's private dwelling, within the permission of the statute. State v. Lotti, 72 Vt. 115, 47 Atl. 392.

"Dwelling."— A person who gives away liquor in a room in which no business is conducted, but which is not his dwelling, is not within the protection of a statute permitting such giving when it takes place "at private dwellings or their dependencies." State v. Danforth, 62 Vt. 188, 19 Atl. 229.

Treating customers.— It is against the law for a traveling agent of a retail liquor dealer, soliciting orders in the country, to be filled at the home place, to give a drink of whisky to a prospective customer. State v. Jones, 88 Minn. 27, 92 N. W. 468.

Pretended sale of some other article.— A device by which one party pretends to sell, and the other to buy, turpentine, when in fact the intention is to buy and sell whisky, is not effective as an evasion of the law. Looney v. State, 43 Ark. 389. So where a different article, such as tobacco, groceries, or meat, is actually bought and sold, and the parties pretend that the liquor which is furnished or delivered with it is a gift or treat, whereas the price paid really covers the cost of the liquor, or the liquor is the actual subject of their bargain, and the other article only a subterfuge, it is a violation of the law. Sandwiches with drinks.— Under a statute permitting hotel-keepers to serve liquor to their guests at meals, a violation of the law is committed where nothing in the shape of a meal accompanies the liquor ordered and consumed by a customer except a sandwich, and especially where the sandwich is neither ordered, eaten, nor paid for by the customer, and is no more than a perfunctory adjunct to the drink. A banker selling bills of lading at his bank to all persons applying, thereby enabling them to obtain intoxicating liquors at a freight depot, is guilty of selling the liquors. State v. Snyder, 108 Iowa 205, 78 N. W. 807.

A blind tiger is a place in which intoxicating liquors are sold by a device whereby the party selling the same is concealed from the person buying. See Rowe v. Com., 70 S. W. 407, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 974; Smith v. State, 42 Tex. Cr. 414, 57 S. W. 815. Thus where two persons went into a room above a saloon and placed ten cents each on a dumb-waiter, and stepped into an adjoining room for a few minutes, and when they came back they found two glasses of beer and some cigars on the waiter and the money gone, it was held a sale of the beer. Henry v. State, 113 Ind. 304, 15 N. E. 593. On the same principle there is an illegal sale, although the price of the liquor is not handed directly to the seller, if it is deposited in his presence in a place which is accessible to him. But if it appears that the alleged intermediary was in reality the owner of the liquor, he is guilty of making a sale,[38] and so if he really acts as the agent of the seller, rather than of the purchaser,[39] or solicits and receives orders for the sale of liquor,[40] or solicits others to join with him in the purchase of a quantity of liquor, and receives and distributes it,[41] or if the pretended agency is a mere trick or subterfuge to evade the law.[42] This is a question for the jury upon all the facts and circumstances of the case,[43] and even if the agent acted in good faith this will not exempt the real seller from responsibility if the sale was otherwise unlawful.[44]

(I) Entrapping Defendant. It is no defense to a prosecution for an illegal sale of liquor that the purchase was made by a "spotter," detective, or hired informer.[45]

(J) Knowledge and Intent of Seller[46] — (1) IGNORANCE AS A DEFENSE. In a prosecution for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquor, it is no defense that the seller did not know that the liquor sold by him was intoxicating, or that he believed it was not intoxicating, if in fact it was.[47] And a similar rule is applied in case of other mistakes of fact.[48] Unlawful sale of spirituous liquors is not excused by the fact that the seller, acting under the advice of his counsel, believed that the particular sale was not a violation of the law.[49]

(2) PURPOSE OR INTENT OF SALE — (a) IN GENERAL. Where a sale of intoxicating liquor is made by one who has no authority to sell for any purpose whatever, it is a general rule that the reasons which prompted him, the spirit or intention with which he made the sale, or the purpose which he expected the sale to subserve, are entirely immaterial, and cannot excuse him from the legal consequences of his act.[50]

(b) SALE FOR USE AS MEDICINE. In some states it is held that, although the statutes may forbid the sale of liquor in general terms, yet a sale made with the actual and bona fide intention that the liquor shall be used only as medicine, and not as a beverage, is not a criminal offense, the law implying an exception in such cases.[51] But in others no such exception is admitted unless explicitly stated in the statute.[52] But if the vendor is authorized to sell for medical purposes, as a druggist for example, he is not guilty of an offense if he acts in good faith and in a reasonable belief that the liquor is to be used as medicine, although the purchaser may secretly intend to use it as a beverage, and does so use it.[53]

to be delivered to the purchaser, does not violate the law, although the carrier agrees to collect the price, for the sale is made at the place where the goods are separated from the general stock and delivered to the carrier, such delivery being delivery to the consignee.[56] But irrespective of the place where the bargain was made or the order received, if the seller, by his own hands or the hands of his servant or agent, carries the liquor to the purchaser, without any intermediate delivery to or through a common carrier, and delivers the liquor to the purchaser at the latter's place, and there receives the pay for it, the sale is made at the place of delivery, and if the vendor is not licensed to sell there he is indictable.[5] Where a person, living and doing business in a territory within which a sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited, receives at his home an order from a person living in another state for intoxicating liquor at an agreed price and in pursuance of such order delivers such liquor at a railroad station within the prohibited territory for shipment to the purchaser at his home in another state, the transaction is a sale of liquor within the prohibited territory.[58]

incurs but one penalty, although several persons may join in drinking it.[60] Where two persons join in selling liquor without a license, they incur only a single penalty.[61]

(II) Sales Without License—(A) In General. Where a valid and operative statute[62] provides a system of granting licenses, and prohibits all persons from selling liquor without procuring such license, under penalty of prosecution and punishment,[63] the obtaining of a license is an absolute prerequisite to the right to sell; no substitute for it will avail, and no excuse for a failure to obtain it will be heard,[64] unless the vendor can bring himself within an excepted or privileged class.[65] And if the person prosecuted has no license at all, and therefore no authority to sell under any circumstances, it makes no difference that the sales made were also in violation of the Sunday law,[66] and the quantity of liquor included in the sale is immaterial,[67] as is also the fact that the sale was made to a minor or other prohibited person.[68] And a single act of selling is sufficient to constitute the offense.[69]

(B) Sales by Producers or Manufacturers. The license laws of the various states frequently contain provisions exempting from their terms persons who for medical and mechanical purposes,[77] or on the prescription of a physician.[78] An unlawful sale, beyond the scope, purpose, or permission of the druggist's license, should be prosecuted under the special statute applicable to such licenses, and not under the general law prohibiting unlicensed selling.[79] In order to hold a physician liable for a violation of the local option law, there must be an illegal sale, brought about by virtue of his act; and merely giving a prescription will not justify a conviction.[80]

(D) Sales Not Authorized by License. A license for the sale of liquor cannot protect the holder from criminal prosecution if he makes sales at times or places, or to persons, or for purposes, prohibited by the express terms of his license or by the general laws of the state or applicable municipal ordinances.[81]

(III) Sale or Keeping Open at Prohibited Times—(A) In General. In many of the states it is made a criminal offense to "keep open" a bar-room or saloon on certain days or after certain hours.[82] While the laws also commonly prohibit the sale of liquor at such times, the sale and the keeping open for sale are entirely distinct and independent offenses,[83] so that no actual sale of liquor is necessary to complete the offense of keeping open, and on an indictment for the latter offense, it need not be alleged or proved that defendant sold any liquor.[84]

(B) What Is "Keeping Open." To constitute this offense, it is not necessary that the place should be kept open in the same manner as on ordinary and lawful days. It is enough if it is so kept that access may be had thereto on the prohibited day, and facilities afforded for obtaining liquor, and it is not material whether the access is by a front door, side door, or back door, or whether the door is kept open or is only opened on application for admittance.[85] In some states the law takes no regard of the purpose for which the place was opened, it being held that the criminality of the act is not obviated by the fact that the purpose was innocent and harmless.[86] But in others it is considered that there is no violation of the law if there was imperative necessity for opening the place, and the purpose of doing so did not contemplate any unlawful act.[87] It is also a rule that, although the bar-room or saloon itself may not be open to the public, yet if other rooms in the house, connected with the bar-room, and habitually or occasionally used for drinking purposes, are accessible to persons desiring liquor, such rooms are regarded as a part of the saloon, and while they are open the saloon is not closed as the law requires.[88]

Where it is made an offense to "sell or give" liquor to a minor, it is immaterial whether the transaction constituted in law a sale or a gift. Hamer v. Eldridge, 171 Mass. 250, 50 N. E. 611.

Barter or loan.— Neither selling nor giving is included in a case where the transac-

give,[14] or furnish[15] any intoxicating liquor to a minor.[16] And such prohibited act may be prosecuted as a separate offense, although it constitutes also an indictable offense against the laws forbidding sales on Sunday or sales without a license, or the like.[17]

(2) INTENT, KNOWLEDGE, OR GOOD FAITH OF SELLER. Where the statute defines the offense as "knowingly" selling intoxicating liquor to a minor, the knowledge of the seller is an essential element of the offense and must be proved, his knowledge including such facts as he could have ascertained by the exercise of proper prudence and diligence.[18] If the statute does not expressly make the knowledge of the purchaser's minority a part of the offense, it is held in several of the states that the seller is not guilty if he made the sale in good faith, after exercising due caution and diligence, and in the reasonable and honest belief that the purchaser was an adult, although he was in fact a minor.[19] But in other states it is held that the seller of liquor is bound to determine for himself, at his peril, whether or not the purchaser is a minor, and if he sells to one who is in fact under age, he is criminally liable, although he was actually ignorant of the fact, and although he honestly believed that the purchaser was of full age.[20]

(3) Consent of Parent or Guardian. In the absence of a statute changing the general rule, it is no defense to a prosecution for selling liquor to a minor that his parent or guardian authorized or consented to the sale.[21] But in several states such sale is permitted on the written authorization of the parent or guardian, under special statutes to that effect.[22] For this purpose, however, a mere oral consent is not sufficient,[23] nor one which is general and unlimited as to time or quantity.[24] With such authorization the dealer may make any sale to a minor which comes within the terms of the permission and would otherwise be lawful;[25] without it he is not justified in selling to the minor for any purpose whatever,[26] and it makes no difference that the minor had neither parent nor guardian who could give the required consent.[27]

(4) Delivery to Minor as Agent for Another. Where a minor purchases liquor, not for his own consumption, but for the use of an adult, as whose agent or messenger he is acting, and to whom the sale might lawfully be made, the seller must inform himself of the fact of the minor's agency. If he ascertains this fact by inquiry, by the presentation of a written order, or by other sources of information, and the fact is as alleged, he sells to the adult, and is not guilty of selling to the minor.[28] But if the principal is not disclosed, so that, for all the seller knows to the contrary, he is selling to the minor for the latter's own use, he is guilty of the statutory offense, although in fact the minor was only acting as messenger for another.[29]

(5) Purchase by Adult For Use of Minor. Where a minor and an adult go together to a liquor saloon, and the adult "treats" the minor, calling for liquor for both and paying for the whole, the sale is to the adult, and the dealer is not guilty of selling to the minor.[30] But this may constitute a "giving" of liquor to the minor, under statutes prohibiting such gifts, the dealer being considered as participating in the act of the person treating,[31] or a "furnishing" of the liquor.[32] If an adult acts merely as an agent or messenger for a minor, buying liquor for the latter with the latter's own money, the dealer is not indictable if he did not know or suspect that the adult was so acting.[33] But he is guilty if he knew that the minor was the real purchaser.[34] A person who at a minor's request and with his money buys liquor for him and delivers it to him is not guilty of selling to the minor.[35] But such a transaction violates a statute against furnishing liquor to a minor.[36]

When verbal order a protection.— A liquor dealer is not guilty of furnishing liquor to a minor, where the liquor is delivered to him on a verbal order from his parent, to be carried to him, and he actually carries it without consuming or parting with any of it; but if the message is a fabrication, and the minor consumes the liquor, the dealer is guilty, the risk being on him where the minor does not produce a written order. A drunkard is one whose habit is to get drunk — one whose ebriety has become habitual. The terms "drunkard," "common drunkard," and "habitual drunkard" all mean the same thing. Com. v. Whitney, 5 Gray (Mass.) 85.

Question of fact.— Whether or not a man is a habitual drunkard, or a person of known intemperate habits, is a question of fact for the jury, to be determined upon competent evidence in each particular case. Kammann are generally immaterial,[43] as is also the quantity of liquor sold.[44] In a prosecution under such statutes, it is necessary to show that the purchaser was in the habit of becoming intoxicated, or was a habitual drunkard, at the time the sale was made,[45] but not that he was drunk at that particular time, as that is not a part of the offense.[46] It is generally held to be unnecessary to constitute the offense that the seller should have knowledge of the buyer's intemperate habits, and that ignorance or mistake of fact in that regard is no defense to the indictment.[47] But in several states it has been decided that defendant must be acquitted if he shows that he was ignorant of the purchaser's habits, and that there were no facts known to him, or discoverable by observation or proper care, to warn him.[48]

(F) Intoxicated Persons. Under statutes[49] making it a punishable offense for any person[50] to sell or give[51] intoxicating liquors at retail[52] to a person who is in a state of intoxication at the time,[53] it has been held that is not necessary, to constitute the offense, that the seller should know his customer to be intoxicated at the time, and his ignorance of the purchaser's condition is no defense.[54]

(V) SALES AT PROHIBITED PLACES—(A) In General. To convict a defendant of the offense of selling liquor at a prohibited place, it must be shown that the place in question was within the territorial jurisdiction of the prosecuting

"Known intemperate habits."— In Pennsylvania, where the law forbids the sale of liquor to a person of "known intemperate habits," it is held that the habits must be known to the community, but not necessarily to the seller; that is, although the seller may have no personal knowledge that his customer is a drunkard, the statutory offense is committed if he sells liquor to one who in fact is intemperate in his habits, and who bears that reputation in the neighborhood in which he lives. school, academy, or other institution of learning.[61] Under a statute of this character, it is held that the prohibition applies to the territory covered by radii extending in all directions, for the prescribed distance from the point at which the church or school is situated.[62]

(VI) Sales in Prohibited Quantities. A sale of liquor in a less quantity than that permitted by the vendor's license may be punished as an unlicensed sale.[63] In determining the quantity sold, it has been decided that, although the quantity sold and paid for may be greater than the statutory minimum, yet if only a portion of it is delivered at the time, the rest remaining, subject to the buyer's call, in the seller's custody and not separated from the bulk of his stock, he may be indicted for the sale of that portion which was delivered to the purchaser, if that is within the statute.[64] But it is otherwise if the liquor sold is separated from the bulk out of which it is drawn, and set apart for the purchaser's use, although it is not all paid for at one time, and although it is taken away in small quantities.[65] If more than the statutory minimum is sold and delivered to one purchaser at the same time, it is immaterial that it is put up in small packages or bottles,[66] unless this is specially forbidden by the statute.[67] If liquor is delivered to several different persons in separate bottles or glasses, each holding less than the required amount, it is a sale at retail, although the aggregate amount may exceed the statutory limit, and although one person may pay for the whole.[68] If several different kinds of liquor are sold to the same purchaser at the same time, it is no violation of the law if the entire purchase amounts to more than the statutory minimum, although the quantity of each kind sold may be below the limit.[69] A statutory provision of this kind cannot be evaded by any trick or device,[70] but the guilt of the accused may depend on the good faith and belief of the parties.[71]

(VII) SALES FOR PROHIBITED PURPOSES. A license to sell liquor for certain purposes therein specified cannot protect the licensee from criminal prosecution for violating the laws of the state by selling liquor for other purposes than those named.[72] If the license permits the sale of liquor "not to be drunk on the premises," it is immaterial whether or not the liquor was actually drunk there, if it was sold with the understanding or intent that it should be.[73] On the other hand the seller is not absolutely bound to prevent the consumption of the liquor on the premises, although he should do what he can to prevent it.[74] If the statute simply forbids the drinking of the liquor "on the premises," or forbids its sale for that purpose, it is held that to convict the seller it is necessary to show that the place of the drinking was a place over which he had the legal right to exercise authority and control.[75] But the expression "on or about the premises" is more comprehensive, and includes places not within the direct control of the seller, but which are so near his premises, and so situated in relation thereto, as to be within the mischief intended to be remedied.[76]

(VIII) SALES NOT PROHIBITED.[77] By way of exception to the laws forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors, under penalty of prosecution, the statutes commonly permit practising physicians to administer liquor to their patients as medicine,[78] or to issue prescriptions for that purpose,[79] while holding them criminally responsible for an abuse of their privileges or evasions of the law.[80] And correlatively, druggists or pharmacists,[81] holding the necessary license or permit,[82] are authorized to sell or dispense intoxicating liquors,[83] on the written prescription[84] of a practising physician,[85] calling for their use as medicine.[86] The statutes also commonly provide what shall constitute a sufficient prescription for this purpose, or what it shall contain.[87]

4. Persons Liable[88] — a. In General. To sustain a conviction under the liquor laws, it is not always necessary to show that the illegal sale, or other act, was the personal act of defendant, or was done in his presence, for he may be guilty if it was done in his interest and behalf, with his authority or consent, by persons in his employment or under his control.[89] In the case of a prosecution against an infant, the ordinary rule of law, as to showing capacity to commit crime, is applicable.[90]

b. Landlord and Tenant. The owner of premises where liquor is sold or kept for sale contrary to law is not guilty of an offense if he leased them for a lawful purpose, and did not affirmatively assent to such unlawful use; mere failure to prevent, or attempt to prevent, the illegal acts of his tenant, does not subject him to liability.[91] But under some of the statutes on the subject if the landlord leased the premises for that purpose, or if, with knowledge of the fact, he authorizes or permits the unlawful acts of the tenant he is liable.[92] It is essential that he should have such control of the premises as to be able to prevent or stop the illegal use of them, by eviction of the tenant or otherwise.[93]

c. Husband and Wife. Unless it is otherwise as the result of statutory enactments[94] a husband is criminally responsible for illegal sales, or other infractions of the liquor laws, made or done by his wife in his presence, or by his command, or with his knowledge and consent, or when she acts as his servant or agent;[95] but not if her acts were done in his absence, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the jury that they were done by his command or authority.[96] And if a married woman commits an offense against the liquor laws, of her own free will, not in the presence of her husband, and independent of any coercion or control by him, she herself is criminally liable and he is not.[97] The fact that a husband who was the manager of his wife's grocery store sold liquor at the store did not render the wife liable, when the sale was made without her knowledge, and contrary to her express orders and his promise to refrain from selling liquor there.[98] If a husband and wife are jointly concerned in the unlawful act — as, in maintaining a liquor nuisance or unlawfully retailing spirits — they may be jointly indicted and both convicted.[99] And the conviction of a wife for selling intoxicating liquors is not a bar to a prosecution against the husband for a sale made by the wife in his presence, unless it is shown that the offense charged is one for which the wife was convicted.[1]

d. Partners.[2] An indictment for a violation of the liquor laws may be maintained against partners who were jointly concerned in the illegal act,[3] or against the one who alone committed it.[4] But if one partner sells liquor unlawfully, in the absence of the other, and without his knowledge or consent, the latter is not liable,[5] except in states where the common-law rule has been changed by statute;[6] but he is equally responsible if the sale was made in his presence or with his acquiescence or consent.[7]

(III) Several Liability of Master and Servant. Where an offense against the liquor laws is committed by a servant or agent, under the general or special authorization of his employer, the latter as well as the former will be indictable, and both may be convicted and punished.[18]

(IV) Liability of Master For Acts of Servant — (A) In General. As a general rule the owner or proprietor of a saloon or bar is responsible for the criminal acts of his servant or agent done within the scope of the latter's general employment, or in the course of the general business authorized by the master; and the master is answerable for such acts done by the servant or agent, whether in or out of his proper or usual employment, when done by the master's command or with his knowledge and consent.[19]

(B) Knowledge or Consent of Master — (1) In General. If the whole course of the master's business is unlawful, as if he keeps liquor for sale without a license, he is responsible for any sales made by his clerks or servants, whether or not he knew of the particular sale or consented thereto, and no matter what his orders to them may have been.[20] And the same rule applies where the particular sale was made with the knowledge and consent of the principal, or in pursuance of his express command or of a general authority to his agent or servant to sell unlawfully.[21] But if the general course of the business is lawful, the master is not criminally liable for illegal sales made by his clerk, servant, or agent, without his knowledge or consent, express or implied, or in his absence and in disobedience to his commands or instructions,[22] except where the statutes are so broad as to hold the master responsible for all acts of his employees, whether authorized or permitted by him or not.[23] Where the evidence shows it must be shown that the order was given honestly and in good faith, and with the intention and expectation that it would be obeyed; connivance on the part of the employer will destroy the effect of such an order; and this is a question for the jury. Knowledge or consent.— All that is necessary to be proven is the knowledge or consent of defendant in the particular instance in controversy; the prosecution cannot be required to show his knowledge of, and consent to, the general violation of law by the servant or agent. Com. v. Rooks, 150 Mass. 59, 22 N. E. 436. Where the evidence shows a sale by a servant in his master's shop of his master's goods there kept for sale, it becomes incumbent upon the principal to show that the sale was made, not only without his knowledge, but also without his consent, express or implied, in order to escape liability. that the alleged unlawful sale of liquor was made in defendant's saloon or bar by his servant or agent, this raises a presumption that defendant authorized the sale or knew of it and consented to it,[24] which defendant may rebut by competent evidence.[25]

(2) Sales to Minors. In some states it has been held that a saloon-keeper cannot be convicted for a sale of liquor to a minor, made without his knowledge or consent, and in disobedience to his orders by his servant or agent.[26] But in others, the master has been held criminally responsible even under these circumstances.[27]

h. Purchasers. The purchaser of liquor which is sold in violation of law, although he knows the sale to be illegal, cannot be held guilty of any offense, on the ground of his soliciting or tempting the seller to violate the law, or on the ground of his having aided and abetted the crime to the mere extent of buying the liquor.[31]

i. Joint Liability. Two persons may be jointly indicted for an offense against the liquor laws, and both convicted if the proof warrants it, or one defendant may be convicted, although no case is made against the other.[32] It is not necessary, to sustain a joint indictment, that the two defendants should have participated in the unlawful act in the same manner or to the same degree, for all who are criminally connected with the wrongful act are principals.[33]

5. Distinct and Continuing Offenses — a. Separate Offenses in Same Act. In prosecutions under the liquor laws, where the liquor is furnished in answer to a single call, at one time and by a single act, it can constitute but one act of

Agent or servant.— Two persons may be convicted of maintaining a liquor nuisance, or of unlawful selling, if both participated in the act, although one simply assisted the other as an agent or clerk, and did not act as furnishing or selling, and the party incurs but one penalty, although it may be drunk by several persons.[34] But the same unlawful act may expose the offender to punishment either under the local option law or under that prohibiting sales without a license,[35] or it may constitute a violation of the general Sunday law and at the same time be punishable as an unlicensed sale;[36] and a sale to a minor may also be punishable under the statute forbidding sales without license,[37] and a person may be convicted of being a "common seller" of liquors, and also of the same several sales which were relied on to prove the former offense.[38]

b. Continuing or Separate Offenses. Where the statute provides that no person shall "sell intoxicating liquors without a license," it describes an offense which may be committed by a single act, and which is not a continuing offense, in any such sense that a repetition of the act or an intention to repeat it is an essential element of the crime.[39] But keeping liquor for sale may be a continuing offense and may be alleged with a continuando.[40]

c. Persons Entitled to Prosecute. The statutes sometimes designate the officials who shall institute criminal proceedings under the liquor laws,[41] although they do not always exclude the right of a private citizen to make complaint and instigate a prosecution.[42]

B. Procedure — 1. Application of Statutes and Ordinances — a. In General. To authorize a conviction on a charge of illegally selling or otherwise trafficking in intoxicating liquors, it must clearly appear that the prosecution was based upon a statute or ordinance which was in force before the commission of the alleged offense,[43] and which made it a crime and prescribed a penalty or punishment.[44] Where two laws are concurrently in force, covering the same ground, the prosecution may be instituted under either,[45] as is sometimes the case in regard to a local option law, in force in the particular locality, and the general liquor law of the state,[46] or a municipal ordinance and the general statute.[47] Where the law divides dealers in liquor into several classes, making different provisions as to each, a prosecution against an offending party must be brought under that statute or part of the statute which governs his particular calling.[48]

b. As to Form of Proceeding. Whatever form of proceeding, principal or collateral, the statute may prescribe for the prosecution of offenses against the liquor laws must be followed, or the judgment or sentence will have no legal foundation.[49] But generally, wherever the law makes a particular act, done in contravention of the liquor laws, an offense or a misdemeanor, without directing the form of proceeding for its punishment, such proceeding properly takes the form of a criminal prosecution founded on an indictment or presentment by a grand jury.[50]

c. Effect of Repeal or Change of Law. When a later statute repeals or changes a prior liquor law, if it expressly reserves rights accrued under the repealed law as to offenses committed or punishments incurred thereunder, the repeal or change will not affect the right to prosecute for penalties incurred under the earlier law; but if the repealing act contains no such saving clause, a conviction rendered in a pending prosecution for a violation of the earlier statute cannot be sustained.[51]

See 29 Cent. Dig. tit. "Intoxicating Liquors," § 217.

In New Hampshire an indictment for selling liquors without a license is not barred by the statute limiting prosecutions on penal statutes. State v. Rundlett, 33 N. H. 70; Coburn v. Odell, 30 N. H. 540.

Violation of two statutes.— Where the same act may amount to a violation of either or both of two statutes having different periods of limitation, the question must be determined by reference to the law under which a conviction is sought. Thus a sale of liquor on Sunday, in violation of a statute in that behalf, is not merely a "desecration of the Sabbath," for which a prosecution must be commenced within six months after the offense; but a prosecution for such unlawful sale is not barred until after the expiration of two years. Shepler v. State, 114 Ind. 194, 16 N. E. 521.

Hired informer.— It is no defense to a prosecution for selling liquor on Sunday that the prosecuting witness was hired to obtain evidence of violations of the law, where defendant was not induced or persuaded by him to make the illegal sale, but furnished it in answer to a simple call. Quoting statute.— An affidavit on which is based a warrant for a violation of a certain section of a municipal ordinance relating to the sale of liquor, which quotes the section, but fails to state in what manner it was violated, is defective. Marietta v. Alexander, 86 Ga. 455, 12 S. E. 681.

62. Qualter v. State, 120 Ind. 92, 22 N. E. 100, holding that where the record on appeal shows that the affidavit on which the prosecution was based was sworn to, the omission of the magistrate's seal to the jurat is not ground for reversal. And see People v. Haas, 79 Mich. 449, 44 N. W. 928.

By whom sworn to.— Although the statute provides that the complaint must be positively the facts constituting the offense, an allegation merely on information and belief not being sufficient.[63]

b. Warrant or Summons. The process employed to bring the accused before the court is not ordinarily required to recite the facts constituting the alleged offense.[64] If the proceeding is criminal, it must contain an order to arrest defendant, a mere summons to appear not being sufficient.[65] If he appears and defends, without making any objection, he will be held to have waived any supposed defects or irregularities in the process, in its issuance, or in the manner of its service, and cannot thereafter have it quashed or set aside.[66]

c. Preliminary Hearing. Under some statutes no preliminary examination of a person accused of violating the liquor laws is allowed,[67] and under others it is unnecessary.[68] But where such a proceeding is had, evidence sufficient to make out a prima facie case will justify the holding of the accused.[69] The rule that one should not be subjected to trial for two separate and distinct offenses at one time has no application to preliminary examinations before a justice for a violation of the liquor laws.[70] Some special provisions as to the duties of the prosecutor and the committing magistrate are found in the statutes.[71]

5. Indictment or Information[72] — a. Nature and Requisites — (i) In General. An indictment for a violation of the liquor laws should be in the name of the state.[73] It need not contain the name of the complainant or prosecutor,[74] or a statement of the penalty, forfeiture, or other punishment incurred,[75] or generally a recital of any preliminary proceedings.[76] It need not allege that such violation was committed "with force and arms."[77] It will not be vitiated by the introducsworn to by a "credible person," it is not necessary that the officer's jurat should show that the person verifying it was of that description. Burk v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. 541, 72 S. W. 585.

But see Deveny v. State, 47 Ind. 208.

Actual knowledge not necessary.— It is not necessary, in a prosecution under the prohibitory law, that the prosecuting witness should have actual personal knowledge of the transactions charged in the information; it is sufficient if he has notice or knowledge thereof, and had the offenses in contemplation when he verified the information which the witnesses testified to, and for which defendant was convicted. tion of unnecessary averments or any other matter which may be treated as surplusage,[78] or because of merely clerical errors in spelling and the like.[79] The name of defendant must of course be given if known,[80] and a substantial misnomer of defendant will be ground for a plea in abatement.[81]

(II) CERTAINTY. The indictment must be drawn with such a degree of legal certainty as to identify the particular transaction complained of, to the end that the court may be able to judge whether the facts alleged are sufficient in law to support a conviction, and to enable the accused to understand exactly what charge he is called upon to meet, and to plead a judgment in bar of a second prosecution for the same offense.[82] In particular, in charging a sale of liquor or other act, which may or may not be a crime, the facts or circumstances which render the act unlawful and criminal must be distinctly alleged.[83] And if the same transaction may constitute either of two offenses, according to the presence or absence of a particular fact, that fact should be affirmed or denied as the case may be.[84] But the indictment will not be vitiated by grammatical errors not materially affecting its certainty,[85] or by the use of the phrase "then and there," as a condensed repetition of the charge as to time and place, before subsequent material averments.[86] Where the sale was made by defendant's servant or agent, it may be charged as a sale by defendant,[87] and if the charge is against defendant as the agent of another, the circumstances of his agency need not be set forth, the fact itself being disclosed.[88]

(III) Bill of Particulars. A bill of particulars may be ordered if authorized by the statute or the practice of the court.[89]

(IV) Following the Statute. An indictment which follows the language of the statute in describing the offense charged will generally be sufficient.[90] If the statute prescribes a form to be followed in indictments, it is sufficient to use such form, provided it describes a punishable offense, and adequately informs defendant of the nature and cause of the accusation against him,[91] even though it would be bad for uncertainty if tested by common-law rules.[92]

(V) Disjunctive Allegations. The allegation, in an indictment, of several acts, articles, or agencies, connected by the disjunctive particle "or," may lay it open to the objection of uncertainty, by reason of the consequent doubt as to which particular thing is intended,[93] unless the statute authorizes a charge in the alternative,[94] or unless the several terms thus employed are synonymous or mutually explanatory.[95]

(VI) DUPLICITY. An indictment under the liquor laws is duplicitous if it charges two or more distinct offenses in the same count.[96] But if the allegation of one of the offenses is legally insufficient, or shows a lack of jurisdiction in the court,[97] or if otherwise it may be rejected as surplusage, leaving a good count, this relieves the indictment of the charge of duplicity.[98] And where two or more acts are so connected that each represents a stage in the same offense, although each act alone would constitute an offense, they may be coupled in one count.[99] Again a statutory offense may be single, although it may require or

Illustration.— In an indictment for selling liquor on Sunday, an averment that defendant had no license is merely surplusage, and does not render the indictment bad for duplicity. State v. Hutzel, 53 Ind. 160.

99. This rule applies where the indictment charges that defendant owned and kept liquors with intent to sell them, exposed and offered them for sale, and sold them (State v. Burns, 44 Conn. 149), that he "did offer to sell, sell, and suffer to be sold" (State v. Nolan, 15 R. I. 529, 10 Atl. 481), that he "did presume to be a retailer and did sell" admit several distinct acts as its constituent elements, as in the case of "retailing liquors" or being a "common seller." And here an indictment is not duplicitous for setting out the various component acts.[1] And it may also properly charge all the different modes or ways in which the same offense may be committed.[2] Nor is there any objection to the use of several terms to designate one and the same place.[3] And an indictment may properly charge a sale to a person named and to divers other persons.[4]

(VII) JOINDER OF COUNTS. The general rule that two or more offenses of the same grade, punishable with similar penalties, committed in the same jurisdiction by the same defendant, and belonging to the same general group or class of crimes, may be joined in separate counts of the same indictment, applies to prosecutions for violations of the liquor laws.[5]

(VIII) ALLEGING FORMER CONVICTION. Where the prosecution is for a second offense against the liquor laws, and a prior conviction for a similar offense becomes material, with a view to the measure of punishment, the indictment should contain such a description of the former conviction as will identify the case and enable defendant to find the record.[6] But if the statute does not to a person named (Com. v. Wilcox, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 503), or that he "unlawfully did sell and was interested in the sale" of certain liquors (Davis v. State, 50 Ark. 17, 6 S. W. 388). And there is no duplicity in charging that he "did sell and did offer to sell, by himself and by an agent." Barnes v. State, 20 Conn. 232. And see People v. Paquin, 74 Mich. 34, 41 N. Repugnancy.— Where two counts of an indictment charge a sale of liquor without license, and another count charges a violation of the local option law, the two sets of counts are irreconcilably repugnant, and the indictment is insufficient in law. Butler v. State, 25 Fla. 347, 6 So. 67.

In New York, under a statute providing that each indictment shall charge but one crime, except that a crime may be alleged in separate counts as committed in a different manner, and where the act complained of constitutes different crimes such crimes may be charged in separate counts, it is held to be contrary to the statute for an indictment to charge sales of liquor in the same town, at different times and to different persons, each sale being alleged in a separate count. People v. O'Donnell, 46 Hun 358. And see People v. Harmon, 49 Hun 558, 2 N. Y. Suppl. 421. But where an indictment charged in one count that defendant sold liquor in quantities less than five gallons to a certain person, at a certain time and place, without a license, and a second count alleged that he sold liquor to be drunk on the premises to the same person at the same time and place, in violation of two distinct sections of the statute respectively, it was held that if there was a sale of less than five gallons to be drunk on the premises, it was a crime under both such sections, and might be charged in separate counts, as the case came within the proviso to the statute. If an indictment alleges an impossible date as the time of the prior conviction it is defective, although this will not vitiate the indictment as to the new offense charged therein. State v. Dorr, 82 Me. 341, 19 Atl. 861. And see State v. Bartley, 92 Me. 422, 43 Atl. 19.

The record of the prior conviction need not provide any different or increased penalty for a second offense, an allegation in the indictment that defendant had been previously convicted of a similar offense is proper ground for demurrer.[7]

(IX) VERIFICATION. An information or complaint for a violation of the liquor law, filed under a statute requiring its verification, must be sworn to by the officer and in the manner directed in the statute.[8]

b. Allegations as to Particular Elements of Offense — (I) CHARACTER OR OCCUPATION OF ACCUSED. If the statute upon which an indictment is founded makes the act charged an offense only when it is done by a person belonging to a particular class, or possessing a certain qualification, or pursuing a given business, as, where he is a "licensed retailer," "merchant," "druggist," or "wholesale dealer," so that the crime can be committed only by one who is so situated, the indictment must show on its face that the accused comes within the class designated by the statute.[9] So also if the statute imposes different penalties upon one class of persons from those imposed upon another class for doing the same act, the indictment must show the class to which defendant belongs.[10] But if the character or occupation of defendant is not an essential ingredient of the offense, as where the statute forbids all persons without distinction to do the particular act, it is not necessary that the indictment should contain any such averment.[11]

(II) INTENT. In an indictment under the liquor laws it is not generally necessary to allege any special criminal intent; an allegation that defendant knowingly and wilfully did the act complained of being sufficient.[12] However, in cases be set forth particularly, but a brief allegation of the fact, giving the necessary data, will be enough. State v. Robinson, 39 Me. 150.

where the intent is an essential part of the offense such special criminal intent on the part of defendant should be alleged.[13]

(III) Knowledge or Notice. If it is an essential ingredient of the offense charged that defendant should have known the special facts which make the sale unlawful, such knowledge should be alleged in the indictment;[14] but in all cases where ignorance or mistake of fact would not constitute a defense, such an allegation is not needed.[15]

(IV) Showing Unlawful Nature of Act—(A) In General. If the act complained of would not be contrary to law unless done in a particular manner, for a particular purpose, or at a particular time or place, the indictment must allege circumstances showing it to have been a violation of the statute.[16] But if the essential facts are set forth, it is not technically necessary to allege that the offense was "unlawfully" committed.[17]

(B) Referring to the Statute. As a general rule it is not necessary for an indictment for a violation of the liquor laws to state specifically, by particular reference thereto, the statute violated by the acts alleged to be a crime.[18] But if different sections of the same statute, on the subject of the liquor traffic, impose different penalties, or distinguish between sales made under different circumstances, the indictment should show which section defendant is charged with violating.[19] And the same rule obtains where two statutes are in force, and the acts charged might constitute an offense under either.[20] But except in such cases

In Massachusetts a complaint which charges an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor "contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided" need not allege more specifically whether the offense was in violation of one or the other of two as these, the statute, if a public act, need not be specially pleaded, and it is sufficient to refer to the statute generally, without a reference to the section imposing the particular penalty.[21]

(c) Conclusion. Where one statute defines an offense against the system of excise of the state, and another statute prescribes the punishment, the indictment must conclude in the plural form, "against the statutes in such case made and provided"; but if the offense is fully defined, both as to its constituent elements and its punishment, in one of the statutes, although the other may impose another and further penalty, the indictment may well conclude in the singular form.[22] Unless the statute expressly requires that all indictments shall allege the offense to have been committed "against the peace and dignity" of the state this formula is not necessary in an indictment for a statutory misdemeanor under the liquor laws.[23]

(v) Adoption and Violation of Local Option Law. In some states it is held that an indictment for selling liquor in violation of a local option law need not contain a statement of all the formalities necessary to render the law operative, or even an allegation that it was in force in the particular jurisdiction; for such laws, although local, are public, and the courts will take judicial notice of them.[24] In others it is necessary to allege that the local option law had been adopted and was in force in the particular locality, as the result of an election held for that purpose.[25] In some this allegation may be general, and it is not necessary to set statutes passed in different years. Com. v. Keefe, 7 Gray 332.

In Kentucky by statute all the technical allegations with reference to the adoption of the local option law are dispensed with and it is simply necessary to state "that the act or acts charged were committed in a territory where the said act was in force." St. (1903) § 2557*b*. And see Crigler v. Com., (Ky. 1904) 83 S. W. 587. Prior to this statute it was necessary to allege with great prolixity and detail, the submission of the question of local option to the people of the district to which it was to be applied, and their adoption at the polls of its provisions. See Edmonson v. Com., 110 Ky. 510, 62 S. W. 1018, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1902; Com. v. Cope, 107 Ky. 173, 53 S. W. 272, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 845; Com. v. Shelton, 99 Ky. 120, 35 S. W. 128, 18 Ky. L. forth in detail all the various steps which were necessary to the legal adoption of the law,[26] while in others great particularity of statement is required, and each essential step in the process of submitting and adopting a local option law must be set forth.[27] In any event the indictment must clearly show that the alleged offense was committed in a district or locality where the local option law was in force.[28] So long as the local option law is in force, an indictment cannot be well drawn under the general law;[29] but after the repeal of a local option law the general law revives and forms the basis for indictments; and recitals of the local option law, in an indictment found after its repeal, may be treated as surplusage.[30]

(VI) Violation of Local Regulations. Where an indictment is intended to charge a violation of a local statute or regulation, or of a municipal ordinance, it must be framed with special reference thereto rather than to the general liquor law, and must contain such allegations as to bring the case plainly within the terms of the law on which it is based,[31] unless it is otherwise provided by statute.[32]

(VII) Allegation of Place of Offense — (A) In General. An indictment for a violation of the liquor laws should contain an allegation of the place where the offense is charged to have been committed, so as to show that it is within the jurisdiction of the court, and also for the purpose of informing the accused of the particular transaction for which he is prosecuted.[33] In a number of cases it has

in which case the place of the alleged offense must be described with sufficient certainty to identify it.[38]

(B) Place as Element of Offense. There are some cases in which the place of its commission is so far a material element of an offense as to require it to be stated with great particularity; as where the prosecution is based on a statute forbidding the sale of liquor within a limited distance of a church, school, agricultural fair, or the like,[39] where a licensed dealer is charged with selling at a place not covered by his license,[40] or with a violation of the screen law or any other law regulating the conduct of business on licensed premises,[41] although it is otherwise if the offense charged is not affected by his possession or want of a license.[42] Where the law relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors distinguishes between local option and other territory, as to the fine for selling without a license, an indictment for selling without a license should allege whether the sale occurred within or out of local option territory.[43]

(VIII) Alleging Time of Offense—(A) In General. An indictment for an unlawful sale of liquor should always contain an allegation of the time when the sale charged was made.[44] In some jurisdictions this allegation must specify

"On or about."— As to the sufficiency of a charge that the offense was committed "on or about" a certain specified day, the authorities are not harmonious. not only the year but also the month and the day of the month.[45] But in others chiefly under statutes providing that an indictment shall not be rendered invalid for stating imperfectly the time at which the offense was committed, where time is not of the essence of the offense, a precise statement of the time is not required, a general allegation being accepted as sufficient.[46] Of course the allegation must show the offense to have been committed within the statutory period of limitations,[47] and an exact statement of the date may be necessary to connect the elements of the offense,[48] or to show that a law recently adopted was in force at the time of its commission.[49]

(B) Sale on Prohibited Days. An indictment for unlawfully selling liquor on Sunday must distinctly name that day as the day of the commission of the offense.[50] It is not sufficient to allege the date of the transaction, by specifying the day of the month and the year;[51] and on the other hand, if the offense is charged to have been committed on Sunday, the indictment is not vitiated by the further allegation that it was on a certain day of the month, which in fact was some other day of the week,[52] nor by a lack of precision or certainty in specifying the date.[53] Where the prosecution is for selling liquor or keeping open a saloon on an election day, it is not sufficient to charge that the offense was committed "on an election day," but it must further be alleged that an election was in fact held on that day,[54] and in some states the indictment must show what was the nature and purpose of the election,[55] and if it was a local election, the place where it was held and the place where the offense was committed must both be described, so as to show that the former included the latter.[56]

(c) Continuando. Where the offense charged is continuous, consisting of a succession of acts, or a prohibited traffic carried on from day to day, it may be laid with a continuando, as by alleging it to have been committed on a certain specified day "and on divers other days and times" between such day and the date of finding the indictment.[57] This form of allegation is not proper where the offense charged consists of a single act; but if the date specified is within the period of limitation and is laid with certainty, the further allegation as to "divers other days" may be rejected as surplusage.[58]

(IX) Purpose of Sale. The purpose of defendant in making the sale for which he is prosecuted is not generally necessary to be stated in the indictment.[59]

But where the sale would be unlawful only if it was made with the purpose or intention that the liquor should be used "as a beverage," the indictment is fatally defective if it fails to charge that purpose or intention.[60] And the rule is the same where the statute only forbids the sale of liquor, by an unlicensed person or by a dealer having a limited license, when it is sold with the purpose or intention that it shall be "drunk on the premises."[61] But it is not necessary to allege that the liquor was drunk on the premises, or that it was drunk anywhere, because that is not necessary to complete the offense.[62] Sometimes the necessity of charging the purpose of the sale will be sufficiently met by a negative allegation to the effect that the liquor was not sold for any of the specially excepted and permitted uses, as under a general prohibitory law, forbidding all sales except for medical, scientific, or mechanical purposes.[63]

c. Allegations as to Liquor — (I) DESCRIPTION AND PROPERTIES IN GENERAL. In an indictment for an unlawful sale of liquor, in the description of the article sold, it will generally be sufficient to follow the language of the statute on which the prosecution is founded.[64] And if the statute prohibits the sale of several enumerated kinds of liquor, in the disjunctive, the indictment may properly allege the sale of each and all of them conjunctively.[65] But the liquor proved to have been sold must come within the general terms of the indictment.[66]

(II) SPECIFYING PARTICULAR KIND OF LIQUOR. An indictment for the unlawful sale or keeping of liquors need not specify the particular kind of liquor which it is expected to prove at the trial. It may describe the article as "spirituous" or "intoxicating" liquor, or use any other general term employed in the statute, without naming any particular liquor.[67] And, where the statutes prohibit the unlicensed sale of "spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors," it has been held that the particular kind of liquor alleged to have been sold, whether spirituous, vinous, or malt, need not be named in the indictment by either of those terms; it is sufficient to allege that defendant sold "intoxicating liquor."[68]

(III) Showing as to Properties of Liquor. If the indictment describes the liquor sold as being of a certain general class as, "malt liquor" or "vinous liquor," and in this respect follows the language of the statute, it is not necessary further to allege that it was intoxicating.[69] But otherwise the intoxicating properties of the liquor in question must appear from the language employed in the indictment.[70] Liquors which are not actually intoxicating, but which the statute declares shall be considered intoxicating within the meaning of the law, may be described as "intoxicating" in an indictment on that statute.[71]

(IV) Averment of Name of Liquor. Where the indictment names the particular kind of liquor sold as "whisky," "beer," or the like, it must further allege that the same was intoxicating liquor, or spirituous liquor, or otherwise according to the statute,[72] unless the article named is a liquor of the intoxicating properties of which the courts will take judicial notice.[73] If the particular liquor named in the indictment is referred to by name in the statute, it is unnecessary to add such an allegation, for if it is prohibited by the statute it is immaterial what its properties may be.[74]

(v) Allegation as to Quantity Sold. Under some statutes an indictment for an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors should contain an allegation setting forth the quantity of liquor sold;[75] but under others this allegation is unnecessary,[76] and it is never required in cases where the quantity of liquor sold is entirely immaterial to the particular offense charged.[77] Where the quantity is to be specified, it should be given according to the established and recognized measures. An allegation that defendant sold "one drink," "one glass," or the like has sometimes been held sufficient,[78] although in other cases it has been considered so uncertain as to vitiate the indictment.[79]

(vi) Showing Quantity to Be Less Than Minimum Permitted. Where the indictment is upon a statute which makes it an offense to sell liquors in quantities less than a certain minimum, it must show on its face that the sale charged was of a quantity within the statutory restriction.[80] Some cases hold that this allegation is sufficiently made by charging a sale "in a less quantity than a quart," or otherwise according to the statute, without adding a specification of a precise quantity,[81] while others require the statement of some particular quantity which shall be known as a measure less than the statutory minimum.[82] An indictment charging a sale of a known and definite quantity of liquor, as one pint or one gill, which as a matter of arithmetic is less than the quantity named in the statute, has been held sufficient without an additional allegation that the sale was "in a less quantity" than the statutory minimum.[83] But according to other decisions this form of averment is not sufficient unless it adds that defendant sold no more than the amount named, or that the sale was of a quantity less than that fixed by law as the limit.[84] It seems that it will be sufficient to allege the sale of a definite measure of liquor "the same being then and there less than" the statutory limit,[85] or to follow the words of the statute and lay the precise quantity under a videlicet.[86] But if the same statute, in its different clauses, prescribes different quantities or limits for different persons or under different conditions, the indictment must clearly show under which clause defendant is prosecuted, which may involve a precise statement of the quantity he is alleged to have sold.[87]

(VII) Allegation of Price Paid. If the indictment alleges a "sale" of liquor, it is held that that term sufficiently imports the payment of a price, and hence it is not necessary to specify any price for which the liquor was sold, or, if the price is stated in an ambiguous or uncertain manner, that will not vitiate the indictment.[88]

In Indiana the statute provides that no indictment shall be quashed for omitting to state the price of any matter or thing in any case where the value or price is not of the essence of the offense; and consequently it is not now necessary to state the price in an indictment for an unlawful sale of liquor. d. Designation or Description of Purchaser — (i) Alleging Name of Purchaser. While it has been held in a number of cases that an indictment for an unlicensed or otherwise unlawful sale of liquor must set forth the name of the person to whom the sale was made, or, if the name is not known to the prosecutor or the grand jury, that fact must be stated as an excuse for not giving it,[89] such an allegation is generally held to be unnecessary, so that an indictment which is otherwise sufficiently certain will not be quashed merely because it fails to name the purchaser of the liquor.[90] Where the offense charged is not a single act of

Reason for the rule.— The reason for requiring the indictment to state the name of the purchaser is that it may be sufficiently certain to inform the accused, without reasonable doubt or ambiguity, of the particular charge which he is called upon to meet, distinguishing the particular sale which the prosecution expects to prove from any other transaction in defendant's business; and also to enable him to plead an acquittal or conviction in bar of a subsequent prosecution for the same offense. sale, but a continuous business, such as keeping liquors for unlawful sale, or unlawfully pursuing the business of liquor selling, or maintaining a liquor nuisance, although it may be necessary to prove one or more sales or offers to sell, it is not necessary to allege the name of the purchaser or purchasers.[91]

(II) How Purchaser Is Described. If the name of the purchaser is to be inserted in the indictment, he may be described by the name by which he is commonly and usually known, although it may differ from his right name; and if he is commonly known by two or more names, he may be described by one or all of them.[92] If the name of the purchaser has not been discovered, he may be described as "a person to the jurors unknown."[93] Where the sale was made to an agent, whose principal was disclosed, it should be alleged as a sale to the principal; but if the principal was not disclosed, it may be laid as a sale to the agent.[94] An indictment for selling to one named person will not sustain a conviction for selling to another person,[95] although the indictment may properly charge the sale of liquor to two persons in the same count.[96]

by describing him with reference to his age, if a minor,[98] his color or status, if that is essential to the offense,[99] his habits of intoxication, in the case of a habitual drunkard,[1] or his intoxicated condition at the time of the sale, if that is the gist of the offense.[2] Moreover if it is essential to the crime that the seller should have had previous notice of the condition or status of the purchaser, either with reference to his habits of intoxication or his minority, the fact of such notice must be distinctly set forth in the indictment.[3]

e. Allegation of Scienter of Defendant. Where the offense charged is a sale to a minor, a drunken person, or an inebriate, it is generally held unnecessary to charge in the indictment that defendant had knowledge of the age, condition, or habits of the purchaser,[4] although a scienter must be laid, where the statutory offense is "knowingly" making such a sale,[5] in which case it seems it is sufficient to aver that the act was "unlawfully and knowingly" done.[6]

f. Negativing Exceptions and Defenses — (i) Denying Authority in General. Where the statute denies the right to sell liquors to all persons except duly appointed town agents or other public officials, it is necessary to allege in an indictment for an unlawful sale that defendant was not such an agent or official.[7] This is sufficiently done by averring that he was not "a legally appointed agent" for such sale, or that he made the sale "without being duly appointed and authorized therefor."[8] But no such allegation is necessary where the prosecution is for an offense which would not be excused by defendant's public position or his authority as a public agent, such as maintaining a liquor nuisance or keeping a place for the illegal sale of liquors.[9]

(ii) Denying Permission of Parent or Guardian. Where the sale of liquor to a minor is lawful when made in pursuance of the consent or permission of his parents or guardian, an indictment for selling to such a person must negative the giving of such permission by each and all of the persons who might have given it and in each of the modes in which it might have been given.[10]

(III) NEGATIVING LICENSE— (A) Necessity. The indictment must contain an allegation denying the existence of a license or authority in defendant to make the sale complained of, when that fact is a necessary ingredient of the offense charged, or where the possession of such a license would have rendered the sale lawful.[11] But if the question of a license is not material to the offense, if the elements of the offense are complete without the additional fact of the sale having been unlicensed, or if the act charged amounts to an offense whether committed by a licensed or unlicensed person, then no averment in regard to a license is needed.[12]

licenses, classified according to the occupation of the licensee, the quantity which he is permitted to sell, the place of consumption, or the kinds of liquor to be dealt in, and the indictment undertakes to negative the various forms of license severally by name, it must deny particularly the existence of each sort of license which might have justified the sale, with a specific reference to each of the sources from which such license might have been derived.[14] It has been held, however, that an indictment is sufficient which negatives the existence in defendant of some individual form or kind of license, with the addition of a general phrase, sufficiently broad and comprehensive, denying all license or authority.[15] And the courts have sustained the sufficiency of indictments which merely deny defendant's right or authority to sell, by the use of a general formula, without specific references to statutes or to particular kinds of licenses.[16] In the case of joint defend-

In Missouri a form which is much in use and which is held sufficiently broad is as follows: "Without his then and there having a dramshop keeper's license, innkeeper's license, or any other legal authority to sell said intoxicating liquor at said place, in manner and form aforesaid, contrary to the form of the statute," etc. State v. Sutton, 25 Mo. 300; State v. Owen, 15 Mo. 506; State v. Hornbeak, 15 Mo. 478. Compare State v. Fanning, 38 Mo. 409.

(IV) NEGATIVING EXCEPTIONS— (A) In General.[18] As a general rule, where the enacting clause of the statute describes the offense with certain exceptions, it is necessary to state in the indictment all the circumstances which constitute the offense and to negative the exceptions; but where there are exceptions or provisos contained in separate and subsequent clauses or provisions of the statute, or in another statute, they need not be noticed in the indictment, but defendant may show them in his defense.[19] But a negative, exception, or proviso, which is descriptive of the offense, as distinguished from one which affords matter of excuse merely, must be met by an allegation in the indictment, irrespective of the question of its position in the statute.[20] But it is of course unnecessary to

It is not necessary to negative a proviso in the act, exempting from its operation all sales made to town agents within a certain time after the act took effect or sales by one agent to another at any time. State v. Wade, 34 N. H. 495. And where the prosecution is under a statute which prohibits the employment of any female waiters in a saloon, but with a proviso excepting the wife or daughter of the proprietor, it is not necessary that the indictment should negative the exception. Walter v. Com., 88 Pa. St. 137, 32 Am. Rep. 429. negative any exception or proviso which, if established, would not excuse or protect defendant in respect to the particular offense with which he is charged.[21]

(B) Exception as to Particular Uses. If the same section or clause of a statute which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors contains also an exception in favor of their sale for certain permitted uses as, medical, pharmaceutical, mechanical, or sacramental purposes, or if the exception points directly to the character of the offense and makes a part of the description of it, the indictment must meet the exception with a negative allegation.[22] But if the exception is contained in a different section or part or proviso of the statute, it is not necessary to aver that the sale was not for any of the permitted purposes.[23]

(C) Exception of Particular Liquors. Where a statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors under certain circumstances contains an exception in favor of particular kinds of liquor, such as home-made wines and cider, it is not generally necessary, in an indictment for an unlawful sale, to negative the exception; it is matter of defense for the accused.[24] It is not necessary to negative an exception in the statute which permits the sale or keeping for sale of foreign imported liquors in the original casks or packages.[25]

Doctrine of federal courts.— It appears to be the doctrine of the federal courts that, even where the exception is in the enacting clause, still, if it is "not so incorporated with the language defining the offense that the ingredients of the offense cannot be accurately and clearly described if the exception is omitted," then it is not necessary to allege that the accused is not within the exception. U. S. v. Cook, 17 Wall. (U. S.) 168, 21 L. ed. 538. Sufficient negative averment.— If the indictment undertakes to negative the exception, it is sufficiently done by an averment that the liquor in question was not wine or spirituous liquor imported into the United charged in an indictment would have been lawful if made on the prescription of a physician, by virtue of an exception in the statute, the existence of such prescription must be negatived in the indictment by an allegation substantially following the language of the statute.[26] Where, however, the statute prohibits the sale of liquor under certain circumstances, and, in another section or in a proviso, authorizes druggists or physicians to sell for certain purposes or under certain conditions, it is not necessary, in an indictment on the statute, to allege that defendant is not within the excepted classes.[27] And even where the exception is contained in the enacting clause as, by a provision that "it shall not be lawful for any person except druggists to sell liquor," there are authorities holding that it is not necessary to negative the exception.[28] But if the indictment undertakes to deny the authority of defendant as a druggist or physician, the allegation in that respect must be as broad, as specific, and as certain as the language of the statute.[29]

31. In South Carolina the Dispensary Act of 1895 prohibits the transportation of alcoholic liquors within the state, and enacts a penalty against any person "handling contraband liquors in the night-time." If an indictment intended to charge an illegal transportation of liquors unnecessarily alleges it to have been done "in the night-time," the words quoted may be rejected as surplusage. State v. Pickett, 47 S. C. 101, 25 S. E. 46. But if the indictment is brought under the latter provision of the statute, an allegation charging defendant with "hauling" liquors is not equivalent to a charge of "handling" the same. with intent to sell the liquor within the state, if that is a statutory part of the offense,[33] and that defendant knew the liquor to be intoxicating;[34] but it need not be alleged that the liquor was not in the original packages in which it was imported.[35]

(III) Keeping Liquors For Unlawful Sale. An indictment for this offense will generally be sufficient if it substantially follows the language of the statute.[36] It need not state who was the owner of the liquor illegally kept,[37] but must distinctly allege a "keeping" by defendant,[38] for the purpose of sale,[39] by defendant himself and not by another person,[40] and should also allege the place of the commission of the offense, that is, the place of keeping the liquors,[41] and the place where it was intended that they should be sold, if that is a statutory part of the crime.[42] The indictment should also negative the license or authority of defendant.[43] As the offense may be a continuing one, the time may be laid with a continuando.[44]

(IV) Carrying on Business. An indictment for being a common seller of liquor, or engaging in the business of liquor selling, without due license or authority, is sufficient if it follows substantially the language of the statute in alleging the occupation of defendant.[45] It is not necessary that the indictment should allege any particular sale, or any number of sales, or give the details of any transaction constituting a part of the forbidden traffic.[46] But it should allege

In Alabama it has been held that to constitute an occupation or vocation within the meaning of the liquor statutes it must be pursued during some length of time. While a protracted length of time is not necessary, a single act is not enough to amount to a violation of the law. Hence an indictment which alleges merely that defendant "did distil" liquors without a license is insufficient, under a statute punishing the prosecuting or carrying on of the business of distilling without a license. the time of the commission of the offense charged,[47] and the place,[48] and should describe the kind of liquors dealt in by defendant, so far as to show that they were within the prohibition of the statute.[49] Two persons may be jointly indicted under these statutes, and the regular course of pleading is to make the averment specific as to each, and negative the license or authority of each.[50]

(v) Acts and Omissions in Conduct of Business. Where a prosecution is founded on a statute regulating the manner of conducting the business of a liquor dealer, or prescribing or forbidding particular acts in the management of such business, particular care must be taken in the indictment to insert clear and specific allegations bringing both defendant and the acts or omissions complained of within the terms of the statute.[51]

(vi) Keeping Open at Prohibited Times. An indictment for keeping open a saloon or bar on Sunday, a public holiday, or any other time when the law requires such places to be closed, must distinctly show that defendant was the owner or proprietor of the place in question, or at least responsible for its being open.[52] It will generally be sufficient if it clearly shows that defendant kept a place for the sale of liquor, that the day charged was a prohibited day, and that he kept it open, or failed to keep it closed on such day, and that the purpose was to sell liquor, or afford an opportunity for its purchase.[53]

People v. Heffron, 53 Mich. 527, 19 N. W. 170.

Duplicity.— If, after the averment that defendant was a common seller, it is added that he "did then and there, as aforesaid, sell and cause to be sold to divers persons, to the jurors unknown, divers quantities of strong liquors," the indictment charges but one offense, and is not bad for duplicity. State v. Churchill, 25 Me. 306; State v. Stinson, 17 Me. 154. And see State v. Nutt, 28 Vt. 598. And even if a particular sale of a definite quantity to a named person is set out in the same count, in addition to the charge of the general offense, this will not vitiate the indictment. Goodhue v. Com., 5 Metc. (Mass.) 553. A count charging defendant with being a common seller of intoxicating liquors may be included in the same indictment with counts charging distinct sales to particular persons. Admission of prohibited persons.— Under the statute prohibiting the keeping of a wine-room in connection with a saloon, into which females are permitted to enter from the outside, or from the saloon, and be supplied with liquor, an information which fails to allege that the females came from the outside, or from the saloon, charges no offense. Walker v. People, 5 Colo. App. 37, 37 Pac. 29. h. Keeping Place For Unlawful Sale — (1) In General. An indictment for "keeping a place" or "maintaining a tenement" for the unlawful keeping or sale of intoxicating liquors may properly describe the offense substantially in the language of the statute.[54] Thus the character of the place as a tippling-house, dram-shop, public drinking saloon, or the like, may be alleged in the words employed in the statute.[55] But the indictment must clearly show that the place was kept or maintained by defendant,[56] in the character of an owner or proprietor,[57] for the specific purpose of the illegal keeping or sale of liquors,[58] and that the liquors so kept or sold were of the character intended by the statute.[59] But it is not generally necessary to allege any specific instances of selling.[60] Care should be taken in charging this offense to avoid the error of duplicity; but an indictment is not bad because it contains two counts setting forth the same offense in the same manner, with slight verbal variations,[61] or because it alleges that ing his place of business open after the hour of eleven o'clock in violation of law is sufficient, although it does not charge a sale of liquors after such hour. State v. Clemmensen, 92 Minn. 191, 99 N. W. 640.

It is not necessary to allege that the place was kept open "to the encouragement of idleness, gaming, drinking, and other misehavior" (Fant v. People, 45 Ill. 259); nor to specify whether defendant was a wholesale or retail dealer, if the law applies to either (People v. Talbot, 120 Mich. 486, 79 N. defendant sold intoxicating liquor to a certain person at such place.[62] The indictment should also negative defendant's license to keep or sell liquors, but this may be done by using the word "unlawfully" or alleging that the place was used for the "illegal" sale or keeping of liquors.[63]

(II) MAINTAINING LIQUOR NUISANCE. An indictment for the maintenance of a liquor nuisance will generally be held sufficient if it describes the offense in the words of the statute.[64] It must show that the place complained of was a common nuisance,[65] that it was used for the illegal sale or keeping of liquor [66] by defendant in the character of an owner or proprietor, or as having control of the place, if that is a part of the statutory offense,[67] or as the lessor of the property knowing the tenant's purpose to use it as a nuisance,[68] and that liquors were there kept for the purpose, and with the intention of selling them contrary to law.[69] It must be averred either that defendant sold liquors at the place mentioned, or that he kept them there for the purpose of selling.[70] But if the "keeping" is sufficiently charged, no allegation of specific sales will be necessary.[71] Since maintaining a nuisance is a continuing offense, it may be alleged to have been kept and maintained on a day named "and on divers other days and times" prior to the indictment.[72] An information charging one with keeping a liquor nuisance should not allege that he kept a place where intoxicating liquors "are sold," but should state that such liquors "were then and there sold." Conclusion.— As this offense is statutory and does not depend upon the existence of a state of facts which would be sufficient to constitute a nuisance at common law, it is not necessary that the indictment should conclude with the common-law formula "to the common nuisance of all the citizens," etc., if the facts stated bring the case within the statute; but it should conclude "against the form of the statute," etc. Com. v. Howe, 13 Gray (Mass.) 26. Duplicity.— If allegations of keeping or maintaining the place in question as a common nuisance are coupled with allegations of specific unlawful sales, this does not make the indictment charge more than one offense or lay it open to the objection of duplicity. gation that he thereby rendered himself guilty of keeping a nuisance was made with a blank space for the time left unfilled, it was held that the indictment was not deficient on this ground.[74] A second clause of a count of an indictment for maintaining a liquor nuisance need not repeat the allegation of time.[75]

(III) Description of House or Place. In regard to the allegation of place, there is a distinction between criminal proceedings against the person guilty of maintaining the nuisance and proceedings, quasi-criminal in their nature, for the abatement of the nuisance itself. In the latter case the place must be described with great exactness and particularity.[76] But in an indictment against the owner or keeper of the alleged nuisance, it is not essential that its location should be designated with any special degree of precision or minuteness.[77] The description necessary sometimes depends upon the provisions of the statute or ordinance upon which the prosecution is based.[78]

i. Allegation of Sale or Gift — (I) In General. An unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor should be alleged in an indictment by the technical word "sell," although other terms may be held sufficiently definite if they clearly import the same thing.[79] An indictment intended only to allege a sale, but charging con-

78. In Ohio, where the place of sale must be described as a place of public resort, it is held sufficient to aver that it was a tavern, eating-house, bazaar, restaurant, grocery, or coffee-house, as all these terms import a place to which the public resort; but it is not sufficiently described by calling it a "room," as this word bears no such import. Aultfather v. State, 4 Ohio St. 467.

In Texas an information charging that in a certain local option precinct defendant kept "a blind tiger" is sufficient as charging the keeping of a place for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors. Segars v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. 45, 31 S. W. 370. But where the essence of the offense is the maintenance of a saloon within the residence portion of a city, contrary to a municipal ordinance, the allegations must plainly show that the place came within the prohibitions of that portion of the ordinance defining and describing a "residence portion." "Retail" imports a sale in small quantity, and hence some cases hold that an allegation that defendant "did retail" liquor to a person named sufficiently charges that he sold the liquor. Wrocklege v. State, 1 Iowa 167; Com. v. Kimball, 7 Metc. (Mass.) 304; State v. Chapman, 25 W. Va. 408.

"Sell and retail" is a proper form of words to use in charging the offense of retailing liquor without a license. State v. Mooty, 3 Hill (S. C.) 187. And see State v. Young, 5 Coldw. (Tenn.) 51.

"Give," as used in a statute prohibiting the giving of liquor to a minor, is synonymous with "furnish" and "supply," and includes a sale to the minor. Com. v. Davis, 12 Bush (Ky.) 240.

Purpose of sale.— An indictment for selling or bartering liquor need not aver in terms that it was done "for purposes of gain." Schlicht v. State, 56 Ind. 173. And so, under a statute providing that no unlicensed person shall "barter, sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of, for his gain or benefit, any spirituous liquors," it is not necessary for the indictment to allege that the sale charged was made by defendant "for his gain or benefit." Anderson v. People, 63 Ill. 53. And see Arrington v. Com., 87 Va. 96, 12 S. E. 224, 10 L. R. A. 242.

The omission of the auxiliary verb "did" which should have been joined with the words junctively that defendant "did sell and give away," or "did sell, barter, and give away" intoxicating liquors, will generally be sustained as against objections on the ground of indefiniteness or duplicity, the unnecessary additional words being rejected as surplusage.[80] And conversely, although the statute uses additional or cumulative terms, it does not follow that the indictment must employ them all.[81] It is not proper to charge, in the disjunctive, that defendant "sold or gave away," or "sold or otherwise disposed of" the liquor in question, for this renders the indictment objectionable on the ground of uncertainty.[82] If a sale is properly alleged it is not necessary to add an averment of the delivery of the liquors.[83] If the sale in question was not made by defendant in person, but by his servant or agent, it is not considered necessary to name such servant or agent;[84] but if defendant is charged as the agent or servant of another, the character in which he acted and his relation to his employer should be pleaded.[85]

(II) Evasions or Devices to Conceal a Sale. Where the illegal transaction amounted in law to a sale of liquor, it is generally sufficient for the indictment simply to charge a sale, without setting forth the particular manner in which it was accomplished, or the devices, subterfuges, or evasions which may have been resorted to for the purpose of making it; and under such an allegation all the facts necessary to constitute a sale may be proved.[86] Under some statutes it must be specifically alleged that the transaction was a pretext to evade the law.[87]

In Alabama it has been held that an indictment under the act of Feb. 19, 1883, for an evasion of the prohibitory laws, must allege: (1) A place where liquor is furnished, or some device used to furnish liquor, in violation or evasion of law; (2) a place or de-

6. Evidence — Proof and Variance[88] — a. Burden of Proof — (I) In General. In prosecutions for violations of the liquor laws the burden is upon the government to establish by evidence the existence of each of the essential constituents of the offense charged,[89] except where statutes make a given act or state of facts presumptive evidence of the intent of the accused or of his guilt.[90] Where the prosecution is for a violation of statutes or ordinances regulating the conduct of the business of liquor selling, by persons authorized to engage in it, the state must assume the burden of proving facts sufficient to show such a violation.[91] Where the prosecution is under a local option law, it is generally held that the state must assume the burden of showing the law to have been in force at the time and place of the alleged offense.[92]

(II) Matters of Defense. Where a sale of intoxicating liquor has been shown as charged, if defendant claims that the sale was not unlawful, because coming within the terms of an exception or proviso in the statute, or because made for specially permitted purposes, or under other circumstances which would relieve him from criminal responsibility, the burden is on him to establish this defense.[93] This rule applies for instance where he claims that the particular liquor sold was such as he might lawfully sell, because not prohibited by the statute or excepted from its terms,[94] or where he claims to have made the sale in the character of a town agent[95] or for a purpose which is permitted, or not forbidden, by vice so constructed as to conceal the person who furnishes the liquor; and (3) a sale of liquor in violation or evasion of law, by a person at the time concealed. Boggus v. State, 78 Ala. 26.

And see Com. v. Owens, 114 Mass. 252 (holding that it is not necessary in a prosecution for keeping a tenement used for the illegal sale of liquors to prove that defendant kept such tenement during the whole of the alleged time, or that the sole business carried on therein was the illegal sale of liquor, or that the premises were in other respects a nuisance or disorderly, or that the accused had no authority to sell); State v. Wade, 63 Vt. 80, 22 Atl. 12. Compare Com. v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 116 Mass. 24.

the statute,[96] or to persons to whom he might lawfully sell at the particular time, although sales to others would have been illegal.[97] In a prosecution under a statute which makes it an offense to keep without a license a "place in which it is reputed that intoxicating liquors are sold," the burden is on defendant to show that such reputation is not well founded.[98]

(III) LICENSE. In cases where a license to sell is relied on as a defense to the prosecution, the government is not bound to produce any evidence in support of the negative allegation that the sale was made without license, but on the contrary defendant must assume the burden of proving that he was duly licensed.[99] And if defendant was the agent, servant, or barkeeper of a dealer, he must pro-

But see Hepler v. State, 58 Wis. 46, 16 N. W. 42; Mehan v. State, 7 Wis. 670, both holding that the state must produce some presumptive evidence that defendant had no license, before he can be called on to prove the contrary.

Maintaining liquor nuisance.— In Massachusetts it has been held that the rule requiring defendant to produce or prove his license, if he has one, does not apply to an indictment for a nuisance by keeping a building used for the unlawful sale and keeping of liquors. duce or prove his principal's license, if he seeks to justify under it.[1] But if the holding of a license, instead of being a defense to the action, is a constituent element of the offense, the particular statute applying only to licensed dealers, then the averment in regard to license is affirmative rather than negative, and it devolves upon the prosecution to show that defendant was licensed.[2] And it has been held that where defendant is charged with aiding and abetting another in the unlawful sale of liquor, the burden is on the state to prove that the latter had no license.[3]

(IV) Authority to Sell For Special Purpose. Where defendant claims that he had authority to sell for certain special purposes, as for medicinal, mechanical, or sacramental use, the burden is on him to prove such authority, and to show that the sale shown by the prosecution was made for such a purpose.[4]

(V) Special Authority For Particular Sale. Where defendant seeks to justify a sale of liquor to a minor, under the written order or consent of the parent or guardian of the minor, as he may do in some states, the burden is upon him to prove his defense; it need not be negatived by the evidence for the prosecution.[5] And the rule is the same where defendant's justification is that he sold on the requisition of a physician,[6] or on the certificate of the purchaser stating the purpose for which he wanted the liquor.[7]

b. Admissibility and Weight of Evidence — (I) In General — (A) Admissions and Declarations of Accused. The prosecution may put in evidence a previous voluntary statement or declaration of defendant, amounting to an admission that he was carrying on the business of a liquor dealer,[8] or that he intended to engage in or continue in that business,[9] or an admission of his guilt, or an offer to plead guilty, or a desire to compromise or settle the complaint,[10] or a declaration showing his ownership or possession of the place in question.[11] But exculpatory statements made by the accused, whether at the time of the alleged offense or afterward, are not generally admissible in his favor.[12]

(B) Testimony of Spies and Informers. In prosecutions under the liquor laws, the testimony of "spotters," detectives, or paid informers is admissible.[13]

(C) Documentary Evidence. The essential facts in a prosecution under the liquor laws may be proved by documentary evidence, when the papers offered are in the nature of public records,[14] or records which the law requires defendant himself to keep,[15] or writings made by the accused,[16] or distinctly connected with his business.[17] And where the law requires a written application or request for liquor as a justification for a sale of it, such applications are proper to be received in evidence.[18]

(D) Circumstantial Evidence — (1) IN GENERAL. A conviction for a violation of the liquor laws may be supported by circumstantial evidence alone, if it is sufficient to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt.[19] And even where the defense is supported by the positive testimony of witnesses, there may be circumstantial evidence strong enough to overcome such testimony and to warrant a conviction.[20]

Evidence too remote.— On a trial for violating the local option law, evidence that whisky had been seen in other stores in the town where defendant had his store should not be admitted, unless defendant is in some way connected with the possession of such whisky. Efird v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. 447, 71 S. W. 957. So also one charged with the illegal keeping of intoxicating liquors in a dwelling-house and its appurtenances cannot be convicted on proof that he kept liquors in a stable not used in connection with the house, where the stable was used exclusively by defendant, and the house exclusively by another person. State v. Kelleher, coincide, at least approximately, with the time of the commission of the alleged offense as laid in the indictment.[24] But evidence of this kind is none the less admissible because it was procured by an illegal and unauthorized search of the premises.[25] Such evidence having been introduced, it is of course open to defendant to explain his possession of the liquors and show the same to have been lawful.[26]

(4) Bar-Room Furniture and Appliances on Premises. In such cases it is competent to show, as against defendant, that the premises in question were fitted up as a bar-room, or contained the paraphernalia or implements of liquor selling, such as a bar, beer-pump, whisky-glasses and the like.[27] But these things must be shown to have been contemporary with the offense charged; and evidence of the condition of the premises at a day subsequent to the finding of the indictment is not admissible.[28]

(5) Character and Reputation of Defendant's Place. The character of the place kept by defendant may be shown by circumstantial evidence, tending to disclose the purpose for which it was used or the kind of business carried on there;[29] but evidence of the reputation of the place — or what people say as to its character or uses — should not be admitted,[30] except where the statutes make such reputation a pertinent fact in the prosecution or declare it to be competent evidence.[31]

(6) Number and Condition of Persons Visiting Place. As tending to show the character of the place kept by defendant, or the kind of business carried on there, it is permissible to prove that it was resorted to by large numbers of persons at unusual times or under suspicious circumstances, that persons were seen going in sober and coming out drunk, or were found in an intoxicated condition on the premises, or that they carried jugs or pails there empty and brought them away full.[32] But such testimony should be confined to the place kept or controlled by defendant, or its appurtenances,[33] and to the time of the offense as charged in the indictment,[34] and must be direct and positive and not hearsay.[35]

(7) Efforts to Avoid Detection. On a prosecution for keeping liquors for unlawful sale, or maintaining a liquor nuisance, or a similar offense, it is proper to admit evidence of efforts on the part of defendant or other persons present on the premises to avoid detection, on the approach or entry of the police, as by trying to hide liquor, or destroying or throwing away the bottles containing it, or pouring it out, or otherwise making away with the material evidences of guilt.[36] And the same is true of arrangements to guard the door or give an alarm upon the entrance of intruders.[37]

(E) Previous Conviction or Acquittal. A prior conviction of defendant may be alleged and proved where its effect will be to increase the penalty for the offense on trial,[38] and the fact is also admissible in evidence on the question of defendant's intent with reference to the liquors or the premises in question, or as tending to show the character of his business,[39] provided it appears that the building or place alleged is the same in both instances,[40] and defendant is identified as the person formerly convicted,[41] and the former conviction is shown to have taken place before the commission of the offense on trial.[42] A former conviction may also be pertinent evidence as affecting the credibility of defendant or tending to show his general character.[43] An acquittal of defendant on a former prosecution may be admitted in evidence in his behalf when the offense charged was the

The indictment or conviction of another person is not generally admissible in evidence. Thus the fact that a third person was charged with illegally keeping liquors in the same barn, on the same day as that on which defendant was charged, has no tendency to show that defendant was not guilty. Com. v. Moore, 157 Mass. 324, 31 N. E. 1070. But on the other hand, where defendant is prosecuted for selling liquor on Sunday as the servant of B, a conviction of B on the charge of being engaged as a liquor dealer, and as such making a sale of liquor on the same day on which defendant was charged with an illegal sale, is admissible on the issue as to whether the business in which defendant was engaged belonged to B. same, or substantially similar to, the one on trial;[44] but not where the two offenses are so dissimilar that his acquittal on the one charge could prove nothing as to his innocence of the other.[45]

(F) Degree of Proof — Variance — (1) In General. The evidence for the prosecution must correspond with the allegations of the indictment,[46] and must identify the transaction complained of and cover the various elements of the offense,[47] establishing the guilt of defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, if the proceeding is distinctively criminal, although a mere preponderance of evidence will be sufficient to justify a recovery in a penal action at law for the fine imposed by the statute.[48] The burden resting upon defendant to prove that any affirmative defense set up by him is sustained by such evidence as is sufficient in criminal prosecutions generally.[49]

(2) Evidence Proving Different Offense. Where the indictment charges one offense and the evidence proves another, the variance is fatal and a conviction cannot be sustained.[50] But where the indictment charges different offenses in different counts, evidence offered under one count may properly be considered by the jury under the other count, if it tends to support the charge therein made.[51]

(II) Proof of Particular Facts — (A) Character or Occupation of Accused. Where the fact that defendant is engaged in a particular business or

Conclusiveness.— On a trial for maintaining a liquor nuisance, evidence that defendant had been acquitted on a charge of keeping the identical liquor with intent to sell it, although not a bar to the present prosecution, is properly admitted, since a judgment on a particular point is, as between the parties, conclusive in relation to such point, although the subject-matter of the two suits be different. State v. Dewey, 65 Vt. 196, 26 Atl. 69. But where, under one indictment for selling liquor within five miles of a church, it was found that the place where the liquor was sold was more than that distance from the church, this does not estop the state from proving on another indictment that the same place was less than five miles from the church. occupation is an essential element of the offense charged, this fact must be established by the evidence for the prosecution.[52] It may be proved by official registers or other public records,[53] or by the testimony of witnesses who have observed defendant in the pursuit of his business;[54] but it is not permissible to receive evidence of public repute or common report as to the nature of defendant's occupation.[55]

(B) License or Authority. Where defendant undertakes to prove that he was duly licensed, as a defense to the prosecution, the best evidence on this point is the license itself,[56] and it is not impeachable on the ground of a want of compliance with the conditions necessary to obtaining it.[57] The license or authority relied on must cover the date or period of time charged in the indictment,[58] and must be sufficient in law to authorize defendant to sell or deal in the particular liquors specified in the indictment,[59] or for the purposes therein described,[60] or to pursue the particular kind of business or branch of liquor selling which would take him out of the penal provisions of the statute,[61] and the license must be available to defendant himself;[62] and if different licenses are required at the same time by different authorities, defendant must produce or prove all of them.[63] If the prosecution undertakes to prove that defendant was licensed, the fact may be shown by the records of the licensing court or board,[64] by the proper officer's receipt for the tax,[65] or by the admissions of defendant.[66] Where the allegation to be proved is that defendant had no license, it is competent to show the fact by the records of the licensing court or board, containing the names of all persons to whom licenses have been issued, and not including defendant's,[67] by the testimony of the officer whose duty would be to issue the license or collect the tax,[68] or by the admissions of defendant.[69]

(c) United States License as Evidence. Where the prosecution is for such offenses as being a "common seller" of liquors, keeping liquors for unlawful sale, maintaining a nuisance, or engaging in the business of liquor selling without proper authority, the fact that defendant has paid the special tax as a retail liquor dealer, under the laws of the United States, is admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing what his business is, or that he keeps liquor for sale, or generally on the question of intent.[70] This fact may be proved by a book containing a record of the names of persons paying special taxes, kept at the office of the collector of internal revenue, as required by the federal statute,[71] by a properly examined and certified copy of the record of special taxes kept by the collector of internal revenue,[72] by the written return made by defendant to the collector,[73] or by the testimony of a witness that he saw a government license, issued to defendant, hanging on the wall of his bar-room.[74] But such evidence does not raise a conclusive presumption against defendant,[75] and it is competent for defendant in rebuttal to explain his possession of the license or to show the purpose for which he procured it.[76]

(d) Criminal Knowledge or Intent. Under the general rule that, where a statute makes a given act indictable, proof of a violation of the law is sufficient to warrant a conviction without proof of a guilty intent, it is not necessary, on an indictment for selling liquor without a license, to prove a criminal intent in order to convict.[77] Defendant's knowledge of the commission of the unlawful act, when necessary to be proved by the state, may be shown by direct testimony of witnesses,[78] or circumstantially by proof of his opportunities for observation, his presence about the premises, or other means of obtaining knowledge.[79]

(E) Connecting Defendant with Unlawful Acts Shown. A conviction cannot be sustained on proof which shows a violation of the liquor laws but fails to connect defendant with the unlawful act or state of facts established.[80] But this connection may be shown by inferential or circumstantial evidence.[81] Thus a defendant may be convicted of making an illegal sale of liquor, although he was not visible to the purchaser, if there is evidence connecting him with the transaction, and from which the jury may infer that he was the seller.[82] Proof that defendant offered or was requested by another to procure liquor for him, and received the money therefor, and shortly after delivered the liquor to such person, puts the burden on defendant to explain where and from whom he got the liquor, and authorizes a conviction where he gives no explanation or one which the jury believe to be a mere subterfuge.[83] When an unlawful sale is shown to have been made in defendant's presence, by a third person, defendant's guilt may be established by evidence of his participation in the act, or, if he took no part in it, that he was the proprietor of the place and the third person was his agent or servant.[84]

And even though defendant was not present at the time, his conviction may be sustained on proof that he was the proprietor of the place, or owner of the business carried on there, and that the actual seller was acting under his orders or directions or as his employee.[85]

(F) Evidence of Sale by Servant or Agent. An indictment or complaint alleging an unlawful sale of liquor by defendant is supported by proof that he sold it by his clerk, servant, or agent.[86] But in this case it is necessary to identify the seller as the agent or employee of defendant, or at least to adduce evidence from which the jury may reasonably infer such a connection between them.[87] And further it must be shown that the sale was made in the presence of the principal, or with his knowledge and assent, or by his direction or authority.[88] But such knowledge, consent, and authority, if not directly proven, may be made out by inference from circumstances sufficient to induce the belief that defendant directed or assented to the acts of the servant or agent.[89] Defendant may show in his defense that the sale in question was made without his knowledge and in disobedience of his positive orders to his servant or agent to make no such sales as that complained of; but the prosecution may contradict this evidence, or show that such orders were not given in good faith or with the expectation that they would be obeyed.[90] But evidence of previous general instructions of this kind is immaterial where it is admitted or conclusively appears that the particular sale charged was made with the knowledge of the master;[91] and such evidence is not competent in favor of the clerk or servant when he is personally charged with the sale.[92] On a trial for selling without a license, the presumption is that the vendor is the owner of the liquor sold,[93] and when the sale was made by the accused in person, the ownership of the liquor is immaterial, unless he justifies under a license to the owner.[94]

(G) Ownership or Possession of House or Place. Where it is necessary to show the ownership or proprietorship of the accused in the house or place where the illegal sales were made, or where the liquors were unlawfully kept, or the nuisance maintained, or otherwise as the case may be, this may be done by evidence of his statements or admissions, previously made, that he was the owner or proprietor of the place,[95] or by the direct testimony of witnesses,[96] or by circumstantial

Illustrations.— A witness who had observed defendant's conduct and conversation at the time and on the premises may be asked "who assumed to be the proprietor and to control the premises" (State v. Cook, 30 Kan. 82, 1 Pac. 32), or what he had seen defendant "doing with reference to the place in question" (Com. v. Fisher, 138 Mass. 504). And, on a trial for maintaining a hotel as a liquor evidence connecting defendant with the place in question in the character of a proprietor.[97] And similar evidence may be used to rebut defendant's contention that he had previously sold or leased the premises to a third person.[98] Evidence that defendant had previously applied for or obtained a license to sell liquor at the place in question is admissible as tending to show him to be the keeper or proprietor of the place.[99] On an indictment for keeping a tenement for the illegal sale of liquor, evidence that defendant kept it at a certain time, when it was not used unlawfully, is competent in connection with evidence that he kept it for the sale of liquor at other times.[1] A deed of the premises from defendant to his wife will not raise the presumption that she is the proprietor of the business, where it appears that he and his family live on the premises and that he conducts the business.[2] Defendant cannot show that a third person, claimed by him to be the proprietor of the place where the liquor was sold, attempted to employ another as bar-tender.[3] Evidence that a warrant was served on a third person, on a charge of keeping liquor in the same place ten days before the present complaint is not competent as to ownership.[4]

(H) Evidence in Case of Joint Parties. It has been held that upon an indictment charging two persons jointly with an unlawful sale of liquor one of them may be convicted, although the evidence does not show any participation by the other,[5] and this being so evidence of a sale by one of defendants is admissible against the other.[6] According to other decisions the evidence must show the joint participation of defendants in the unlawful act, or it will not warrant a conviction.[7]

(I) Evidence as to Purchaser — (1) IDENTIFICATION OF PURCHASER. Where the indictment charges an unlawful sale of liquor to a particular person by name, the proof must correspond with the allegation, and the indictment will not be sustained by evidence of a sale to a different person,[8] and the name of the pur-

nuisance, where a witness has testified to sales made in barns appurtenant to the hotel, he may be allowed to state that he supposed, from the fact that defendant kept his horses in the barn and had control of the hotel, that he also had control of the barns. chaser must be proved with due certainty and without material variance.[9] The indictment is supported by proof that the sale was made to the named person through his servant or messenger,[10] that he himself was the agent of an undisclosed principal,[11] or that he made the purchase jointly with another person who is not named.[12] Where the indictment charges a joint sale to two or more persons by name, it is generally held that proof of a sale to either of them will warrant a conviction,[13] and an allegation of a sale to a named person "and divers other persons" will admit evidence of a sale to a person other than the one named.[14] And the failure of the state to prove the name of the purchaser is immaterial when defendant himself has given the requisite proof.[15]

(2) Evidence Under Allegation of Sale to Person Unknown. Where the sale is alleged to have been made to "a person unknown" to the complainant or the grand jury, there can be no conviction if the sale is shown to have been made to a person who actually was known to the complainant or the jurors at the time of preferring the indictment.[16]

(J) Place of Offense—(1) In General. is material to the description of the offense.[18] If the indictment charges the commission of the offense within a certain municipality, as a town, city, district, or precinct, it is not supported by evidence which shows the place to have been beyond the limits of such municipality or within the limits of another.[19]

(2) IDENTIFICATION OF PARTICULAR PREMISES. Where the place is an essential element of the offense, and the indictment describes the building, tenement, or shop with particularity, the proof must correspond with reasonable certainty to the allegations, or there can be no conviction. This is the case where the indictment is for maintaining a liquor nuisance,[20] or selling liquor to be drunk on the premises where sold.[21] But reasonable intendments will be made to uphold the description of the premises as given in the evidence.[22]

(3) SALE WITHIN PROHIBITED LIMITS. Where the prosecution is under a statute prohibiting the sale of liquor within given limits of distance from a certain municipality or institution, the evidence must show with precision that the offense was committed within the forbidden zone,[23] and also that the place or institution was of the kind intended by the statute.[24]

(K) Time of Offense—(1) IN GENERAL. The evidence must show that the acts charged in the indictment were done within the period of limitations,[25] for which purpose it is generally necessary that there should be positive testimony as to the year when the events occurred,[26] and also that the offense charged was committed before the filing of the information or finding of the indictment.[27] Moreover, if the law or ordinance under which the prosecution is brought is of recent adoption, or has been repealed or suspended, and reënacted or revived, it must be clearly shown that the offense was committed at a time when it was in force.[28] But it is not always necessary that the time proved should be coextensive with the time laid in the indictment.[29]

(2) SINGLE UNLAWFUL SALE. Where the prosecution is for a single unlawful act of liquor selling, so that time is not of the essence of the offense, the time need not be proved strictly as charged, but it will be sufficient to show that the act was done at any time before the date of the indictment and within the period of limitations, although at a different day or time from that alleged.[30] It has been held that proof of a number of sales about the time alleged in the indictment, and prior to the finding thereof, is sufficient to warrant a conviction.[31]

(3) CONTINUING OFFENSE. Where the offense charged is continuous in its nature, as maintaining a liquor nuisance, being a common seller, keeping liquors for unlawful sale, etc., and the indictment lays the time with a continuando, the evidence as to time need not be as broad as the allegation, but it will be sufficient if the offense is shown to have been committed during any part of the time charged.[32] And under a complaint for keeping a liquor nuisance on divers days between a day named and the day of filing the complaint, evidence of what took place on the day the complaint was filed is admissible to show the intent with which the liquors were kept.[33] According to some of the decisions where the offense is of this character and the time is laid with a continuando, it is held that the evidence must be confined to acts which happened within the days alleged, and proof of anything prior to such days cannot be admitted.[34] But it is generally held that the indictment may be sustained by evidence of acts prior to the time charged, if within the period of limitations.[35]

(4) SALE ON PROHIBITED DAYS. Where the indictment charges a sale of liquor on Sunday, it must be proved to have been made on that day of the week, but not necessarily on the day of the month specified; evidence of a sale on any Sunday within the period of limitations will sustain a conviction.[36] Where the indictment alleges, and the evidence shows, a sale or keeping open on an election day, it may be presumed, to support a conviction, that an election was in fact held on that day.[37] Evidence to show that a defendant charged with keeping open a saloon on an election day was told that it was not an offense to open it after the close of the polls is not admissible as a defense.[38]

(L) Evidence as to Liquor Sold — (1) QUANTITY. Under an indictment based on a statute prohibiting the sale of liquor in quantities "less than" a certain minimum, it is necessary to show that the sale charged was of a quantity below the statutory limit.[39] But where defendant is charged with selling one quart, one pint, or any other specific quantity of liquor, it is not necessary to prove a sale of the exact quantity mentioned in the indictment, but only that the quantity sold was less than the statutory minimum.[40] Nor is it necessary that the evidence should describe the quantity sold in terms of any standard measures, such expressions as a "drink," a "glass," or a "dram" being sufficient to warrant a finding that it was below the permitted quantity,[41] nor even that any witness should expressly state the quantity sold if there is evidence that it was less than the statutory minimum.[42] Where the testimony shows a sale at one time of several measures of liquor, each singly below the minimum, but aggregating more than that quantity, the circumstances must determine whether the transaction amounted to one sale of the whole or separate sales of the component parts.[43]

(2) KIND OF LIQUOR SOLD. Where the indictment in describing the liquor alleged to have been sold uses general terms, such as "intoxicating liquor," "spirituous liquor," or the like, following the language of the statute, the proof will be sufficient if it shows a sale of any specific kind of liquor coming within the general term employed.[44] Where a general term is used and a particular liquor is named under a videlicet, this will excuse the prosecution from strict proof, unless the matter should become essentially descriptive of the offense.[45] But if the indictment charges the sale of a specific kind of liquor by name, not accompanied by general descriptive terms, it must be proved as alleged.[46] For Statutory maximum.— Where the prosecution is under a statute forbidding the sale of liquors in quantities of a quart or more, it is not necessary for the state to show that the quantity sold was not a drop less than a legal quart; as for instance, where the liquor was sold in an ordinary brandy bottle, commonly known as a quart bottle, but really holding something less than a quart. Liquor not of general class described.— Where the indictment charges defendant with selling "spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors," it must be shown that he sold one or more of the kinds of liquors mentioned, and proof that the liquor sold was intoxicating is not sufficient, without further proof that it was either spirituous, vinous, or malt. Brantley v. State, 91 Ala. 47, 8 So. 816. Intent.— Proof of sales of liquor other than that for which a conviction is sought is admissible upon the question of the intent with the purpose of proving the particular kind of liquor which was sold, it is proper to admit the direct testimony of a witness, who need not be an expert or a chemist, that it was whisky, or otherwise as the case may be,[47] or the fact that the witness called for the particular kind of liquor alleged to have been sold, and received liquor purporting to be of that kind, especially with testimony that it looked, smelled, or tasted like the kind of liquor alleged,[48] notwithstanding the fact that defendant sold it under a different name, or swears that it was of a different kind, as to which he may be contradicted by any pertinent evidence.[49] That the liquor was intoxicating, and such as might not lawfully be sold, may be shown by defendant's entreaty to the purchaser not to report the matter to the grand jury.[50] It is admissible to introduce in evidence a bottle containing liquor, provided it is fully identified by the witness as the liquor which he bought from defendant.[51] Stamps, tags, and labels, on kegs and barrels in defendant's place of business may also be admissible for the purpose of determining the variety of liquor in question.[52] cases where the court may take judicial notice of this fact,[54] or where the liquor is shown to be of a kind which the statute declares shall be deemed intoxicating.[55] But generally, where it was sold under some disguise or fanciful name, with a view to eluding the law, it is a question of fact for the jury whether or not it was intoxicating liquor.[56] The fact that the liquor sold was intoxicating may be shown by any competent evidence whether direct or circumstantial.[57] It is competent to show sales other than those upon which the state elects to try defendant, in order to show the purposes for which the liquor in question was sold and purchased.[58]

(b) OPINIONS OF WITNESSES. On this issue a witness may testify without being an expert, if he has had personal experience or observation such as to enable him to form a correct opinion.[59] But such testimony will not be admissible unless it

Question of intent.—Where defendant knew that he was selling brandy cherries, the only issue was whether such sale was a sale of spirituous liquors, and evidence to show intent was not admissible. Petteway v. State, 36 Tex. Cr. 97, 35 S. W. 646.

Defendant's knowledge or belief.— In Farrell v. State, 32 Ohio St. 456, 30 Am. Drunken men about premises.— Where defendant alleges that the liquor sold by him was not intoxicating, it is proper to admit evidence that drunken men were seen about his place of business about the time of the sale in question, or that men were seen to go into the place sober and come out drunk. Whisky in stock.— Testimony that defendant had whisky in stock at his place of business about the time of the alleged sale, and that persons who drank the beverage sold became intoxicated, is admissible on this question. Proof of fortifying liquor.— Evidence that native wine, found in defendant's place of business, and which he was selling as agent, had been fortified by spirits, rendering it intoxicating, that it was not so fortified when delivered to him by his principal, and that defendant kept in the place material for so fortifying it, is sufficient to authorize the submission to the jury of the question whether the spirits were added by defendant. is clearly established that the witness speaks of a liquor proved or admitted to be identical with that sold by defendant.[60]

(c) Effects of Use. On the question of the intoxicating properties of the liquor sold by defendant, testimony of witnesses that they drank it and became intoxicated in consequence, or that it produced symptoms of alcoholic intoxication in them, is competent,[61] provided they speak of liquor identical with that sold by the accused,[62] and is sufficient evidence on the point, unless successfully contradicted.[63]

(d) Chemical Analysis. To show that the liquor in question was intoxicating, or that it contained the percentage of alcohol designated in the statute as sufficient to make it intoxicating, it is competent to put in evidence the result of a chemical analysis made by a qualified chemist, there being proper proof of identity.[64]

(iii) Evidence of Particular Offenses—(a) Unlawful Sale of Liquors—(1) Sale in General. Variation in analysis.— In a prosecution for the illegal sale of liquors, the state need not show that the liquor alleged to have been sold complied strictly in analysis with the commercial article known by that name. State v. Cunningham, 2 Mo. App. Rep. 887.

65. Fleming v. State, 106 Ga. 359, 32 S. E. 338, holding that the fact that defendant had agreed to sell a certain quantity of whisky for a certain price, and was about to draw it from a barrel, when he was interrupted by the entrance of the police, does not show a sale.

Exceptions — Sale or furnishing.— Where the statute prohibits the selling, giving, or furnishing of liquor, although the evidence may not clearly make out a sale, it does not follow that defendant must be acquitted; for if it tends to establish either a sale or a furnishing, it must go to the jury. State v. Hassett, 64 Vt. 46, 23 Atl. 584. Where the statute concerns any one who shall "sell or be concerned in selling," and the indictment charged that defendant "sold" liquors, it will be supported always necessary to prove each separate element of a contract of sale. Thus, while payment of money is a distinctive feature of a sale, and tends strongly to prove it,[67] the other circumstances in the case may establish a sale without any evidence of the passing of a consideration.[68] If the parties have attempted to cloak or disguise the transaction or to evade the law by a subterfuge, evidence is admissible to show the real character of their dealings, and will justify a conviction if it satisfies the jury that a sale was actually intended and accomplished.[69] The fact that defendant on certain occasions refused to sell liquors to persons who wished to buy it has no tendency to contradict or control evidence that he by proof that he was concerned in selling them. Needham v. State, 19 Tex. 332.

In Connecticut it has been held that a conviction for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquors is sustained by proof that defendant kept such liquors with intent to sell contrary to law. State v. Teahan, 50 Conn. 92.

Proof of buying instead of selling.— Under an indictment for "selling" liquor, a person cannot be convicted on evidence showing that he was a purchaser. State v. Miller, 26 W. Va. 106.

67. Loveless v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. 131, 49 S. W. 98.

Evidence as to payment.— It is sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty if the evidence shows that a person put down money in defendant's presence and carried away a bottle of liquor without objection. Liles v. State, 43 Ark. 95; McClure v. State, 43 Ark. 75; Latham v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1903) 72 S. W. 182. But an indictment for selling without license is not supported merely by proof that liquor was drunk on defendant's premises by his invitation. State v. Quinn, 25 Mo. App. 102. And see State v. Spaulding, 61 Vt. 505, 17 Atl. 844. And in a prosecution for a sale of whisky on Sunday, where the witness was so drunk at the time of the alleged offense as to be unable to testify whether the liquor was sold or given to him, or whether or not he paid for it, it was held that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain a conviction. Keller v. State, 23 Tex. App. 259, 4 S. W. 886. A sale may be inferred from the fact that a waiter carried wine from the bar into the eating room, and brought back money. Delivery as evidence.— In Maine and Massachusetts, by statute, in prosecutions for selling liquor contrary to law, the delivery of liquor is presumptive evidence of a sale of it, and sufficient to warrant a conviction if not controlled by other evidence. State v. Day, 37 Me. 244; State v. Fairfield, 37 Me. 517; Com. v. Gavin, 148 Mass. 449, 18 N. E. 675, 19 N. Taking orders for liquor.— To prove a sale by defendant, it is proper to show that orders for liquor were sent to him, by written message or by telephone, and that liquor was accordingly delivered or shipped to those ordering it. State v. Johnson, 86 Minn. 121, 90 N. W. 161; State v. Priester, 43 Minn. 373, 45 N. W. 712. And the books of an express company are competent evidence to show the shipment and delivery of goods to the buyer. State v. Kriechbaum, 81 Iowa 633, 47 N. W. 872.

Order on third person.— If it is shown that defendant gave to a person desiring to buy liquor a written order on a third person for such liquor, and received the money for it, it is evidence of a sale by defendant. Hunter v. State, 55 Ark. 357, 18 S. W. 374; State v. Briggs, 81 Iowa 585, 47 N. W. 865.

Confessions or admissions of defendant are also proper evidence. Thus his admission, in a stipulation where he attempts to justify under a revoked license, that he sold the liquor as charged, is sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction. Neuman v. State, 76 Wis. 112, 45 N. W. 30.

69. Reese v. Newnan, 120 Ga. 198, 47 S. E. 560. See New Gloucester v. Bridgham, 28 Me. 60; Archer v. State, 45 Md. 33; State v. Scoggins, 107 N. C. 959, 12 S. E. 59, 10 L. R. A. 542.

This principle is illustrated by the cases, frequently occurring, where defendant, on being applied to for liquor, refuses to sell it, or says he has none for sale, but leads the way to another part of his premises, where the purchaser "finds" liquor, and defendant "finds" the price, or where defendant pretends that the liquor belongs to a third person, but nevertheless receives the money for it. See Roberson v. State, 100 Ala. 37, 14 So. 554; Stultz v. State, 96 Ind. 456; Knox v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1903) 77 S. W. 13.

Sale disguised as gift.— Where the parties state that the money which passed between them was the price of some other article sold at the same time, and that the liquor delivered from the one to the other was given without consideration or as a bonus, it is for the jury to determine from the evidence whether there was a sale of liquor disguised by a subterfuge or trick. See Marcus v. State, 89 Ala. 23, 8 So. 155; State v. Simons, 17 N. H. 83.

made the particular sale charged, and is not admissible on that issue.[70] An unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor may be proved by other witnesses than the purchaser.[71]

(2) Sale, Gift, or Exchange. Where the statute prohibits the sale of liquor by certain persons or under certain conditions, and the indictment distinctly charges a sale, there can be no conviction on evidence which proves a gift or exchange of liquor, as distinguished from a sale.[72]

(3) Proof of Sales Other Than Those Counted on. Where an indictment for the unlawful sale of liquor contains but a single count, the prosecution should not be allowed to go to the jury upon evidence of more than one transaction, and if evidence of several sales has been introduced the state should be required to elect.[73] And where, on an indictment for illegal selling, the prosecution has proved one unlawful sale, it is error to admit evidence of other sales,[74] unless they all constitute one transaction, or the further evidence is necessary to identify the offender or to prove motive or knowledge,[75] or unless the whole series must be proved to make out the offense.[76] But evidence of other sales than that counted on, made on similar occasions, is admissible on the question of intent,[77] to show defendant's authorization or acquiescence in sales made by his wife or employees,[78] or to show his general system of conducting his business,[79] or the purpose for which the particular sale was made.[80] The state is not restricted in its evidence to proof of sales which were testified to before the grand jury.[81] And where the proceeding is by information, which is verified both by the prosecuting attorney and the complaining witness, it is not error to permit evidence to be introduced on the trial showing sales of liquor other than those of which the prosecuting witness had knowledge.[82]

(4) SALE WITHOUT LICENSE. To establish the commission of this offense, it is necessary to prove a sale by defendant, as in other cases,[83] or a sale in violation of the terms or conditions of his license.[84] On an indictment for violating a municipal ordinance, by selling without a license, evidence of the population of the city and county, and the annual sales of liquor and the profits thereon, is properly rejected, because the reasonableness of the ordinance, if questioned, is for the court.[85] When the prosecution is for retailing liquors without having paid the occupation tax therefor, one cannot be convicted of this offense without proof that a tax was imposed on such occupation,[86] and it is error to exclude the sheriff's receipt for the tax, offered in evidence by defendant to prove that he had paid the tax.[87] The accused may show that he was a druggist or physician and dispensed the liquor in good faith as a medicine or on a prescription.[88] A conviction for selling liquor without a dramshop license will not be disturbed, where the only evidence presented by the accused was a merchant's license, and two wit-

Presumption as to ownership of liquor.—The presumption, on a trial for selling liquor without a license, is that the vendor is the owner of the liquor sold. Rana v. State, 51 Ark. 481, 11 S. W. 692.

The offense of selling liquors without a license and of keeping such liquors with intent to sell without a license are distinct offenses, and the fact that an indictment for both of them avers that they were committed on the same day does not raise a presumption that they arose out of one transaction, namely, the sale of liquors without a license, which liquors, up to the time of sale, defendant had kept with intent to sell them without a license. nesses testified, positively to the purchase of liquor from the accused prior to the date of such license.[89]

(5) Sales by Druggists and Physicians. In a prosecution for the violation of a statute forbidding druggists to sell liquor except on prescription of a physician, it is not necessary for the state to present evidence negativing the exception, but it is for defendant to make good his justification.[90] And the rule is the same where the statute prohibits pharmacists from selling liquor "as a beverage."[91] Where the prosecution is against a physician for giving a false prescription, his good faith in the matter must be established to the satisfaction of the jury.[92]

(6) Sale For Unlawful Purpose. In a prosecution for illegally selling liquor to be drunk on the premises where sold, it is not necessary to show that the liquor was in fact drunk on the premises, although the indictment so alleges.[93] But the place of sale, the place where it was intended the liquor should be consumed, and the intention of the seller in regard to its consumption are material to the offense, and should be proved as alleged.[94] A prosecution for selling liquor for an unlawful purpose cannot be sustained by proof that it was sold for a proper purpose but in an irregular manner.[95]

Evidence inadmissible for this purpose.— Evidence for defendant that the liquor was called for and sold to be used as a medicine is not admissible; it is not equivalent to showing that it was sold on prescription. State v. Hendrix, 98 Mo. 374, 11 S. W. 728. And where the statute directs what the prescription shall contain and how it shall be preserved, it is proper to exclude oral evidence merely of the fact that the purchaser had a prescription. Forbidding drinking on premises.—The fact that defendant told persons who bought liquor from him that it could not be drunk on the premises, or forbade them to drink it there, does not prove that it was not sold with the intention that it should be consumed on the spot; for the other circumstances of the case may show that such a declaration on his part was merely perfunctory and not meant to be heeded, especially where it appears that purchasers paid no attention to such remark except to step into an adjoining room or place and drink their liquor there. (7) SALE TO MINORS. To convict a defendant of the offense of selling liquor to a minor, it must be proved that there was a sale of the liquor,[96] and that the purchaser was under age at the time.[97] Where the law is such that the offense is not committed unless the seller knows the purchaser to be a minor, such knowledge on the part of defendant must be affirmatively proved by the evidence for the state.[98] In other cases where defendant is not guilty if he made the sale in the reasonable and honest belief that the purchaser was of age, it is for him to show the existence of such belief and the reasons for it.[99] It is not permissible for the jury to make their finding as to the belief and good faith of defendant depend upon their impressions of the age of the alleged minor, as formed from their observation of his appearance on the witness' stand.[1] Where defendant is accused and being prosecuted for a violation of the local option law, evidence that the purchaser was a minor should not be admitted against the accused in aggravation of the offense.[2]

(8) SALE TO INTOXICATED PERSONS. To convict a defendant of selling liquor to a person who was intoxicated, there must be proof of the drunken condition of the purchaser[3] at the time of the alleged sale to him.[4] Proof of this will raise a presumption that defendant knew of his intoxicated state, and further proof of such knowledge is not necessary in the first instance.[5]

(9) SALE TO HABITUAL DRUNKARDS. To warrant a conviction for this offense, it must be shown that defendant made a sale of liquor,[6] to a person who, at or about the date of the sale was a common drunkard or a person of intemperate habits.[7] The fact of the purchaser's habits may be established by the testimony of any competent witness,[8] including the drunkard himself.[9] And such habits may be proved by testimony to numerous and repeated instances of intoxication on his part.[10] If it is necessary for the prosecution to prove that the seller had knowledge of the intemperate habits of the purchaser,[11] this fact may be shown by direct testimony or by proof of such circumstances as will warrant the jury in inferring that he had such knowledge.[12]

(10) SALE OR KEEPING OPEN AT PROHIBITED TIMES. The offense of selling liquor or keeping open a saloon on Sunday or at other prohibited times may be established by evidence that the place was open, or was accessible to visitors, although not by the usual entrance, and that defendant or his employees were seen in the place, together with other persons who had no business there except to get liquor;[13] or that, on the place being raided, many persons were observed to rush out by the back way;[14] or by evidence that persons seen to go into the place came out drunk[15] or bringing bottles of liquor with them;[16] or by the testimony of a witness that he bought liquor at the place and time alleged.[17] To warrant a conviction for this offense, it is not necessary to show that the liquor sold was drunk on the premises.[18] A charge for exposing liquor for sale on Sunday is not sustained by proof of defendant's admission that he had violated the Sunday laws.[19]

(B) Illegal Transportation. On a trial for transporting liquors from place to place, having reasonable cause to believe that they were intended for unlawful sale, it is competent to show that defendant, on several occasions within a short time, had received other considerable quantities of liquor, at the same railroad station, for transportation by him,[20] or that he had frequently delivered similar packages at the same place, which were found to contain liquor.[21] On the question of his having cause to believe that the liquors were intended to be sold in violation of law, it is competent to show that the consignee was engaged in the business of liquor selling, or that the place of delivery was used for that business, or that sales were actually made there.[22] It is necessary to prove the place from which and the place to which the liquor was carried, as laid in the indictment;[23] but not that defendant began and completed the transportation, it being sufficient if he aided and assisted in it.[24] Nor is it necessary that he be the owner of the liquor,[25] nor that he knew that the liquor was intended for sale in violation of law.[26] It is sufficient to show that he had reasonable cause to believe that the liquor was intended for unlawful sale.

must be proof that intoxicating liquors[28] were kept by defendant[29] with the intention on his part to sell them unlawfully within the jurisdiction.[30] Although it is not necessary to show a sale, the fact of unlawful sales by defendant on recent occasions is competent evidence of the intent with which the liquor was kept.[31] For this purpose it is proper to admit evidence of the discovery of liquor on defendant's premises, in large quantities, or under suspicious circumstances;[32] evidence as to the condition of the room or place where the liquors were kept, with reference to its appointments and fixtures;[33] evidence that drunken men have been seen coming from the place;[34] and evidence of efforts on the part of defendant to evade or escape detection.[35] The admissions or declarations of the accused are likewise admissible for the same purpose.[36] Testimony that it has been a matter of public report and notoriety that intoxicating liquors were sold by defendant is not admissible.[37]

(D) Being a Common Seller. Under statutes making it an offense to be a common seller of intoxicating liquors without a license, and providing that proof of three several sales by an unlicensed person shall be sufficient evidence to convict, the jury are not merely authorized but required to convict on such proof being made.[38] The three sales are not necessarily to be proved by the direct testimony of witnesses, but may be established by well combined circumstantial evidence, provided it satisfies the jury.[39] A defendant cannot be found guilty of being a common seller of liquor simply because he has paid the United States tax as a retail liquor dealer.[40] Evidence that defendant kept a public house, and had upon it an innkeeper's sign is irrelevant and inadmissible; because one may be licensed as an innkeeper without the right to sell liquors, and it cannot be presumed that he violated the law.[41]

(E) Carrying on Liquor Business. Where the indictment charges that defendant "engaged in," "pursued," or "carried on" the business of liquor selling without a license, as distinguished from the offense of making an unlawful sale, there must be some evidence of continuance in the business, or that selling liquor was defendant's occupation;[42] and a single act of sale is not sufficient to establish this fact,[43] although it may go to the jury if there are circumstances indicating that such sale was made in the course of the seller's usual business.[44]

(F) Keeping a Place For Unlawful Sale. On an indictment for maintaining a liquor nuisance, or a place used for the unlawful sale of liquors, there must be evidence of something more than defendant's mere purpose or intention to use the premises in such manner.[45] It is not necessary to prove an act of sale or offer to sell,[46] and proof of a single unlawful sale will not be sufficient to convict.[47] But it is competent to put in evidence specific instances of illegal selling, as the unlawful intent may be inferred from the unlawful sales.[48] The evidence must make out the particular offense charged, as distinguished from other forms of violation of the liquor laws,[49] and show a keeping or maintaining by defendant as the owner or proprietor of the place,[50] or distinctly connect him with the offense.[51] And the character of the place, if more particularly described in the statute, must also be shown by the evidence.[52] On this question, and as to the nature of defendant's business, and his purpose or intent, the discovery of liquors on the premises, especially if under suspicious circumstances, is competent evidence, as also the presence of the materials and implements for pursuing the traffic, the presence of drunken men about the place, evidences of recent drinking, and attempts to hide the liquor or otherwise to escape detection.[53] But evidence of the general reputation of the place or tenement kept by defendant is not admissible,[54] unless by statute.[55] The admissions or declarations of the accused are admissible for the prosecution.[56] The proof must also correspond with the allegations of the indictment in respect to the place of the alleged offense,[57] and the time of its commission,[58] and the character of the liquors charged to have been kept or sold.[59] prevails that the court may take judicial notice of the adoption of the local option law, and that it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove this fact, nor to show, in the first place, that the requisite formalities were observed.[64]

(H) Evidence on Prosecution of Club. On an indictment for selling liquor without a license, defendant may show that he was acting as a member or employee of a bona fide social club, where, by the local law, such associations are not required to take out a license in order to be permitted to dispense liquors to their own members.[65] But the state may show that the pretended club was but a fraudulent contrivance or device to cover the unlicensed sale of liquor, which fact may be established by evidence of any pertinent facts tending to expose its real nature or the pretense under which it masquerades.[66]

7. Trial — a. Conduct of Trial — (I) In General. Trials for violations of the liquor laws are governed by the ordinary rules of criminal procedure[67] in respect to such matters as the time for making a motion to dismiss,[68] the grant or refusal of continuances or adjournments,[69] the authority of attorneys specially appointed to prosecute,[70] the presence of spectators in the court,[71] or the swearing of witnesses, the conduct of their examination, and the order of presenting evidence.[72]

(II) Defendant's Plea. In prosecutions under the liquor laws, the plea of "not guilty" is the general issue, and puts in issue every material fact.[73]

Time to prepare for trial.— Where the summons to appear before a magistrate was served on defendant less than an hour before the time fixed for his appearance, and although he was present he refused to plead or to ask for an adjournment, whereupon the magistrate entered a conviction, it was held that the proceedings were contrary to natural justice, and the conviction was quashed. A special plea, when it merely states matters of justification or such as would constitute a defense on the merits, may properly be stricken out, for such matters would be admissible under the general issue. Trost v. State, 64 Miss. 188, 1 So. 49.

A former conviction for the same offense may be given in evidence under the general issue, in a prosecution before a justice for illegal liquor selling; but if it is pleaded in bar, a replication that the conviction was for another offense than the one charged is sufficient. State v. Conlin, 27 Vt. 318.

Nolo contendere.— In Massachusetts a defendant in such a prosecution cannot be adjudged guilty on a plea of nolo contendere, unless it appears by the record that the plea

(III) Election Between Counts or Offenses. In prosecutions for violations of liquor laws the general rules as to election between counts or offenses apply.[74] Where the law provides that the granting of a new trial shall place the parties in the same position as if no trial had been had, the prosecution on such new trial may elect to proceed upon a different sale from that relied on in the former trial.[75]

(IV) Trial by Jury. The constitutional right of one charged with a violation of the liquor laws to claim a trial by jury has been discussed in an earlier section.[76] As to the competency of jurors, it is held that members of societies or associations formed for the purpose of enforcing the liquor laws and securing the prosecution of offenders are disqualified;[77] but not where the society, although designed to promote temperance among its own members, does not endeavor to compel others to obey the laws.[78] The fact that a person as constable is specially charged with enforcing the liquor law does not disqualify him from acting as a juror on a trial for maintaining a liquor nuisance in another precinct.[79]

b. Questions For Jury — (I) In General. In trials under the liquor laws, as in other cases, whether or not evidence is competent or admissible is a question for the determination of the court;[80] but its effect is for the jury, and the court should not direct their verdict unless there is a total want of evidence or an entire lack of conflict; although the testimony is conflicting, it must not be rejected, but must be left to the jury to consider.[81] Whether defendant had a license is a question of fact; but the nature and extent of the authority it conferred on him is matter of law for the court.[82] And so whether or not a transaction was a sale of was received with the consent of the prosecutor. Com. v. Adams, 6 Gray (Mass.) 359.

Pleading guilty to one count and not guilty to another.— Where the first of two counts charged defendant with having been a common seller of liquor during a certain time, and the second alleged a single sale within the same time, and defendant pleaded guilty to the second and not guilty to the first count, it was held that he might nevertheless be tried and convicted upon the first count, and judgment rendered thereon against him, and a nolle prosequi entered on the second count. liquors may be a question for the court, if it depends on the legal consequences of proved or admitted facts;[83] but it is for the jury if the facts are in controversy, if it depends on the intention of the parties,[84] or if there was an attempt to evade the law by a trick, device, or subterfuge.[85] The alleged agency of the accused, either as acting for the seller or the buyer, is also a question which should be left to the jury;[86] and the same is true of questions concerning the location, description, or character of premises constituting the scene of the alleged offense.[87] And generally all controverted questions of fact are to be determined by the jury.[88]

(II) Intent, Knowledge, or Notice. It is the province of the jury to determine questions concerning the intent of defendant in the transaction complained of;[89] his knowledge of facts which, if known to him, would make the particular sale unlawful;[90] or his honesty of purpose or good faith, when set up as a defense or justification.[91]

(III) Character and Properties of Liquor. While there are some well known alcoholic beverages which are judicially known to be intoxicating,[92] it is generally a question of fact to be submitted to the jury whether a given liquor is "intoxicating," "spirituous," "vinous," "malt," or otherwise according to the language of the statute, and especially where the liquor in question was disguised by being mixed with other substances, or sold under a fanciful or deceptive name.[93]

(IV) Identity, Character, or Condition of Purchaser. Where two persons go together to a saloon for a drink, it is for the jury to find, if the fact is disputed, to which of them the sale was made.[94] Where a defendant is charged with selling liquor to an intoxicated person, or to a habitual drunkard, the question of the inebriated condition of the one, or the intemperate habits of the other, is a question of fact for the jury.[95]

c. Instructions — (I) In General. On a trial for a violation of the liquor laws the rules as to instructions in criminal prosecutions generally are applicable.[96] Accordingly, in trials for offenses of this character, it has been held that the court should instruct the jury as to the existence and applicability of the statute covering the case;[97] the essential elements of the offense charged,[98] the instructions being carefully restricted to the specific offense alleged in the indictment, as distinguished from all similar but distinct crimes;[99] as to the time within which[1] and the place meant to be obeyed is a question for the jury. State v. Wentworth, 65 Me. 234, 20 Am. Rep. 688; Com. v. Riley, 157 Mass. 89, 31 N. E. 708; Moore v. State, 64 Nebr. 557, 90 N. W. 553.

Time of offense.—An instruction which permits the jury to find defendant guilty on proof of acts committed before the enactment of the statute under which he is prosecuted, or at a time beyond the statutory period of limitation, is erroneous. State v. Shank, 79 Iowa 47, 44 N. W. 241; State v. Jacobs, 75 Iowa 247, 39 N. W. 293; Webb v. State, (Tex. Cr. App. 1900) 58 S. W. 82. But such error where[2] the offense must be shown to have been committed in order to warrant a conviction; as to any presumptions of law arising in the case;[3] and as to their province in regard to questions of law and of fact.[4] As in other criminal cases the instructions will be erroneous if there is no evidence in the case to support them or to which they are applicable;[5] and the court should not charge on the weight of the evidence.[6] It is proper, however, to instruct the jury that they are to weigh and estimate the value of the testimony and give to it such effect as they think it ought to have.[7] A special instruction on circumstantial evidence may be given if required by the nature of the evidence before the jury.[8]

(11) Agency or Representation of Accused. Where the alleged illegal sale was made by a servant or agent of the accused, the jury should be instructed as to the necessity of knowledge and consent on his part, and as to the circumstances under which they may infer such knowledge and consent as from his presence at the time, the general course of his business, or other pertinent facts.[9] If the defense is that the unlawful sale was made contrary to the proprietor's

Compare People v. Bacon, 117 Mich. 187, 75 N. W. 438, holding that a charge that among other things the posting of a United States internal revenue receipt in the room was made presumptive evidence of the sale of liquor was not misleading, although there was no evidence as to such a receipt in the case, where, in another instruction, the court stated correctly the facts which must be found from the evidence to warrant a conviction.

Evidence of spy or informer.— The court is not bound to charge that the testimony of a spy or informer "is to be received with great caution and distrust"; and there is no error in the refusal so to charge if the jury are properly instructed as to the matters which they may take into consideration in weighing the evidence of the witness. orders to his servants, the jury should be instructed to consider whether such orders were given in good faith and with the intention that they should be obeyed.[10] If defendant claims to have acted as the agent of the buyer,[11] or attempts to justify as the employee of one having a license,[12] and there is evidence to support his contention, he is entitled to an instruction upon the circumstances which would relieve him from liability, on the ground of such agency or employment.

(III) Intent, Knowledge, or Good Faith. Where the charge is selling liquor to a minor or drunkard, defendant's right to an instruction on the question of his knowledge of the purchaser's age or habits, or his grounds for a reasonable belief on the subject, or good faith in making the sale, will depend on whether the statute makes such knowledge an essential part of the offense, or permits ignorance or an honest mistake to be shown in defense.[13] Where the liquor is claimed to have been sold in good faith, for use as a medicine or for other permitted purposes, the jury should be instructed concerning defendant's knowledge and good faith.[14]

(IV) Character and Properties of Liquor. Where an issue is raised as to the properties of the liquor sold by defendant, the court should instruct the jury as to the meaning of the word "intoxicating," as applied to a beverage,[15] except in cases where the statute expressly defines this term;[16] and should charge that defendant must be acquitted unless the evidence proves beyond a reasonable doubt that the liquor which he sold was intoxicating liquor and of the kind charged in the indictment.[17] But the court should not charge, or assume in its instructions, that the liquor in question was intoxicating,[18] except in the cases where this fact may come within the judicial cognizance;[19] but may instruct and direct the jury in regard to the evidence which it is proper for them to consider in determining this issue.[20] The court is not obliged to charge that the jury must find that the liquor sold by defendant produced intoxication in the purchaser, as it is not necessary to convict for a sale of intoxicating liquor that the buyer should have been made drunk by the use of the liquor sold.[21] It is erroneous for the court to tell the jury that the fact that certain bitters made the purchaser drunk is proof that they were spirituous liquor, this being an instruction on the weight of the evidence.[22]

(v) Illegal Sales. On trial for an illegal sale of liquor, the court should explain to the jury the meaning of "sale" as a legal transaction,[23] and, if the evidence requires it, should discriminate between a sale, a gift, an exchange, and other forms of transfer, so as not to permit a conviction for one on proof of another.[24] Instructions should not be so framed as to permit the jury to convict for a sale to a different purchaser than the one specified in the indictment,[25] or a sale made at a time when it would be lawful,[26] or without proof of some one specific sale.[27] If there is evidence in the case to justify it, it is proper to instruct the jury that they must find defendant guilty if they are satisfied that his conduct in the particular transaction was only a subterfuge, device, trick, or evasion to disguise or mask an unlawful sale.[28] On a charge of selling to a prohibited person, it is proper to instruct the jury as to what constitutes a sale,[29] and to explain to them the status, character, habits, or other condition of the purchaser which would render it unlawful;[30] but not to take from them the question of defendant's knowledge, or of what would constitute due diligence on his part in seeking information.[31] Instructions relative to a charge of keeping open a saloon or bar at a prohibited time are erroneous if so framed as to permit the jury to convict where the evidence shows that it was opened for a lawful purpose.[32] Where the defense is that the sale was made for a lawful and permitted purpose, the jury should be instructed as to the purposes which would be lawful and as to the circumstances they may consider in determining the purpose of the particular sale and the question of defendant's good faith.[33] If the defense of a license is interposed, the jury should not be permitted to disregard the evidence on that point, but should be instructed as to the legal effect of a license if proved.[34]

(VI) KEEPING FOR SALE. On a trial for this offense, it is not improper to instruct the jury that the finding of liquor on defendant's premises is presumptive evidence that he kept it for sale, provided they are told this presumption is rebuttable and are instructed as to the burden of proof and the right of an individual to keep liquors for lawful purposes.[35] The effect of such evidence and the general question of defendant's purpose are matters which must be left to the jury.[36]

(VII) CARRYING ON BUSINESS. As there is a fundamental distinction between the offense of engaging in, or carrying on, the business of liquor selling and the offense of making an unlawful sale or sales, the difference should be pointed out to the jury, and instructions which confuse the two crimes or tend to mislead the jury are erroneous.[37] But the jury may be told that they may find defendant guilty if satisfied that selling liquor was his common and ordinary business, without proof of any particular number of sales.[38]

(VIII) MAINTAINING LIQUOR NUISANCE. The offense of keeping a place for the unlawful sale of liquor, or maintaining a liquor nuisance, being distinguishable both from that of unlawful selling and from that of keeping liquor for unlawful sale, the jury should be instructed as to the differences, and instructions are erroneous which tend to mislead them or to permit a conviction of one offense

In Massachusetts the statute provides that three several sales of liquor shall be sufficient evidence of the character of the defendant as a common seller. Under this provision, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury that proof of three sales is enough on proof of another.[39] The jury should also be instructed, where the evidence requires it, concerning the effect of finding liquor on the premises as evidence,[40] the proof necessary to connect him with the offense as the keeper or proprietor of the place, or as being interested in the business or in control of the place,[41] and as to the proof of a license or authority on his part, or the want of it.[42]

d. Verdict and Findings.[43] In prosecutions under the liquor laws, a general verdict of guilty or not guilty will generally be sufficient.[44] A general verdict is not insufficient because it fails to specify on which of several counts in the indictment it is founded.[45] If a special verdict or finding is made, it is essential that it should find every fact which is necessary to establish defendant's guilt under the indictment.[46]

tion of the liquor laws, unless special provisions are made by statute, are governed by the rules applicable in criminal prosecutions generally.[47] A conviction will not be sustained where, pending the appeal, the statute under which the prosecution was had has been repealed[48] or adjudged unconstitutional by the court of last resort.[49]

b. Right of Appeal. Although the statute defining and punishing offenses against the liquor laws may not specifically allow appeals from conviction, yet such right may generally be claimed under the general statutes granting the accused an appeal in cases of misdemeanor.[50] Where a prosecution under a municipal ordinance regulating the sale of liquor is civil in form, and not strictly criminal in its character, the right of appeal may belong to the municipality as well as to defendant.[51]

c. Questions Considered on Appeal. The appellate court will not consider objections to the indictment, information, or complaint which were of such a character as to be waived by pleading or cured by verdict,[52] or objections to the evidence or the instructions or other rulings of the court not duly excepted to or which have been waived by defendant's conduct at the trial.[53]

d. What Record Must Show. A conviction cannot be sustained on appeal if the record fails to show the presentation of evidence of each of the facts essential to constitute the offense on trial,[54] including such facts, where they are severally necessary, as the place of commission of the alleged offense,[55] the sale of liquor to the particular person named in the indictment,[56] defendant's knowledge of circumstances making the sale unlawful,[57] that the occupation tax, non-payment of which made the sale unlawful, had been duly levied before the sale alleged,[58] or that the local option law was duly in force at the place and time charged.[59]

e. Review. On appeal from a conviction for violating the liquor laws, the judgment will be affirmed where no error appears,[60] and where there was some evidence on every material point to support a verdict of guilty,[61] which, although it was conflicting, might have justified such a verdict.[62]

f. Harmless Error. The judgment will not be reversed for error which was not harmful to the appellant. This rule applies where the action of the court to which objection is made, although actually erroneous, did not result in prejudice to any substantial rights of the accused;[63] where facts or qualifying circumstances which should have been adverted to in the instructions were either admitted or proved by the testimony;[64] or where the charge of the court was theoretically too broad or would have authorized a conviction on a state of facts not laid in the indictment or warranted by the statute, but the evidence was strictly confined to the limits of the indictment and the statute.[65] And a similar principle applies where the objection is to mere verbal inaccuracies of the court in defining or explaining the terms used in the law,[66] or to remarks improperly made by the judge, but cured by the explicit terms of the charge.[67]

g. New Trial. A new trial may be granted on appeal from a conviction under the liquor laws where there was a total failure of evidence on some essential point,[68] or on the ground of newly discovered evidence, if not merely cumulative,[69] or because of surprise.[70]

9. Sentence[71] and Punishment — a. In General. When the statute specifies the amount of fine or term of imprisonment to be imposed as a penalty for the violation of the liquor laws, the court has no discretion in regard to the punishment, but must enter the sentence directed by the statute.[72] And this applies also to the nature of the penalty or punishment to be awarded.[73] If the statute does not authorize punishment by imprisonment only a fine can be imposed.[74] It is otherwise where the law allows a judgment of fine or imprisonment or both.[75] As to sentencing defendant to pay a fine and to be imprisoned in default of payment, or to stand committed until the fine shall be paid, authority for such a judgment must be found in the statute.[76] The severity of the sentence may also vary, if the statute so directs, according to the occupation of the accused, as whether or not he is a licensed dealer, or a dram-shop keeper,[77] or a druggist.[78] The duty of fixing the amount of the fine to be imposed is sometimes cast by law upon the jury.[79] It has been held that a conviction and fine for retailing liquor without a license does not operate as a license to retail for a year.[80]

b. Applicability of Laws and Ordinances. Although the statute prohibiting the particular act for which defendant has been convicted may prescribe no penalty for its violation, he may still be subject to sentence if there is a general law respecting the punishment of misdemeanors, or enacting penalties for infractions of the law not otherwise provided for, or punishing all persons transacting without a license any business for which a license is required by law.[81] If the statute is tainted with unconstitutional provisions, he cannot be punished at all, if the invalidity affects the whole; but it is otherwise if the invalid provisions may be eliminated, leaving enough of the statute to sustain the conviction.[82] He may be liable to concurrent penalties under several laws or ordinances;[83] but in case of conflicting statutes or progressive changes in the law the sentence should be determined in accordance with the latest expression of the legislative will.[84] And where a local option law is in force at the place of the offense, the penalty which it prescribes, rather than that under the general liquor law, must be applied.[85] And generally, where different offenses are defined by different sections of the same statute, or by successive statutes, with varying penalties, the court must take care to impose on a convicted defendant only that sentence which applies to his particular offense and is warranted by the applicable statute or section.[86]

c. Joint Defendants. Two or more persons may be jointly indicted for a violation of the liquor laws, and if both are found guilty, the full punishment may be imposed on each.[87] The judgment should be several against each for the full penalty, and not joint.[88]

d. Separate Counts or Offenses. Under an indictment charging several violations of the liquor law in as many counts, where defendant is found guilty on all, a separate sentence should be rendered on each count.[89] It is error to render judgment for an aggregate fine or for a term of imprisonment in gross; the punishment awarded under each count should be specified.[90] A fine for two separate offenses under the liquor laws, although both are proved, cannot be imposed where only one was charged.[91]

e. Successive Convictions. The expression "third offense," as used in must have been committed after the enactment of the law which authorizes such increased penalties; that is, the penalty for a second conviction cannot be imposed on a defendant because he had been before convicted under a previous law.[93] It is also generally required that the two offenses shall have been violations of the same statute or provision, or of those of similar character.[94]

f. Excessive Punishments. The punishments to be inflicted for violations of the liquor laws, when not absolutely fixed by statute, rest very much in the discretion of the trial court, but are of course subject to the constitutional provisions against excessive fines and cruel and unusual punishments.[95]

10. Costs and Fees. The sentence against one convicted of a violation of the liquor laws will generally include the payment of the costs,[96] including witness' fees,[97] and in some jurisdictions a fee to the attorney conducting the prosecution,[98] although in others such fee is payable by the county.[99]

11. Lien For Fine and Costs. In several of the states it is provided by statute[1] that property occupied and used for the sale of liquor,[2] with the consent and knowledge[3] of the owner thereof,[4] shall be subject to a lien in favor of the state for all fines and costs imposed for violations of the liquor laws upon the tenant or

X. SEARCH, SEIZURE, AND FORFEITURE.

A. Nature and Grounds in General — 1. STATUTORY PROVISIONS. The statutes familiarly known as "search and seizure laws," which have been adopted in a number of the states, are intended to aid in the suppression of the unlawful traffic in liquors, by authorizing proceedings in rem against the illicit property itself, resulting in its forfeiture or destruction, and connected with a criminal liability on the part of the person who has illegally kept them or dealt in them.[8] These statutes are not unconstitutional if they do not authorize unreasonable searches, and if they make due provision for hearing the claims of parties in interest,[9] but they are not to be construed retrospectively.[10]

2. PROPERTY SUBJECT TO SEIZURE. The liquor being contraband, or kept or intended for illegal sale, it is not always necessary, to justify its seizure, that it should be at the time in the possession of the owner.[11] Under proper conditions it may be seized in the hands of an express company or other carrier,[12] or of a warehouseman.[13] Liquor purchased by municipal officers illegally and without authority, or illegally held by them, may also be seized under this process,[14] and so may liquor which has already been taken by an officer from a person engaged ject to the result of such proceedings. State v. Mateer, 105 Iowa 66, 74 N. W. 912.

5. Pfefferle v. State, 39 Kan. 128, 17 Pac. 828, holding that the amount of the lien is determined prima facie by the amount of the fine and costs embraced in the judgment in the criminal action.

Liquors imported into state.—The provision of the act of congress called the "Wilson Act" (26 U. S. St. at L. 313 [U. S. Comp. St. (1901) p. 3177]), that intoxicating liquors shall be subject to seizure and confiscation by the police power of the state "upon arrival in such state" does not mean that liquor shall be so subject on its entrance within the borders of the state, nor on delivery to the consignee, but on reaching its destination. In re Langford, 57 Fed. 570. in illegally transporting it, and still held by the officer;[15] but liquor may not be taken from the possession of a receiver of a federal court.[16] It is necessary that an intention to make an unlawful sale or other disposition of the property should exist at the time of the complaint;[17] but such an intention on the part of a bailee or agent of the owner, having present possession of the liquors, is sufficient, although the actual owner may have been innocent of it.[18] The seizure should include only the liquors described or specified in the warrant,[19] and may or may not, according to the statute, include the casks or vessels containing them,[20] and the appliances or implements of the business.[21] The seizure of vehicles used in the transportation of intoxicating liquor is sometimes provided for by statute.[22]

3. GROUNDS FOR SEIZURE. The usual ground on which such statutes authorize the search for and seizure of liquors is that the same were kept or intended for sale in violation of law.[23] This severe process should not be used for the mere purpose of scraping up evidence on which to found a prosecution.[24] A conviction of the seller is no bar to a proceeding of this kind against the liquors.[25]

B. Information or Complaint — 1. IN GENERAL. Proceedings for a search for and seizure of liquor kept for unlawful sale are generally required to be founded on a proper information or complaint,[26] filed in the proper court and correctly entitled,[27] except where the statute allows the seizure of contraband liquor without a warrant, in which case the complaint may be made after the seizure as well as before.[28] A motion to quash such a complaint is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and its action thereon forms no basis for an exception.[29] of this kind is generally directed to be made by a citizen or resident of the county,[30] by a legal voter,[31] or by a credible resident,[32] although sometimes it may also be made by a public officer.[33]

3. Form and Contents — a. In General. The complaint or information will be generally sufficient if it follows the language of the statute or the forms which it prescribes, without greater particularity of averment.[34] But it should always contain a showing of probable cause to believe that liquor is unlawfully kept in the place and for the purpose described, or complainant's averment of his actual belief that it is so kept,[35] and should allege ownership of the liquors in some specific person,[36] as well as the illegality of the keeping or the intention to sell the liquor in violation of law,[37] and a description of the liquors to be searched for, with approximate certainty as to kind and amount.[38] In Vermont it has been held that the complaint need not be signed by the complainant, although the statute requires it to be reduced to writing by the magistrate.[39]

b. Description of Place. The complaint or information must also describe the location of the property to be searched for, or of the premises to be searched, and this must be done with as much precision and accuracy as the circumstances will permit.[40] It has been held that the description will be sufficiently certain if it is such as would be required in a deed to convey a specific parcel of realty,[41] or if it leaves no discretion to the officer as to what place he is to search, but fully directs him in that respect.[42] Where the statute does not authorize a warrant for the search of a dwelling-house unless it is alleged to be a place of common resort for tippling purposes, or to be kept as a dram-shop, the complaint must so describe it.[43]

c. Verification. The information or complaint must be verified[44] by the oath or affirmation[45] of the complainant or informant,[46] asserting the truth of the allegations of the complaint, or that the affiant has reason to believe and does believe such allegations to be true.[47] The jurat should be in due form;[48] but neither this nor the verification itself forms a part of the complaint, in any such sense that the prosecution is required to prove all the facts detailed in the oath.[49] A special form of affidavit is required to be made, in some states, when the warrant is for the search of a dwelling-house.[50]

4. Issues, Proof, and Variance. On the trial of a proceeding of this kind, the issue concerns the liability of the liquors to forfeiture, and of defendant to the statutory penalty, and not the facts set forth by the complainant in his affidavit, as the grounds of his information or belief.[51] And while the proof should correspond with the allegations, and a complaint framed under one statute will not support a seizure where the facts proved establish a liability under another and distinct statute,[52] yet immaterial differences between the charge and the proofs as in the description of the place will not constitute a fatal variance, if not amounting to a failure of evidence.[53]

C. Search Warrant — 1. Necessity of Warrant. Unless authorized by a statute, an officer cannot justify entering a building and searching for intoxicating liquors, and seizing liquors found there, although the same were illegally kept by the owner of the premises, unless he had and acted under a warrant.[54]

2. Requisites and Sufficiency — a. In General. A search warrant issued in pursuance of such a statute is a sufficient justification for the officer acting under it, where the magistrate has jurisdiction, and the face of the warrant itself discloses sufficient ground for his judicial action.[55] The search warrant should be duly signed[56] and officially sealed if the statute so requires,[57] and should recite that it was founded upon the oath required by the statute,[58] and name the complainant,[59] and contain such other statements as are necessary to make it a complete and legal instrument.[60] It should direct the officer to search the premises described,[61] and seize the described liquors if found there;[62] and may, if the statute so provides, also include a direction to arrest the respondent,[63] and should order the officer to make due return of the warrant.[64]

b. Showing as to Probable Cause. If the statute requires the warrant to recite that probable cause has been shown for the search which it authorizes, or that the magistrate is satisfied from the testimony of witnesses that such cause exists, the requirement is imperative and the recital cannot be omitted.[65]

c. Description of Liquors. The warrant should describe, with as much certainty and particularity as is practicable, the liquors for which the officer is to search and which he is to seize on discovery, both in respect to the kind[66] and the quantity.[67]

Form of description.— It is usual and sufficient to describe the liquors by general terms followed by the specification of several particular kinds under a videlicet. Thus, "spirituous and intoxicating liquors, to wit, whisky, rum, brandy, gin, and ale." State v. Robinson, 33 Me. 564; Com. v. Intoxicating Liquors, 13 Allen (Mass.) 561; State v. Whiskey, 54 N. H. 164.

Officer's authority limited by description.— If the warrant directs the seizure of "certain intoxicating liquors," and then, under a videlicet, specifies certain particular kinds, the officer will not be justified in seizing any other kinds than those specified; for here the videlicet limits the general expression preceding it by what follows. Mallett v. Stevenson, 26 Conn. 428. But on the other hand the fact that some of the kinds of liquor specified are not found at all will not invalidate the seizure of those kinds which are found. Com. v. Intoxicating Liquors, 13 Allen (Mass.) 52.

67. See cases infra, this note.

Form of description.— In respect to the quantity, the following form of statement, or any form equivalent thereto, will be held sufficient: "A certain quantity" of some specified kind or kinds of liquor, "being about and not exceeding one hundred gallons," or some other specified quantity. "contained in certain barrels, kegs, jugs, jars, bottles, and other vessels." Downing v. Porter, 8 Gray (Mass.) 539; In re Horgan 16 R. I. 542, 18 Atl. 279; State v. Fitzpatrick, 16 R. I. 54, 11 Atl. 767.

Limit of authority as to quantity seized.— Of course the officer is not bound to find the entire quantity mentioned in the ward. Description of Place. The search warrant must contain a description of the premises to be searched so specific and accurate as to avoid any unnecessary or unauthorized invasion of the right of privacy. To this end it should identify the property in such a manner as to leave the officer no doubt and no discretion as to the premises to be searched.[68] And to justify the search of barns, stables, or other outbuildings of the house, they must be mentioned in the warrant; but this may be done by describing the premises as a certain "dwelling house and its appurtenances."[69] A warrant directing the search of the dwelling-house of a named person authorizes the search only of the house occupied by him, and it is trespass if the officer searches a house owned by him but occupied by another.[70] But it is no objection to the warrant that it directs the search of several different places, if all are sufficiently described.[71]

e. Variance From Complaint. The proceedings will be invalidated by any substantial variance between the complaint and the warrant, as for instance in the description of the premises to be searched;[72] but not by differences which arise out of merely superfluous or unimportant statements or details.[73]

3. Execution of Warrant.[74] The warrant must be executed by the officer to whom it is directed or another officer having legal authority to serve such warrants.[75] Unlike a common-law warrant, it may be executed at night as well as in the daytime,[76] and an entry may be obtained by force if necessary.[77] If so commanded the officer should arrest the person of the respondent,[78] and if the statute so directs close the shop, building, or tenement used for the illegal traffic.[79] Persons who are guilty of resisting or obstructing the officer in the perrant. If he seizes and returns a less quantity, but of the same kind, it is not an invalid seizure. Com. v. Intoxicating Liquors, 97 Mass. 63; Com. v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 13 Allen (Mass.) 52. formance of his duty in the execution of the warrant may be punished under the proper form of proceeding.[80]

4. Officer's Return. The officer's return to the search warrant should show his official authority to execute it,[81] and that the place searched was the identical place to which the warrant directed him,[82] and the liquors seized the same as those described in the complaint and warrant.[83] If he arrested the respondent, due return of this fact should also be made.[84] The return is admissible in evidence as part of the record, and the inventory therein is conclusive until the contrary appears.[85]

5. Status of Property Under Seizure. Property seized on a warrant of this kind is regarded, in the interval between its seizure and the final judgment in the case, as in the custody of the law, and hence it cannot be taken from the officer by proceedings in replevin.[86] A person whose liquor has been forfeited as having been unlawfully kept for sale, and ordered to be delivered to a certain town, ceases to have such an interest in it as would enable him to sue the officer seizing it for his failure to deliver it to the town.[87]

6. Care of Property Seized. In keeping the liquor seized, the officer is only bound to exercise such a degree of care and diligence as prudent men use in the care of their own goods.[88]

7. Seizure Without Warrant. In several states the laws empower an officer to seize liquor whenever found by him under circumstances which would have justified his search for and seizure of it if armed with a warrant, and also authorize him, without a warrant, to arrest any person found in the act of illegally transporting liquor.[89] But having so acted, and still retaining the liquor in his custody,[90] he must then proceed to make a complaint[91] and take out a warrant within a reasonable time in the regular mode prescribed by the statute,[92] and thereupon he should seize the liquors nunc pro tunc, and make his return that the liquors were seized on such warrant.[93] To justify the arrest of the respondent without a warrant, it is not necessary to prove that a warrant was afterward procured

State v. Le Clair, 86 Me. 522, 30 Atl. 7. On the contrary, as the property is now in his own custody, the complaint should allege that the liquors "were" unlawfully kept and deposited in the place where he found them, and that they "were" then and there intended for sale contrary to law. against the liquors seized at the same time.[94] But to justify this course, the officer must have reasonable proof, or probable cause to believe, that the respondent is criminally liable, and mere cause to suspect him is not enough.[95]

D. Proceedings For Forfeiture — 1. Nature of Action. The proceeding authorized by the search and seizure laws, being for the purpose of forfeiting property, on the ground that it is kept for an illegal and criminal purpose, is in the nature of a criminal action, although the form of it is assimilated to that of a civil action.[96] Yet it is not a criminal proceeding in the strict sense of the term, but is rather to be regarded as a proceeding in rem, against the liquor for its condemnation as forfeited property, and the complaint is in the nature of a libel.[97]

2. Jurisdiction. Where the proceedings in the first instance are before a court of limited or inferior jurisdiction, the facts essential to its jurisdiction must appear on the face of the proceedings, otherwise there will be no presumption in favor of the jurisdiction.[98] The jurisdiction of a justice is not limited or affected by the value of the liquors seized.[99] In Massachusetts the court for criminal business has jurisdiction of this proceeding.[1]

3. Notice to Claimants. The liquor having been seized by the officer and his return made, the next step in the proceedings is to give notice of the hearing to the person from whose possession the liquor was taken and to claimants generally. This notice being provided for by statute is essential to the validity of all further proceedings.[2] The notice should describe correctly the liquors seized[3] and the place where they were found.[4] But one who has entered an appearance as a claimant of the liquors cannot object to defects or omissions in the notice or the service thereof.[5]

4. Rights of Claimants. On the proper notice being given, any person who claims to be the owner of the liquors in question may be made a party to the proceedings,[6] and may set up and maintain any right to the liquors which is set forth specifically in his written claim filed in the case.[7] The lien of a carrier or warehouseman will not defeat the condemnation of the liquors, especially if he was implicated in the owner's unlawful purpose with regard to them.[8] In South Carolina the claimant of liquors may maintain claim and delivery against the officer who has seized them, the statutory remedy not being exclusive.[9]

5. Trial. The proceedings are governed by the ordinary rules applicable in civil actions.[10] The owner or claimant must be allowed to interpose proper pleas,[11] and must be given a full and fair hearing.[12] A proceeding for the seizure and condemnation of liquors under a search warrant is not one in which a trial by jury is claimable as of right.[13]

6. Evidence. There can be no judgment of forfeiture of the liquors seized unless the allegations of the complaint are proved by competent evidence.[14] But it is enough for the prosecution to make out a prima facie case if there is no evidence in defense.[15] The essential facts to be proved are that, at the place alleged in the complaint,[16] the intoxicating liquors seized by the officer[17] were kept with the unlawful intention to sell them contrary to law[18] in the city, town,

Not necessary to state facts as to purchase. — It is not necessary that the claimant should set forth in his claim the person from whom, the place where, or the time when, the liquors were bought by him. or other district where they were kept or deposited.[19] To authorize a forfeiture of the liquors, it is sufficient to show that they were kept with intent to sell them contrary to law, although it is not alleged or proved by whom the intention was entertained.[20] But the person charged as thus keeping liquors cannot be convicted unless it is shown that he himself had the intention to sell them in violation of law.[21] If the respondent justifies under a license or authority to sell, the burden is on him to prove it.[22]

7. JUDGMENT.[23] The ground of condemnation of the liquor seized must correspond with that set forth in the statute. But where the law denounces the keeping of liquor for illegal "sale or distribution," the court may condemn for either of the alternative causes, both being named in the complaint, as the case presents itself to the court on proof.[24] A judgment for the destruction of the liquors should describe them with reasonable certainty.[25]

8. APPEAL AND REVIEW. The statutes commonly provide for summary proceedings before a magistrate or inferior court, in the first instance, with a right of appeal to the intermediate or nisi prius court,[26] and sometimes an appeal from the latter court to the court of last resort.[27] Any person who appears and files a claim to the liquors in question becomes thereby a party defendant, and acquires the right to appeal from the judgment.[28] On such appeal the facts will not be reviewed where the evidence below was not conflicting,[29] nor will the judgment be reversed on objections not properly raised in the court below.[30] Certiorari does not lie to quash the proceedings of a police court in issuing a warrant for the seizure of intoxicating liquors.[31]

9. COSTS. The right to costs and the liability therefor depend upon the provisions of the statute under which such a proceeding is brought.[32]

E. Recovery of Liquors Wrongfully Seized. If it is adjudged that the liquors were not liable to seizure and forfeiture, it is the right of the claimant to have them returned to him; and where the statute provides for a return of the liquors seized "if it is not proved" that they were kept for illegal sale, this is held to apply to cases where the proceedings are quashed for defects in matters of form.[33] The fact that intoxicating liquors unlawfully kept for sale in a pro-

XI. ABATEMENT AND INJUNCTION.[35]

A. Nature and Grounds — 1. Statutory Provisions. In several states statutes have been enacted declaring that houses or tenements kept for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors shall be deemed public nuisances; allowing any citizen of the county to maintain a bill for an injunction, or authorizing the district attorney to file an information; giving jurisdiction to chancery to enjoin the nuisance; and in some cases authorizing its abatement by the removal and sale or destruction of the liquors, vessels, and implements of the trade, and the closing up of the building.[36] Such statutes are valid and constitutional.[37] But in the absence of such a statute equity cannot take jurisdiction of an application by a private person for an injunction against an unlicensed or unlawful liquor-shop, although the keeping of it might constitute a public nuisance, unless the petitioner could show some special and individual damage sustained by him in consequence of it.[38] And even where these statutes are in force, they do not authorize any private individual to abate the statutory nuisance by force, as by breaking into the building and destroying the liquors found there; this can be done only by the proper officers, and only by the warrant of due legal proceedings.[39]

2. Nature of Remedy. An action to secure the abatement of a nuisance is rather in the nature of a criminal proceeding than a civil action;[40] but a bill for an injunction is purely a civil proceeding, and is not affected by the fact that the nuisance complained of may also be a breach of the criminal law.[41] And it may be cumulative of other remedies, and available even though the other remedies are complete and adequate.[42]

3. Grounds For Abatement or Injunction. In order to constitute a place kept the liquors and a refusal are a conversion of the property.

Action for damages for detention.— In Iowa under the statute as to actions for the recovery of intoxicating liquor, the owner of such liquor suing to recover damages from an officer who refuses to return them when ordered so to do, must allege and prove that he owned and kept them with a lawful intent, and not for the purpose of sale contrary to law. Injunction as "penalty." — Under a statute providing that persons dealing in liquors shall, under certain circumstances, be subject to all the "penalties" prescribed by the statutes governing the traffic, this word includes the remedy by injunction against the maintenance of a liquor nuisance. for the sale of liquor a nuisance under these statutes, it is necessary that the traffic conducted there, or the purpose to which the place is devoted, should be unlawful.[43] The statute may be applicable only to places used for unlawful selling at retail,[44] or may, as in Iowa, apply to all places used for the unlawful manufacture, sale, or keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors.[45] It is not generally applicable to a person who conducts the business under the authority and protection of a license,[46] unless he exceeds its permission or abuses the privileges which it grants.[47] This is also the case with regard to a druggist who sells unlawfully,[48] or a hotel conducted as to its bar in an illegal manner.[49] The owner of leased premises may be liable under the statute, where it is shown that he both knew of the fact that the property was used in such a manner as to make it a nuisance, and permitted such use and consented thereto.[50] In West Virginia it is necessary, to justify an injunction or an order for the abatement of the nuisance, that the keeper of the place should first have been convicted of the offense of unlawful selling at the place described.[51]

4. Voluntary Discontinuance of Business. A liquor nuisance cannot be abated or enjoined unless it continues to exist at the time of suit brought;[52] and hence no order for abatement or injunction will issue if it appears that the parties themselves have voluntarily abated the nuisance or discontinued the unlawful business,[53] unless the circumstances justify a decree forbidding defendant to renew the nuisance or resume the business,[54] which may be the case where its discontinu-

It is not necessary that such place should be kept in a disorderly manner (Howard v. State, 6 Ind. 444); or that the proprietor should permit the drinking of liquor on the premises (State v. Fraser, 1 N. ance was of suspiciously recent occurrence.[55] The owner of premises whose tenant is alleged to have maintained a nuisance thereon may escape liability by showing that, upon discovering the facts, he terminated the lease and ousted the tenant, or earnestly endeavored to do so, and caused the cessation of the illegal traffic.[56] But to make this defense available, the respondent must assume the burden of proving[57] that the nuisance has been abated permanently[58] and effectually and in good faith.[59]

B. Who May Maintain Proceedings. A proceeding for the abatement or injunction of a liquor nuisance may be instituted by certain designated public officers,[60] or generally by any private citizen of the county where the nuisance is kept,[61] without the necessity of obtaining the consent or concurrence of the prosecuting officers.[62] And the right to prosecute the action to judgment is not lost by plaintiff's removal from the county after the commencement of the suit.[63] But the action cannot be instituted by a citizen of another county,[64] nor do the statutes give one citizen the right to intervene in such an action when commenced by another citizen.[65]

C. Against Whom Proceedings May Be Brought. The proprietor or keeper of the place in question is generally the person against whom such proceedings may be brought.[66] But if the premises are leased to a tenant, the owner

Manager of business.—By the "keeper" of a nuisance is meant not only the owner of the place or business, but any other person who is in possession and control of the place and the liquors, and who manages the unlawful business. Schultz v. State, 32 Ohio St. 276.

Master and servant.— If one defendant is the sole proprietor, or has sole charge of the premises, and the other only kept or maintained the premises as his servant, under his direct personal supervision, the latter cannot be convicted. State v. Gravelin, 16 R. I. 407, 16 Atl. 914.

Trespasser.— To be the keeper of a liquor nuisance, so as to subject the place to condemnation as such, under N. D. Rev. Codes (1899), § 7605, the person must be an occupant under a claim of right, and not a mere of the property, although taking no direct part in the business, is properly made a defendant, and may be convicted,[67] provided he knew of the use which was being made of the premises and consented thereto or acquiesced therein.[68]

D. Actions and Proceedings — 1. JURISDICTION AND VENUE. To the validity of proceedings under these statutes, it is essential that there should be jurisdiction in the particular court in which the action is brought,[69] that the place in question should be described in the petition or complaint,[70] and that such place should be within the territorial jurisdiction of the court.[71] A county is not a party to such an action, within the meaning of a statute providing that a change of venue may be had where the county in which the action is brought shall be a party.[72]

2. DEFENSES. Aside from defenses consisting of a denial of the various facts necessary to make out the case for the complainant, it is held that an injunction already granted to restrain defendant from maintaining a liquor nuisance at the place in question, although it has not been enforced, is a bar to a second action by another citizen seeking the same relief.[73] It is no defense that defendant's violation of the law was the result of a mistake of law,[74] or that the liquors were sold in the original packages of importation.[75]

3. PLEADINGS. The petition or complaint for an injunction against a liquor nuisance or for its abatement must describe the place where the alleged nuisance is maintained,[76] allege the several facts and unlawful acts constituting the nuisance,[77] and connect the persons named as defendants with the offense complained transient and naked trespasser therein. State v. Nelson, (N. D. 1904) 99 N. W. 1077.

Property occupied by trespassers.— But an injunction will not lie against persons whose property was occupied by trespassers, who erected a shanty thereon and sold liquors unlawfully, of which the owners had no knowledge until the petition was served on them, when they abated the nuisance. State v. Lawler, 85 Iowa 564, 52 N. W. 490.

Bankrupt estate.— State courts have jurisdiction to enjoin or abate a liquor nuisance maintained on property belonging to the estate of a bankrupt, this being a matter of police regulation, which does not interfere with the bankruptcy jurisdiction of the federal courts. State v. Price, 92 Iowa 181, 60 N. W. 514. License or authority to sell, on the part of defendant, need not be negatived by the complaint. Com. v. Brusie, 145 Mass. 117, 13 N. E. 378.

Purpose of defendant.— The proceeding is maintainable, although the bill fails to al-of.[78] Any essential allegations of the complaint which are well pleaded and which are not controverted by the answer, or all of them, if no answer is filed, are taken as true, and require no evidence in their support.[79] A general denial does not put in issue the allegation of the petition as to the complainant's residence in the county,[80] and no reply is necessary to an answer which merely alleges that the suit is brought in bad faith and for the purpose of annoying defendant.[81] An answer which does not deny that the nuisance existed and was being maintained at the time the action was brought, but merely alleges that afterward defendant obtained and now holds a permit to sell liquor, is demurrable.[82]

4. EVIDENCE. The burden of proving the facts necessary to sustain the decree sought is generally on plaintiff or complainant.[83] It is not necessary that these facts should be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, a mere preponderance of the evidence being sufficient.[84] The burden is on defendant to prove that admitted sales were legal,[85] that he was acting under a license or permit,[86] or any other affirmative defense.[87] The complainant may make out his case by showing the finding of large quantities of liquor on the premises, the presence of bar furniture, the fact that drunken men frequented the premises, and the like,[88] or by showing the fact of defendant having paid the United States special tax as a liquor dealer,[89] or by showing the general reputation of the place in question.[90] Certificates showing the purchase of liquor from defendant, although not shown to be public records, are competent evidence,[91] and depositions may be used as in other civil actions.[92] And where the petition charges a continuing offense, evidence of illegal sales post litem motam is competent.[93]

5. TRIAL OR HEARING. Where an injunction is sought, the court may submit issues on conflicting evidence to a jury and be guided by their finding.[94] Where the trial is before a jury, the instructions should be framed with a careful regard lege that defendant intends to continue the illegal use complained of. Wright v. O'Brien, 98 Me. 196, 56 Atl. 647.

to the rights of defendant.[95] Continuances may be granted, as in other cases, for good and sufficient cause.[96]

6. Judgment and Enforcement Thereof — a. Abatement. The statutes provide for the abatement of an existing nuisance by seizing and destroying the liquor, removing from the building all articles used in carrying on the business, and closing the place for a definite period, as a year. When the fact of the nuisance has been established, an order for its abatement in this manner is not only justified, but it is error for the court to refuse it.[97] When the place has thus been closed by order of the court, it is unlawful for defendant to reopen it within the prescribed time; but this is only upon condition that the officer has fully and faithfully complied with the directions of the statute and of the order, in closing the place and posting notices.[98]

b. Injunction. A temporary injunction to restrain a liquor nuisance may issue on a satisfactory showing to the court by affidavits or other ex parte proofs,[99] and this may be dissolved on defendant's showing good cause against it,[1] or the injunction may be made permanent at any time while the case remains on the docket of the court for action,[2] and thereafter may be modified to suit a changed state of the law or of the circumstances of the case,[3] or may be dissolved or vacated for fraud practised in obtaining it or for other sufficient reasons.[4] The injunction should forbid defendant to carry on the business or conduct the saloon or bar complained of as a nuisance,[5] and should designate with reasonable certainty the place to which its prohibition is intended to apply;[6] but should not

How executed.— In most states the order of abatement is directed to, and is to be executed by, a public officer. But in Ohio the order is not to be so directed; it is an order addressed to the person who has been convicted of maintaining the nuisance, and his obedience to it may be enforced, if the nuisance continues, by attachment for contempt of court. go further than the prayer of the bill, in respect, for example, to the traffic in a given kind of liquor, such as beer, as to which no relief is asked.[7]

7. Contempt Proceedings For Violation of Injunction. If the person enjoined persists in maintaining the nuisance, or otherwise disobeys the lawful order of the court, it is a contempt for which he may be punished.[8] It has been held that such a proceeding is criminal in its nature.[9] It is to be begun by an information,[10] or affidavits presented to the court, charging a violation of the injunction,[11] and may properly be brought in the name of the state, and need not be instituted by the same person who was plaintiff in the original action for injunction.[12] Defendant is not entitled to a trial by jury.[13] Punishment as for contempt may be awarded against defendant violating the injunction, whether he directly engages in the prohibited business,[14] or knowingly and willingly allows another person to continue it,[15] and also against his servants and employees;[16] but not against a third person, who was not a party to the injunction proceedings and is ignorant of the decree.[17] The facts constituting the alleged violation of the injunction should be established by satisfactory evidence given by competent and credible witnesses.[18] And defendant may set up and must prove any facts relied on as showing cause why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt.[19] The punishment for the contempt is not necessarily the same as the penalty fixed by law for the original offense of maintaining the nuisance.[20]

8. Appeal and Review. The statutes generally allow an appeal, both from the judgment granting an injunction or ordering the abatement of the nuisance,[21] and from a judgment punishing defendant for contempt in violating the injunction.[22] On such appeal the reviewing court may correct the form of the order or decree if irregular,[23] reduce the punishment if excessive,[24] or reverse the judgment for any fatal defects;[25] but it will not review questions proper for the determination of the trial court,[26] nor reverse for a mere conflict in the evidence, when there was evidence to sustain the conviction.[27]

9. Costs and Fees. Under statutes allowing an attorney's fee, in cases of this kind, it is the duty of the court, if there is any contention as to the amount to be taxed, to hear evidence as to the value of the services rendered by the attorney[28] and fix his fee accordingly, the amount resting very much in its discretion.[29] The provision of the statute as to fees applies as well to actions prosecuted by the county attorney in the name of the state as to those prosecuted by a private citizen in his own name,[30] and the fee may be chargeable upon the county, if it cannot be collected from defendant.[31] The supreme court may also allow an attorney's fee for prosecuting the appeal.[32] The costs of the action are chargeable to defendant if unsuccessful, and may be made a lien on the premises;[33] and if defendant wins, the costs may be taxed against plaintiff, provided it appears the action was brought maliciously and without probable cause.[34]

XII. Civil Damage Laws.

A. In General — 1. Nature of Remedy. Civil damage laws create a new right of action, unknown to the common law.[35] A proceeding thereunder is not a criminal prosecution[36] or an action for the recovery of a fine or penalty;[37] it is law, in thinking that the particular sales made by him as of imported liquors in the original packages were not in violation of the law, is no excuse for violating the injunction. State v. Bowman, 79 Iowa 566, 44 N. W. 813.

simply an action of tort founded on the statute.[38] And where the common-law system of pleading is in force "case" is the proper form of action under such statute.[39]

2. Statutory Provisions. A civil damage law, being highly penal in its character, and in derogation of the common law, should receive a strict construction,[40] and does not operate retroactively, unless there are express words to that effect.[41] It is a general law of the state, applicable even in counties where the traffic in liquors was regulated by special laws, at the time of its enactment,[42] but has no extraterritorial operation or effect.[43] The effect of the repeal of a civil damage law is to destroy all rights of action previously acquired under it, even in the case of pending suits, unless the repealing act contains a saving clause.[44]

B. Grounds of Action — 1. In General. To sustain an action under a civil damage law, there must have been a "sale," a "gift," or a "furnishing" according to the terms of the statute of intoxicating liquor by defendant,[45] which caused or contributed to[46] a state of intoxication, or of habitual intemperance, on the part of the person so supplied with liquor,[47] in consequence of which the acts or omissions of the intoxicated person or drunkard have caused actual damage or injury to plaintiff[48] of such a character as to come within the terms of the Survival of right of action.— In so far as the right of action accrues to a person dependent for support upon a husband or father, who is disqualified by intemperance from earning a living, it is not lost by the death of such husband or father, caused by such intemperance, but becomes fixed thereby. Construction.—Such a statute should not be construed so strictly as to defeat its purpose. While its character should not be enlarged, it should be interpreted, where the language is clear and free from ambiguity, according to its true intent and meaning, having in view the evil to be remedied and the object to be obtained. statute.[49] But it is not necessary that an action should also be maintainable against the intoxicated person on the same state of facts,[50] or that the seller should have known of the purchaser's intemperate habits,[51] or should have been able to anticipate the particular injury which resulted.[52] Plaintiff may maintain his action without regard to the fact that the particular sale in question is also a criminal offense,[53] and may pursue defendant personally, although the latter may also be liable on his bond,[54] and may have separate and successive actions for every separate injury caused by defendant's acts.[55]

2. ILLEGALITY OF SALE. As a general rule the civil damage laws make it an essential prerequisite to the maintenance of an action thereunder that the sale or furnishing of liquor causing the intoxication complained of should have been illegal, as being contrary to the provisions of some statute as to the liquor traffic.[56]

3. INJURIES TO PERSON. "Injury to the person," as founding a right of action under the civil damage laws, means actual physical violence, or physical harm or suffering, sustained by plaintiff at the hands of the intoxicated person.[57] It is not necessary that plaintiff should be a relative of the drunken man. A stranger who is injured in his person by the violent or reckless conduct of the drunken man, as by being set upon and beaten, or shot and wounded, or thrown out of his carriage, may recover damages against the person who supplied the liquor which caused the intoxication.[58] But such a statute does not contemplate a recovery for injuries sustained, in consequence of intoxication, by the drunken man himself.[59]

4. INJURIES TO PROPERTY. Under these statutes a plaintiff may recover damages for direct injury to property of his, or for the loss of property belonging to him, when caused by the intoxication produced by defendant's sale or furnishing of liquor.[60]

5. INJURIES TO MEANS OF SUPPORT — a. In General. A civil damage law, which provides an action for injuries to "means of support," creates a new right of action, and it is not necessary, to sustain such action, that the injury should be a common-law injury or one before remediable by action.[61] The wife has an interest in her husband's capacity to perform labor as a means of support; and if his intoxication, habitual or otherwise, so impairs his mental or physical powers as to incapacitate him for work or business, or results in accidents or injuries which produce the same result, the wife sustains an actionable injury,[62] irrespective of the habits of her husband, with reference to industry or idleness, before the acts complained of,[63] and without regard to the fact that she has independent means of her own, or that she is competent to earn her own living;[64] but there must be an impairment of his support of her, or capacity to support her, and she cannot found her action on a mere diminution of his estate or of what she expects to inherit if she survives him.[65] A wife's right of support is not, however, limited to the bare necessaries of life, but embraces comforts suitable to her situation and her husband's condition in life.[66] A liquor dealer may be as much liable for causing the continuance of a condition or state of affairs which injures the wife in her means of support as for causing such an injury in the first place.[67] A right of action for this species of injury is not confined to wives. A husband may maintain an action for injury to his means of support by the loss of his wife's services caused by intoxication;[68] and for the same reason a parent, dependent wholly or in part on the earnings of his child, may sue to recover for injury from such cause to his means of support.[69]

b. Death of Husband. It is generally held that the death of plaintiff's husband, resulting as the consequence of his intoxication, caused or contributed to by the liquor furnished him by defendant, is such an injury to her "means of support" as will enable her to maintain an action under the statute.[70]

6. Disgrace and Mental Suffering. Mental suffering alone does not constitute a cause of action under the civil damage laws. That is, plaintiff's sorrow, fear, or anxiety caused by the conduct toward her of the intoxicated husband or other relative, or mortification or disgrace caused by the publicity of his degradation, or estrangement or loss of his society and companionship, will not alone entitle her to recover, without proof of actual injury to person, property, or means of support.[71] But if a foundation for actual damages has been laid, these various elements of injury to the susceptibilities or happiness or social standing of plaintiff may be taken into account as a ground for the award of exemplary damages.[72]

7. Care of Intoxicated Person. It is sometimes provided by statute that one who sells liquors and makes another drunk shall pay a reasonable sum for taking care of such drunken person.[73]

8. Proximate Cause of Injury — a. In General. To justify a recovery under the civil damage law, it must appear that the intoxication of the person in question was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.[74] It has been held, however, that it is not necessary that the injury should be the natural or probable result of the intoxication; it is enough if it was its actual and direct result.[75]

b. Sale Causing Death of Purchaser. If liquor sold to a man and causing his intoxication sets up such functional or systematic disorders as result in his death, the illegal sale to him is the immediate or direct cause of death.[76] But it is not necessary, to found an action on the injury sustained by reason of the death, that the sale of the liquor or the resulting intoxication should have been the immediate cause of death; it is sufficient if it was the proximate cause.[77] And this is the case where the man's drunken condition so far deprives him of the normal use of his faculties, physical or mental, as to render him incapable of taking care of himself or of protecting himself against dangers to which he may be exposed, and he meets his death by an accident, such as drowning, freezing, or being thrown from a carriage or run over by a railroad train, to which he would not have exposed himself, or from which he could have saved himself, if he had not been stupefied or rendered helpless by intoxication.[78] But if the death of Proximate cause.— If a man driving with his wife is so drunk as to be unable to control the team, and by his mismanagement of the horses brings about an accident so that they are both injured, his intoxication is the proximate cause of the injury to the wife. Thomas v. Dansby, 74 Mich. 398, 41 N. W. 1088. And the liability of defendant, in actions under these statutes, for injury to the means of support, is not confined to cases of injury resulting from drunkenness, immediately and during its continuance, but extends as well to cases where the injury results from insanity, sickness, or disability induced by the intoxication. Mulford v. Clewell, 21 Ohio St. 191.

one who receives an injury while intoxicated can be traced as the natural and probable result of any new or intervening cause, such as reckless exposure of himself or an unnecessary surgical operation, the action will not lie.[79] Where the drunken man, in consequence of his abusive language, is assaulted and killed by a third person, there is no liability to the widow for the death; for in such a case it cannot be presumed that the deceased, if sober, might not have given the same provocation.[80] A man's fixed habits of intemperance cannot be considered, in a legal sense, the cause of his receiving a fatal injury while drunk, although, but for such habits, he might not have drunk the liquor which intoxicated him on the day of his death.[81]

c. Commission of Crime by Intoxicated Person. It is a generally accepted rule that the sale of liquor to a man who becomes intoxicated thereby, and in that condition commits a crime, may be considered the proximate cause of injuries to third persons resulting from such crime. This rule is applied in cases where an innocent third person is assaulted and beaten or shot by a drunken man,[82] or where a widow sues for injury to her means of support in consequence of her husband having been murdered by the intoxicated person.[83]

9. Sale Contrary to Notice. In several states the statutes provide that the wife or other relative of a habitual drunkard may give notice to liquor sellers not to furnish him with liquor, and that, if the prohibition of the notice is violated, an action for damages may be maintained.[84] To sustain the action it is necessary that the notice should have been given by a person entitled to do so,[85] and concerning a person who is at the time in the habit of drinking to excess,[86]

Right of action under civil damage law not affected.— A statute of this character does not interfere with a plaintiff's right of action under the general provisions of the civil damage law. In Ohio it has been held that the notice may be served in anticipation of the habit of drunkenness being formed, or a debauch and to one who is at the time engaged in the business of selling liquors.[87] No great strictness is observed in regard to the form and contents of the notice; it need not follow the language of the statute, if it gives all the necessary information and expresses the prohibition in intelligible terms.[88] But the statutory directions as to the manner of serving the notice should be strictly observed.[89] It is no defense to such an action that the liquor seller could not read the notice,[90] or that he did not know that the person who obtained the liquor was the person named in the notice.[91]

C. Defenses — 1. In General. Actions under the civil damage laws may be defended on the ground of the absence of any of the statutory elements of a right of action.[92] It is not a defense that the person in question had been a habitual drunkard for a long time before defendant began selling to him,[93] nor that a part of the liquor consumed by him was bought from other sellers, if that sold to him by defendant did in fact contribute to the intoxication which caused the injury, complained of.[94]

2. License or Permission. It is no defense to an action under the civil damage laws that the defendant had been duly licensed to sell intoxicating liquors.[95] And one is not estopped to sue because he signed defendant's petition for a being indulged in, and as a means of prevention thereof, and the seller cannot ignore it because the person against whom he is warned is not at the time a drunkard or intoxicated. Kolling v. Bennett, 18 Ohio Cir. Ct. 425, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 81.

The relationship of the person giving the notice to the inebriate need not be disclosed by the notice; but if it is not, it must be shown that defendant knew that it was given by one of the persons entitled under the statute, and it is not sufficient that he had reasonable cause to believe that such was the case. license.[96] But it has been held that plaintiff's consent or permission that liquor should be sold to the person in question, whether express or tacit, or by withdrawing a notice not to sell, will prevent a recovery,[97] provided the consent was given voluntarily, and not obtained by threats or coercion.[98] But according to other decisions such consent or permission is no defense, at least where the consequences exceeded anything that might reasonably have been anticipated from the sale authorized.[99] And consent given to the sale of liquor by other persons than defendant, or to the sale of liquor by defendant on other occasions, will not defeat the action, if there was no consent to the particular sale which caused the intoxication complained of.[1] Where a third person is injured by an intoxicated minor, it is no defense to his action against the seller that the sale was made to the minor with the consent of the latter's father.[2]

3. Contributory Act or Negligence. A recovery cannot be sustained where it appears that the death of the person who was the means of support of plaintiff was the result of his own wilful and unlawful conduct.[3] A wife cannot recover damages from the seller of liquor, for injuries committed by her husband upon herself or her property, while he was intoxicated, if she contributed to his intoxication, by purchasing liquor for him, or drinking with him, or neglecting such steps as she might have taken to prevent his intoxication.[4] And a similar rule applies where the action is brought by a stranger to recover damages for injuries caused by a drunken person.[5] But the act of one who buys and drinks liquor, or takes liquor offered to him, or deliberately drinks himself into a condition of helplessness, is not such concurring negligence on his part as will prevent a recovery for injuries sustained by him or by his relatives.[6]

given by one having authority to compromise. If the statute gives a right of action both to the wife and minor children of the intoxicated person, the wife cannot compromise the claim of the children, at least without the authority and approval of the court.[7]

D. Persons Entitled to Sue — Parties Plaintiff — 1. In General. The right of action under the civil damage laws is not confined to the relatives of the intoxicated person, but, as these statutes are usually framed, extends to any stranger who may be injured, in one of the ways specified, by the acts of the drunken man,[8] including his employer, who is deprived of his services by his intoxication and consequent inability to work,[9] or any person who may take charge of and provide for the intoxicated person;[10] but not generally the town or poor district upon which the man becomes dependent, in consequence of injuries sustained while intoxicated, if he did not previously draw support therefrom.[11] The intoxicated person himself sometimes has a right of action against the liquor seller;[12] but in no case can the liquor seller recover damages from the intoxicated person for injuries sustained in consequence of the acts or behavior of the latter.[13]

2. Husbands and Wives. A husband may maintain an action for injury to his means of support, where his wife's intoxication, caused by defendant, prevents her from caring for his house and children and so deprives him of her services.[14] And a wife may sue for injuries sustained in consequence of the intoxication of her husband.[15] And she does not lose a right of action once accrued by her subsequent divorce from her husband.[16] And although by his death she ceases technically to be a "wife," and becomes a "widow," this does not prevent her from suing, it being sufficient if she sustained the relation of wife at the time of the intoxication which caused his death.[17]

3. Parents and Children. A father may maintain an action against one causing the intoxication of his son, when he is thereby deprived of the son's services and put to expense in caring for him, or, although the son be an adult, if he is unable to support the family without the assistance given by the son, and of which the latter's intoxication deprives him.[18] And an action may be maintained by a dependent widow against one who caused the intoxication of the son who supported her, or contributed to her support.[19] Where a husband and wife are divorced, the right of action for selling liquor to their son is in the parent with whom he lives.[20] Under some statutes an action may be brought by the mother without reference to whether the father is alive or not.[21] Where a father is rendered incapable, by his intoxicated habits, of providing for his family, his minor children may sue for the injury to their means of support.[22] And the fact that the widow of the drunkard has recovered a judgment under the civil damage law will not prevent her from maintaining another action in behalf of her infant son as his guardian.[23]

4. JOINDER OF PLAINTIFFS. In a few states it has been held that a wife and her minor children, although they may be entitled to separate actions, may join as plaintiffs in suing for loss of their means of support against one who has furnished liquor to the husband and father.[24] But elsewhere it is the rule that the rights of each party in interest must be worked out by a separate action, and that the wife and children cannot properly join as plaintiffs.[25] Where the wife sues, she need not join, as co-plaintiff with her, the husband whose intoxication caused the injury complained of.[26]

E. Persons Liable — Parties Defendant — 1. IN GENERAL. The provisions of civil damage acts determine who are subject to liability thereunder.[27] Thus under some statutes an action may be brought against licensed dealers in liquor,[28] and under others it may be maintained against any person[29] whose sale or furnishing of liquor[30] has caused or contributed in an appreciable degree to the intoxica-

Treating a friend to a glass of liquor as a mere act of kindness or hospitality, without any purpose of gain or profit, does not ex-

tion from which the right of action springs,[31] including not only retailers, but also brewers or distillers who sell by the cask or barrel from their place of business,[32] and including one who is a partner in business with a licensed dealer.[33] The fact that a dealer may be liable on his bond does not prevent the maintenance of a personal action against him.[34]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT. A liquor dealer is responsible for actionable injuries under the civil damage laws, caused by sales of liquor made by his agents or servants within the general scope of their employment, although the particular sale was made without the knowledge or consent of the master.[35] But he is not responsible for the acts of a mere trespasser or volunteer.[36] If the statute imposes a liability upon "any person" who shall cause the intoxication of another, the person who actually sells the liquor may be personally liable, although he acts only as the clerk or servant of another.[37]

3. IMMEDIATE AND REMOTE VENDOR. The statutory liability rests upon the immediate not the remote vendor of the liquor; so that if the liquor passes through several hands, only the person who made the last sale, to the person who became intoxicated by it, is responsible.[38] So if two separate liquor dealers furnish liquor at different times to the same person, producing two separate fits of intoxication, with an interval of sobriety between, and injury results from the second intoxication, the first seller is not liable therefor.[39]

4. JOINT TORT-FEASOR. If several persons by selling or furnishing liquor contribute to an intoxication which results in actionable injuries under the civil damage laws, their responsibility is that of joint tort-feasors, so that they are jointly and severally liable, and a recovery against one without satisfaction will not bar an action against another.[40] But a defendant is only liable for damages resulting from the particular act or state of affairs to which he contributed; and therefore there is no joint liability among sellers who supplied the person with liquor at different times, even on the same day, producing separate and distinct intoxications.[41] But where the habitual drunkenness of a husband or other relative forms the cause of action, all who have contributed to induce or confirm the habit are liable in damages, although there was no concert or connection between them.[42] In case of a joint liability plaintiff is entitled to but one satisfaction, and the payment or release of a judgment against one of the parties jointly liable will prevent a recovery against the others, or prevent the enforcement of judgments which may have been recovered against the others.[43]

5. Sureties on Dealer's Bond. The civil damage laws sometimes allow an action on a licensed dealer's bond in the same circumstances which would give a right of action against him personally.[44] The liability of the sureties extends to exemplary as well as compensatory damages,[45] and is not released by the fact that the illegal sales were made by a bar-tender instead of by their principal in person,[46] or by irregularities in the proceedings to obtain the license, or in the bond itself, which do not absolutely nullify it.[47] And their liability, having once attached, for an injury consisting in the habitual or continuous intoxication of plaintiff's husband or other relative, continues throughout the period of such habit or condition of intoxication, whether it terminates during the license year or continues longer.[48] Whether plaintiff must first recover a judgment against the principal before suing the sureties depends on the conditions of the bond. Such a course is not necessary where the bond stipulates that the principal will not do certain acts, the breach of which gives rise to an action under the civil damage laws, such as selling to an intoxicated person, and the bond is conditioned for the due performance of such covenant.[49]

6. Owner or Lessor of Premises. In several states the civil damage laws also give a right of action against the owner or lessor of property, who knowingly permits the sale of liquor on the premises, for actionable injuries caused by such sale.[50] But this does not make him a joint tort-feasor with the saloon-keeper.[51] To hold the owner responsible it is necessary to establish by clear and satisfactory proof both his knowledge that the premises were used for the sale of liquor,[52] and his consent to such use.[53]

F. Actions[54] — 1. Limitation of Actions. An action under the civil damage law is an action of tort, and is governed by the provision of the statute of limitations relating to such actions, unless specially regulated by the same law which gives the right of action.[55] The period of limitation begins to run from the date of selling or furnishing the liquors, rather than from the day when the resulting intoxication caused loss or injury to plaintiff.[56]

in such an action or of particular allegations thereof is to be determined by the rules applicable in civil actions generally.[57] It should allege with reasonable certainty a sale, gift, or furnishing of liquor by defendant to the person intoxicated [58] at a designated time,[59] that the injury counted on occurred in consequence of the resulting intoxication,[60] and the nature and extent of the injury which plaintiff has thereby suffered.[61] It has been held that it is not necessary for the complaint to state the particular kind of liquor sold,[62] or that defendant knew that the purchaser was intoxicated,[63] or to allege that the sale was not made in good faith or for a lawful purpose,[64] or to particularly describe the place of sale, unless where a lien on the premises is claimed.[65] The cause of action may under some of such statutes be alleged as a continuing one.[66] Exemplary damages are not the subject of a claim in such sense that it is necessary to make an averment thereof in the declaration or complaint.[67]

b. Issues, Proof, and Variance. Under the general rules as to issues, proof, and variance to actions under the civil damage laws, it is necessary that plaintiff's evidence should correspond with the allegations of the complaint.[68] But exact proof is not required as to the time laid in the complaint,[69] or the place of sale.[70]

And see McLees v. Niles, 93 Ill. App. 442. But although the declaration alleges that the intoxication which caused the injury complained of was caused wholly by defendant, yet there is no fatal variance when the proof shows that it was caused only in part by the sales which he made. And similarly it has been held that as to other immaterial averments exact proof will not be required.[71]

3. Evidence — a. Presumptions and Burden of Proof. The burden is on plaintiff to establish each of the facts necessary to constitute his cause of action,[72] but is on defendant to prove the legality of the sales made by him or any other affirmative defense.[73]

b. Admissibility. The evidence in actions under the civil damage law is to be strictly limited to the issues in the case,[74] and must be of such a character as to be admissible under the general rules applicable in civil actions.[75] Where injury to the means of support is counted on, a judgment obtained by plaintiff in an action against another party for injury accruing thereto at the same period is admissible to show the actual extent of the wrong done by defendant.[76] And where the death of a husband is relied on as the cause of action, evidence tending to show that his death was the result of frequent intoxication caused by liquor sold him by defendant is admissible.[77] Evidence as to the number, age, and sex of plaintiff's children is not admissible to affect the question of damages.[78] In a wife's action under such a statute, her husband is a competent witness in her behalf.[79]

c. Weight and Sufficiency. Although an action under the civil damage laws is penal in its nature, and hence the allegations of the complaint must be fully proved, it is not a criminal proceeding, and therefore it is not necessary that the evidence should exclude all reasonable doubt. Plaintiff may recover on a mere preponderance of the evidence, and circumstantial as well as direct evidence may be sufficient.[80]

d. Proof as to Particular Matters — (I) Sale by Defendant. As the sale or furnishing of liquor by defendant is an essential element of the right of action under the civil damage laws, plaintiff must assume the burden of proving this fact.[81] It may be established by direct testimony, or made out indirectly or inferentially by proving various facts and circumstances.[82] Thus proof that the person alleged to have been made drunk by defendant was seen to enter the latter's place sober and come out intoxicated may raise a presumption that such person obtained intoxicating liquor there.[83] And where the intoxication of such person is proved, and some circumstances connecting defendant with it, it is for the jury to determine whether defendant sold or furnished the liquor which caused it,[84] and circumstantial evidence in that behalf may be so strong as to justify them in disregarding the positive denials of defendant or his witnesses.[85] Defendant may of course produce any proper evidence to controvert such allegation; but generally his refusal to furnish liquor to the party in question on other occasions or under other circumstances is not a material fact;[86] nor is evidence

Habitual drunkenness.— Where a recovery is sought on the ground of sales of liquor which have caused habitual drunkenness, the proof should show that defendant had sold a sufficient number of times to aid materially in bringing about such a condition. admissible on this issue that he had instructed his servants not to sell to the party.[87]

(II) Liability of Lessor of Premises. That the owner of leased premises knew they were being used for the sale of liquor, and consented thereto, a fact necessary to charge him with liability under the civil damage law as above stated[88] may be proved by circumstantial evidence, sufficient to charge him with such knowledge constructively and from which his consent may be implied.[89]

(III) Nature and Extent of Injury. Whether plaintiff claims damages for injury to his person, property, or means of support, it is incumbent on him to prove, not only the fact of actual injury received, but also the extent to which he has been damaged by the intoxication resulting from defendant's acts.[90]

(IV) Intoxication as Cause of Injury. To sustain an action of this kind, it is necessary for plaintiff to prove that the person in question became intoxicated on a particular occasion, or, as the case may be, contracted habits of intemperance,[91] that such intoxication was either caused or contributed to in an appreciable degree by the acts of defendant,[92] and that the particular injury complained of was sustained in consequence of such intoxication or intemperate habits.[93] Applying the general rules relating to the admissibility of declarations

Injury to means of support.— A wife suing for injury to her means of support may testify as to the amount necessary to support the family in circumstances suitable to its condition (Warrick v. Rounds, 17 Nebr. 411, 22 N. W. 785), as to the amount of her husband's earnings when sober (Brandt v. McEntee, 53 Ill. App. 467), and that his earnings were devoted to the support of his family (Gran v. Houston, 45 Nebr. 813, 64 N. W. 245). And it may be shown how much he had paid to defendant for liquor during the time covered by the complaint. Ward v. Thompson, 48 Iowa 588. And see Horn v. Smith, 77 Ill. 381. But evidence that defendant owed the deceased husband for work at the time of his death, and subsequently refused to pay the money to plaintiff, is not admissible. Karau v. Pease, 45 Ill. App. 382. The widow should not be permitted to show inconveniences which she has suffered since the husband's death nor any circumstances calculated merely to work upon the sympathies of the jury. Flynn v. Fogarty, 106 Ill. 263. Defendant is entitled to show, as bearing on plaintiff's means of support, that, since the death of her husband, she has married again. Sharpley v. Brown, 43 Hun (N. Y.) 374. But evidence as to the widow's indifference to the death of her husband, and of her previous declarations that she wished he would die, offered for the purpose of showing that she did not value his life, or the support afforded by him, at anything, is irrelevant and immaterial. Injury from accident.— As to proof that intoxication was the cause of an accident suffered by the intoxicated person which caused his death or serious bodily harm see Meyer v. Butterbrodt, 146 Ill. 131, 34 N. E. 152 [affirming 43 Ill. App. 312]; Wall v. State, 10 Ind. App. 530, 38 N. E. 190; Colburn v. Spencer, 177 Mass. 473, 59 N. E. 78;

or statements in evidence, statements of the intoxicated person as to how he received the injury in question are not generally admissible.[94]

(v) Character and Habits of Intoxicated Person. Evidence of the age of the person through whose intoxication the injury is alleged to have been sustained and of his habits and circumstances prior to the sales by defendant is competent generally,[95] and evidence is admissible of his habits of drinking or of his being a habitual drunkard, when that fact is necessary to make out plaintiff's case,[96] or to show the effect on him of the sales made by defendant,[97] or to show defendant's knowledge of his condition or habits,[98] and under proper conditions on the question of damages.[99] The character or habits of such person in respect to other matters may also become important as bearing on the nature or extent of the injury sustained, or on the measure of damages, and may then be put in evidence.[1]

(vi) Pecuniary Condition of Intoxicated Person. Where the injury alleged is to plaintiff's means of support, it is proper to receive evidence of the pecuniary condition of the person whose intoxication caused the injury, at the time of the alleged wrongful sales of liquor to him, and of the amount of his earnings and savings, and of his habits of industry and thrift, and the like, to enable the jury to estimate the amount of damage plaintiff has sustained.[2]

(vii) Nature and Properties of Liquor. In an action under the civil damage law, it must be proved that the liquor sold by defendant was intoxicating; but this may be shown either by the direct testimony of witnesses or by evidence that the person who bought and drank it was shortly afterward drunk, without any intervening cause.[3]

4. Damages — a. In General. The damages in an action under the civil damage law are to be measured by the directions of the statute, if any are prescribed therein,[4] otherwise they are to be determined by the jury under the instructions of the court.[5] Defendant is liable only for the damages which he has caused or contributed to, although it may be difficult to separate such damages from those caused by other dealers.[6] His liability may extend to injury resulting from the dissolute habits of the person in question, induced by his sales to such person, after such sales have ceased.[7] Plaintiff's recovery is limited to his individual injury, although others may also have a right of action on the same state of facts against the same defendant.[8] The loss, suffering, or trouble of the person who was intoxicated by defendant's liquor is not to be taken into account, except in so far as it may have reacted upon plaintiff; for injury or damage to the drunkard is not the cause of action, but injury or loss to a third person caused by his intoxication.[9] In such an action a wife may recover for the expense of medicine and medical attendance made necessary by the husband's sickness or by injuries sustained by him while drunk, or for additional care and nursing which she was obliged to bestow upon him, or for the expenses of her own sickness caused by her exertions in caring for him.[10] The damages should not be increased for the reason that plaintiff has agreed to give half the amount recovered to his counsel for his services.[11]

b. Injury to Means of Support. Where the action is brought by a wife or a dependent relative for injury to the means of support, the measure of damages is the diminution resulting to plaintiff's present and future means of support.[12] A wife cannot be allowed compensation for the loss of the society and companionship of her husband or for estrangement between them resulting from his habits.[13] His previous intemperate habits may be taken into account as affecting the measure of damages.[14] In case of his death the widow's recovery may include the expense of his final sickness and funeral.[15] For the purpose of estimating the Amount of money spent for liquor.— In order to ascertain the amount of damage suffered by plaintiff, where the sales complained of extended over a considerable period of time, evidence may be given of the amount of money withdrawn from the support of the family, from week to week, and used in the purchase of liquor in defendant's saloon. Hudson v. Weston, 23 Ill. App. 487. And see Hutchinson v. Hubbard, 21 Nebr. 33, 31 N. W. 245. But the amount spent for liquor, which otherwise would have been devoted to the support of plaintiff, is not by itself the measure of damages, where a substantial injury is shown, such as the husband's loss of his position or incapacity to work. Kolling v. Bennett, 18 Ohio Cir. Ct. 425, 10 Ohio Cir. Dec. 81.

Diminished earning capacity.— Where the intoxication resulted in an accident to the drunken man, disabling him temporarily or permanently, the damages may be measured by the difference between his earnings after the injury and the amount he would otherwise have earned. Thomas v. Dansby, 74 Mich. 398, 41 N. W. 1088.

Plaintiff partly self-sustaining.— Plaintiff's recovery is not limited by the fact that he may, in the past, have partly supported himself; for the duty to support, and probability of future support, as well as the fact of past support, are to be taken into consideration. c. Exemplary Damages — (1) In General. Generally such statutes, either expressly or by necessary implication, authorize the recovery of exemplary damages under proper conditions.[17] It is first of all necessary that plaintiff should show actual damages; for without this foundation no vindictive damages can be allowed.[18] And the general rule is that to justify exemplary damages, it must be shown that defendant's conduct was wilful, wanton, reckless, malicious, oppressive, or otherwise aggravated and deserving of punishment.[19] The amount to be allowed as exemplary damages rests very much in the sound discretion of the jury.[20] It is generally held that exemplary damages may be given in a proper case, notwithstanding defendant is also liable to be fined or otherwise punished under the criminal law for the same sale or gift of liquor.[21] Exemplary damages may be recovered against the owner or lessor of the premises, who has knowingly permitted them to be used for the sale of liquor; but a case must be made therefor against him individually, as by showing some malicious or blameworthy conduct on his part, aside from the circumstances which justify the award of exemplary damages against the tenant.[22]

(II) Circumstances Aggravating Damages. A claim for exemplary damages must be based on some positive wrong wilfully inflicted on or caused to plaintiff, or some gross neglect of his rights.[23] Such damages are properly awarded in cases where defendant has wilfully furnished liquor to an inebriate after notice not to do so, or against the protest or remonstrance of the drunkard's wife, plaintiff in the action,[24] or has supplied liquor to a person who, as he must have perceived, was drunk at the time,[25] or to a habitual drunkard, with knowledge of his intemperate habits,[26] or to a person whom he knew to be a minor.[27] And it has been held that such damages may be allowed on proof that defendant's act in selling the liquor, or his course of business including the particular sale, was illegal, as where he sells without a license.[28]

d. Reduction or Mitigation of Damages. On the part of defendant, for the purpose of reducing damages, evidence may be given of his honest endeavors to prevent injury to plaintiff and of his having been deceived or misled by tricks or artifices,[29] and he may show that other saloon-keepers, by furnishing liquors, contributed to the same injury of which the plaintiff complains,[30] or that the sales complained of were made by his bar-tender or servant, without his knowledge or consent, and in disobedience to his positive orders honestly given.[31] But the fact that a deceased person to whom liquors were furnished had accumulated property which plaintiffs inherited on his death does not go to mitigate damages but rather to enhance them.[32]

e. Excessive Damages. The determination of the amount of damages to be allowed in a case of this kind rests very much in the discretion of the jury, and their award will not be set aside or reduced, on the ground of its being excessive, unless it is plain that the circumstances do not justify so great an allowance and that the jury has abused its discretion in the matter.[33]

5. TRIAL — a. Questions For Jury. In an action under the civil damage law, the following questions of fact should be submitted to the jury and determined by them: Whether there was a sale, gift, or furnishing of liquor by defendant;[34] whether intoxication was produced by the liquor so sold or furnished;[35] whether the liquor sold or furnished by defendant caused or contributed to the injury complained of;[36] whether plaintiff, by his acts or conduct, voluntarily contributed to the injury in question;[37] what was the proximate cause of the injury sustained;[38] whether the injury was wilfully committed;[39] and where plaintiff seeks to subject the premises where the liquor was sold to the lien of a judgment against the seller, whether the property was leased for the purposes of such sale.[40]

b. Instructions.[41] In such an action the jury should be properly instructed by the court concerning the facts which plaintiff must prove to make out a case.[42] Where the issues and evidence in the case require it instructions should be given as to the proof of a sale by defendant, distinguishing, where necessary, between a sale, a gift, and a "furnishing" of liquor;[43] as to the responsibility of defendant for the acts of his agents or employees;[44] as to the necessity of showing that the beverage sold by defendant was an intoxicating liquor,[45] and that it induced intoxication in the person who drank it,[46] and as to what constitutes "intoxication";[47] as to defendant's knowledge or cause of belief concerning the habitual drunkenness, minority, or other peculiar condition of the purchaser, if that is an element of the case;[48] as to the effect of plaintiff's consenting to or authorizing the sale in question, or contributing to the injury resulting;[49] as to defendant's liability as dependent upon the question whether the liquor sold or furnished by him caused or contributed to the intoxication from which the injury arose;[50] and as to the liability of joint defendants, or of persons whose sales have all contributed to the intoxication complained of.[51] The jury should also be instructed as to the necessity of finding that the intoxication in question was the proximate and not the remote cause of the injury complained of, and as to the meaning of these terms, as applied to the circumstances in evidence.[52] If plaintiff claims an injury to the "means of support," the meaning of this term should be explained to the jury, and proper instructions given to enable them to estimate the extent of the injury.[53] And instructions on the subject of damages should be so framed as to inform the jury of the extent of their discretion in the matter, the considerations they may properly take into account, and the propriety of allowing exemplary damages.[54] The court should be particularly careful to avoid giving instructions, or using expressions in its charge, which might tend to prejudice the jury against the one party or the other, or to give the one an advantage as against the other.[55]

6. Judgment — a. In General. The judgment in an action against several defendants, under the civil damage law, should be against them in solido, and not divided;[56] and if it is in favor of several plaintiffs, it should not attempt to distribute among them the amount recovered.[57] The judgment, if against a saloonkeeper, is conclusive on the sureties on his bond;[58] but a judgment against the owner of the premises where the liquor was sold is not conclusive on the lessee, the seller, if he was not made a party to the action or notified to defend it.[59]

b. Lien on Premises.[60] Under statutes declaring that judgments recovered under the civil damage laws shall be liens on the property used or occupied by defendant for the purposes of the liquor traffic,[61] plaintiff acquires no interest in the property, nor does any lien attach, until the judgment has been rendered,[62] and then it does not displace or override previously attaching valid liens by mortgage or otherwise.[63] It is not necessary that the saloon-keeper and his landlord should be joined in the same action. A judgment may first be recovered against the saloon-keeper, and afterward established as a lien on the premises in an action against the landlord.[64] In an action against the latter, it is necessary to show that the owner of the property knew of its use as a saloon, or for the traffic in liquors, and consented thereto.[65] A judgment against the tenant is not conclusive as to the amount to which the property should be charged, if the landlord was not a party to the proceedings.[66]

7. COSTS.[67] It has been held that under a civil damage act providing that the damage in all cases arising thereunder, together with the costs of suit, shall be recoverable in an action of trespass on the case before any court of competent jurisdiction, plaintiff, if entitled to recover at all, is entitled to costs where the claim for damages brings the case within the jurisdiction of a court of record.[68]

8. APPEAL AND REVIEW.[69] The judgment in an action under the civil damage laws will not be reversed on account of the admission of improper testimony, if it is not shown to have injured the appellant;[70] or on account of conflicting evidence, if there is enough to sustain the verdict;[71] or where the verdict, although not in harmony with the charge of the court, is sustained by evidence sufficient to make a case under the complaint without material variance.[72]

property, and entitled as such to the protection of the law.[73] Thus, in the absence of a judicial determination that a particular place, or the sale of liquor there, constitutes a nuisance, the place cannot be broken open and the liquors destroyed by persons whose relatives and friends frequent the place and obtain liquor there.[74] Intoxicating liquors may properly be the subject of taxation;[75] may be levied upon under mesne process, attachment, or execution;[76] and may be the subject of theft or larceny.[77] One who is engaged in an illegal traffic in intoxicating liquors cannot recover for the loss of profits caused by the interruption thereof.[78]

2. Recovery of Possession. In the absence of a statute to the contrary, the owner of liquors may maintain trover, trespass, replevin, or other appropriate action against any person who has tortiously deprived him of the possession of them,[79] or recover them from the possession of an officer who has wrongfully seized them on attachment or execution as the property of a stranger,[80] or have his action against a carrier, charged with their transportation and delivery to him, and by whose fault or negligence they have been lost or destroyed.[81] But in several states statutes have been enacted forbidding the maintenance of any action for the recovery of the possession or value of any intoxicating liquors. They have been held to apply, however, only where the liquors in question were kept for an illegal purpose, or sold or held for sale in violation of law.[82]

B. Validity of Contracts and Conveyances — 1. In General. Where the illegal sale of liquor enters into any contract as an inseparable part of its consideration, or the terms or conditions of the contract are inseparably connected with the illicit traffic in liquors, it is against public policy and immoral and therefore void.[83] And such a contract is not validated by the subsequent repeal of the law which made the sale or traffic in liquors unlawful.[84] But these principles do not apply to an insurance upon a stock of liquors, which is an enforceable contract, even though the property was illegally kept for sale.[85] And if a judgment has been recovered upon the contract, or for the price of the liquors illegally sold, it is not voidable on account of the illegality of the original consideration.[86] Whether or not one can recover from his agent the proceeds of illegal sales of liquors is to be determined in accordance with general rules which have been fully stated elsewhere in this work.[87]

2. Contracts of Sale — a. In General. Wherever a statute prohibits the sale of liquor except by a person holding a license or permit, or prohibits the sale altogether, a contract for the sale of liquor made by a person not so protected, or made under any other circumstances amounting to a violation of law, is void, and the seller cannot maintain an action against the purchaser for the price or value.[88]

Me. 280; Timson v. Moulton, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 269. No action lies upon a warranty given upon the sale of a horse, the price of which was paid in spirituous liquors, which the purchaser could not legally sell. Howard v. Harris, 8 Allen (Mass.) 297. Where an assignment of rent is made in consideration of liquors the assignee cannot maintain an action for its recovery. Davis v. Slater, 17 Iowa 250. There cannot be any recovery on a contract, an inseparable part of which was an attempted assignment of a license to sell liquors (Sanderson v. Goodrich, 46 Barb. (N. Y.) 616); or on a bond given by the resident agent of a foreign brewing company to account for the proceeds of liquor sold by him, when neither the principal nor the agent had any authority to sell liquors at the place where the agent did business (Fred Miller Brewing Co. v. Stevens, 102 Iowa 60, 71 N. W. 186). But although liquors were illegally sold, if there has been an actual payment for them by a bill of sale of goods, such bill is not invalidated by the illegality of the sale. Carter v. Clark, 28 Conn. 512. And a contract restricting the retail traffic in intoxicating liquors in a town, or restricting a party generally in respect to such traffic, cannot be considered against public policy and is therefore valid. Further such a contract is incapable of ratification or of supporting a new promise to pay the price.[89] If the invalidity of the contract grows out of a prohibitory statute of the state where the sale was made and completed, the seller will not be helped to a recovery by the mere fact that he holds a license under the federal laws.[90] A contract for the purchase and sale of liquors is not invalidated by statutes subsequently enacted, unless they are expressly made retroactive,[91] or by the neglect or omission to comply with statutory conditions after the sale, such as keeping a record of sales, or reporting them to designated officers.[92] As a general principle the invalidity of a contract of this kind can be taken advantage of only by the parties or their privies, not by mere strangers or persons collaterally interested.[93]

b. Place of Sale. A contract made in one state for the sale of liquors to be delivered in another state, such as would be valid at common law, and which is not shown to be invalid where made, will enable the seller to maintain an action for the price in the state where the delivery is made, notwithstanding that, if made in the latter state, the contract would have been void.[94] But this rule is of no avail in the face of statutes such as have been enacted in several states, providing that there shall be no recovery on a contract of this kind, where the purchaser

Delivery in another state.— In Alabama it has been held that a statute (Ala. Code (1896), § 3524), providing that all sales or agreements to sell liquors are void if the seller has not a license, has no application to a sale of liquor made by a wholesale dealer doing business in another state, and having no license in Alabama; the subject of the sale being also in another state, and to be there delivered. buys with a view to violating the laws of his own state, although the contract would have been good where made. Such legislation is valid and enforceable.[95] And a statute forbidding local agents of non-resident manufacturers or dealers to solicit or take orders for liquors to be shipped into the state, the purpose being to sell them there in violation of law, will prevent a recovery on an order so taken and filled, although the contract would have been valid in the state where completed.[96] If a contract for the sale of liquor is void in the state where made, it is void everywhere, and the seller cannot maintain an action for the price in the state where the goods are delivered.[97] Hence the right to maintain an action for the price of liquors sold frequently depends upon the determination of the place where the contract was made. This is a question to be decided upon various applicable principles of the law of contracts.[98] Many elements may enter into it, but the most important to be considered are the place where the order was given,[99] the place where delivery of the goods is made,[1] and the character of the sale as final or conditional.[2] Where an order for liquors is taken by an agent and forwarded to his principal in another state, who fills the order and delivers the goods to a carrier for transportation to the purchaser, it is generally held that the place of the contract is the place where the order is so filled.[3] But according to some

Mere knowledge on the part of the seller of intoxicating liquor that the buyer intended to make an illegal use thereof will not defeat a recovery, if the seller did not in any way participate in the unlawful design.[5] But if the seller actively participates in the purchaser's illegal purpose, it puts him in the position of an accomplice and defeats his action to recover the price.[6]

3. Note For Price of Liquors.[7] Where the purchaser of liquors gives his note for the price, it may be collected by suit if the sale was not in any way contrary to law.[8] But no action can be maintained upon a note given for the price of liquors sold by the payee in violation of law.[9] And it is immaterial that the note was made in another state, if the sale of the liquor was in violation of the laws of the state where the action is brought.[10] But to make this defense available, defendant must assume the burden of proving that the sale was unlawful, as by showing that the seller had no license, or that the sale was for a purpose not permitted by the statute, or to a person to whom it is unlawful to sell,[11] except where the local statute casts upon the payee the burden of proving affirmatively the validity of the sale in question.[12] If the note is given in settlement of an account, or for the purchase of several kinds of articles, including some items of intoxicating liquors unlawfully sold by the payee to the maker, the illegal part of the consideration taints the whole, and no part of the note can be collected by suit.[13] But although the note may thus be invalid as between the original parties, it will still be good in the hands of a bona fide holder for value, acquiring it before maturity and without notice of the illegality of the consideration,[14] except where

The consideration must be directly connected with the unlawful sale, in order to invalidate the note, and not merely collaterally. Thus, where the sale of liquor is illegal, it is no defense to a promissory note that the maker bought liquor from one who was indebted to the payee for rent, and, in payment for the liquor, assumed the debt for rent, and executed the note therefor; for here the consideration for the note is the rent and not the liquor. 4. Mortgage of Liquors. In some states it has been decided that a mortgage of intoxicating liquors, being in the nature of a conditional sale, is invalid, except perhaps in cases where each of the parties holds a license or other necessary authority to buy and sell such goods.[16] But in others it is considered that such a mortgage must be held good as between the parties to it, and as against creditors of the mortgagor, and as possessing sufficient validity to sustain an action by the mortgagee against one taking the property from his possession without authority.[17]

License obtained after lease made.— Such a lease is not void merely because a license has not been obtained by the tenant at the time it is made, where there is nothing to show an intention or understanding of the parties that the business should be carried on without a license. Kerley v. Mayer, 10 Misc. (N. Y.) 718, 31 N. Y. Suppl. 818.

Lease of premises in prohibited place.— A lease is not void because the property is situated within the prohibited distance from a school-house, where it does not appear that a license could not have been obtained by transfer from other premises, as allowed by the statute. Shedlinsky v. Budweiser Brewing Co., 17 N. Y. App. Div. 470, 45 N. Y. Suppl. 174.

A lease containing no provision with reference to the sale of liquor on the premises, and with no parol contract providing for such sale, is not avoided by the subsequent use of the premises for that purpose. Kittredge v. Allemania Soc., 3 Ohio S. & C. Pl. 217, 3 Ohio N. P. 312.

In Ohio the use of the premises by the tenant for the unlawful sale of liquor renders the lease void at the election of the lessor; discovers that the premises, leased for a lawful purpose, are being used for the illegal sale of liquor, he may cancel the lease and recover possession of the property by an action of forcible entry and detainer or other appropriate proceeding.[20]

C. Recovery of Price of Liquor Sold — 1. No Recovery on Illegal Sale. It is a good defense to an action to recover the price of liquors sold by plaintiff to defendant that the sale was contrary to law.[21] But a recovery may be had where the sale was made before the enactment of the statute forbidding such sales,[22] or after the repeal of a statute which merely provided that there should be no recovery on liquor contracts,[23] although the repeal of a law which absolutely prohibited sales of a particular kind, or declared liquor contracts to be absolutely void, cannot give a right of action on a contract made in contravention of the statute while it was in force.[24] And it seems that an award of arbitrators giving to one of the parties credit for liquors illegally sold cannot be overturned on that ground, although he could not have maintained an action at law for the same item.[25]

2. Accounts Including Other Items. Where a plaintiff's cause of action embraces several demands, some of which are for liquors illegally sold, he can recover nothing if the contract or transaction was entire and inseverable and the consideration cannot be apportioned between the legal and illegal items.[26] But if the price or consideration is separable, separate prices or distinct agreed values being placed on the prohibited goods and on the lawful items, plaintiff may recover for so much of the whole as is not affected by the illegality of the rest;[27] and the same rule applies if the unlawful items are waived, withdrawn, or stricken out by consent.[28] In an action on a current account, defendant has the burden of proving, if such is his contention, that part of it was for liquor illegally sold.[29] If partial payments are made on an account, consisting partly of charges for liquors illegally sold, and partly of other and valid charges, it is the right of the parties to apply them to the illegal items if they so choose, or of the creditor to make such application in the absence of an appropriation by the debtor;[30] but if

but where the lease was made for the purpose of having the premises so used, and this purpose is afterward accomplished by the tenant, the lease becomes void as to both parties. Justice v. Lowe, 26 Ohio St. 372.

Settlement of partnership.— Where articles of partnership contemplate the sale of liquors, and the stock on dissolution contains such goods, and on settlement one partner is charged with the price of them, and is authorized to pay certain debts incurred in their purchase, the other partner, when sued for contribution, cannot set up the liquor law in defense of the items paid for such debts. Liquor and vessels.— If intoxicating liquors are illegally sold, with an agreement that the vessels containing them, which are sold at the same time, may be returned and the buyer credited with the price charged, no action lies to recover the price of the vessels not returned; the sale, being illegal, vitiates the entire contract. no appropriation is made by the parties, the law will first apply the payments to the legal items.[31]

3. Limitation of Amount of Recovery. In some of the states statutes have been enacted forbidding tavern-keepers and other dealers in intoxicating liquors to sell the same to any person on credit, beyond a designated small amount. Such a law prevents the maintenance of an action for the recovery of the price of liquors sold, except in the statutory amount.[32]

4. Actions — a. In General. In an action for the price of liquors sold, the defense of illegality must be set up by defendant if he means to rely on it;[33] and the question whether or not the sale was illegal, in so far as it depends on matters of fact, is for the jury,[34] under proper instructions from the court.[35]

b. Pleadings. In an action to recover the price of liquors sold, the declaration or complaint need not allege that the sale was authorized by law or by plaintiff's license,[36] for if defendant relies on the illegality of the sale as a defense, he must allege and prove it, and this cannot be done under the general issue,[37] but must be specially pleaded, and by a plea setting forth every fact essential to show that the sale was contrary to law.[38]

c. Evidence. In most jurisdictions, in an action for the price of liquors sold, it is not incumbent on plaintiff, in the first instance, to prove that he was duly licensed or authorized to make the sale; on the contrary, if defendant relies on the illegality of the sale, he must assume the burden of proving it.[39] In a few jurisdictions, however, the rule is otherwise.[40] The admissibility and sufficiency

In Michigan under a statute providing that, to entitle the seller to recover, there must be "positive proof" that the liquors sold were imported from abroad and sold in the original packages, it was held that this reof evidence offered to show that the vendor of liquors knew that the purchaser was a person of intemperate habits[41] or that he intended to sell them in violation of law[42] are to be determined in accordance with the general rules on the subject.[43]

D. Recovery of Money Paid For Liquor — 1. Right of Recovery — a. In General. Although an executory contract for the illegal sale of liquor may be rescinded and partial payments reclaimed,[44] yet if the contract has been fully executed, no action will lie, at common law, to recover back the price or value of the liquors paid.[45] But in several states statutes have been enacted providing that all payments for liquors sold illegally shall be held to have been received in violation of law, and against equity and good conscience, and to have been received upon a valid promise and agreement to repay the same on demand.[46] It is generally necessary that a repayment shall have been demanded and refused.[47] The Iowa statute applies to all illegal sales made by any person whomsoever.[48]

b. Legality of Sale. An action of this kind cannot be sustained unless it is quirement was not met where an account was presented, opposite each item of which were added the words "imported and sold in the original packages," and defendant admitted the correctness of the account. Niles v. Rhodes, 7 Mich. 374.

Validity.— Such a statute is valid and constitutional, as an exercise of the police power, and is not objectionable as interfering with interstate commerce. Connolly v. Scarr, 72 Iowa 223, 33 N. W. 641.

Effect of repeal.— The right of action given by these statutes is a vested right in all persons who have paid money on such illegal sales, and is not affected by subsequent changes in the law. Dewey v. Dolan, 121 Mass. 9; Adams v. Goodnow, 101 Mass. 81; Peters v. Goulden, 27 Mich. 171.

Limitation.— An action under these statutes is barred only at the end of the same period which would bar a valid promise or agreement to pay the money in question; it is not a penal action such as is barred in two years. Woodward v. Squires, 41 Iowa 677.

Claim assignable.— A claim for the repayment of moneys paid on an illegal sale of liquors is assignable. Sellers v. Arie, 99 Iowa 515, 68 N. W. 814.

Purchase for illegal purpose.— Although the purchaser bought the liquor for the purpose and with the intention of reselling it in violation of law, this will not prevent him from maintaining an action on the statute. Yerteau v. Bacon, 65 Vt. 516, 27 Atl. 198.

Proportional recovery.— If a single payment in money is made for a stock in trade, only a part of which consisted of liquor, the purchaser may recover the proportional amount paid for the liquor. Jacobs v. Stokes, 12 Mich. 381; McGuinness v. Bligh, 11 R. I. 94.

shown that the sale of liquor in question was in violation of some positive law of the state.[49]

c. Place of Sale. The statutes under consideration do not authorize a recovery of the price where the contract of sale was made and completed in another state,[50] even though the seller knew of the buyer's purpose to dispose of the liquors in violation of law, and assisted and participated in such unlawful purpose to such an extent as would have deprived him of the right to sue for the price.[51]

2. Form of Action. An action on a statute of this character is an action of contract and not in tort,[52] and where the common-law system of pleading prevails, the proper form of action is assumpsit, as for money had and received.[53] The claim for money paid on such an illegal sale may also be pleaded as a set-off or counter-claim, in cases where such a plea would otherwise be permissible.[54]

In its most comprehensive sense it is generally understood to signify the laying out of money in such manner that it may produce a revenue, whether the particular method be a loan or the purchase of stocks, securities, or other property. San Diego County Sav. Bank v. Barrett, 126 Cal. 413, 416, 58 Pac. 914; Drake v. Crane, 127 Mo. 85, 103, 29 S. W. 990, 27 L. R. A. 653; Una v. Dodd, 39 N. J. Eq. 173.

The general understanding of the term is taking a given sum of money and placing it where it will produce an income, either as the profit of capital in a commercial venture, or in the form of interest earned by bonds, stocks, and other securities. People v. Feitner, 167 N. Y. 1, 10, 60 N. E. 265, 82 Am. St. Rep. 698.

Colorable transfer.—The use of the term "investment" in a stipulation with one of the parties to a suit of the manner of the making of the investment is inconsistent with the idea of a merely colorable transfer, which is designed to conceal the misappropriation of the money, but implies an actual investment. Not applicable to bank capital.— "When, in connection with the power to invest, other ways are pointed out in which funds may be invested besides in banking business, . . . [it was] . . . held to be a forced use of the term 'investment' to apply it to an active capital employed in banking, since it is usually applied to a more permanent and inactive disposition of money; and, although it might extend to banking, yet it ought not to receive that interpretation, where another sense, more obvious and consistent with the general objects of the incorporation, can be given to it." IRRIGATE. Primarily, according to the Latin word from which it is derived, to convey water to or upon anything, and, more generally, to wet or moisten anything; and the ordinary definition in our language is to water lands, whether by channels, by flooding, or simply by sprinkling.[42] (See WATERS.)

IRRIGATION. In its primary sense, a sprinkling, or watering; yet, according to the best lexicographers, it has an agricultural or special signification: the watering of lands by drains or channels.[43] In its popular sense, the application of water to land for the production of crops;[44] the operation of causing water to flow over lands for nourishing plants;[45] a proper mode of using water by a riparian proprietor; the lawful extent of the use depending upon the circumstances of each case.[46] (See, generally, WATERS.)

IS.[47] The present indicative singular of the substantive verb "to be,"[48] which may have, however, when applied to a transaction yet to come, a future signification.[49] So, too, when warranted by the context or by the intent with which it is used, the word may refer to something in the past.[50]

IS DAMNUM DAT QUI JUBET DARE; EJUS VERO NULLA CULPA EST CUI PARERE NECESSE EST. A maxim meaning "He occasions a loss who gives orders to cause it; but no blame attaches to him who is under the necessity of obeying."[51]

ISH. In the law of Scotland, a term essential to a valid lease.[52]

ISLAND. A body of land surrounded by water.[53] (Island: Accretion to Shore, see NAVIGABLE WATERS; WATERS. Adverse Possession, see ADVERSE POSSESSION. Grants of Swamp Land Including Partly Submerged Island, see PUBLIC LANDS. Jurisdiction of Offenses Committed on, see CRIMINAL LAW. Ownership of, see BOUNDARIES. B. In Relation to Property — 1. In General. The word "issue" is susceptible of three meanings: 1. It may describe a class of persons who are to take as joint tenants with the parties named. 2. It may be descriptive of a class who are to take at a definite and fixed time as purchasers; and 3, it may denote an indefinite succession of lineal descendants who are to take by inheritance. Whenever this word is used either in a deed or will, it must be used in one of these senses.[74]

2. In the Sense of Descendants.[75] In its legal sense, as used in statutes and wills, and deeds, and other instruments, issue means descendants,[76] lineal descend

At an early day it was held in its primary sense, when not restrained by the context, to be co-extensive and synonymous with "descendants," comprehending objects of every degree. But it came to be apparent to judges there that such a sense given to the term would in most cases defeat the intention of the testator; and hence in the latter cases there is a strong tendency, unless restrained by the context, to hold that it has the meaning of "children." 2 Jarman Wills 328 [quoted in Drake v. Drake, 3 N. "Lawful issue" is synonymous with "heirs of the body." Kingsland v. Rapelye, 3 Edw. (N. Y.) 1, 6.

without regard to degree.[11] But the words, issue of his body, are more flexible than the words, heirs of his body,[12] and courts more readily interpret the former as the synonym of children, and a mere descriptio personarum, than the latter.[13] The word "issue" is a word of broader import than descendant[14] and may include the children of a living parent as well as the children or descendants of one who is dead.[15] The term is nomen collectivum,[16] nomen generalissimum,[17] or genus generalissimum;[18] it takes in the whole generation ex vi termini,[19] and must always have its effect accordingly, unless there be a clear manifestation of intention in the context to use it in the restricted sense of issue living at the death.[20] But the word issue may be designatio personæ,[21] and may indicate a particular class in being at a special time.[22] It is a word capable of being used in different senses,[23] even in different clauses of the same instrument,[24] and whether in a will it shall be held to mean "descendants" or "children" depends upon the intention of the testator as derived from the context or the entire will, or such extrinsic circumstances as can be considered.[25] The meaning of the word may be restricted,[26] and its true interpretation must be found from the connection in which it is used,[27] noscitur a sociis;[28] and whatever be the prima facie meaning of the word it will yield to the intention of a testator to be collected from the will.[29] It may when such appears to have been the intent with which the word is used have the restricted import of CHILDREN,[30] q. v.

issue, as to real property, is not the apt word of inheritance, and does not in itself convey a fee,[31] but is always taken as a word of purchase.[32]

b. In Wills. In a will the term "issue" may be employed either as a word of purchase or of limitation, according to which sense will best effectuate the testator's intention.[33] It is usually construed as a word of limitation,[34] and not of

A clear intention must appear in order to restrain the usual sense of the word. Weehawken Ferry Co. v. Sisson, 17 N. J. Eq. 475, 485.

A slight indication in other parts of the will that such was the meaning of the testator is sufficient. Emmet v. Emmet, 67 N. Y. App. Div. 183, 185, 73 N. Y. Suppl. 614.

Where a power is given to appoint among "issue" followed by a limitation over in their favour, and then it is declared that the "children" shall take in equal shares, the word "children" does not cut down the strict technical meaning of the word "issue." In re Warren, 26 Ch. limitation which would not control the legal effect of the words "heirs of the body" have frequently been held to give the word "issue" the operation of a word of purchase.[38] So also a direction that issue shall take a vested interest at a certain period is a context inconsistent with issue being a word of limitation, and the issue take as purchasers.[39] When issue is used as a word of limitation, it expresses the quantity of the estate, in its indefinite duration, and all the rights which are incident to the estate.[40]

4. In the Sense of Rents and Profits. The word "issue" is an apt term to indicate the rents and profits derived from realty.[41]

C. In Commercial Law.[42] As a noun, a class or series of bonds, debentures, etc., comprising all that are emitted at one and the same time;[43] the first delivery of the instrument, complete in form to a person who takes it as holder.[44] As applied to negotiable paper, its delivery for use and circulation.[45] As applied to bonds, it usually includes delivery,[46] but it does not invariably do so.[47] It may mean "executed" under some circumstances and "delivered" under others.[48] It is said to include not only the delivery of the bonds, but all preceding acts of signature and preparation,[49] and registration according to law.[50] In this connection, it is used in two distinct senses; sometimes when the bonds are merely authorized; and, also, when they are actually executed anddelivered for value.[51] As applied to a license, it means filled out and delivered to the applicant therefor.[52]

As applied to a patent it means delivered.[53] As applied to an insurance policy "issued" is indicative of the completion, signing up, and execution of the instrument, making it ready for delivery.[54] In a popular sense a corporation engaged in organization is said to issue stock when it obtains subscriptions for it.[55]

D. In Pleading. A single certain and material point issuing out of the allegations of the plaintiff and defendant;[56] a single material point of law or fact depending in the suit, which, being affirmed on the one side and denied on the other, is presented for determination;[57] a point in dispute between parties[58] on which they put their cause to trial;[59] a claim on one side denied by the other;[60] that matter upon which the plaintiff proceeds by his action and which the defendant controverts by his pleadings;[61] some question, either of fact or law disputed between the parties, and mutually proposed and accepted by them as the subject for decision.[62] In technical strictness, the term when used with reference to pleadings, signifies the disputed point or question.[63] An issue arises on the pleadings where a fact, or conclusion of law, is maintained by one party and controverted by the other;[64] where both parties rest the fate of the cause upon the truth of the fact in question;[65] when both the parties join upon somewhat that they refer unto a trial to make an end of the plea.[66] Issues are classified and distinguished as follows: General and special; material and immaterial;

To constitute an issue, there must be an affirmative on one side and a negative on the other. Black L. Dict.

The production of an "issue" is the object as well as the end and effect of the system or process of pleading; and when, by means of this process, the parties have arrived at a specific point affirmed on the one side and denied on the other, they are said to be "at issue," (ad exitum, that is, "at the end" of their pleading;) and the emergent question itself is termed "the issue;" being designated, according to its nature, as an "issue in fact," or an "issue in law." Burrill L. Dict.

formal and informal; real and feigned;[67] and of law and of fact.[68] A general issue is raised by a plea which briefly and directly traverses the whole declaration, such as "not guilty" or "non-assumpsit."[69] A special issue is formed when the defendant chooses one single material point which he traverses, and rests his whole case upon its determination.[70] Issues are described as material or immaterial according as they do or do not bring up some material point or question which, when determined by the verdict, will dispose of the whole merits of the case, and leave no uncertainty as to the judgment.[71] A formal issue is one framed in strict accordance with the technical rules of pleading.[72] An informal issue is raised when the material allegations of the declaration are traversed but in an inartificial or untechnical mode.[73] A real issue is one formed in a regular manner in a regular suit for the purpose of determining an actual controversy.[74] A feigned issue is one made up by direction of the court upon a supposed case for the purpose of obtaining the verdict of a jury upon some question of fact materially involved in the cause.[75] An issue of law is an issue upon a matter of law or consisting of matter of law being produced by a demurrer on the one side and a joinder in demurrer on the other.[76] An issue of fact is an issue taken upon or consisting of matter of fact; the fact only and not the law being disputed; and which is to be tried by a jury.[77] Matter of law, however, is sometimes involved in an issue of fact as in what are termed general issues.[78]

ITA QUOD. Literally, "so that."[85] A term often used as preceding conditions.[86] (See, generally, COVENANTS; DEEDS.)

ITA SEMPER FIAT RELATIO UT VALEAT DISPOSITIO. A maxim meaning "Let the relation be so made that the disposition may stand."[87]

ITEM.[88] A word of varied meaning; according to the standard lexicographers, it may mean an article;[89] a circumstance, a driblet, a part;[90] a separate particular of an account,[91] the particulars of an account[92] or a single item of an account;[93] anything which can form part of a detail;[94] an ENTRY,[95] q. v.; a single entry;[96] or a thing in the aggregate composed of several single things.[97] In written instruments, especially in wills, the word is sometimes used as the proper beginning of a distinct clause[98] or paragraph,[99] and is introductory of a new clause, and divides, so far from connecting it with the precedent;[1] to introduce new and distinct matter,[2] and not to influence other clauses of an instrument;[3] to mark and distinguish the different clauses.[4] (See ITEMIZE; and generally, ACCOUNTS AND ACCOUNTING; WILLS.)

ITEMIZE. To state in items or by particulars.[5] (See ITEM.)

ITEMIZED ACCOUNT. An account which states the items making up the aggregate of the demand.[6] (See ITEM. See also, generally, ACCOUNTS AND ACCOUNTING.)

Jewelry may be made of electro-type ware, but electro-type ware is not jewelry any more than the rude gold or the rough and unpolished precious stone is jewelry."

"The word 'jewelry' is generally used as including articles of personal adornment, and the word further imports that the articles are of value in the community where they are used. A belt of cowry shells, a necklace of bears' claws, a head ornament of sharks' teeth, though possessing no value in themselves, are esteemed valuable in the communities where they are worn; and we, therefore, constantly find them referred to in books written in the English language,— books of travel, standard works, encyclopædias, and scientific dissertations upon sociology — we find those articles described in those books as 'jewelry.' The articles of value used for personal adornment in our civilization are, and for centuries have been, the precious metals,— gold and silver, to which, I think, platina is now generally added,— and what are known as precious stones,— the diamond, sapphire, ruby, etc. Articles manufactured from those for the purpose of personal adornment are known . . . as articles of jewelry." 2. Statement of Single Wrong Infringing Distinct Rights. The statement of distinct rights infringed by the same wrong constitutes a statement of distinct causes of action;[10] as for example, where the same act is averred to have caused an injury to both person and property.[11] But the statement of distinct elements of damages arising from the same wrongful act does not constitute a statement of distinct causes of action.[12]

3. Claims For More Than One Remedy or Relief — a. In General. Since the demand for relief does not constitute a part of the cause of action,[13] as from the same cause of action there often arise several remedial rights,[14] the singleness of a cause of action cannot be determined by an examination of whether different kinds of relief are prayed for or objects sought.[15] For this reason a complaint not be joined with one for trespass on the land.

Creditors' suits.— A common form of action in which the question of misjoinder arises is that of creditors' actions in which the object is to set aside fraudulent conveyances made by the debtor, especially where the conveyances are alleged to have been made at various times and to different persons — between whom there is no privity. In cases of this character the whole right of action is deemed to rest on the fraud of the debtor and to constitute but one right of action, although it may affect defendants differently. relief and legal relief must be consistent,[21] and in some cases it has been held that the grounds therefor must be separately stated.[22] The courts, however, frequently ignore the question of whether complaints asserting rights to legal and equitable relief, arising from the same set of facts, state in reality but a single cause of action, and apply to such complaints the principles governing the joinder of legal and equitable causes of action generally.[23] A complaint is not bad, although equitable relief is sought to which plaintiff is not entitled.[24]

(II) DAMAGES FOR INJURY AND INJUNCTION OR ABATEMENT. A complaint seeking to recover damages for an injury and an injunction against the continuance of the acts causing it states but a single cause of action.[25] So a complaint may seek to recover damages resulting from a nuisance, and to restrain its continuance,[26] or a judgment abating it.[27]

(III) REFORMATION AND ENFORCEMENT OF INSTRUMENT. Under the rule that plaintiff may without stating more than one cause of action seek more than one form of relief, it has been held that but one cause of action is stated by a complaint seeking to reform an instrument and to enforce it as reformed,[28] as where, after reformation of a deed, it is sought to quiet title,[29] or to have partition,[30] or where it is sought to reform the acknowledgment of a mortgage and

In Indiana, by express statutory provision, the reformation and enforcement of an instrument may be sought in one proceeding (see Monroe v. Skelton, 36 Ind. 302); so a mortgage may be reformed and foreclosed (Smith v. Kyler, 74 Ind. 575; Miller v. Kolb, 47 Ind. 220; Conger v. Parker, 29 Ind. 380; Hunter v. McCoy, 14 Ind. 528).

to foreclose it.[31] But in many cases, without decision as to whether two or more causes of action are stated in such a complaint, the principles governing the joinder of causes of action generally have been applied.[32]

(IV) CANCELLATION OF DEED AND RECOVERY OF PROPERTY. As incidental relief, the recovery of property conveyed may be sought in connection with a rescission of a contract,[33] or the possession of property conveyed, in connection with the cancellation of a fraudulent deed.[34]

(V) FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE AND JUDGMENT FOR DEFICIENCY. Although the cause of action at law to procure a judgment upon the debt secured by mortgage is distinct from the cause of action in equity for the foreclosure of such mortgage,[35] a complaint in foreclosure is not regarded as stating two causes of action, by reason of the fact that it sets out the bond or note secured and seeks a deficiency judgment as a part of the relief.[36]

(VI) SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE AND MONEY JUDGMENT. A claim for specific performance and for a money judgment, where arising out of an entire contract, constitutes but one cause of action.[37] Under the rule that incidental relief may be sought without stating a new cause of action, it has been held that a claim for rents and profits may be inserted in a complaint seeking the specific performance of a contract to convey land.[38]

(VII) ACCOUNTING AND OTHER RELIEF. As incident to other relief a demand for an accounting is not usually regarded as the statement of a separate cause of action;[39] but such relief must be germane to the principal relief.[40]

e. Effect of Causes Imperfectly Stated. The pleading must contain a complete statement of two or more good causes of action to present a question of joinder.[46] The use of ambiguous expressions which point to a cause of action other than that well stated[47] or which may be rejected as surplusage[48] is not sufficient. Hence, where but one cause of action is alleged against one of defendants, and no cause of action is alleged against the remaining defendants, there is no misjoinder.[49]

f. Effect of Stating Single Cause as Several. B. Propriety of Joinder — 1. At Common Law — a. Forms of Action Which May Be Joined — (I) In General. At common law the form rather than the subject-matter of separate counts determines the propriety of their joinder in many cases,[51] the general rule being that a joinder of counts requiring the same plea and judgment is proper.[52] This rule, however, does not prohibit a joinder in all other cases, and although the pleas are different, counts of the same nature and on which the same judgment may be rendered may in some cases be joined.[53] Nor can counts to which the pleas and judgments are the same be joined in all cases;[54] for example, debt on bond and covenant broken cannot be joined, although general issue to both is non est factum and the judgment misericordia.[55] So in some states replevin,[56] account,[57] or an action on book-debt[58] cannot be joined with any other cause of action.

(II) Contract. Under the general rules already stated,[59] counts in assumpsit and debt cannot be joined;[60] nor can assumpsit be joined with a count in book-debt[61] or in covenant;[62] nor can debt and covenant be joined;[63] nor book-account with account as bailiff or receiver.[64] Debt, however, in apparent contradiction to the general rule, may be joined with detinue, although the judgments are different.[65]

(III) Tort. Since actions requiring different judgments cannot as a general rule be joined,[66] it is usually held improper to join trespass and trespass on the real estate, and the other for partition, yet, if in fact he has set forth but one cause of action, a demurrer for misjoinder cannot be sustained. Westlake v. Farrow, 34 S. C. 270, 13 S. E. 469.

Division into paragraphs. — The fact that a petition is divided into paragraphs and the later paragraphs introduced by the phrase "for a further and separate cause of action" will not of itself cause the petition to be construed as stating more than one cause of action. Houston v. Delahay, 14 Kan. 125; Welch v. Platt, 32 Hun (N. Y.) 194; Hillman v. Hillman, 14 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 456 [approved in Thompson v. Kearney, 14 Daly (N. Y.) 342, 12 N. Y. St. 682].

Stating distinct rights as legal conclusion. — A petition will not be regarded as containing several distinct causes of action, by reason of the fact that it sets out several failures to perform a duty enjoined by law, for which the law permits the recovery of but a single penalty, and as a conclusion of law claims the legal right to recover a penalty for each failure. Loveland v. Garner, 71 Cal. 541, 12 Pac. 616, where several failures of the directors of a corporation, with regard to the rendering of statements of accounts and to the making of reports, were alleged in one complaint.

case,[67] the judgment in trespass being technically quod capiatur, and in case, even though force is inferred, quod sit in misericordia.[68] For the same reason the action of trover, being a form of case, cannot be joined with trespass;[69] but trespass and case[70] or trespass and trover[71] may be joined where, under the practice, the same judgment is applicable to both forms of action. So the joinder of trespass and case is proper where the distinction between the actions is removed by statute.[72] Trover and case may be joined,[73] trover being originally an action on the case.[74] So when an action is originally trover, new counts in case may be added by way of amendment.[75] Under the statutes of some states a plaintiff in replevin may add a count in trover for goods which cannot be found.[76]

(iv) CONTRACT AND TORT. It is a well established rule of common-law pleading, that a cause of action arising ex contractu cannot be joined with a cause of action arising ex delicto.[77] Hence it is improper to join counts in assumpsit with

A count to recover a statutory penalty which, although in form in debt, is founded on a tort, cannot be joined with a count in assumpsit. Higdon v. Kennemer, 120 Ala. 193, 24 So. 439.

81. Connecticut.— McWheeney v. Waterbury, 46 Conn. 295, holding that a statute which allows the joining in the same declaration of trespass on the case with trespass and also with assumpsit does not authorize the joining of trespass with assumpsit, or the joining of case, trespass, and assumpsit.

case,[84] nor trover and detinue.[85] A count upon a contract and a count in tort may sometimes be united, where the former sounds in damages for the malfeasance of defendant in regard to the contract, and where they are so formed that the same plea may be pleaded and the same judgment rendered on both.[86] The joinder of debt and case may be authorized by a statute conferring arbitrary remedies.[87]

(v) DIFFERENT FORMS FOR SAME CAUSE. By statute in some states counts for the same cause of action may be joined, although in forms which at common law could not be joined, for example trespass and trespass on the case[88] or Hilzheim, 35 Miss. 231; Morrison v. Bedell, 22 N. H. 234); nor with trespass for taking and carrying away goods (Morrison v. Bedell, supra; Burr v. Sharp, 2 N. J. L. 382).

84. Burr v. Sharp, 2 N. J. L. 382, where it was sought to join debt for rent, trespass to land and case for waste.

86. New Hampshire. — Crawford v. Parsons, 63 N. H. 438, covenant and case.

New Jersey. — Little v. Gibbs, 4 N. J. L. 211.

New York. — Church v. Mumford, 11 Johns. 479 (where in two counts the gravamen set forth was in both a tortious breach of defendant's duty as an attorney, as well as of the implied promise arising from his being employed); Hallock v. Powell, 2 Cai. 216 (a count in assumpsit and a count on a warranty on a sale may be joined where the gist of the action in both counts is deceit. If not guilty be pleaded to the other count, and plaintiff take judgment on the assumpsit and enter a nolle prosequi on the warranty the misjoinder is not movable in arrest of judgment).

Pennsylvania. — Smith v. Rutherford, 2 Serg. & R. 358, holding that a count alleging that defendant did not permit plaintiff to enter certain land, and cut and carry away certain grain sold by defendant to a third party, and by the latter to plaintiff, but prevented plaintiff from so doing, and converted the grain to his own use, consists partly of breach of contract, and partly of misfeasance, and is properly joined with a count in trover, the process, plea, and judgment being the same. Compare Pettit v. Sanger, 2 Pearson 84, holding that a count setting forth a promise arising out of a sale of property, receipt of proceeds, and failure to pay them over was a count in case ex delicto which might be joined with other counts in tort.

England. — Brown v. Dixon, 1 T. R. 274. Compare Dickon v. Clifton, 2 Wils. C. P. 319.

Compare Lane v. Hogan, 5 Yerg. (Tenn.) 290, holding that a count charging that defendant agreed to pay a certain sum in good bank-notes, for a horse, with an averment that the notes paid were forged, was in case and might be joined with a count for a deceitful representation that the notes were genuine. But see Humiston v. Smith, 22 Conn. 19, holding that while an action upon a warranty is founded on a contract, plaintiff may at his election declare either in assumpsit or in tort; but the two forms of action are so distinct that they cannot both be joined in the same declaration.

Case and a count for breach of trust and fraud arising upon contract, express and implied, may be joined. Clark v. Kent County Judge, 125 Mich. 449, 84 N. W. 629, such as a claim for fraudulently procuring money with which to pay a license-fee to conduct a business for plaintiff in another city, and a claim for money which defendant had collected on a note forwarded to him by plaintiff.

88. See the statutes of the several states. And see Griffin v. Gilbert, 28 Conn. 493 (sustaining a declaration containing two counts in trespass for an entry on land and the digging up of the soil and carting of stones thereon, and a third count in case alleged to be for the same cause of action); Havens v. Hartford, etc., R. Co., 26 Conn. 220 (holding that a declaration containing a count in trespass for the forcible ejection of plaintiff by defendants, a railroad company, from their cars, and a count in trespass on the case for the same injury by the negligence of defendants as common carriers in conveying him as a passenger, the latter count also containing an allegation that defendants at the same time assumed to carry safely plaintiff's tool-chest, but damaged it through their negligence, was bad for a misjoinder, although the second count contained an averment that it was for the same cause of action as the first); Boerum v. Taylor, 19 Conn. 122 (holding that a count in trespass for placing filthy substances in a quart of rum in a jug, whereby the rum was rendered valueless and spoiled, and another in case for putting such substances into the rum with the intent to cause plaintiff to drink thereof, and that plaintiff drank and was made sick thereby, could not be joined); Black v. Howard, 50 Vt. 27 (holding that a count in trespass quare clausum fregit might be joined with a count in case for neglect to maintain a division fence); Hagar v. Brainerd, 44 Vt. 294 [distinguishing Keyes v. Prescott, 32 Vt. 86, which held that a count in trover could not be joined with an action of trespass under a statute providing treble damages for cutting trees on the land of another, since the two counts were not for the same cause of action] (sustaining a joinder of trespass on the freehold and trespass on the case); Alger v. Curry, 38 Vt. 382.

trover.[89] Other statutes permit the joinder of counts in contract and tort for the same cause,[90] some of such statutes requiring a specific averment that but one cause is stated,[91] although in a proper case such averment may be introduced by amendment.[92] Plaintiff after such an averment cannot introduce evidence of a tort not within the scope of the count on contract.[93] Even in the absence of statute, the joinder of counts for the same cause in different forms has been permitted upon the doctrine of implied amendment.[94]

(VI) MANDAMUS AND INJUNCTION. The remedies by injunction and mandamus cannot be had in the same action.[95]

(VII) LEGAL AND EQUITABLE. An action at law and an action in equity cannot be joined,[96] hence a joinder of a legal claim against one person with an equitable claim against other persons cannot be permitted.[97]

b. Causes Which May Be Joined — (I) IN GENERAL. As a general rule it may be stated that a plaintiff may join all his causes of action in one declaration; if in separate suits he can recover on each in the same form of action,[98] although

When two causes of action are of the same nature, where they can be conveniently and fairly tried together, and where a judgment for plaintiff is of the same effect so that defendant cannot be embarrassed on trial, or oppressed by different executions, they may be joined. Morrison v. Bedell, 22 N. H. 234.

The true distinction does not rest on the sameness of the process, plea, or judgment, but upon the consideration of whether the action is founded on tort or contract; if the former it may be joined with any tort, and if the several causes are distinct rights of action so that a judgment for one will not bar a recovery for the other.[99] This rule is, however, subject to the qualification that the causes of action must be in the same right.[1]

(II) Inconsistent Causes. A plaintiff cannot recover upon two or more inconsistent counts in his declaration.[2]

(III) Statutory and Common-Law Causes. While it has been said that a joinder of a count upon a statute with one based on a common-law right is not permissible,[3] the general rule is that, where the pleas and judgments are the same, the joinder may be permitted,[4] subject also to the further qualification that the

A. 402, holding that a cause of action against a railroad company to recover damages on account of defendant's negligence in the construction and maintenance of cattle-yards at a shipping station, by reason of which certain cattle of plaintiff, placed in the yards while awaiting shipment, escaped, and were lost and injured, may properly be joined with a separate count to recover for the negligent killing of some of the same cattle by an engine on defendant's road.

A declaration by a principal against an agent which charges the agent with the failure to pay over certain moneys and property received by him upon a mortgage belonging to the principal, sufficient in amount to pay the mortgage in full, also counting on a promise made by the agent that if the principal would cause the mortgaged premises to be sold under a decree in foreclosure he, the agent, would pay to the principal any deficiency arising on the sale, contains two inconsistent causes of action. (IV) CONTRACTS. The pleader may join as many counts in the declaration as he has causes of action of the same nature in assumpsit,[6] hence it is proper to join counts upon an account annexed with counts for money had and received.[7] Counts in debt on a bond or other specialty may be joined in the same declaration with counts in debt on a judgment or on simple contract,[8] as may counts in debt for several causes of action on statutory penalties of a similar nature.[9] Where the same obligors have executed several bonds to the same obligee, he may sue upon all in the same action;[10] and the obligee of several joint and several bonds not be joined with another in trespass for maliciously issuing an attachment against plaintiff.

counts for distinct libels,[20] or malicious prosecutions,[21] or for slander and malicious prosecution[22] or false imprisonment.[23] Counts for injury to the person may be joined with counts for injury to property.[24]

(VI) REAL ACTIONS. Where the same land is demanded twice in a writ of right the writ is abatable.[25] So a writ is abatable where the writ in separate counts relies on different seizins.[26]

(VII) ACTIONS IN DIFFERENT RIGHTS—(A) In General. A further rule governing the joinder of actions is that the counts must be in the same right.[27] So an executor or administrator[28] or guardian[29] cannot sue or be sued in the same action upon an individual and a representative demand. Where, however, an individual cause of action is stated, a misjoinder will not arise from the use of words usually indicating a representative capacity.[30] A statutory action for death

A count by the assignee of a bankrupt for money loaned by him as assignee may be joined with a count for money had and received to his use as such assignee. Richardson v. Griffin, 5 M. & S. 294. See cases more specifically cited infra, I, B, 1, b, (VII), (B), (C), (D).

Municipal and parochial claims.—The rule requiring causes of action to be in the same right does not prevent the joinder of rights of action accruing to towns in their municipal character with those accruing in their parochial character. Alna v. Plummer, 3 Me. 88, holding that a count for money paid for the support of paupers and a count for the price of a pew in a meeting-house belonging to plaintiffs might be joined.

Rights derived from different titles.—In case the same form of action is proper a plaintiff may as a general rule proceed for several distinct injuries, although the several rights affected are derived from different titles. Gabel v. Hammerwell, 44 Ala. 336, holding that a plaintiff may proceed in one action for breaches of two or more attachment bonds executed by the same obligors.

Individual and official bond.—It would seem that an action upon a bond single, for payment of money, cannot be joined in an action upon an official bond running to plaintiff and his successors in office. See Foltz v. Stevens, 54 Ill. 180 (holding that a count describing a bond as the writing of defendant, whereby he acknowledged himself bound unto the plaintiff "constable" with a condition that defendant should on a certain day deliver to the constable or such other officer as might by law be entitled to receive the same, certain property levied on and placed into the custody of defendant as bailee, was properly joined with a count declaring on an instrument of defendant whereby he acknowledged himself to be bound unto plaintiff in a certain sum of money); Patrick v. Rucker, 19 Ill. 428.

30. Blackstone Nat. Bank v. Lane, 80 Me. 165, 13 Atl. 683 (holding that where a note was binding upon a defendant in his private and individual capacity, the fact that defendant was described in the note and not in the writ, as trustee, did not create a misjoinder); Rush v. Good, 14 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 226 (holding that in an action by a creditor a count against assignees of a debtor who have sold property and received enough to pay the debts of the assignor, in which defendants are named as trustees, may be joined with a count for money had and received in which defendants are not described as trustees); Wheeler v. Wilson, 57 Vt. 157 (holding that where, by statute, a tax-collector is given the right to sue as an individual "in his name" to recover taxes, the fact that in certain counts of a declaration plaintiff declared in his official character, while in others he declared in his individual capacity, did not show a misjoinder). See also Rollins v. Marsh, 128 Mass. 116.

cannot be joined with one in the right of the decedent for pain and suffering.[31] Where a plaintiff has different interests in possession and reversion, he may recover in one action for an injury affecting both.[32]

(B) Upon Joint and Several Liabilities. A claim upon which defendant is individually liable may be joined with one upon which he is jointly and severally liable,[33] but not with one on which he is jointly liable with his co-defendants.[34] A count in assumpsit on a promise by two defendants may be joined with a count on a promise by them and a third person deceased.[35]

(C) Upon Partnership and Individual Rights and Liabilities. Since rights of action vested in a partnership accrue to a surviving partner not in a representative capacity, but in his own right, a count for a debt due the surviving partner in his own right may be joined with a count on a debt due to the firm,[36] as may counts for debts due to him as surviving member of different firms.[37] A count against a partner on an individual demand cannot be joined with a count against him on his liability as a member of a partnership.[38] A surviving partner may, however, be sued on both an individual and a firm debt.[39] The payee of notes made by distinct partnerships of which defendants are the only partners cannot in the same action against such defendants recover on the notes of each partnership.[40]

(D) Actions By or Against Husband and Wife. Distinct and separate rights of the husband and wife cannot be enforced in the same action;[41] hence an action which accrues to the husband alone cannot be joined with one which accrues to the husband and wife,[42] nor can a count which will survive to the wife be joined with one which abates at the death of the husband.[43] A count on a

See also Staley v. Barhite, 2 Cai. (N. Y.) 221.

In New Jersey, where a statute provides that in any action by a husband and his wife for an injury done to the wife, in respect of which she is necessarily joined as co-plaintiff, it shall be lawful for the husband to add thereto claims in his own right arising ex delicto, a cause of action by the wife for personal injuries may be joined with one by the husband for injuries to himself and property, resulting from the same act which injured her. Ackerman v. North Jersey St. R. Co., 65 N. J. L. 369, 47 Atl. 585.

Under the English Common Law Procedure Act of 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, § 40), a count for breaking and entering the premises of the husband may be joined with a count by the husband and wife for assaulting and imprisoning the wife. Morris v. Moore, 19 C. B. N. S. 359, 115 E. C. L. 359.

promise by the husband and wife cannot be joined with a count on a promise by the wife before marriage;[44] nor can a cause of action against the husband alone.[45] A count for money received to the joint use of husband and wife cannot be joined with a count for money received to the use of the wife while sole,[46] nor can either of these counts be joined to one for money received to the use of the wife while sole, as guardian of her minor children.[47] A joint action will not lie for slander spoken by the husband and wife severally.[48]

(VIII) AGAINST SEVERAL DEFENDANTS. In order that causes of action against several defendants be joined, they must each affect all defendants;[49] so distinct causes of action against different defendants cannot be joined, although in favor of the same plaintiff.[50] For example a joint action will not lie against two for their several debts upon separate obligations,[51] or for breach of distinct covenants.[52] Nor can a joint action be maintained against a principal debtor and a guarantor,[53]

An action for money had and received against several defendants cannot be maintained unless the money was jointly received by all. Simmons v. Spencer, 9 Fed. 581, 3 McCrary 48, holding that where certain deeds were left with a bank, to be delivered on the payment of a specified sum of money which it was instructed to place to plaintiff's credit, and the money paid in was turned over to a third party without credit being given therefor, a joint action could not be maintained against the bank and the third party.

or against principals and sureties where they are liable in different amounts.[54] Upon the same principle independent tort-feasors, neither of whom has control over the acts of the others, cannot be sued jointly.[55] When, however, two or more parties are guilty of a joint tort, they may be sued jointly or severally;[56] but a count for a joint cause of action cannot be joined with counts for several causes of action.[57] By statute it is sometimes provided that persons severally liable upon contracts in writing may be joined as defendants in one action,[58] but contracts which are entirely distinct in their nature and terms cannot be joined under such a statute.[59]

(IX) BY SEVERAL PLAINTIFFS. Several plaintiffs cannot join separate causes of action against the same defendant.[60] If two persons have an entire joint damage, they may bring a joint action, although their interests are several.[61] Joint owners of personal property may sue jointly to recover damages for its wrongful seizure and detention by another.[62]

criminal proceeding.[68] The rules applicable to the joinder of actions in a complaint apply in general to the joinder of causes of action in a counter-claim.[69]

b. Common-Law and Statutory Causes. While the general rule is that common-law and statutory causes of action of the same nature may be joined,[70] the weight of authority seems to be that, where a specific proceeding is prescribed by statute, it may not be joined with an action at common law.[71] A cause of action, under the common law, against one party for compensatory damages cannot be properly joined with an action against another party for punitive damages, the right for which is conferred by statute, although both causes arise out of the same transaction.[72]

c. Inconsistent Causes. Causes of action which are inconsistent with each other cannot as a general rule be joined,[73] although they may have arisen out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action;[74]

76. California.— Rucker v. Hall, 105 Cal. 425, 38 Pac. 962, holding that, in an action to recover commissions under a contract for payment at a certain rate if certain facts were true, and at another rate if other facts were true, and all the facts being peculiarly within the knowledge of defendant, plaintiff might state his cause of action in different counts, accordingly.

Iowa.— Jack v. Des Moines, etc., R. Co., 49 Iowa 627; Pearson v. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co., 45 Iowa 497; Camp v. Wilson, 16 Iowa 225, cause of action on a note and cause of action on the consideration of the note.

Nebraska.— Williams v. Lowe, 4 Nebr. 382, holding that a count alleging that certain shares of stock owned by plaintiff were purchased at a judicial sale by defendant, under a parol agreement that the latter should hold the shares in trust and reconvey the same on the payment of a debt due from plaintiff, might be joined with a count allegcause of action and ask that in case it proves unfounded another cause of action be tried.[77] Another apparent exception to the rule requiring consistency has been made in certain cases arising from contract express or implied.[78] A prayer for alternative relief does not in itself render the complaint inconsistent.[79]

d. Causes Having Separate Places of Trial. Causes of action requiring different places of trial cannot be joined.[80]

e. Causes Subject to Different Limitations. It is no objection to a joinder of causes of action that they are subject to different rules of limitation.[81]

f. Causes Belonging to Separate Classes. Where the causes of action which may be joined are classified by the codes, a union of causes of action falling in separate classes is as a general rule prohibited,[82] with the exception of those cases ing a want of jurisdiction in the court making the judicial sale, but that defendant under color of such aale procured the transfer of the shares on the books of the company and received dividenda thereon in trust for plaintiff.

New York.— Blank v. Hartshorn, 37 Hun 101; Longprey v. Yates, 31 Hun 432 (holding that in one count an agreed price for certain work might be alleged, and in another count a recovery might be sought, as on a quantum meruit); Schuyler v. Peck, 8 N. Y. Suppl. 849.

stances a suit may be prosecuted upon a demand not due, such a demand cannot be joined with causes of action upon demands which are due.[97]

h. Injuries to Person. As injuries to the person, false imprisonment and malicious prosecution may be joined.[98]

i. Injuries to Character. As injuries to character, actions for slander,[99] or libel [1] may be joined with actions for malicious prosecution. Actions for libel and for slander may be likewise joined,[2] as may several causes of action for slander.[3] But in case the causes of action fall within different divisions of the statutory classification of actions which may be joined,[4] or are regarded as inconsistent,[5] the joinder is not permissible.

j. Injuries to Property. Under the code provisions that causes of action arising out of injuries with or without force to property may be joined,[6] distinct causes of action for injury to realty,[7] or personalty,[8] or realty and personalty,[9] may be stated. Other provisions authorize the joinder of actions for injury to realty.[10] As injuries to property, several causes of action for a penalty prescribed by statute in case of over-charges by carriers of passengers may be joined.[11] Fraudulent representations upon the faith of which one is induced to part with money or property give rise to a cause of action for injury to property.[12] As rents and profits, or damages for withholding them, may be recovered in the same action,[19] or tax deeds on separate tracts set aside;[20] but the claim for recovery of possession and the claim for damages or rents and profits must not relate to different tracts.[21] Hence ejectment for the possession of a house cannot be joined with trespass on other property where they are distinct transactions.[22] An action for partition may be joined with one for the recovery of rents and profits of the same realty,[23] or to quiet title.[24] An action to recover possession cannot be joined with one for waste,[25] or to foreclose a mortgage,[26] or an action for the unlawful maintenance of a fence constituting a nuisance, with one for the recovery of real estate and to quiet title,[27] nor can a proceeding by an administrator to sell land to pay debts and an action by the heirs for partition be joined as claims to recover real property.[28]

l. Recovery of Chattels With or Without Damages. By the provision of many of the codes, claims for the recovery of specific personal property and damages for the taking or withholding of the same may be united in the same petition.[29]

m. Claims Against Trustee. By the codes it is usually provided that claims against a trustee, by virtue of a contract or by operation of law, may be united.[30] The claims must be against the trustee as such.[31] To arise by operation of law, the liability must arise simply from the position occupied by the trustee.[32]

n. Claims Arising From Same Transaction or Transactions — (i) GENERAL RULE AND DEFINITIONS OF TERMS. A provision common to the majority of the codes is that causes of action arising out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action, may be joined.[33] A definition of the

The meaning of the provision that plaintiff may unite several causes of action, whether legal or equitable, or both, where they all arise out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action is, that plaintiff may unite: (1) As many legal causes of action as he pleases, arising out of the same transaction; (2) as many equitable causes of action as he pleases, arising out of the same transaction; (3) as many legal and equitable causes of action as words employed in this provision is extremely difficult,[34] and while the courts have attempted definitions, the cases themselves appear to have been decided more upon reasons of expediency and with regard to the circumstances of the particular case than upon a settled idea of the meaning of the terms employed in the code.[35] A transaction has been defined to consist of an act or agreement, or several acts or agreements, having some connection with each other, in which more than one person is concerned and by which the legal relations of such persons between themselves are altered.[36] The phrase "subject of action" is generally construed to refer to the property or thing concerning which the proceeding is instituted and carried on, and the changes to be affected by the proceeding.[37] It is regarded as having a meaning distinct from the phrases he pleases, arising out of the same transaction; (4) as many causes of action as he pleases, arising out of different transactions connected with the same subject of action. Robinson v. Flint, 7 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 393.

Causes not arising from the same transaction may be joined when connected with the same subject of action. Flint v. Dulany, 37 Kan. 332, 15 Pac. 208.

Causes arising from the same transaction may be joined, although not such as could be joined if arising from different transactions. Robinson v. Flint, 7 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 393.

35. Wiles v. Suydam, 64 N. Y. 173; Barkley v. Williams, 30 Misc. (N. Y.) 687, 64 N. Y. Suppl. 318; Emerson v. Nash, 124 Wis. 369, 102 N. W. 921, 70 L. R. A. 326.

The purpose of the provision is to extend the right of plaintiffs to join actions, not merely by including equitable as well as legal causes of action, but to make the ground broad enough to cover all causes of action which a plaintiff may have against a defendant, arising out of the same subject of action, so that the court may dispose of the same subject of controversy and its incidents and corollaries in one action. Hamlin v. Tucker, 72 N. C. 502.

The provision should be liberally construed. — Emerson v. Nash, 124 Wis. 369, 102 N. W. 921, 70 L. R. A. 326.

36. Craft Refrigerating Mach. Co. v. Quinnipiac Brewing Co., 63 Conn. 551, 29 Atl. 76, 25 L. R. A. 856, further defining the phrase as meaning something which has taken place whereby a cause of action has arisen. Any event in which two or more persons are actors, involving a right which may presently, or by what would proximately occur in respect thereto, be violated, creating an actionable wrong, is a transaction. Emerson v. Nash, 124 Wis. 369, 102 N. W. 921, 70 L. R. A. 326.

The word "transaction" has been defined to be an infringement upon the primary right of plaintiff (Scarborough v. Smith, 18 Kan. 399), as the thing done (Anderson v. Hill, 53 Barb. (N. Y.) 238), the doing or performance of any business, the management of any affair (Rogers v. Wheeler, 89 N. Y. App. Div. 435, 85 N. Y. Suppl. 981 [citing Bouvier L. Dict.]), the act of transacting or conducting any business; negotiation; management; —a proceeding (Rogers v. Wheeler, supra [citing Worcester Dict.]), the management or settlement of an affair, the doing or performing (Rogers v. Wheeler, supra [citing Century Dict.]). With respect to matters of contract the same transaction has been defined to mean the entire proceeding, commencing with the negotiation and ending with the performance of the contract (Robinson v. Flint, 7 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 393). When a contract between two or more persons on one side, and two or more persons on the other, creates a situation involving presently or proximately separate rights upon one side, each of which with a violation thereof by the other side would constitute a complete ground of complaint for judicial redress, the initial circumstances, that is, the making of the contract, is a "transaction," and such grounds of complaint, should they arise, would be separate "causes of action arising out of the same transaction." Emerson v. Nash, 124 Wis. 369, 102 N. W. 921, 70 L. R. A. 326.

As distinguished from the primary right. — The primary right, from the violation of which a cause of action arises, must be distinguished from the transaction as referred to in this provision of the codes. The transaction is distinct from the immediate elements of the cause of action, since such elements arise from the transaction. Emerson v. Nash, 124 Wis. 369, 102 N. W. 921, 70 L. R. A. 326.

37. McKinney v. Collins, 88 N. Y. 216; Rogers v. Wheeler, 89 N. Y. App. Div. 435, 85 N. Y. Suppl. 981.

Other definitions. — The "subject of action" has in some cases been defined as the primary right. Scarborough v. Smith, 18 Kan. 399.

The term "transactions connected with the same subject of action" refers to a different situation than causes of action arising out of the same transaction. The former applies generally, if not exclusively, to matters which might constitute a source of independent causes of action, yet are so germane to the primary matter, the suit being in equity, as

"cause of action," [38] and "object of the action," which are elsewhere considered and defined. [39]

(II) APPLICATION OF THE RULE—(A) In General. While it is impossible to formulate a general rule which will control the circumstances of all particular cases which may arise,[40] it has been held proper, under the rule that causes of action relating to the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action, may be joined, to join various causes of action relating to realty,[41] claims arising from the settlement of partnership affairs,[42] or growing out of the administration of decedents' estates,[43] or matters of guardianship,[44] or trust estates,[45] or corporate liabilities and management,[46] as well as many other and miscellaneous to be regarded really a part thereof. Emerson v. Nash, 124 Wis. 369, 102 N. W. 921, 70 L. R. A. 326.

As not arising from the same transaction, it is not proper to join an action to restrain the collection of taxes and to recover back taxes paid (Turner v. Althaus, 6 Nebr. 55), or a claim for the possession of a tract of land with trespass upon another tract (Hulce v. Thompson, 9 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 113), or the foreclosure of mortgages upon distinct portions of land (Tobin v. Smith, 1 Ohio S. & C. Pl. Dec. 675, 1 Ohio N. Joinder of contract and tort see infra, I, B, 2, c.

A cause of action against an officer to recover damages incurred through his failure to perform certain duties may be joined with a cause of action to recover a penalty imposed by statute for such default. Pearkes v. Freer, 9 Cal. 642.

A cause of action for the annulment of a marriage cannot be joined with one seeking to quiet title of plaintiff in her separate property in which defendant falsely claims an interest. Uhl v. Uhl, 52 Cal. 250.

Causes which may not be joined.— Breach of warranty based on the explosion of a gun sold plaintiff, and a cause of action for the wrong in putting a defective weapon on the market (Reed v. Livermore, 101 N. Y. App. Div. 254, 91 N. Y. Suppl. 986); alienation of wife's affections and the subsequent conversion of personal property (Crowell v. Truesdell, 67 N. Y. App. Div. 502, 73 N. Y. Suppl. 1013); action in contract against attorneys for failure to properly conduct an action, and an action for wilful misconduct in its prosecution (Barkley v. Williams, 30 Misc. (N. Y.) 687, 64 N. Y. Suppl. 318); action to annul a contract and cancel a mortgage, and injunction to restrain an action for services rendered, not arising from the contract (Alleghany, etc., R. Co. v. Weidenfeld, 5 Misc. (N. Y.) 43, 25 N. Y. Suppl. 71); action by trustee in bankruptcy to recover property adjudged in different suits to belong to certain of defendants, and also property sold in satisfaction of judgments in attachment by other defendants (Davis v. Novotney, 15 S. D. 118, 87 N. W. 582).

Where several penalties sought to be recovered grow out of the violation of distinct provisions of law, neither the transaction nor the subject of action are the same or connected with each other. Motley v. Pratt, 13 Misc. (N. Y.) 758, 35 N. Y. Suppl. 184.

held, however, that where actions in tort and actions upon contract are embraced in separate subdivisions of the statute with regard to joinder, they cannot be joined, although arising out of the same transaction, such a joinder being prevented by the rule that the causes of action must fall within one of the specific classes.[64] It must appear clearly from the statement of facts that the causes of action arise from the same transaction; a general averment that they so arise is not sufficient.[65] In all cases where a joinder is permitted, the causes of action must affect all the parties.[66] In determining whether a count is on contract or in tort, the fact that other counts are in contract may be considered as signifying that it was not the intention of the pleader to join inconsistent counts.[67] Where there is an ambiguity as to whether an action is on contract or in tort for conversion, it is to be presumed to be based on contract.[68] The prayer for relief may also be material in the determination of the question.[69] The fact that, as between the tort-feasors, the liability is on contract, will not render an action against them jointly bad as based on a joinder of contract and tort.[70]

p. Legal and Equitable Causes — (1) IN GENERAL. The provisions of the codes abolishing the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity,[71] while it does not abrogate the distinction between legal and equitable rights, or legal and equitable remedies,[72] renders it proper in nearly all of the code states to join actions to enforce legal and equitable rights or to obtain legal and equitable relief,[73] provided usually that they arise out of the same transaction or transac-

76. Getty v. Hudson River R. Co., 6 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 269. See supra, I, B, 2, c.

77. Claussen v. Lafranz, 4 Greene (Iowa) 224, holding that, although several causes of action may be united in the same petition, they must be either on the law or chancery side of the court.

In the federal courts, since the distinction between law and equity is preserved (see ACTIONS, 1 Cyc. 736 note 89), causes instituted in a state court, which involve both legal and equitable claims as permitted by the state practice, must be recast on removal to a federal court so as to separate the legal and equitable causes of action. See REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

78. Bowman v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 86 Iowa 490, 53 N. W. 327 (holding that an action to restrain the laying of a railroad track in a street in front of plaintiff's premises could not be joined with one asking damages for a track already laid there, and an injunction to prevent further use of the street until such damages were paid); Faivre v. Gillman, 84 Iowa 573, 51 N. W. 46 (holding that actions against a person of unsound mind to recover judgment upon debts due by her, and to have her declared of unsound mind, and a guardian appointed, and to set aside a deed made by her to another defendant, as fraudulent, and subject the land conveyed to the satisfaction of the debts, cannot be joined in the same petition); Stevens v. Chance, 47 Iowa 602 (holding that a demand arising on a contract cannot be joined with a prayer to subject to the claim of plaintiff real estate fraudulently conveyed away by defendant).

Retention of suit to award complete relief see EQUITY, 16 Cyc. 106 et seq.

79. Hines v. Whitebreast Coal, etc., Co., 48 Iowa 296, in which mechanic's lien proceedings were joined with an action upon contract.

80. Phillips v. Gorham, 17 N. Y. 270; Porter v. International Bridge Co., 45 N. Y. App. Div. 416, 60 N. Y. Suppl. 819 [affirmed in 163 N. Y. 79, 57 N. E. 174]. See also Davis v. Morris, 36 N. Y. 569; Krakow v. Wille, 125 Wis. 284, 103 N. W. 1121, in which it was said the equitable issue might be tried first by the court and the legal issue then tried by a jury. Compare Alger v. Scoville, 6 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 131, Code Rep. N. S. 303. Contra, House v. Cooper, 16 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 292, holding that a cause of action against a corporation for equitable relief, which was triable only by a judge at special term, could not be joined with a claim for damages against directors and officers which, in the absence of a waiver by the parties, was triable only by a jury at the circuit.

Right to trial by jury generally see JURIES.

is left to his own election.[81] To authorize both legal and equitable relief in the same action, the complaint must contain allegations which would be sufficient to entitle plaintiff to both kinds of relief if sought in separate actions.[82]
