To

more than to any other man is due the existence of the Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure. His was the idea; his was the plan; and his has been the business ability and energetic management, as organizer and president of The American Law Book Company, which have made possible the successful publication of these volumes, which are therefore respectfully dedicated to him.

William Mack.

party relies upon either as a cause of action or defense or objection as the case may be.[4]

II. General Principles.

A. Effect of Codes.[5] All of the American codes of civil procedure provide that the mode of pleading in civil actions and the rules by which the sufficiency of the pleadings shall be determined shall be as prescribed by the code. It has been held that the rules of the common law respecting the sufficiency of pleadings are abrogated by the code, and whatever rules of common-law pleading are still applicable derive their authority wholly from the fact that the code has adopted them.[6] Other cases, however, hold that the common-law rules of pleading have been abrogated only in so far as they are inconsistent with the principles of the code; but otherwise they are to be deemed still in force.[7] The most characteristic changes introduced by the codes are the abolition of the common-law forms of action and the establishment of a single civil action for the enforcement of all rights, both legal and equitable, wherein the distinctions between actions at law and suits in equity are abolished.[8] And the general rules which determine the sufficiency of the pleadings are the same, whether the action be to enforce a legal or an equitable right,[9] except where the inherent differences between legal and equitable causes of action make necessary corresponding differences in the pleadings.[10] In certain of the code states separate law and equity dockets are still preserved, but this distinction between legal and equitable actions is scarcely more than nominal, and the rules of pleading are substantially the same as in other code states.[11] The codes do not change the rules as to the facts necessary to constitute a cause of action or to constitute a defense,[12] and they do not change the rule that in some cases a party must allege matter which he is not compelled to prove.[13]

B. Effect of Practice Acts. The various practice acts do not generally purport to establish a complete and well defined system of pleading, but are designed merely to abolish or modify certain technicalities of the common-law system.[14]

C. What Law Governs. In all matters of procedure courts are governed by the laws of the jurisdiction in which they sit, without any regard to the domicile of the parties, the origin of the right, or the country of the act.[15] In the United States courts the rules of pleading which exist in the State wherein the court sits are followed substantially in all actions at law,[16] but the courts are at liberty to depart therefrom in respect to details which in their judgment would tend to defeat the ends of justice.[17] And such rules of pleading will not be followed to the extent of allowing the union of legal and equitable causes and defenses.[18] A statute altering the rules of pleading is usually construed not to apply to actions pending at the time it takes effect.[19]

D. Necessity For Written Pleadings.[20] Under the ancient common-law practice the pleadings were all made orally in open court, and were transcribed by the officers of the court, upon the record.[21] While it is the almost universal modern practice in courts of record to file written pleadings, nevertheless, in the absence of a statute or rule of court, the parties may dispense with them if they are content to have their case presented and heard without written statements.[22] The essential thing is that the issue must appear by the record.[23] But such practice is loose and should not be encouraged.[24] Oral pleadings are governed by the same rules as written pleadings.[25]

E. What Constitute Pleadings. In the broadest sense of the term the pleadings include all proceedings from the complaint until issue is joined.[26] The term has been held to include demurrers,[27] petitions for rehearing,[28] and perhaps bills of particulars.[29] And an admission made in open court becomes a part of the pleading of the party making it.[30] But a petition for discharge of a bankrupt is not a pleading,[31] nor is the writ by which the action is commenced,[32] nor the indorsement on the writ, even where it is required that it consist of a statement of the nature of the claim made.[33] And mere memoranda written at the foot of a declaration form no part of it.[34]

F. Entitling. The name given to a pleading is not controlling, but its character is always to be determined by its allegations.[35]

Motion for new trial.— Pleadings are defined by Kan. Code, § 84, as "the written statements, by the parties, of the facts constituting their respective claims and defenses." Section 86 limits and defines the only pleadings permissible by the code as follows: "The only pleadings allowed are: First, the petition by the plaintiff; second, the answer or demurrer by the defendant; third, the demurrer or reply by the plaintiff; fourth, the demurrer by the defendant to the reply of the plaintiff." So that a motion for a new trial is not a pleading within such definition. McDermott v. Halleck, 65 Kan. 403, 69 Pac. 335.

Notice of special matter in infringement suit.— Notice of special matter in an action for the infringement of a patent is not a "pleading," and, instead of being put in the answer, should be served on the adverse party. Cottier v. Stimson, 20 Fed. 906.

Petition to foreclose mortgage.—A petition, Ga. Code, § 3962, to foreclose a mortgage on realty, is a pleading, within the statute of amendment, embraced in Code, § 3479. Ledbetter v. McWilliams, 90 Ga. 43, 15 S. E. 634.

The codes of procedure enumerate demurrers among the pleadings allowed. But notwithstanding this provision of the code, it was held in Merrill v. Pepperdine, 9 Ind. App. 416, 36 N. E. 921, that a demurrer is not, strictly speaking, a pleading. And in State v. Ryan, 2 Mo. App. 303, it was said that a demurrer was not a pleading, but merely a refusal to plead.

A stipulation "to plead in ten days" has been construed as not authorizing the filing of a special demurrer within that time. Welsh v. Blackwell, 14 N. J. L. 344.

Not a plea to the action.—A demurrer to the declaration is not classed among pleas to action, not only because it may be taken as well to any other part of the pleading as to the declaration but also because it neither affirms nor denies any matter of fact and is not therefore regarded as strictly a plea of any class but rather an excuse for not pleading. G. Subject-Matter of Allegations Generally — 1. Matters Judicially Noticed.[36] Facts of which the court will take judicial notice need not be alleged.[37] But judicial knowledge cannot aid a pleading unless it contains averments which bring into the case the controversy respecting which the resort to judicial knowledge is sought.[38]

2. Matters of Record.[39] It is not necessary, in pleading, to allege any fact which already appears upon the record in the same cause.[40] Nor can a party plead in contravention of such record.[41] Where a record in a different cause is relied upon it should be pleaded with a prout patet per recordum,[42] except where alleged merely as inducement;[43] and this is true whether the record be of the same or another court.[44] No facts can be pleaded against the validity of a record, although there may be against its operation,[45] nor can a defect in a record be supplied by averment.[46] In pleading judicial proceedings, for all ordinary purposes, copies are unnecessary.[47] In pleading the existence of a record in courts of general jurisdiction, the allegations should be certain and specific, and it is not sufficient to allege the same on information and belief.[48]

3. Matters Appearing in Other Pleadings. Facts which are alleged in other pleadings in the same cause may be made a part of a pleading by expressly adopting them.[49] Thus one defendant may adopt the answer of another defendant.[50] An intervener may adopt in his petition the allegations of plaintiff's petition,[51] and a defendant may adopt the allegations of plaintiff's petition in a supplemental cross bill.[52] But an answer cannot be made a part of a reply,[53] nor can the allegations of a pleading in another action be adopted[54] unless they are copied into the pleading.[55]

4. Matters Within Knowledge of Other Party. Where facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party, they may be alleged with less certainty than would otherwise be necessary,[56] or may be alleged on information and belief.[57] They may even be omitted entirely,[58] but this rule does not dispense with the necessity of alleging such facts as are essential to establish an apparent or prima facie right;[59] and when facts are omitted from a pleading under this rule, it is necessary for the pleading to show that they are not accessible.[60]

5. Matters of Presumption or Implication. There need be no direct allegation of a fact which otherwise sufficiently appears, or of a fact which is necessarily implied from other averments.[61] So where terms are used which in their legal significance include other terms, the latter will be deemed to appear in the pleading, although only the former are actually used.[62] And it need not in general be alleged that an act was lawfully done, where nothing to the contrary appears, since it will be presumed to have been done in a lawful manner.[63] But it is not sufficient that a fact may be inferable from the facts pleaded, where it is not necessarily implied.[64] And it has indeed been said that under the codes a fact must be pleaded unless the law raises a conclusive presumption of its existence from the facts stated.[65] In many cases, under a rule of liberal construction, courts have held pleadings sufficient which only inferentially and by reasonable presumption contained material averments, but such inference or presumption does not take the place of a positive averment for all purposes, and if objection to such pleadings is made seasonably and properly, it will be sustained.[66]

Action at law compared to a syllogism.— In New York, etc., R. Co. v. Hungerford, 75 Conn. 76, 77, 52 Atl. 487, the eourt used the following language in eomparing an aetion at law to a syllogism: "The major premise is a proposition of law, as, for instanee, whoever does eertain speeified acts to the injury of another is bound to pay that other the damage thus inflicted. This proposition is not pleaded, but is neeessarily involved in stating the facts alleged in the complaint. The minor premise is a statement of faets, as. for instanee, the defendant has done eertain aets (being the aets referred to in the proposition of law) to the damage of the plaintiff. These faets are alleged in the complaint. The eonelusion is the judgment or sentenee of the law, whieh neeessarily follows the establishment of the truth of the two premises."

The distinction between a conclusion of law and a conclusion of fact is thus expressed by the supreme court of Minnesota in Curtiss v. Livingston, 36 Minn. 380, 381, 31 N. W. 357: "It is urged that the clause we have quoted from the eomplaint is a statement of a conelusion of law, and not an allegation of fact. It is, for the purpose of pleading, rather a statement of an ultimate faet, or a eonelusion of faet, based on or arrived at by several minor faets, and the rules of law applicable to them. This, to avoid prolixity, is sometimes not only permissible, but necessary, in pleading. Thus, in ejeetment, it is suffieient for plaintiff to allege that he is the owner and entitled to the possession, and that the land is wrongfully withheld, without alleging in detail the partieular faets on which his elaiu of title is based,— Buekholz v. Grant, 15 Minn. 406; Wells v. Masterson, 6 Minn. 566; McClane v. White, 5 Minn. 178 — also that a mortgage was 'duly foreelosed,' without alleging partieulars,— Pinney v. Fridley, 9 Minn. 23 — also, in an aetion to enforee a lien for taxes passing under the statute to a purehaser at a void tax sale, that the taxes were 'duly levied and assessed.' Webb v. Bidwell, 15 Minn. 479. So an allegation that a party 'conveyed,' or that he 'eontraeted' or 'agreed,' without detailing the particular aets whieh it is elaimed resulted as a eonveyance, eontraet, or agreement, must usually be suffieient in pleading. Where the allegation is so indefinite that the opposite party may not be apprised of what is elaimed, the eourt may, perhaps, on a motion to make more definite and eertain, require a more full and detailed statement; but, as against a demurrer, a general allegation of an ultimate faet or eonelusion of faet is suffieient." Conclusions of fact distinguished.— The rule permitting eonclusions of law to be disregarded when the suffieieney of the faets pleaded to eonstitute a eause of aetion or defense is ealled in question does not apply to conclusions of faet. or a motion to make more definite and certain.[72] While in some cases it is held that a pleading which is made up partly of conclusions of law, instead of averments of facts, is not fatally defective,[73] the more general rule is to the contrary.[74] The question of whether a pleading states a legal conclusion or merely pleads facts according to their legal effect is sometimes difficult to determine.[75] But as a general rule it may be said that a statement is not to be deemed any the less a statement of fact because its ascertainment may depend upon some principles of law applicable to other facts and circumstances.[76]

b. Illustrations — (1) Claim or Indebtedness. A mere averment that a party has a claim or demand against another without any facts showing how the same arose is a conclusion of law.[77] So a general allegation that one party is indebted to another, or that a party owes or does not owe certain money, or that money is or is not due, is a mere conclusion of law,[78] as is an averment that a

Shirley v. Stephenson, 104 Ky. 518, 47 S. W. 581, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 767. And allegations in a complaint that at an election duly held the officers of a school-district were authorized to incur an indebtedness to erect a school-house, that a contract was entered into, and that party became liable,[79] that no attorney's fee is due under a mortgage,[80] that by default in interest the principal of certain bonds became due,[81] that a public fund exists which is applicable to a claim,[82] or that a trust deed is declared due under an option therein.[83]

(II) Contracts — (A) Generally.[84] An averment that certain writings constitute a contract states a legal conclusion,[85] as does an averment that there was a tacit understanding between parties,[86] that a person assumed and agreed to pay a mortgage debt,[87] or that a person is entitled to certain rights under a contract.[88]

(B) Promise in Express Contract. An averment that defendant promised to perform certain stipulations and covenants is an averment of fact.[89]

(C) Promise in Implied Contract. Under the code procedure, where facts are alleged from which the law will imply a promise, it is not necessary to allege a promise in terms, such allegation being a mere conclusion of law.[90] But under the common-law rule a promise is deemed an issuable fact and it is essential to allege it.[91] Where facts pleaded are such as to raise an implied contract, the fact that the pleader draws such conclusion from the facts will not cause the pleading to be regarded as averring an express contract.[92]

(D) Consideration. An averment that there was or was not a sufficient consideration, or any consideration, for a contract, is a legal conclusion.[93]

(E) Beneficiary. An allegation that a contract was entered into for the benefit the order sued upon was issued in payment of the indebtedness, present issuable facts, and not conclusions of law. Meyer v. Minnehaha County School Dist. No. 31, 4 S. D. 420, 57 N. W. 68.

of the residents and taxpayers within a fire district, where no individual taxpayers are named and it is not alleged that the contract was for their benefit, nor that it was intended to be for their benefit, is a mere legal conclusion.[94]

(F) Breach. An allegation that a party has violated the conditions and covenants of a contract,[95] has broken a contract,[96] has not performed according to agreement,[97] has failed to fulfil his obligations,[98] is in default,[99] has refused to carry out the terms of his agreement,[1] that an act constitutes a breach of contract,[2] that goods were different from those which the party agreed to purchase,[3] or that goods were delivered as described in and in conformity with a contract[4] is a mere conclusion of law. But where a contract provided for the giving of estimates as work progressed, an averment that an estimate was given for a less amount than defendant was entitled to, in violation of the contract, was held not to state a conclusion of law.[5]

(III) CONVERSION. An averment that defendant converted plaintiff's property to his own use is an averment of a fact, and not a conclusion of law.[6]

(IV) DUTY.[7] The general rule is that an allegation of duty, in terms, is a mere legal conclusion, and that the facts showing the existence of the duty should be alleged.[8] There are some authorities, however, which hold that in actions in averment of mistake,[13] or undue influence,[14] or conspiracy,[15] without averring the facts which constitute such fraud, mistake, undue influence, or conspiracy, is a conclusion of law and insufficient. But there are some cases which hold that in a plea or replication it is sufficient to allege fraud generally.[16] An allegation of defense relying on duress must specify the act or acts constituting the duress.[17] So an averment that a husband by threats and intimidations procured certain acts to be done by his wife is a mere conclusion of law.[18] that a garnishee so answered as to create the conviction that title had not passed to her,[22] that certain conduct conclusively shows an intention not to make certain payments,[23] or that a policy-holder was in good standing with an insurance company [24] are conclusions. So also is an allegation that a provision in a contract was a mere device to evade the usury law,[25] that a certain use was reasonable,[26] and that plaintiff had not given the bond "mentioned" in the contract.[27] But allegations that plaintiff became of ill repute,[28] that an animal was of a fierce and dangerous nature,[29] or was well cared for[30] have been held not to be conclusions. A statement in a complaint that a certain place is a public highway is sufficient, without further averment of the manner in which it became so.[31] And an averment of the unsoundness of a slave, in an action for a breach of warranty of soundness, was held to be a statement of fact, and not of a conclusion.[32]

(B) Purpose and Intent. Intention may be alleged directly as a fact.[33] An allegation that an assignment was made for the purpose of defeating creditors is not a conclusion of law.[34]

(C) Readiness and Willingness. An allegation of readiness and willingness to perform an act is not a conclusion but an averment of a fact.[35]

(D) Diligence. It is, as a rule, not sufficient to allege generally that due diligence has been used, but the facts constituting diligence must be set out.[36]

(E) Wrongfulness. A mere allegation that an act was wrongful, or that an act was wrongfully done, is a conclusion of law.[37]

(VIII) JURISDICTION. Averments of lack of jurisdiction must set up the facts;[38] and where the jurisdiction of a court of limited or inferior jurisdiction is averred, the facts necessary to show such jurisdiction should be alleged and not the mere conclusion that it existed.[39]

(IX) NOTICE AND KNOWLEDGE. An averment that there was or was not due and legal notice, without the facts constituting the notice, is a conclusion and is insufficient,[40] so an averment that a purchaser of trust property was charged with notice is a conclusion,[41] but an averment that there was no notice whatever is an averment of a fact,[42] as is an averment that a person had been notified of a particular fact.[43] An averment of knowledge does not state a conclusion of law.[44]

(x) Performance of Conditions. Where the performance of conditions precedent is essential to a right of action or defense, the facts constituting the performance must be stated, and it is not sufficient to allege generally that all the conditions were performed.[45] In a number of states, however, statutes allow the general averment of the performance of conditions precedent in a contract,[46] but such statutes are permissive merely, and it is equally proper in those states to allege the facts showing performance.[47] Such statutes usually apply only to contracts, and not to conditions imposed by law,[48] although in a few states they are not limited to conclusions in a contract.[49]

(xi) Personal Status and Relationship — (a) Settlement. An averment that a person has no settlement in a borough states a conclusion of law.[50]

(b) Heirship and Relationship. Some authorities hold that an allegation that a party is the heir or next of kin of another is a mere conclusion,[51] but others consider it an allegation of fact.[52]

(c) Capacity. A general averment of disability is a mere conclusion,[53] as is an averment that a woman was relieved of the disabilities of coverture,[54] and a pleading which proceeds upon the theory that a person was of unsound mind, without stating any facts indicating unsoundness, has been held demurrable.[55]

(d) Appointment and Authority of Officers. An averment that certain officers had or had not authority to do designated acts is in some jurisdictions held a mere conclusion,[56] but in others it is deemed an allegation of fact.[57] An averment that an officer was duly appointed has been held to be a conclusion of law.[58] An averment that a judge was disqualified is the mere statement of a legal conclusion.[59]

(xii) Real Party in Interest. An averment that a party is or is not the real party in interest, without facts showing whether or not such is the case, is insufficient, being a mere legal conclusion.[60]

(xiii) Ratification. A mere averment that a party ratified an act, without facts showing what was done, is a conclusion of law.[61] But a statement that a contract was renewed, ratified, and affirmed has been held not to be a statement of a conclusion.[62]

(xiv) Release, Waiver, Abandonment, or Forfeiture. An allegation that one party released another from liability is a mere legal conclusion.[63] In some jurisdictions an allegation that conditions were waived is considered a conthat plaintiff has a special ownership in certain property;[82] or that a note is a wife's separate estate[83] are conclusions of law. But a general allegation that plaintiff is the owner of the property is usually held sufficient, at least on demurrer,[84] and the same rule has been applied to an averment that plaintiff is lessee,[85] or that title is derived by gift.[86] So an averment that a way existed appurtenant to certain land has been held an averment of fact,[87] as is an averment that possession is lawful.[88] A vested estate in possession is properly pleaded by alleging the facts showing such possession.[89] In pleading a judicial conveyance the decree and deed must be averred.[90] An averment that a person was invited upon premises is a

But see Jones v. Rogers, 85 Miss. 802, 38 So. 742, holding that an allegation in a bill to remove clouds from title that complainants' ancestor, under an execution sale to whom complainants claim, was at the time of his death seized and possessed in fee simple of certain land, was merely a legal conclusion and a statement of constructive possession, not of actual possession.

An allegation of ownership in the present tense does not render a pleading insufficient where other facts are alleged inferentially showing ownership at time of injury (Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Harper, 11 Ind. App. 481, 37 N. E. 41); and where ownership is alleged on a day prior to the injury, it will be presumed that it continued during the time of the injury (Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Harper, supra). See also Gould v. Eagle Creek School Dist., 7 Minn. 203, for a somewhat similar holding. In an action against an insurance agent for breach of contract to procure insurance on plaintiff's property, which has been destroyed by fire, where the complaint alleges that plaintiff was, when the contract was made, and "now is" the owner of the property, it sufficiently shows that plaintiff owned the property when the loss occurred especially when the objection is not raised till that fact has been proven without objection. Lindsay v. Pettigrew, 5 S. D. 500, 59 N. W. 726.

An averment of ownership as heir is insufficient in the absence of allegations showing the proceedings necessary to the vesting of title. Buttles v. De Baun, 116 Wis. 323, 93 N. W. 5. Without authority of law.—It has been held that an allegation that an order directing the opening of a road was without authority of law, without jurisdiction, null and void, was the statement merely of a legal conclusion. Carlson v. Spokane County, 38 Wash. 616, 80 Pac. 795.

In setting forth decrees of a court of probate, or an execution from a court of general jurisdiction, it is sufficient to allege its legality generally. Leland v. Kingsbury, 24 Pick. (Mass.) 315; Hamilton v. Lyman, 9 Mass. 14.

Due performance of act.— Several cases have sustained the propriety of alleging that an act was duly performed. Hatheway v. Reed, 127 Mass. 136; Newton v. Highland Imp. Co., 62 Minn. 436, 64 N. But see Kenneally v. Chicago, 220 Ill. 485, 77 N. E. 155, holding that an averment that a patrolman had been duly appointed stated a mere conclusion. So it has been held that an averment that an act has been duly performed, while ordinarily but a legal conclusion, is nevertheless sufficient in the absence of a special demurrer or objection on that ground to authorize evidence on the issues. Pacific Paving Co. v. Diggins, 4 Cal. App. 240, 87 Pac. 415. Where the matter is collateral to the essential fact it suffices to allege generally that an election was duly held, or that an officer was duly elected and qualified, assuming to act in the particular capacity involved; but where the fact itself must appear it is insufficient to say that it had been duly performed, without stating how, the allegation being a mere conclusion of law. State v. Malheur County Ct., 46 Oreg. 519, 81 Pac. 368.

a cause of action or defense based thereon; otherwise it is a mere averment of evidence.[45] And it is bad pleading to set out an instrument in hæc verba without a statement of its legal effect, where the result is to leave uncertain the issue intended,[46] or where the length of the instrument will render the pleading verbose and redundant.[47] In pleading an instrument according to its legal effect such effect must be correctly stated,[48] although verbal inaccuracy will not vitiate if the instrument is correctly described as to its legal operation.[49] So, where by statute the same legal effect is given to an instrument as if it were sealed, the instrument may be declared on as sealed.[50] Where an instrument is set out in terms, it is for the court to determine its legal effect, and any averments which the pleader adds respecting the legal effect of the instrument will be regarded as surplusage.[51] If the writing declared on contains abbreviations and incomplete terms, extrinsic averments may be employed to make it intelligible.[52] When an instrument is incorporated into a complaint, it must show upon its face in direct terms, and not by implication, all the facts which the pleader would have to allege had he elected to set it forth by averment.[53] But it is not indispensable that the words of the writing should be accompanied by words of professed recital, for if they appear to be the words of the instrument the court will construe them as such.[54] The recitals in an instrument incorporated into a pleading are not equivalent to averments.[55] At common law, when a statute made writing essential to a matter to which writing was not necessary at common law, it was not necessary to plead that it was in writing.[56] But where a thing was originally made by statute and was required to be in writing, it must be pleaded to have been in writing with all the circumstances required by the act.[57]

b. Exhibits. Another method of pleading a written instrument is to attach it as an exhibit, under statutes authorizing that practice. But this subject will be treated in a subsequent part of this article.[58] At common law a writing could not be referred to and thus be made a part of a declaration, as was the practice in chancery.[59]

822. It is never necessary to declare in the precise words of a written promise. It is always allowable, and often necessary, to declare according to their legal effect and import. c. Setting Forth Part of Instrument. Only so much of an instrument need be set forth as relates to the point in question.[60] At common law, if any part of a deed were omitted in the declaration which defendant conceived would, if shown to the court, induce a construction in his favor in point of law, the proper mode was for defendant to pray oyer, and, after setting the deed out in hæc verba, demur, as he was thereby enabled to compare one part of the deed with another and show from the whole context the legal effect of it.[61]

d. Connecting Several Instruments. If several instruments are relied upon as constituting one agreement, the pleading must show that they are to be read as one instrument.[62]

e. Date. The date of the instrument should be alleged,[63] and if there is no date it may be declared on as executed on a certain day without stating that it has no date.[64] If the only materiality of the date be that it was after a certain other event, it may be so alleged.[65]

f. Name. The name which the pleader gives to the instrument is not material, and if it is wrongly named the pleading is not thereby rendered insufficient.[66]

g. Statutory Provisions. In some states it is required by statute that a copy of the instrument upon which an action is founded be set out in the pleading, attached thereto, or filed in the case.[67] And in other states the statutes provides that in an action or defense founded on an instrument for the payment of money

9. Falsity, Impertinence, and Scandal. These properly are terms belonging to equity practice, and are not ordinarily used in respect to actions at law.[69] But they are occasionally employed by the courts in states which are under the code procedure.[70] A pleading known to be false when filed is void.[71] A pleading alleging that every allegation of the opposite party is "corruptly false," should be removed from the files.[72]

10. Surplusage. Surplusage is matter which is unnecessary either to the substance or form of the pleading, and which if stricken out would leave a good pleading,[73] or, as otherwise stated, which consists in the allegation of matter so wholly foreign and irrelevant that no allegation whatever upon the subject is necessary.[74] Matter of this nature is deemed not to vitiate a pleading,[75] and will be ordinarily disregarded,[76] and while it may be properly stricken out on action,[90] an incorrect legal effect stated respecting an instrument recited in the pleading,[91] or a bad count or defense joined with a good one[92] have been held to constitute surplusage.

H. Form of Allegations — 1. Pleading According to Legal Effect. At common law it is necessary to plead facts according to their legal effect or operation,[93] but the usual provision of the codes is for a plain and concise statement of the facts upon which the pleader relies.[94] This provision, however, is construed to require the pleading of the ultimate facts merely, as distinguished from evidentiary facts.[95] And in most cases the pleader will be permitted to state the facts constituting his cause of action, either as they actually exist or according to their legal effect.[96] Ultimate facts of necessity are conclusions drawn from intermediate and evidentiary facts;[97] but legal conclusions[98] cannot be pleaded as ultimate facts.[99] The rule permitting pleading according to legal effect has been applied, among other instances, to allow the pleading of the legal effect of a verbal contract,[1] or of a written instrument,[2] or the allegation of the act of the servant or agent of a person as the act of the person himself.[3]

"As a general rule, no allegation which is descriptive of the identity of that which is legally essential to the claim or charge, can ever be rejected; and, if an immaterial allegation limit and confine that which is material, the latter can never be available to any greater extent; for such an averment is always descriptive. 3 Stark. Ev. 1539–1550. State v. Copp, 15 N. H. 212. In other words, the substance of the rule is that, unless you may not only reject the immaterial allegation, but every allegation or averment which it goes to identify by description or to limit or define, an immaterial averment can not be rejected as surplusage; so that, if any material averment is thus described, limited or defined, the indictment, declaration or other pleading, must fall without proof of the immaterial averment." See Page v. Freeman, 19 Mo. 421, holding that since the adoption of the code the legal effect need not be stated.

2. Directness and Positiveness — a. In General. The essential facts of a cause of action or defense should be unequivocally alleged, and where the averments are contingent and conjectural, the pleading will be held bad.[4] Facts so alleged are not admitted by failure to deny them.[5] It is not sufficient to allege that facts are alleged to exist.[6] Nor should facts be set forth by innuendo.[7] Matter pleaded with a videlicet, when material, is regarded as a direct and positive averment, which may be traversed.[8]

b. Hypothetical Pleading. Hypothetical pleading is generally bad;[9] but in some instances to allow a defendant to plead all his defenses,[10] or where a defendant can conscientiously plead several defenses under oath only in that form,[11] or where he has no knowledge or information concerning the matters alleged in the complaint sufficient to form a belief,[12] it may be permitted. The remedy for hypothetical pleading under the code procedure is a motion to make more definite and certain [13] or a motion to strike,[14] although in some cases a demurrer has been held proper.[15] At common law the remedy was a demurrer.[16]

c. Pleading by Way of Recital. Material facts must be alleged directly and not by way of recital.[17] But facts which are alleged by way of inducement merely, and are not of the gist of the action, may be alleged with a quod cum.[18] Nor does it seem to have been deemed a defect in a declaration on contract at common law that the averments were made under a whereas, at least on general demurrer.[19] But the participial form of averment in an affidavit is sufficient.[20]

Giving color in pleading is giving to your adversary a title which is defective, but not so obviously so that it would be apparent to one not skilled in the law, it must be such as would perplex a layman; it, therefore, draws the consideration of the question from the jury to the court, which is the object of the pleading. d. Argumentative Pleading. Facts should not be alleged argumentatively, for the reason that when so alleged no material issue can be raised respecting them.[21] Pleadings which violate this rule are bad,[22] either on motion,[23] or on general[24] or special demurrer,[25] but not at the trial.[26]

3. Certainty, Definiteness, and Particularity — a. In General. The averments in a pleading must be clear and unequivocal.[27] Material facts should be averred with certainty.[28] A pleader is not at liberty to leave his pleading open to different constructions and then take his choice between them.[29] Such circumstantial accuracy is necessary as will apprise the opposite party of what is intended to be proved on the trial.[30] But no greater particularity is required than the Effect of practice acts.— In Read v. Smith, 1 Allen (Mass.) 519, 520, Chapman, J., said: "The rule of pleading was, before the practice act, that the declaration must allege all the circumstances necessary for the support of the action, and contain a full, regular and methodical statement of the injury which the plaintiff has sustained, with such precision, certainty and clearness that the defendant, knowing what he is called upon to answer, may be able to plead a direct and unequivocal plea; and that the jury may be able to give a complete verdict upon the issue; and the court, consistently with the rules of law, may give a certain and distinct judgment upon the premises. . . . The practice act has made no change in this respect; for although by this act the facts may be briefly stated, yet all the facts must be stated which are necessary to constitute the cause of action."

Where the only matters concerning which the pleading is uncertain are peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party, the latter cannot be heard to complain thereof.[35] And where a subject comprehends a multiplicity of matters, in order to avoid prolixity the law allows general pleading.[36] The fact that a complaint is indefinite is not conclusive as to its uncertainty,[37] as where the averments necessary to certainty are supplied by conclusive inference.[38] Where a word employed in a pleading is capable of two meanings and the sense in which it is used is uncertain, the pleading is ambiguous.[39] At common law, where the power to do an act was originally granted by statute, in pleading such act it must be shown that it was done according to the direction of the statute and of every subsequent statute relative to the subject.[40] Where it is

b. Alternative Allegations.[43] As a general rule facts should not be alleged in the alternative.[44] But where the facts are of such a nature that the party pleading them cannot well allege them otherwise than in the alternative, the pleading is not thereby rendered bad, at least on general demurrer.[45] By statute in some jurisdictions a party is permitted to allege alternatively the existence of facts, if he states that one of them is true and that he does not know which of them is true.[46] The mere fact that a disjunctive is used will not in all cases cause the

Where the pleader has no knowledge as to which of two sets of facts, under either of which the opposite party would be equally liable, exists, he may properly allege them in the alternative. Suppl. 829, sustaining an allegation that a corporate officer "made or authorized to be made, or knowingly or negligently permitted to be made" an unauthorized and unlawful payment of a portion of the corporation's funds. W. 764; Taylor Cotton-Seed Oil, etc., Co. v. Pumphrey, (Tex. Civ. App. 1895) 32 S. W. 225. In Munn v. Cook, 8 N. Y. Suppl. 698, 24 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 314, 332, the rule was stated as follows: "There is a class of cases in which for no fault of his own, and usually by fault of the defendant, the plaintiff does not know which of two absolutely inconsistent grounds he may succeed in proving, either of which will entitle him to recover; as in the case of fraud or mistake, or a case of suspected agency for an undisclosed principal. If it is important to plaintiff's policy, as it usually is, especially in such classes of cases, to obtain a sworn answer, he must make a sworn complaint; and he cannot, even on information and belief, swear to inconsistent facts. Therefore he cannot state such inconsistent grounds of recovery in separate causes of action, each alleged without qualification. He must state them, if at all, in a single cause of action and in the alternative. A rule which allows plaintiff to state essential allegations in the alternative, is obviously capable of much abuse, because by multiplying alternatives he may leave the defendant quite in the dark as to the facts the latter must be prepared to meet. But within limits which will exclude such abuses, the right of the plaintiff to allege alternative grounds is now recognized by the highest authority, and is not without sanction in the lower courts and courts of other jurisdictions."

But this does not authorize the averment of liability on the part of one or the other of two defendants (Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Ft. Wayne Electric Co., 108 Ky. 113, 55 S. W. 918, 21 Ky. L. pleading to be construed as in the alternative.[47] So it has been held that where an act is averred to have been done by a person or by his agent acting within the scope of his authority the pleading is not bad, at least where the objection is not presented by demurrer.[48] Qualifying averments which are legal equivalents may be alleged in the alternative.[49] A motion is the proper remedy,[50] or a special demurrer.[51]

4. Consistency or Repugnancy. The different allegations in a pleading should be consistent with one another,[52] and if inconsistent or repugnant averments appear they may be stricken out on motion.[53] But if the allegations are so utterly repugnant as to destroy one another, so that no cause of action or defense remains, a general demurrer will lie against the pleading.[54] Inconsistent matter laid under a videlicet may be rejected.[55] The test of inconsistency is whether the proof of one averment tends to disprove another.[56] The fact that inconsistent allegations as to

Illustrations.—An averment that plaintiffs are citizens of New York, to wit, of Illinois, where diverse citizenship confers jurisdiction, is repugnant (Leavitt v. Cowles, 15 Fed. Cas. No. 8,171, 2 McLean 491), and an allegation that certain judgments were "entered" by confession by the clerk in vacation coupled with an allegation that they were rendered by the court in term-time and subsequently entered in vacation (Abbott v. Yuma County, 18 Colo. 6, 30 Pac. 1031), and a declaration which styles the plaintiff "executor" in the commencement and subsequently avers that he took out letters of administration (Rowan v. Lee, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 97), and a claim to recover a slave as property inherited from plaintiff's mother, or in case the court should consider the slave as community property, a claim to be decreed the owner of one half of the slave (Wood v. Harrell, 14 La. Ann. 61). Averments that a transfer of property is a simulation and that it is a donation in disguise are inconsistent (Brown v. Brown, 30 La. Ann. 966), as is an allegation alleging indebtedness as executor of the will of a person named, and also as trustee (Brown v. Brown, supra), or allegations that certain real estate does and does not belong to a community (Bourdette v. Burke, 119 La. 478, 44 So. 270). An averment that a note has been given for an entire insurance premium is inconsistent with another averment setting up default in another note for a similar amount given as a premium note. Farmers, etc., Mut. Ins. Co. v. Koons, 120 Ill. App. 303. But there is no inconsistency in averring that the grantee of real estate is a fictitious person and that the conveyance was made to such grantee to hinder and defraud creditors (Purkitt v. Polack, 17 Cal. 327); nor is an allegation that the charter of a bank was surrendered inconsistent with an allegation that it was continued by virtue of the several acts for the settlement of the bank's affairs (Savage v. Walshe, 26 Ala. 619); nor is the allegation of an intervener that he owns a note inconsistent with an allegation that the claim of ownership of plaintiff is fraudulent and simulated (Brown v. Brown, 22 La. Ann. 475); nor are allegations of fraud and simulation inconsistent (Chaffe v. Scheen, 34 La. Ann. 684; Johnson v. Mayer, 30 La. Ann. 1203). Averments that a signature is genuine are not inconsistent with an averment that a party is estopped to deny such signature. Eikenberry v. Edwards, 71 Iowa 82, 32 N. W. 183. An averment that plaintiff purchased certain lots designated by number is not inconsistent with another averment that he bought other numbered lots represented as being within the boundaries of those first mentioned. Castenholz v. Heller, 82 Wis. 30, 51 N. W. 432. The fact that where it is obvious that an instrument did not state its full or true consideration, the fact that it is set out does not render it inconsistent with an allegation of the true consideration. Wallace v. Skinner, 15 Wyo. 233, 88 Pac. 221. An admission that plaintiffs are universal legatees of a person de-

the cause of an accident are made, it has been held, will not render a complaint for negligence defective.[57]

5. Materiality. Only material facts should be averred in a pleading, although facts alleged by way of inducement are liberally construed in this respect.[58] A material allegation is one which is essential to the cause of action or defense, and which cannot be stricken from the pleading without leaving it insufficient.[59] But in actions brought under the code procedure there is a difference in this respect between those of a legal and those of an equitable nature. In the former the material facts are strictly "issuable," in that the action will fail if any one of them is not proved. But in actions of an equitable nature this is not generally true. The facts proper to be alleged frequently cover a wide range, and are all material, in that each one has some bearing and effect upon the relief to be granted, but they are not "issuable" in the sense that a material issue can be raised by the denial of any one of them.[60]

6. Irrelevance and Redundance. A pleading should be confined to a statement of the facts which the party seeks to prove by evidence at the trial.[61] An irrelevant allegation in a pleading is one which has no substantial relation to the controversy between the parties to the action and cannot affect the decision of the court.[62] In code procedure it corresponds to the impertinency of the old chancery practice.[63] Facts which are clearly irrelevant will be stricken out on motion,[64] but great latitude should be allowed, especially in proceedings of an equitable nature, in setting forth allegations which are in good faith deemed important.[65] Irrelevant matter does not render a pleading demurrable.[66] Facts which properly constitute matter of inducement or introduction are not irrelevant, ceased are not inconsistent with an averment that another person is testamentary executor and that an agreement exists between such person and defendant, operating as a bar of the action. St. Aubin v. Crevier, 7 Quebec Pr. 403.

although they are not issuable.[67] Redundancy consists in the needless repetition of material allegations or in the insertion of irrelevant matter, so that irrelevant matter is always redundant, although redundant averments may not be irrelevant.[68] The proper remedy for redundancy is a motion to strike.[69] Allegations which are merely evidentiary may be stricken as irrelevant;[70] but matters which are of an elementary as well as an evidentiary character may be properly pleaded.[71] The steps in a transaction may, without irrelevancy or redundancy, be averred instead of pleading the transaction according to its legal effect.[72] An averment in a complaint for the purpose of presenting a federal question cannot be stricken as irrelevant.[73]

7. Language and Clerical Construction — a. Grammatical Errors. Bad grammar will not vititate a pleading if its meaning is clear.[74]

b. Clerical Errors. Mere clerical mistakes, such as the use of one word or one name for another, where there is and can be no doubt as to what word the pleader intended to use, will not render a pleading bad,[75] at least on general demurrer,[76] or after pleading to the merits.[77] But a mistake in the volume and page of a record has been held fatal.[78]

c. Abbreviations. Abbreviations may be employed where they are clear and intelligible.[79] Thus dates and sums may be expressed in figures instead of words,[80] names of months may be abbreviated,[81] and common abbreviations used in legal documents may be employed.[82] But the practice is not to be commended,[83] and where insensible or unusual abbreviations are used they have been held to vitiate the pleading.[84]

d. Technical Terms. In pleadings drawn under codes of procedure, the terms employed should be those used in the codes, rather than technical common-law terms.[85]

e. English Language. It is the rule in the United States that the pleadings must be in the English language,[86] but it is nevertheless entirely proper to make use of such Latin words or abbreviations as "versus," [87] "vs." [88] "Anno Domini," [89] and "etc." [90] And the use of Arabic figures does not offend against the rule.[91]

f. Erasures and Interlineations. While it is a better practice not to allow pleadings to be defaced by erasures and interlineations, such alterations are made necessary by the hurry of business, and they will not of themselves render a pleading bad.[92]

g. Folioing. Under the statutes or rules of court in some states, when a pleading is in excess of a certain length it must be folioed.[93]

and two meanings present themselves that construction is to be adopted which is most unfavorable to the party pleading,[96] on the theory that it will be presumed that the pleader has stated his case as strongly as he can.[97] But this rule does not require such a construction to be given, where the pleading may be construed in two or more different ways, as will make the pleading absurd,[98] nor so as to wrest an averment from the ordinary meaning and acceptation of the language used,[99] the rule being that the pleading must receive a fair and reasonable construction.[1] And the rule does not apply where matters are pleaded that are peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party,[2] nor can a party take advantage of it after pleading over.[3]

2. Under the Codes. The common-law rule as to construing pleadings most strongly against the pleader has been either abrogated or at least much relaxed in the code states by statutes requiring pleadings to be liberally construed.[4] Under this rule a pleading is usually construed, even on demurrer, to allege all the facts be given their ordinary and popular meaning.[6] But even under this code rule, while the pleader is to be given the benefit of every allegation made or reasonably implied from the language employed, the principle at the base of the common-law rule that the party is presumed to have stated his case as strongly as the facts will justify still prevails.[7] And a fact is not well pleaded when it is to be inferred only as a conclusion from other facts stated which are not inconsistent with an opposite conclusion.[8] So this provision of the codes is held in some states to apply only in matters of form, and when a pleading is susceptible of two meanings that which is most unfavorable to the pleader must be accepted;[9] and many cases hold that on demurrer or motion a pleading under the code will be strictly construed against the pleader.[10]

Construction more liberal on demurrer than on motion.— In Chambers v. Hoover, 3 Wash. Terr. 107, 110, 13 Pac. 466, the court said: "A suitor is no longer to be turned out of court, if by making all reasonable intendments in his favor enough can be seized hold of in his pleadings to show that he has rights which ought to be enforced. He may be required on motion to conform his statement to the rules of good pleading, and if he refuse, may be turned out of court; but as against a demurrer, the office of which is to raise a substantial issue on the law of the case, and not on the law of practice and pleading, evidentiary facts, and even inferences from averments amounting to mere conclusions of law, will be considered in his favor."

4. Parts of Pleading Considered.[15] A pleading must be construed as an entirety,[16] including the caption.[17] And where a petition refers to a former petition the court may regard the two as constituting one petition.[18] So where different pleadings have been interposed by a party, allegations in one pleading should be construed together and in connection with allegations in other pleadings of the party.[19] But if an action based on a tort is brought against two defendants, allegations against one only cannot be considered in determining whether the complaint states a cause of action against the other.[20] So the title of the action should not be allowed to control the averments of the complaint.[21] The prayer for relief may be considered,[22] but it is not controlling.[23] So the writ may some-

"The whole frame-work is in fraud, and the cause of action, as set forth, is based upon the false and fraudulent representations of the defendant. . . . It was error in the court to change the form of the action, by striking out or treating as surplusage the principal allegations — those which characterize and give form to the action — because, perchance, there may be facts stated by way of inducement spelled out, which would, when put in proper form, have sustained an action in assumpsit." Barnes v. Quigley, 59 N. Y. 265, 267.

no ground for a demurrer.[32] In case it is doubtful, from the facts alleged, upon what theory plaintiff seeks to recover, the prayer may be looked to as an aid in determining the question, but it is not conclusive.[33] And it has also been held that the summons should determine the matter in case of doubt.[34] But that a certain theory was evidently contemplated by the person who drew the pleading is of no avail as against the theory shown by the facts alleged.[35] Where it is doubtful whether the cause of action stated is in contract or tort, it is presumed to be the former rather than the latter.[36] Plaintiff cannot try his case on one theory and then, after finding himself unable to prove it, shift to another.[37]

6. Specific Averments Control General. Where both general and specific allegations are made respecting the same matter, the latter control.[38] Thus where there is a general charge of negligence followed by an enumeration of specific facts, it is generally held that the specific facts control, and limit the evidence which is admissible.[39] So also where a written instrument is set out in hæc verba, the terms of the instrument as so set forth control general allegations as to its legal effect.[40]

7. Construction Adopted by Parties. Where it is apparent that both parties have placed a certain construction upon a pleading, that construction will usually be adopted by the court if possible.[41]

8. Facts Not Alleged — a. In General. A material fact, if not alleged, is presumed not to exist.[42]

b. Failure to Allege That Contract Is in Writing. The general rule is that where a complaint is based on a contract or agreement and it is silent as to whether the agreement was oral or written, it will be presumed that it was in writing,[43] although there is authority to the contrary.[44]

9. Averment of Existing Fact Construed as Continuing. Where a fact is averred as existing, and it is continuous in its nature, it is to be construed as continuing unless the contrary is averred.[45]

10. Particular Words and Phrases — a. In General. Particular words and phrases in a pleading should be construed according to their usual meaning in connection with the apparent intention of the pleader.[46]

b. Name of Instrument or Act. Where the character of an instrument appears from the allegations of a pleading, a wrong name given to it will not be construed as rendering the pleading unintelligible.[47] And the name given to an act is of no importance in a pleading.[48] So conclusions as to the legal effect of statutes or

Time to which allegations relate.— The allegation of the complaint, in an action by a creditor of a firm seeking to follow its property into the hands of purchasers, that the firm is insolvent, raises no question as to its insolvency at the time of the sale. Where the same words are used in a statute, and the declaration under it, the court will construe them as having the same meaning in both cases. Gebhart v. Adams, 23 Ill. 397, 76 Am. Dec. 702. So where the sufficiency of a complaint is brought before an appellate court, they take notice of a public statute, and, if there is a conflict between averments of the complaint and the statutes, it is the court's duty to interpret the former so as to make them read as if set out in connection with the provisions of the statute. resolutions will not be considered[49] but reference must be had to the statutes or resolutions themselves.

c. Words of Reference. Neither a pronoun nor the word "said" is to be construed as referring to the last noun preceding it unless the meaning requires it.[50] The word "thereupon," which ordinarily marks the succession of events, does not necessarily exclude the existence of other facts than those previously recited;[51] and the word may be taken to mean "in consideration thereof" where the context would seem to require such a meaning.[52]

d. Words Signifying Contractual Relations. An averment of a "settlement" means that the parties agreed upon a balance;[53] an "arrangement" entered into amounts to the averment of a contract;[54] an "understanding" will be construed to mean a contract;[55] "transfer and assign" a transfer by writing;[56] "indorse," to put a name on the back of a paper;[57] bonds "issued and sold" means negotiated and in the hands of third parties;[58] "bargained and sold" avers a sale.[59]

11. Construction of Reply. The complaint and reply should be construed together when not repugnant,[60] and even on demurrer the complaint and also the answer may be looked to in construing the reply.[61] Although the reply is vague and uncertain, it will be presumed that it was designed to fairly respond to the allegations of the answer, and will be liberally construed on that theory.[62]

J. Conclusiveness of Allegations or Admissions as Against Pleader[63]

—1. In General. The general rule is that parties are bound by, and estopped to controvert, allegations or admissions in their own pleadings.[64] Nor can a party

Facts admitted are equivalent to findings.— Miller v. Head Camp W. W., 45 Oreg. 192, 77 Pac. 83.

The general principle applies on appeal and error, and a party cannot assume a position in the appellate court inconsistent with the allegations in his pleadings. Barbour v. Whitlock, 4 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 180; Payne v. Hardesty, 14 S. W. 348, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 336; Candler v. Stange, 53 Mich. 479, 19 N. W. 154.

Exceptions to rule.—Where, however, a fact alleged in the complaint is expressly denied in the answer and issue is joined thereon, neither party can rest upon the allegation of the other, but the issue must be decided according to the facts appearing in the case. the party using it.[66] And the allegations or admissions in one count or defense are not conclusive upon a party on the trial of another and distinct count or defense.[67]

2. Conclusions and Immaterial Matter. A party is not bound by averments or admissions of immaterial facts,[68] even though immaterial only at the stage of the pleadings when made,[69] nor by admissions or averments of legal conclusions.[70] Thus a party is not bound by admissions as to the legal effect of a written instrument,[71] nor by the name given to it.[72]

3. Admissions Through Ignorance or Mistake. Admissions or allegations made inconsiderately by mistake or inadvertence, or in ignorance of the facts, will not operate as an estoppel where no prejudice has resulted, and may be withdrawn or repudiated,[73] unless the ignorance was the result of gross negligence;[74] but this does not apply where the mistake is made respecting the legal effect of facts.[75]

4. Pleadings Withdrawn, Abandoned, or Amended.[76] Generally averments or admissions in pleadings subsequently withdrawn, abandoned, or stricken out are not conclusive against the pleader.[77] So a party is not concluded in respect to an amended pleading by an allegation or admission in the original pleading,[78] but such admissions may be introduced in evidence against the pleader subject to contradiction or explanation.[79] It follows that a party may, where such an amendment is allowed, contradict, by amendment, allegations in former pleadings,[80] although it has been held that where such allegations constitute distinct items of proof as distinguished from ultimate facts, the party is bound by them notwithstanding his amendment.[81]

5. Persons Bound. Only the pleader and his privies are bound by the allegations and admissions in a pleading.[82] The admissions of an executor or administrator as such bind the estate he represents,[83] but do not bind him personally;[84] and heirs are estopped by admissions of the intestate.[85] Nominal defendants cannot, by their admissions, bind the real defendants.[86] Co-parties not joining

Amendment after reversal.— An averment in a petition that defendant received certain moneys "in trust and for the use and benefit of plaintiff" for a specified purpose is not such an admission as will estop plaintiff from amending the pleadings after reversal and proving to the contrary on another trial. Iowa County v. Huston, 43 Iowa 485.

An affirmative allegation of negligence in one action will not estop plaintiff to amend his petition in a subsequent action, by alleging his ignorance of defendant's negligence until after the institution of the first action, and that because of such ignorance he was induced to enter into an accord and satisfaction with defendant. in the pleading are not bound,[87] nor is the admission of one partner conclusive upon another.[88]

6. Admissions Considered as an Entirety.[89] A party wishing to avail himself of an admission or averment in a pleading of the opposing party must accept it as an entirety.[90]

III. Declaration, Complaint, Petition, or Statement.

A. In General — 1. Definitions. Various terms are used in the several jurisdictions to designate the first pleading filed by plaintiff. At common law it was called a declaration,[91] under the codes it is in some states called a complaint [92] and in others a petition,[93] while in a few states it is called a statement.[94] An information is the name usually given to a complaint preferred on behalf of the state in a civil cause.[95]

2. Statutory Provisions. In most states there are statutes which define with more or less particularity the form and requisites of the declaration or other pleading which contains the statement of plaintiff's cause of action. Some of these statutes are limited in scope and vary the common-law practice only in certain specified particulars.[96] The codes, so-called, are more radical. The common provision of the codes of procedure is that the complaint shall contain a plain and concise statement of the facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action, without unnecessary repetition.[97] It follows that a pleading which satisfies all the require-

Does not include verification.— In the ordinary use of these legal terms, a verification forms no part of a complaint. ments of the statute states a good cause of action.[98] Substantial compliance with the statute is sufficient.[99] But the allegations necessary in a given case are generally the same as at common law.[1] And the code rule requiring the allegation of facts is generally held not to render invalid a declaration framed in substantially the common-law form of indebitatus assumpsit.[2] Short forms of declarations or complaints on certain written instruments are in many states specially authorized by statute.[3] Where a statute, in prescribing a form of declaration, dispenses with an averment which would otherwise be necessary, the statute is deemed to stand in place of the averment.[4] The mechanical arrangement of the pleading is a matter to be determined by the taste of the pleader, subject only to the express limitations imposed by statute.[5] sufficient.[6] And generally a defect in the title is deemed a merely formal defect,[7] which is waived by answering to the merits.[8] A requirement as to the style of process does not apply to a declaration, even where the action is commenced by service of declaration with rule to plead indorsed.[9] Where a declaration is wrongly entitled, the remedy is by motion.[10] Under the code provisions abolishing the form of distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, it has been held immaterial whether the complaint is entitled as at law or in equity.[11] The caption is no part of a count proper.[12]

4. Designation of Court. The court in which the action is brought should be designated with substantial accuracy,[13] but technical defects will not render the pleading insufficient.[14] It is sufficient to state it in the caption.[15] Where, however, the pleading wholly fails to indicate the court, there is no jurisdiction,[16] and the proceedings will be set aside.[17] And where a pleading is required to be addressed to the court, such address is an essential part of the pleading,[18] and it is a fatal error to address it to a court different from that in which it is filed.[19]

5. Designation of Term. The first pleading filed should be entitled in the term to which the writ is returnable,[20] and after the time when the cause of action accrues.[21] allegation, if affirmative in form, should be laid with a venue; that is, should state the place at which the alleged fact happened.[23] In addition to this venue, which included the parish, town, or hamlet as well as the county, there was another laid in the margin of the declaration at its commencement stating merely the name of the county. But the reasons for the laying of this venue in the body of the declaration having gradually ceased to exist the practice has become, under the modern common-law procedure, a mere matter of form,[24] except in local actions.[25] And by express statutory provision an allegation of place is sometimes made unnecessary unless from the nature of the case place is material or traversable.[26] It is, however, held sufficient at common law to lay the venue in the margin of the declaration,[27] and although the action is local,[28] particularly where there are words of reference,[29] or to lay the venue in the body without stating it in the margin.[30] And it is held further that where there are several facts the venue stated as to the first will apply to all the sentences connected by the conjunction "and."[31] In transitory actions a venue is only necessary to be laid to give a place for trial.[32] The venue for trial is a legal fiction, devised for the furtherance of justice, and cannot be traversed.[33] Under the codes the petition is usually required merely to contain a statement of the court and county in which the action is brought,[34] and unless place is a material element in the cause of action it need not be averred.[35]

7. Names and Description of Parties — a. In General. The names of all the parties to the action must appear either in the caption or body of plaintiff's pleading.[36] Where they appear in the caption the parties may subsequently be referred to simply as plaintiffs or defendants,[37] or as the "above named" or "said" plaintiffs or defendants,[38] without naming them. But failure to give the names of the parties in some part of the pleading is a fatal defect.[39] Parties plaintiff are bound to set out their names.[40] It is not sufficient to style parties as "owners,"[41] or "heirs."[42] Nor is it sufficient to describe defendants by a class name without reference to their number or condition.[43] The christian and surname of both plaintiff and defendant should be stated with accuracy;[44] but the absence of the first names amounts only to a misnomer, and forms no ground to strike a petition from the files.[45] When parties have all the same surname, it is unnecessary to repeat it with the christian names.[46] The word "junior" is no part of a man's name, and need not be used in legal proceedings.[47] No objection for misnomer can be taken at the trial.[48]

b. Initials.[49] Parties should sue and be sued by their full christian names. Initial letters are not sufficient.[50] The proper remedy for this defect is a motion,[51] not a demurrer.[52] The objection is waived by pleading to the merits,[53] and comes too late after judgment.[54] The first christian name is enough, and the middle name may be omitted or indicated by initial letter.[55] If one is in the habit of using only initial letters for his christian name, an action against him by that name is good.[56]

c. Wrong or Assumed Name. In some jurisdictions it is held that, in the absence of fraud, a person may do business and execute contracts in any name he may choose to assume, and may be sued in such name.[57] Some authorities even hold that if a person execute a contract in a wrong or assumed name, he must sue and be sued in that name.[58] On the other hand it is the rule in other jurisdictions that by whatever name a person may contract, he may sue and be sued in his true name.[59] And it has been held that in such case one must sue and be sued in his true name, and the style or description by which he executed the contract should be made to appear under an alias dictus.[60]

d. Change of Name.[61] At common law a man may lawfully change his name, and may sue or be sued in any name by which he is known or recognized.[62]

e. Party Known by Two Names. It is a sufficient answer to a plea of misnomer that the party was equally well known by either name.[63] But such an answer is good only where plaintiff mistakes defendant's name.[64]

f. Unknown Parties and Use of Fictitious Names.[65] The codes and practice acts commonly provide that a party defendant, whose name is unknown, may be sued by a fictitious name.[66] Such a statute applies only where a cause of action is known to exist against one whose name only is unknown, and not where a cause of action is not known to exist against a person whose name and identity are known.[67] There must be a distinct allegation to the effect that the name is so used by reason of ignorance of defendant's true name.[68] The ignorance of the name must be real, and not wilful, ignorance, or such as might be removed by mere inquiry, or a resort to means of information.[69] A party named in a complaint by a fictitious name is a party to the action from its commencement.[70]

g. Misnomer.[71] Where two names have the same original derivation, or where one is an abbreviation or corruption of the other, but both are taken promiscuously, and according to common use, to be the same, although differing in sound, the use of one for the other is not a material misnomer.[72] But if the name of a party be wholly mistaken, and repugnant to truth, the misnomer is fatal.[73] A mistake in the name of a party, which was amendable in the court below, will be disregarded in the supreme court, as not affecting the substantial rights of the adverse party.[74] Where a misnomer is due to clerical error, and the adverse party is not prejudiced thereby, it will not vitiate.[75]

h. Parties in Particular Capacities. The character in which a party sues must be determined from the body of the pleading and not from the description given in the caption.[76] And where there is a wrong description or no description in the title, the error will be deemed merely formal.[77] A substantial description is sufficient.[78] Where one sues or is sued in a representative capacity, it must be averred that it is as such representative, and a mere statement of the representative character, following the name of the party, will be treated as only descriptio personæ.[79] So where the pleadings disclose a cause of action by or against a person in his individual capacity, superadded words, such as "agent," "executor," "trustee," etc., should be rejected as descriptio personæ.[80] In actions by or against officers, the individual name as well as the name of the office should be used.[81] In an action by one for the use of another, the words "for the use of" are unnecessary for any purpose other than to protect the interest of the usee against the nominal plaintiff. They are to be deemed surplusage merely.[82] In an action at law by the holder of a legal title it is not necessary to give the name of the equitable owner,[83] nor need a trustee plaintiff state the name of the beneficiary.[84] Where it is doubtful in what capacity a plaintiff sues, reference may be had to the whole pleading to determine the question.[85] Some cases hold it essential that plaintiff should state whether he sues in person or by attorney.[86] But it is improper to commence a suit in the name of an attorney in fact.[87]

founded either on a contract between the parties or on the obligation of law arising out of defendant's particular character or situation.[92] An allegation in the present tense will be deemed to refer to the time when the action was commenced.[93]

2. TEST OF SUFFICIENCY. The test of sufficiency frequently applied is whether the declaration informs defendant of the nature of the demand so that he may not be misled in the preparation of his defense. If it does this it is sufficient, although inartificially drawn.[94] If facts are alleged which entitle plaintiff to any relief in the court where the action is commenced, the pleading will be held to state a cause of action,[95] even though the pleading contains a demand for relief to which plaintiff is not entitled.[96] And if sufficient facts are stated to make a good cause of action, the pleading is not vitiated by the further averment of legal conclusions respecting the effect of the facts alleged.[97] Vagueness, uncertainty, or other formal defects will not be deemed fatal under rules permitting liberal interpretation if a good cause of action can be gathered from the pleading.[98] But a declaration containing facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action will be rendered insufficient by the averment of other facts constituting a defense to it.[99]

3. Matter of Inducement. Inducement is the statement of matter which is introductory to the principal subject of the pleading, and which is necessary or suitable to elucidate it and make its purport clear.[1] If such matter is not so related to the constitutive facts of the cause of action it is surplusage, and whether matter is surplusage or proper inducement is to be determined by a sound construction of the entire pleading.[2] Its office being merely explanatory, it does not require exact certainty, nor is it necessary that it be formal. If it substantially suffices to make the principal facts intelligible, that is enough.[3]

4. Right of Plaintiff — a. Necessity That the Right Be Shown. It is incumbent upon plaintiff to allege sufficient facts to show that he is concerned with the cause of action averred, and is the party who has suffered injury by reason of the acts of defendant. In other words, it is not enough that he alleges a cause of action existing in favor of someone; he must show that it exists in favor of himself.[4] The burden should not be placed upon defendant to show that plaintiff is not the aggrieved party and that he has sustained no damages.[5] It must appear that the cause of action had accrued to plaintiff at the time the action was commenced.[6] So the complaint must aver non-payment of the amount sued for.[7] But where the general averments of the complaint show that plaintiff's claim is due and unpaid, it is sufficient without making such averment directly.[8] It is also necessary to allege facts showing that the cause of action alleged accrued to him in the capacity in which he sues,[9] and for this purpose it is necessary to allege his authority.[10] Where there is a mistake in the name of plaintiff in an instrument sued on, there should be an averment of identity in the pleading, to connect plaintiff with the cause of action set up.[11] The fact that an action is brought by a person as next friend of another, instead of in the name of such other by next friend, is an immaterial irregularity.[12]

b. Beneficiary Need Not Be Shown. It is sufficient to allege sufficient facts to show a cause of action in favor of the legal plaintiff, without showing the interest of the person beneficially interested.[13] Nor need the latter be named.[14]

c. Joint Plaintiffs. If several plaintiffs sue jointly, facts should be averred showing a joint right of action existing in all of them.[15] But it need not be so alleged in terms if the fact substantially appears from the allegations.[16]

5. Liability of Defendants. It is necessary that plaintiff allege some wrongful act giving rise to a liability on the part of defendant.[17] It is not sufficient to show a liability on the part of someone, but such liability must, by apt averments, be shown to rest upon the particular party or parties against whom the action is brought.[18] Thus a declaration alleging the commission of a negligent act by one of the defendants states no cause of action against the other defendant.[19] Some duty or obligation must be shown to rest upon the party sought to be charged, a neglect or breach of which has resulted in the injury complained of.[20] But plaintiff need show only sufficient facts to create a liability, and it is unnecessary to allege any further interest in or connection with the subject of the action,[21] or any further facts relative to the character of defendant.[22] If the averments show a liability on the part of defendant, it is unimportant in what character his liability originated.[23] In case a contract is made by defendant in a wrong name plaintiff must by proper averments show that the obligor in the contract and defendant sued are the same.[24] Where several persons are named as defendants the complaint must contain allegations sufficient to show the relation which they sustain toward each other with regard to the subject of action.[25] But where by statute a liability is joint and several, a complaint against several defendants need not aver a joint liability.[26] Under the provisions of some statutes a complaint against several defendants is, for the purpose of determining its sufficiency, considered as both joint and several.[27]

6. Excusing Non-Joinder of Parties. It is incumbent on the pleader to show on the face of his complaint the proper parties to the action.[28] Where it appears from the facts alleged that other parties should have been joined, the pleading is defective unless it alleges such other facts as satisfactorily account for the non-joinder.[29] A declaration against one of several joint and several obligees is good without an averment that the others are without the jurisdiction of the court.[30]

7. Jurisdictional Facts.[31] The general rule is that where a court has general jurisdiction of the subject-matter of an action it is not necessary to allege the facts showing jurisdiction.[32] But where the court is one of limited jurisdiction, the complaint must affirmatively show that the case is within the jurisdiction.[33] Where the jurisdiction of a court of limited jurisdiction depends on residence or citizenship, facts showing it should be alleged.[34] Where courts exercise an extra-territorial jurisdiction it is generally held that the facts showing how it arises need not be alleged in the declaration,[35] although other cases have held such allegations necessary.[36] A statutory requirement that the complaint shall show that the value of the property involved is within the prescribed limit does not require any particular form for the jurisdictional averment.[37] A count which by its averments ousts the jurisdiction of the court may be stricken out.[38] In pleading the process of a court of limited jurisdiction, every jurisdictional fact must be plainly and explicitly averred.[39]

8. Residence. The residence of a party need not ordinarily be alleged,[40] except where necessary for jurisdictional purposes,[41] but the statutes in some states require it.[42]

or complaint a time when every material traversable fact happened generally [45] a similar rule has been applied under the codes and practice acts.[46] But the true time need not ordinarily be stated except where it is of the essence of a contract or constitutes matter of description of an instrument, or is otherwise material.[47] In alleging time, the day, month, and year [48] should be stated,[49] and it is said that a day certain must be alleged even where a continuando accompanies the allegation.[50] Allegation in the form of continuando [51] is proper where the cause of action consists of repeated or continued acts,[52] especially where the precise dates are wholly within the knowledge of the other party.[53] Time alleged as to one fact applies to every other fact connected conjunctively therewith.[54] The defect is cured by verdict [55] and is not ground for nonsuit [56] or arrest of judgment.[57]

11. Demand. Where a demand is necessary before a right of action accrues, such demand must be alleged by plaintiff.[60] But a demand which is not essential to the cause of action need not of course be alleged.[61] Such an allegation is sufficiently made where plaintiff avers that he requested defendant, etc., and defendant refused,[62] and an allegation that defendant is indebted to plaintiff is sufficient allegation of demand where there could be no indebtedness without a demand.[63] An allegation of defendant's refusal has been held sufficient, since he could not refuse unless he had been asked to perform.[64] A mere averment, "though often requested," is sufficient on demurrer.[65] But even where a demand is a condition precedent to plaintiff's right, if defendant in his answer denies all liability so that it is clear that a demand would have been refused, defendant cannot complain at the lack of demand.[66] The date of the demand should be alleged, and if such date be omitted a motion to make more definite and certain will lie.[67] and plaintiff intends to rely upon matter excusing performance such matter must be alleged.[69]

b. Impossible Conditions. When, however, a condition precedent is clearly impossible, it may be disregarded.[70]

c. Concurrent Covenants. In the case of concurrent covenants plaintiff must allege performance or readiness to perform,[71] and an offer to perform.[72]

d. Waiver. A plaintiff may safely assume that conditions which have been waived will not be relied upon, and allegations of waiver to meet a defense based on such conditions are not inconsistent with the statutory allegations that all conditions on the part of plaintiff have been duly performed.[73]

e. Form of Averment. A general averment that plaintiff has performed all the conditions precedent to his right is not sufficient, unless authorized by statute, but the performance of each condition must be specifically shown.[74] But while a general averment of performance is sufficient under these statutes, such an averment will not suffice to avoid ambiguities in the contract, and in case it is not clear what acts were done in performance, the court, especially in an equity case, may hold the pleading insufficient.[75]

13. Allegations on Information and Belief.[76] Facts which are presumptively within the knowledge of the party pleading should be alleged positively, but other facts may be alleged upon information and belief only.[77] Many cases, however, hold that this rule does not allow plaintiff to allege merely that he is informed and believes certain facts to be true. A traverse of such an averment would put in issue only the information or belief, and not the truth of the facts themselves.

But, if payment is not to be made if a contingency happens during its continuance, e. g. if the party is enjoined from using the article which is the subject-matter of the contract, he is not to pay the purchase price until the injunction is dissolved, the contingency is in the nature of a condition subsequent, and it is not necessary to allege in the complaint the nonhappening or noncontinuance of the contingency."

But plaintiff must allege that the facts are true, as he is informed and believes.[78] But other cases permit the allegation that plaintiff is informed and believes the facts to be true.[79] The words "information and belief" added to a positive averment may be disregarded as surplusage.[80] An averment on information and belief is not vitiated by allegations as to the source of the information.[81]

14. Damages. A pleading which does not allege facts showing any damage suffered by plaintiff is bad on general demurrer.[82] Special damages cannot be recovered unless they are alleged.[83] If the facts alleged entitle plaintiff to even nominal damages, a general demurrer cannot be sustained to the pleading, although no special damages be alleged.[84] That is to say, if the acts charged upon defendant are such that their natural and necessary consequence is to injure plaintiff, an allegation of general damages is sufficient, and a failure to allege special damage does not subject the pleading to attack by demurrer.[85] If the only damages shown to have been suffered are too remote, indefinite, or contingent to form the basis for a legal demand, the pleading is bad on general demurrer.[86]

15. Anticipating Defenses. It is a general principle that a pleading need and should not, by its averments, anticipate a defense thereto, and negative or avoid it;[87]

but in some cases such a form of pleading is permissible,[88] and there are cases where the facts constituting the cause of action cannot be set up properly without at the same time disclosing the facts which constitute a defense thereto, and in such cases it is proper for plaintiff to allege facts which he deems a reply to the defense thus disclosed.[89] For if facts constituting a defense to the cause of action alleged are set up in the pleading, it will be held bad unless they are denied or their effect avoided by other facts.[90] Any allegations made for the purpose of anticipating defenses are immaterial,[91] unless defendant wishes to rely upon them, in which case he will be relieved from specifically setting up his defense and may accept the issue presented by plaintiff.[92]

16. Prayer For Damages or Other Relief[93]— a. At Common Law. The failure of the declaration, in an action at common law sounding in damages, to claim damages in some sum is fatal.[94] And even in actions not sounding in damages it was usual to lay nominal damages.[95] The claim for damages, usually made in the conclusion of the pleading, is called the ad damnum clause.[96] is ambiguity in such statement.[98] A bad prayer for relief or a prayer for improper relief will not vitiate a pleading which is otherwise sufficient.[99] The facts alleged, and not the relief demanded, are of chief importance, and they determine the relief to be granted.[1] But where the facts leave doubt as to the cause of action which the pleader intended to present the prayer may be resorted to to explain such intent.[2] As a general rule, under the codes, the complainant may ask for general relief as was ordinarily done in equity, and where such a prayer is made the court may grant any relief to which complainant entitled upon the allegations of the complaint and the proofs introduced at the trial.[3] It has been held, however, in some states that the incorporation of a prayer for general relief in an action at law will not supply the place of a specific demand of particular relief which, if sought, gives character to the whole action.[4]

(II) SUFFICIENCY. Technical nicety is not required in the demand for damages under the codes and practice acts, and if it substantially informs defendant of the amount of the claim it will be deemed sufficient.[5] A prayer in the form of the ad damnum clause at common law is sufficient.[6]

c. Where There Are Several Counts. A single ad damnum clause or prayer for relief at the end of a count is usually held sufficient for all the counts which precede it,[7] if the language used is broad enough to include them.[8] Where there is but one conclusion of damages to apply to more than one count, all of the counts are bad if the conclusion is bad.[9] The amount demanded at the end of a declaration consisting of several counts should regularly be the aggregate of all the sums alleged to be due in the different counts.[10]

17. FORMAL CONCLUSION. That part of the declaration which follows the statement of the cause of action and shows the motive or object of plaintiff in suing is termed the conclusion.[11] An informal conclusion is not deemed a material defect,[12] although a ground for special demurrer at common law.[13] A general conclusion applies to each count in the declaration.[14] It is not necessary to conclude the statement of a statutory cause of action with the words, "against the form of the statute," etc., except where the statute is penal and not remedial.[15] Where a declaration is founded on an amendatory act, which refers to and continues the provisions of a former act, it is proper for it to conclude against the form of the "statute" and not "statutes."[16]

No. 13,122, 1 Gall. 261. Chief Justice Shaw, in Reed v. Northfield, 13 Pick. (Mass.) 94, 99, 23 Am. Dec. 662, in the course of a somewhat exhaustive discussion of this question, said: "The point which has been most elaborately argued, and upon which many authorities have been cited, arises on a motion in arrest of judgment, because the declaration in this case does not aver, that the negligence of the town complained of, and on the ground of which the plaintiff claims damages, was against the form of the statute relied on. The precise point is, whether in an action on the case in which a party claims damages merely, and sets out fully the facts upon which that claim rests, bringing it within the provisions of the statute, this averment in precise terms, or in some expression equivalent, must be made. We think it is not necessary. We think the authorities leading to a contrary conclusion, will be found to apply either to indictments or informations, or to actions, of debt or on the case, for penalties, where the same strictness is required. And where the statute gives a penalty, and the thing sued for is pursued as a penalty, although the right to sue is given only to the party grieved and even though the whole penalty when recovered shall go to the party grieved, still the same rule may apply, because the form of proceeding is still for a penal sum, and the ostensible and real object of the suit, in form at least, is punishment. Some of the elementary works and books of practice lay down the rule, in general terms, without the qualification limiting it in terms to penal actions, but it is believed, that when the cases are examined which are relied on to support the rule, they will be found to be cases of penal actions."

declaration in covenant,[23] and where the summons showed an action on contract while the complaint was in tort.[24] A variance between the amounts claimed in the summons and plaintiff's pleading is immaterial,[25] but there is other authority to the contrary.[26] Where there is a difference in the county named as the place of trial in the summons and the complaint, that in the complaint will control.[27] Some cases hold that in case of a variance the discrepancy falls upon the writ, and the defect is cured by appearance.[28] But under the codes and practice acts which render variance between the declaration and the summons amendable,[29] the question of variance has become of little practical importance.[30]

b. As to Parties. The declaration or other pleading filed by plaintiff should be by and against the same party or parties as the writ.[31] So also the character or capacity in which a party sues or is sued must be the same in the writ and in the pleading.[32] If the title of the pleading does not correspond with that given in the writ, the pleading is irregular and may be set aside.[33] But clerical or other formal errors in this respect will not be deemed fatal.[34] Where several defendants are sued by process not bailable, plaintiff may declare against one of them,[35] but not so in bailable actions.[36] It is a departure to issue a writ in the name of one person and to file a declaration in the name of another person to the use of the first.[37] But it is not a departure where the summons is issued in the name of a party and the complaint declares in the name of the state on relation of the same party.[38] It is no objection to a declaration that it states the names of other parties or describes them more fully, if it merely enlarges but does not depart from the writ.[39] Where the process and pleading are served together, a misdescription of the parties will not be deemed fatal.[40]

19. Statutory Actions. Where a party relies for recovery upon a special statute creating a liability where none existed before, he must set forth in ordinary and concise language a statement of facts showing his right to recover under that statute.[41] But since the courts will take judicial notice of statutes [42] it is not necessary to refer specifically to the statute by title and date of passage.[43] In stating a cause of action which is derived from a statute it is not necessary, in alleging the facts which bring plaintiff within it, to use the exact words of the statute. Words of equivalent import are equally proper.[44] The exact words of the statute may, however, be used, and are generally sufficient.[45] But no recovery can be had thereunder unless plaintiff alleges exactly those facts which the statute names as the basis for the right conferred.[46] No greater certainty is required than is found in the statute itself.[47] Where a party relies upon a statute which contains an exception in the enacting clause, such exception must be negatived;[48] but where the exception occurs in a proviso or in a subsequent section of the act, such exception is matter of defense and need not be negatived.[49]

20. Theory. A declaration or complaint must proceed upon a definite theory and must be good upon that theory or it will be deemed insufficient.[50] The mingling of inconsistent theories renders the pleading insufficient to sustain a judgment.[51] Where the facts alleged constitute a cause of action on either one of two theories, a general demurrer will not lie,[52] but plaintiff may be required to elect between them.[53] In some cases under the codes pleading in the nature of an equity bill with a double aspect has been permitted.[54] If a plaintiff adopts a wrong theory and fails to prove the cause of action intended, yet if he proves any other cause of action embraced by the allegations in his pleading, he may, according to some cases, recover on that.[55] Under a stricter and better ruling, however, it has been held that the court must determine the theory on which the pleading rests, and unless a good cause of action is stated on that theory a demurrer should be sustained, even though facts are stated sufficient to show that plaintiff has a cause of action of a different character.[56] And under this rule no recovery can be had upon a theory other than the one upon which the pleading proceeds.[57] In addition to the material facts alleged, others which neither show the right in the plaintiffs or a wrong thereto on the part of defendants do not invalidate the cause of action stated.[58] So the character of an action is not changed by mere expressions in the declaration which do not go to the gist thereof.[59]

21. Indorsements. Statutes frequently require the indorsement of certain facts, such as the nature of the issue, or other matters respecting the action, upon plaintiff's pleading, and in such cases a substantial compliance with the statute is necessary.[60]

joinder of causes of action is treated under another title,[62] and we shall here consider only the form and general requisites of separate counts in a declaration or complaint, assuming that in the cases discussed the question of misjoinder does not enter. The theory of separate counts is that each is a complete cause of action; as distinct from others as if it stood alone in the pleading.[63] But averments which precede the statement of any cause of action, and constitute what is called the commencement of the pleading, are entirely distinct from the various counts and need not appear in each.[64] And a single averment of breach at the end of a declaration made up of the common counts is sufficient.[65] One cause of action cannot be split up into several parts and each part alleged in a separate count.[66] The use of several counts instead of one does not of itself make a pleading ambiguous and uncertain.[67] The form of the pleading will not control in determining whether it sets up more than one count, but the substance of the averments will be considered, and the evident purpose of the pleader.[68] Where plaintiff mistakenly believes that he has two causes of action and sets them up in separate counts, while all the facts alleged really constitute but one cause of action, he should not be required to elect, but the entire pleading should be construed as setting up a single cause of action, irrespective of the attempted division.[69] A single good count is, as a rule, enough to sustain a verdict,[70] and in case judgment has been rendered it

b. Relaxation of Rules. But the rule should not be held to require the separate statement of a large number of causes of action upon identical instruments, thus making the pleading prolix and redundant, when all the instruments could be easily described in one count.[74] And in other cases, where the causes of action are very numerous and based upon similar facts, they may properly be set up in one count.[75] And when a single and continuous purpose runs through an entire transaction made up of various acts, each of which might alone constitute a cause of action, it is proper to set up all the facts in one count as a single cause of action.[76] And by statute in some jurisdictions, where two or more acts of negligence or other wrong are set forth in the complaint as causing or contributing to the injury for which suit is brought, plaintiff will not be required to state such several acts separately.[77]

3. Duplicity — a. In General. Duplicity consists in joining, in one and the same count, different grounds of action, of different natures, or of the same nature, to enforce only a single right of recovery. This is a fault in pleading only because it tends to useless prolixity and confusion, and is therefore only a fault in form, and not in substance.[78] But to allege in a single count several kinds of damage resulting from a single wrongful act is not duplicity.[79] Immaterial matter cannot render a pleading bad for duplicity,[80] nor can matter alleged in aggravation of damages,[81] nor matter alleged as inducement,[82] nor matter not relied on as ground for recovery.[83] Mere diversity of facts alleged in a count will not make it double when all the facts taken together tend to the statement of one point or ground of recovery.[84] And where a single transaction is relied on by plaintiff, the pleading is not double because the facts alleged show a liability both in contract and tort.[85] Nor is a pleading subject to objection on the ground of duplicity when the additional facts alleged in the count are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action.[86] The fact that two theories of recovery are set out in the alternative in a count will not render the count duplicitous unless one theory negatives the other.[87]

b. Distinguished From Misjoinder, Commingling, and Multifariousness. Duplicity is essentially different from misjoinder, for the latter is joining in different counts several different demands which the law does not permit to be joined, to enforce different rights of recovery.[88] And it is to be distinguished also from

In code pleading.— See, however, Fisk v. Tank, 12 Wis. 276, 299, 78 Am. Dec. 737, where Dixon, C. J., speaking for the court said: "It [the complaint] proceeds for damages for several breaches of one contract. It is obvious that in such a case, the plaintiff may, either at common law or under the code, in a single statement or count, allege as many breaches as he chooses, and when he comes to the trial be permitted to give evidence concerning any or all of them." This is probably the correct code rule, but is directly opposed to the common-law doctrine of duplicity.

In Montana Ramsdell v. Clark, 20 Mont. 103, 49 Pac. 591, holds that the assignment of several breaches of the same contract constitutes several distinct causes of action.

In Canada the case of Hagel v. Starr, 2 Manitoba 92, holds it proper to allege several breaches of the same contract in one count.

E. 705 [affirming 129 Ill. App. 86]. In Raymond v. Sturges, 23 Conn. 134, 146, the court said: "In order to constitute duplicity, it is not sufficient that a count, in a declaration, shows merely that the plaintiff has various causes of action against the defendant, although the contrary might be inferred from the general and loose definitions of duplicity, in some of the elementary treatises on pleading. It is necessary, further, that those various causes of action, or more than one of them, should be claimed and relied on, as distinct grounds of recovery. Dyer, 42, b; Stephen on Pl. 302. For, if it appears, that the plaintiff seeks to recover upon only one of them, and makes no claim on any of the others, as a distinct, additional, or independent ground of recovery, the mere circumstance that he has other valid claims against the defendant, which he might but does not seek to enforce in the suit, ought not to deprive him of a recovery on the cause of action, on which alone he seeks to recover. And, in such a case, there can be no multiplicity of issues, to avoid which duplicity is discountenanced."

a mere commingling of different causes of action in the same count, which may be joined but should be separately stated. But these distinctions have not always been observed by the courts, and there is considerable confusion in the cases in the use of the term.[89] Some cases seem to use the term "duplicity" in the sense of multifariousness, as employed in equity pleading, which is clearly incorrect.[90]

4. Same Cause of Action Stated in Separate Counts — a. General Rule. Under the common-law procedure it was a common and often a very useful practice to state a single cause of action in different ways, each in a separate count, to meet the possible results of the evidence as it might be developed at the trial, for it is frequently impossible to know beforehand exactly what the evidence may disclose. In this way plaintiff who had a meritorious case might succeed on some one count while failing in all others.[91] The variations between the different counts were required to be substantial, and if the counts were so far identical that the same evidence would support each, and the variation appeared to have been vexatiously inserted, the redundant counts would be stricken out.[92] The same rule still obtains in many jurisdictions, and a plaintiff may set up the same cause of action in different counts to meet the contingencies of proof.[93] Such counts should, according to some authorities, purport to allege different causes of action,[94] but this rule is not universally observed.[95] Under some statutes the joinder of counts in different forms is permitted where they are for the same cause of action.[96] Under such a statute an averment that the counts are for the same cause of Another statement.— "One of the objects of inserting two or more counts in one declaration, when in fact there is but one cause of action, is to accommodate the statement of the cause, as far as may be, to the possible state of the proofs to be exhibited on the trial, or to guard, if possible, against the hazard of the proofs varying materially from the statement of the cause of action, so that, if one or more of the several counts should not be adapted to the evidence, some other of these may be so. The plaintiff has in every case a right to insert in his declaration as many counts (each being in itself single) as he pleases." Rawlinson v. Shaw, 117 Mich. 5, 9, 75 N. W. 138.

action is decisive,[97] unless it appears from the declaration that such is not the fact.[98]

b. Under the Codes. Under the codes of procedure, many courts have held that the code requirement that the facts constituting the cause of action should be stated without unnecessary repetition precludes the use of different counts where there is but a single demand,[99] except under peculiar circumstances where, from the nature of the case, it would be clearly inequitable to confine plaintiff to a single statement.[1] Other courts have held, on the other hand, that such restatement in different forms is proper under the code system.[2]

5. Aider of Incomplete Counts by Others. A count which is insufficient cannot be aided by averments appearing in other counts,[3] even where, according to some cases, there is an express reference to such averments.[4] But the rule is different as to matters of inducement, and a reference in one count to such matter in another will be sufficient, even though the count containing such matter of inducement be held bad on demurrer.[5] And most authorities allow such aider where express reference is made even as to facts constituting the gravamen of the action.[6] Not only may a reference in a count to matter outside it incorporate such matter into the count, but the effect is the same where the reference is outside the count. Thus a single reference in another part of the pleading may aid a number of separate counts each of which would be defective without it.[7] But a reference to be deemed sufficient, must be clear, direct, positive and explicit.[8] Such reference has been recommended as a means of avoiding too great prolixity.[9] Some cases hold that where a reference is made to an averment in a count which is held bad on demurrer, such reference will not aid;[10] but others hold that a defective or abandoned count is still a part of the pleading for purposes of reference.[11]

Suppl. 913, the appellate division said: "Nor do we think the complaint was demurrable for realleging in the second and third causes of action distinct paragraphs by number of the first count of the complaint. The authorities cited in condemnation of referring in a pleading to the antecedent allegations are where the repetition is made by reference to folios which creates confusion and upon a review may be unintelligible, as the pleading folioing may not be followed in the printed record. And an order directing that the action should be dismissed for want of prosecution if the statement of claim was not delivered within eight days was amended so as to make it direct only that plaintiff should deliver the statement within eight has been personal service or an appearance.[29] Under the old English and Canadian practice a plaintiff was deemed out of court if he did not declare within one year after defendant's appearance.[30] But this rule has not been followed by American courts.[31] In construing court rules, reference is to be had to the statute under which the rule was made, to other rules having a bearing upon the subject, and to the common-law principles of practice applicable thereto.[32] Technical objections will not be allowed to defeat a reasonable interpretation.[33] Where the pleading is required to be filed a certain number of days before the term, this means the term at which defendant may be required to plead.[34] The word "term" means either general or special term,[35] and applies to the actual sitting of the court.[36] The general rules for the computation of time apply to the filing of pleadings.[37] Where the statute provides that the pleading must be filed within the time fixed in the writ of process or a certain number of days before the term, the latter alternative may be followed, although it is after the time stated in the writ.[38] If the pleading is not filed at the time required, the suit may ordinarily be dismissed, but the court has considerable discretion in the matter.[39] In some states it is deemed discontinued by statute.[40]

IV. PLEA OR ANSWER, CROSS COMPLAINT, AND AFFIDAVIT OF DEFENSE.

A. In General[41] — 1. Definitions and Classification — a. Pleas Generally.

The word "plea" in its most general sense indicates the formal answer made by a defendant to a demand or charge.[42] The term is used at common law to denote a defense of matters of fact,[43] or more specifically, defendant's answer by matter of fact to plaintiff's declaration.[44] But the term "plea" in its proper sense is not

Whatever is offered by defendant as sufficient to defeat the cause of action stated in sufficient to include the idea of a demurrer.[45] Pleas are divided most generally into two classes: (1) Dilatory pleas,[46] (2) peremptory pleas,[47] or, as they are more commonly called, pleas in bar.[48]

b. Dilatory Pleas. Dilatory pleas are those which delay plaintiff's remedy. They do not affect the merits of the cause of action, and plaintiff may still seek his remedy by a new action, but they defeat entirely the particular suit in which they are used.[49] Dilatory pleas are commonly divided into (1) pleas to the jurisdiction of the court, (2) pleas to the disability or to the person of plaintiff or defendant, and (3) pleas in abatement of the count, declaration, or writ.[50] Pleas to the person are also called pleas in suspension of the action,[51] and are frequently classed as pleas in abatement;[52] and all dilatory pleas are sometimes called pleas in abatement, in distinction from pleas in bar.[53] Defects in the declaration itself cannot be taken advantage of by plea in abatement. In such cases a demurrer is the proper remedy.[54] Pleas in abatement, properly so called, are founded on some defect in the writ itself, or on some variance or repugnancy between the declaration and the writ.[55] They seek to defeat the proceedings, but do not show that plaintiff is forever concluded, and set forth a better form of action for the redress sought.[56]

c. Pleas in Bar. Pleas in bar of the action are those which show a meritorious ground for wholly defeating it. They differ from all dilatory pleas in that they do not merely divert the proceedings to another jurisdiction, nor suspend them, nor abate the writ or declaration, but they substantially and conclusively impugn the right of action altogether.[57] Pleas in bar are sometimes termed issuable pleas[58] or defenses.[59] Pleas in bar are divided into pleas by way of traverse and pleas by way of confession and avoidance, according to whether they deny the material facts alleged or set up new facts which destroy their legal effect.[60] Under the code they are called answers by way of denial and answers by way of new matter.[61]

d. Distinction Between Dilatory Pleas and Pleas in Bar. The distinction between dilatory pleas and pleas in bar is substantial, and the character of a particular plea is to be determined, in the absence of formal parts to the contrary,[62]

by what it contains.[63] Statutes abolishing special pleading apply only to pleas in bar, and pleas in abatement may still be filed.[64] Under the code the technical distinctions between the various pleas no longer exist, and answers are in abatement or in bar according to the allegations which they contain.[65]

e. Pleas in Discharge. A plea in discharge is one which admits that plaintiff had a cause of action, but seeks to show that it was discharged by some subsequent or collateral matter.[66]

f. Pleas in Confession and Avoidance. A plea in confession and avoidance is one which admits that plaintiff had a cause of action, but which avers that it has been discharged by some subsequent or collateral matter.[67]

g. Plea of Justification. A plea in justification or excuse admits facts alleged by plaintiff, but in effect denies that plaintiff had at any time a good cause of action, either because the conduct of defendant is justified under some legal right or cause, or because he is excused from liability in the particular case through some act or conduct of plaintiff.[68] It is a plea of confession and avoidance.[69]

h. Plea of Release. A plea of release is a plea which admits the cause of action, but sets forth a subsequently executed release.[70]

i. Pleas to the Action. A plea to the action is one which disputes the cause of action.[71]

2. Matters Relating to Pleas and Answers Generally — a. Necessity.[72] No answer is necessary to a petition which has been stricken from the files.[73] If the complaint is bad, it is not error to overrule a demurrer to a bad answer, a bad answer being good enough for a bad complaint.[74]

b. Waiver of Defenses by Failure to Plead. All defenses not made in the pleadings are considered waived,[75] especially such as are connected with the facts alleged by plaintiff,[76] and those which are dilatory in their nature.[77] But there are certain exceptions to this rule. of a contract the court will notice it ex officio.[78] So a defendant may avail himself of a defense disclosed by plaintiff's proofs.[79] And where a defendant might subject himself to a criminal prosecution by answering the allegations of plaintiff, he may so state in his answer and the allegations will be deemed put in issue without being denied,[80] or without the denial being verified.[81] Nor does the rule apply where the pleading filed by plaintiff is not one on which judgment can be given.[82]

c. Persons Who May Plead Defenses.[83] A defense can be used only by the party in whose favor it exists, and cannot be set up by a defendant in favor of a third person.[84]

d. Entitling Plea or Answer. There is some conflict in authority as to the necessity of entitling a plea. Some cases hold that it is not necessary, as the title of the declaration is deemed to be carried over to the plea.[85] Under this rule it is held that no venue is necessary in a plea except where defendant justifies at a different place and makes the place material, the venue in the declaration drawing to itself everything that is transitory.[86] But other cases hold that the plea must be entitled,[87] and that technical strictness will be required in this respect in the case of dilatory pleas.[88]

e. General Form.[89] A memorandum indorsed by defendant on the back of a complaint, if it contains proper matter, may constitute a valid answer.[90] But mere formless memoranda do not constitute pleas.[91] A plea which has been used on a former trial may be used again if the date be changed to correspond with the defense.[92]

f. Subject-Matter.[93] A plea or answer must consist of allegations or denials of facts, and not of matters of law, the latter being properly grounds for demurrer.[94] Defects appearing on the face of plaintiff's pleading, which are grounds of demurrer, cannot be raised by plea or answer.[95] A defendant cannot, by his pleading, confer rights upon plaintiff which did not exist at the commencement of the action and which would enable plaintiff to recover upon a clause of action different from that alleged in the complaint.[96]

Distinction between demurrer and plea.—"A demurrer is never founded on matter collateral to the pleading which it opposes, but arises on the face of the statement itself;—a pleading is always founded on matter collateral. This consideration will serve as a guide to determine whether a given objection should be brought forward by way of pleading or of demurrer. Thus, if the declaration in assumpsit omit to mention the day when the promise was made, it is an objection to which that statement on the face of it, is subject and which would consequently be taken by demurrer; but if one of the parties making the promise is omitted, the fact that there was such a party, is one of a collateral nature, not disclosed by the declaration itself, and must be brought forward therefore by way of plea, viz., plea in abatement." and should be set forth by positive averments in such a way as to be fully understood by the opposite party and by the court.[98] Such a statement will not be wholly rejected, although it contain formal irregularities,[99] or clerical errors.[1] The facts shown in a single plea or defense should be consistent, and where they mutually nullify each other the pleading is bad on demurrer.[2]

h. Short Pleas. If a plea is pleaded "in short by consent" of parties, the consent applies only to matters of form, and it must still be good in substance.[3] Such pleas are to be construed as though set out in extenso, and as though they embodied all facts appearing in exhibits and essential to the defense indicated.[4]

i. Pleas Filed by Leave of Court. Where leave of court is necessary to the filing of a plea or answer, it must appear that defendant has a meritorious defense, since otherwise the court will exercise a sound discretion in refusing leave.[5] Sham defenses will be rejected.[6] The record should show the order granting leave, and a recital that leave was granted is not enough.[7] But this rule is not always followed.[8]

j. Disclaimers.[9] A disclaimer is a denial of any claim to or right in the thing demanded,[10] and if not falsified it defeats the action.[11] It should be full and explicit in all respects.[12] When once made it cannot be withdrawn without leave of court.[13] Pleas of disclaimer are sometimes held to be pleas in abatement only and not pleas in bar.[14] By statute provision is frequently made for the substitution of a party claiming the subject-matter of the suit in lieu of defendant who disclaims any interest therein.[15]

k. Equitable Defenses. Under the common-law practice, equitable defenses are not available in actions at law, but under most of the codes such defenses may be set up without restriction.[16] An equitable defense must be pleaded as such.[17] A plea purporting to set up an equitable defense, which is so uncertain that it cannot be determined whether the defense it sets up is legal or equitable, will be stricken out.[18]

L Defenses Accruing After Suit Brought.[19] In no case is a defendant to be deprived of a defense merely because it accrued after suit brought.[20] Under the common-law rule matter of defense which arises after the commencement of the suit but before plea or answer filed, cannot be pleaded in bar of the action generally, but must be pleaded to the further maintenance of the suit.[21] But where it is pleaded in bar generally, it is good after verdict.[22] Matter of defense which arises after plea or answer filed must be pleaded puis darrein continuance.[23] But where matters of defense have arisen after an imparlance, they may be pleaded as regular pleas in bar, and not puis darrein continuance.[24] Under the code practice a defendant may set up in his answer any defense which exists at the time such answer is filed, irrespective of when it arose;[25] but matter arising after the action is commenced and before answer must be specially pleaded.[26]

3. Time Within Which to Plead — a. General Rules. The time within which defendant must plead is fixed by statute or rule of court in each jurisdiction.[27]

27. See the statutes and rules of court in the several jurisdictions; and see the following cases:

Where the statute fixes it, rules of court in regard thereto must not contravene the statute,[28] and while courts may, in their discretion, extend the time so given, they cannot shorten it.[29] A defendant is never under obligation to plead until he knows or should know that a declaration is on file against him,[30] and usually he need not plead until actual service of the summons or complaint,[31] or until due return of service is made.[32] A plea or answer filed before the filing of the declaration or complaint is irregular,[33] and may be stricken;[34] and a plea filed too late may be stricken from the files.[35] or disregarded.[36] A plea improperly filed cannot be disregarded, and if no motion is made to strike it out, it will stand as a valid plea.[37] Delay or other irregularity in the filing of a plea, under such circumstances as to constitute a fraud upon the practice of the court, will be sufficient ground for allowing plaintiff to take a default, although the plea is served previous to the expiration of the time to plead.[38] The date of the filing of a plea is not changed by the subsequent filing of a more formal jurat.[39]

b. Presumptions. When a plea is found on file in its proper place, the presumption is that it was filed in time, and this presumption is not rebutted by a judgment by default entered in the same case.[40] And where a plea is in the record, filed after the proper term for filing, it will be presumed to have been filed with the permission of the court.[41]

c. Extension of Time[42]—(i) Control of Court Over Extension. Unless there is an express restriction by statute, it is within the discretion of the court to extend the time for pleading, even after default.[43] If the period of extension merits before judgment is reversible error.[55] Where a defendant's default appears to have resulted from no neglect or fault on his part, the court will exercise its discretion in relieving against it.[56] Leave will be refused where granting it would result in confusion and delay.[57] After an extension once granted, further extensions may be granted in the discretion of the court,[58] or leave may be given to file nunc pro tunc.[59]

(II) What Operates as an Extension. It is a matter of right on the part of a defendant to plead to the declaration when filed, and therefore when plaintiff delays in filing his declaration, defendant may nevertheless plead to it when filed without leave of court.[60] Where oyer is demanded and given the party has the same time in which to plead thereafter as he had at the time of the demand, the time elapsing between the demand and giving not being counted as part of the time allowed for pleading,[61] and the same is true in case of a demand for a bill of particulars,[62] and of security for costs.[63] But a voluntary bill of particulars will not enlarge the time to plead; [64] nor will a stay of proceedings of itself operate as an extension,[65] nor an irregular motion to require production of a power of attorney.[66] Where service is made by publication, the mere fact that a newspaper continues to publish the summons beyond the necessary period does not extend the time for answering.[67] Nor is the time for answering extended by the pendency of a motion by defendant to set aside the service of summons and complaint.[68] A continuance granted at the request of defendant does not extend the time allowed by law for pleading.[69] A defendant is not excused from filing his plea within the time fixed merely because plaintiff has failed to comply with an order of the court.[70] In case the appearance term of court has been illegally adjourned, defendant has until the next regular term of court in which to plead.[71]

(III) Waiver and Consent of Parties. Failure on the part of defendant to plead seasonably may be waived by plaintiff and any defense to the merits is in time if offered before default claimed.[72] And plaintiff may voluntarily grant defendant an extension of time if not unreasonable. But such action is subject to the approval of the court.[73]

(iv) Proceedings For Obtaining Extension. Under the rules of practice an extension of the time to plead will as a rule be granted only in case the application conforms to certain specific requirements.[74] The reasons offered for the extension must be meritorious and sufficient to satisfy the court.[75] Due diligence must also be shown.[76] But the character of the showing required is largely in the discretion of the court.[77] Where no reason for the extension is given, it is not error for the court to refuse an application for more time in which to plead.[78] In some jurisdictions the application is required to be submitted on affidavit of merits.[79] Under some statutes the extension of time may be on ex parte application without notice,[80] under others notice to the adverse party is required,[81] together with a copy of the proposed answer.[82] Some statutes have required service of a copy of the order of extension[83] and of the affidavit on which it was granted.[84] After default has been entered for lack of an answer, the proper course is for defendant to apply on notice to be relieved from the default and have leave to answer, and not apply ex parte for an extension of time in which to answer.[85] An application for leave to defend on the merits cannot be considered upon a motion of plaintiff for judgment by default.[86] Enlarging the time to plead does not operate as a stay of proceedings.[87] An irregular order extending the time to plead is operative so long as it is not appealed from and no steps have been taken to vacate it.[88] An order extending the time to plead may, on good cause shown, be revoked,[89] and when revoked, defendant must plead within the time which he originally had,[90] except that he has at least the rest of the day on which the order was vacated.[91] The service of an answer after granting of a motion to vacate an order extending the time, but before the settlement and entry of such order, is in time.[92]

d. Computation of Time. The time for answering is usually held to begin to run from the day of actual service of complaint or summons, and not from the day of the filing of proof of service.[93] In computing time the rule is to exclude the first day and count the last or vice versa.[94] If a certain number of days in term-time are allowed, it means days on which the court actually sits.[95] If the final day falls on Sunday it is to be excluded.[96] But where a certain number of days are designated without limitation, they need not be secular days.[97] Where time is extended a certain number of days, this is computed from the expiration of the period originally allowed, and not from the date of the extension.[98] A rule extending the time "to" a certain day means until the sitting of the court on that day, and does not include the day.[99] If defendant has a day's time to plead from the happening of an event, he has the whole of the day following that on which the event happens.[1] Where the time to plead is given in months, this means lunar and not calendar months.[2] When a defendant is ordered to plead forthwith he must plead within twenty-four hours.[3] Instanter means on the same day,[4] or within twenty-four hours.[5] After non-resident defendants have once appeared they thereafter come within the rules applicable to resident defendants.[6]

e. Conditions Imposed. The conditions imposed by the court upon granting leave to plead after the time has expired must not be unjust.[7] The court cannot deny defendant the right to set up any particular meritorious defense,[8] nor will it usually restrict him otherwise in the character of the defenses to be pleaded.[9] But he may be required to pay the costs and disbursements of the other party in opposing the motion for leave to plead.[10] Conditions imposed are not judgments conclusively affecting rights and interests of parties, and they may be modified at a subsequent term.[11]

f. Imparlance. An imparlance is time given by the court to a party to plead.[12] Three species of imparlance were recognized at common law. (1) The general imparlance, which reserved to defendant no exceptions and did not allow thereafter the pleading of matter in abatement or any objection to the jurisdiction of the court. (2) The special imparlance, which reserved the right to plead in abatement but not to the jurisdiction. (3) The general-special imparlance, which reserved all exceptions whatsoever, including the right to plead to the jurisdiction, but did not allow the pleading of a tender.[13] The granting of an imparlance is a matter within the discretion of the court.[14] Defendant is entitled to no imparlance in a summary process.[15]

g. Rule to Plead. Under the practice of some states an action may be commenced by filing and serving a declaration with notice that a rule to plead has been entered. Such rule to plead and notice thereof take the place of the customary writ of process, and have nothing directly to do with the pleadings further than is the case with a summons.[16] In other states the rule to plead is a proceeding in addition to the writ of process, and is a prerequisite to defendant's obligation to plead in the cause or to plaintiff's right to take default. The rule and notice inform defendant that he is required to plead within a designated time, and in case of his failure, default may be taken against him.[17] A rule to plead means pleading to the merits.[18]

4. Joint or Separate Pleas or Answers of Co-Defendants — a. General Right to Join or Sever.[19] In general, where there are several defendants in an action, and the defense is in its nature joint, they may either join in the same plea or they may sever.[20] So in a case where infants and adults are joined as defendants, they may join or sever in their answers.[21] And where two are sued jointly and one suffers a default, the other may plead alone.[22] This rule has been said not to apply to dilatory pleas.[23] If they sever, one defendant may plead in abatement, another in bar, and another may demur.[24] The mere fact that a joint answer is filed is not an admission of joint liability.[25] Defendants who appear jointly by the same attorney may nevertheless plead separately.[26]

b. Necessity That Joint Plea or Answer Be Good as to All Defendants. A joint plea or answer which is bad as to one defendant is bad as to all who join in it.[27] Some cases hold the rule applicable only to pleas of justification,[28] but the true doctrine seems to be that it applies to affirmative defenses generally.[29] But this rule is not applied to equitable defenses under the code.[30] Where a joint plea or answer is held bad for this reason, the court may, in its discretion, allow separate pleas or answers to be filed.[31] A several plea or answer, on the other hand, need be good only as to defendant who files it.[32]

c. Effect of Plea or Answer of One Defendant on Rights of Others. As a general rule one defendant cannot, in his answer, assert, the rights of a co-defendant who does not answer.[33] One defendant may by express adoption make an answer of a co-defendant available as his own,[34] or a part of a co-defendant's answer may be adopted if it is clearly indicated what part.[35] However, the defense pleaded by one defendant may inure to the benefit of another, where it goes to the sufficiency of the writ [36] or to the cause of action.[37] But other defenses, such as the statute of limitations,[38] or incapacity,[39] do not inure to defendants who do not plead them. Where part of the defendants sued upon a joint liability fail to defend, no judgment can be taken until all have had the full time to answer and until the issues tendered by those defending have been tried.[40] One defendant may, by motion, strike out irrelevant allegations from the answer of a co-defendant.[41]

d. Form of Allegations. Where the word "defendants" is used in the plea or answer without limitation, and there is nothing in the previous proceedings to indicate that it applies to less than all, the pleading will be considered as filed by all the defendants jointly.[42] Where one of several joint promisors pleads separately, the denial should be that he and the other defendants did not promise, and a denial that he promised is bad.[43]

e. Admissions in Answer of Co-Defendant. An admission in the plea or (Tenn.) 151, 152, the court said: "In 1 Chitty on Pl. 554 (Ed. of 1833), the position is laid down, and Sergeant Williams asserts the same doctrine (1 Saund. 28, note 3), that if a plea begin only as an answer to part, and is in truth but an answer to part, the plaintiff cannot demur to the plea, for it is sufficient as far as it extends; but must take his judgment for the part unanswered as by nil dicit. . . . But the position assumed by Mr. Chitty is contradicted and denied to be law, by very high authorities, both English and American. . . . We think the plaintiff, in such case, may, at his election, treat the plea as bad, and demur thereto; or he may waive the objection, and take issue thereon, and demand a judgment by default as to so much of the cause of action as remains unanswered."

fact they only answered a part;[53] but the rule now general is that a set-off or counter-claim is good so far as it goes, no matter whether it purports to answer the whole demand or not.[54] But when a set-off is treated on the trial as an answer in bar, it will be required to conform to the rules respecting such answers, and if it answers but a part of the demand while purporting to answer all, it will be held bad.[55]

6. Defenses to Several Counts. Where the declaration consists of several counts defendant may file a single plea to them all[56] or separate pleas to each.[57] A plea or answer need not answer the whole of the declaration or complaint when it consists of several counts, but where it purports to answer the entire pleading and is bad as to any one count it is bad altogether on demurrer.[58] Where an answer consisting of several defenses is filed to a complaint containing several counts, each defense should designate the count or counts to which it is intended to apply,[59] and each defense may be met separately and differently as plaintiff may choose.[60] A defense not expressly limited to one count will be construed to apply to all.[61] And where it is expressly limited to one defense but it is apparent from the averments that it really relates to all, it will be so considered.[62] And conversely, if a plea does not relate to every count, and does not specify the particular counts to which it does refer, but it is clear from the substance of the plea what counts it in fact refers to, this is sufficient.[63] A plea which professes to answer one count and in fact answers another is demurrable.[64] If the same cause of action is set up in two counts, and defendant files two pleas, one applying to both counts and the other applying to but one, plaintiff cannot on the trial abandon the count which is not met by the second plea, in order to avoid that plea.[65]

In Curran v. Curran, 40 Ind. 473, 483, the court said, respecting the rule in New York, Ohio, and Kentucky: "It has been repeatedly held, in all of such states, that an answer setting up a set-off, which assumed to answer the whole complaint, but only answered a part, would not be bad on demurrer. Such rulings are placed on the grounds that a set-off is not strictly a defence, and that from its very nature, it can only be regarded as an answer to so much of the plaintiff's demand as may be proved on the trial." And the cases theretofore decided, holding a contrary view, were expressly overruled. See, however, Shrum v. Salem, 13 Ind. App. 115, 39 N. E. 1050, where the court seems to revert to the old rule.

7. Pleading Different Defenses[66] — a. In General — (i) The English Practice. The early practice at common law did not allow more than one plea to the same cause of action.[67] This rule, however, resulted in a general tendency on the part of pleaders to crowd a multitude of facts into their pleas, and to correct this abuse a statute was enacted[68] expressly permitting a party to plead as many defenses as he might have to the same declaration or count thereof, in courts of record and by leave of court.[69] Subsequently, by reason of the custom of pleading the same matter of defense in different forms, a general rule was passed, by the judges,[70] prohibiting the statement of the same subject-matter of defense varying only in manner of statement, description, or circumstances, but the right to plead different matters of defense was not withdrawn.[71] But several defenses will not be allowed where they are merely vexatious.[72]

(ii) The American Practice. Under the American practice frequently by express statutory provision a defendant may interpose as many different defenses as he may have to the same cause of action,[73] and if any one of them is established he will be entitled to judgment.[74] Some old cases hold that several pleas may be filed only by leave of court.[75] The codes of procedure expressly provide that a defendant may set forth in his answer as many defenses and counter-claims as he may have, whether they are legal or equitable.[76] In some instances particular proceedings are expressly excepted from the operation of these provisions,[77] and it has been said that in any event the court has some discretion in excluding defenses not essential to the justice of the case.[78] An enumeration in the statute of certain pleas which may be pleaded together does not prohibit the union of other pleas which might have been joined before the statute.[79] In the absence of a statute permitting it, pleas which tender issues not triable by the same method of trial, cannot properly be joined.[80] Where two defenses are in fact identical in substance, the court may, on motion, compel defendant to elect between them.[81] In case of doubt as to whether defendant has intended to set up one or more than one defense, the court will determine the question from a consideration of the whole answer.[82]

compliance with this rule is sufficient.[84] Some of the codes require different defenses to be separately numbered also.[85] But allegations which together constitute but a single defense should not be separated.[86] When a defendant has set up several defenses, and has clearly indicated that they are separate and distinct, he cannot afterward on demurrer assert that they are not so.[87] The same facts may be set up both as a partial and as a full defense if they are separately stated,[88] or by way of defense and recoupment,[89] or otherwise showing different legal conclusions arising out of the same state of facts,[90] but the same defenses should not be repeated in different forms.[91] The code provision requiring the separate statement of defenses has been held not to apply to specific denials, so that denials of several material allegations in a complaint may be made in one division of an answer.[92] Affirmative and negative matter respecting the same portions of the complaint cannot properly be united in the same paragraph;[93] but an answer which confesses certain allegations of the complaint and avoids them by affirmative facts and denies all the others may be stated in one paragraph as a single defense.[94] Where separate defenses are not separately stated, a motion is the proper remedy.[95]

In Gardner v. McWilliams, 42 Oreg. 14, 17, 69 Pac. 915, the court said: "The rule is quite well settled that it is unnecessary to restate in a pleading facts contained in a prior count, which constitute matters of inducement, necessary to explain both; in which case the pleader, by referring to the preceding narrative, thereby makes a part of the subsequent count. . . . Matter stated in a pleading constituting a history of the transaction . . . which naturally precedes and logically leads up to the gravamen of the action or defense . . . is denominated inducement."

in dilatory pleas or pleas in bar.[3] But defendant may plead several facts in one plea if they together constitute one entire defense or single proposition or transaction.[4] To determine whether or not a plea is double, reference must be had to both the matter and the general frame and structure of the plea.[5]

(II) Matters Not Within Rule. Immaterial matter which is alleged in a plea will not make it double,[6] nor will matter which is alleged merely as inducement,[7] nor surplusage.[8] So where one defense, by reason of its insufficiency, may be treated as surplusage, it cannot render the plea double,[9] and where matters inappropriate to the defense pleaded, but proper for some other defense, incidentally appear in a plea, they will be deemed surplusage and will not render the plea bad for duplicity.[10] And a plea is not double which in one paragraph sets up defenses to each of several causes of action in plaintiff's complaint, if only one defense is pleaded to each one.[11] So a defendant may plead several distinct and independent pleas to separate parts of a single count.[12] A plea is not rendered double by an express averment of facts which would otherwise have been implied.[13]

ant could not file two pleas to the same count.[14] To remedy this inconvenience the statute of 5 Anne was passed, which allowed defendant, with leave of the court, to plead as many several matters as he should think necessary for his defense.[15] Under this statute it was the practice at first for the court to refuse leave when the proposed pleas were inconsistent,[16] but in modern practice such pleas, notwithstanding the apparent repugnancy between them, are permitted.[17] The discretion vested in the court by the statute of Anne to refuse leave to put in more than one plea is a legal discretion not to be exercised unless good reason exists.[18] In general a defendant will be allowed to plead as many different grounds of defense as may be thought necessary, although they appear to be contradictory and inconsistent, and the court will deny leave only where the several pleas are clearly repugnant, or will create unjust delay or embarrassment in obtaining a trial.[19] Defendant will not be allowed to plead several pleas which require different trials, and he will in such case be put to an election between his pleas.[20] Nor will the court allow a defendant to set up the same defense by a special plea and by a notice of special matter under the general issue, and when this is sought to be done a motion to strike or to elect will lie.[21] Even if the pleas be consistent the court may rescind the rule to plead several pleas, if defendant has made improper use of his leave for the purpose of delaying plaintiff and throwing difficulties in his way.[22] And if they be inconsistent the court may require an affidavit that they are necessary to the justice of the cause.[23]

(II) Under Codes and Practice Acts — (A) In General. Under the reformed procedure, as in force in England and in all the states in which the code system prevails, separate and distinct defenses are allowed to be pleaded simultaneously,[24] each being stated in a separate paragraph of the answer,[25] consistent in itself, and sufficient to constitute a defense to the action. As to whether a defendant, thus interposing distinct defenses in separate paragraphs of his answer, may rely upon defenses inconsistent with each other, the authorities are in apparent conflict. Many cases lay down the general rule that defenses inconsistent with

Reason for the rule.— In Rudd v. Dewey, 121 Iowa 454, 458, 96 N. W. 973, the court said: "Absurd as it may seem at first blush to allow defendant, charged with having negligently broken a borrowed kettle, to answer that he never borrowed the kettle, that it was broken when he borrowed it, and that it was sound when returned, nevertheless, when it is reflected that the controversy may be about a kettle borrowed by defendant's servant, as to which defendant had no knowledge whatever and that, the servant having disappeared, defendant will be entirely dependent on such casual evidence as he may be able to scrape up in the neighborhood, the rule is not by any means unreasonable or without support in public policy."

many of the cases the decision of the question has been made to turn, not on the right to plead inconsistent defenses, but on the question whether the distinct defenses pleaded are in fact necessarily inconsistent.[32] And even in those states allowing inconsistent defenses to be pleaded, it is doubtful whether a defendant would be allowed to plead and rely on two defenses so inconsistent that if one is true the other must be false.[33] The proper remedy for inconsistent defenses, where they are not allowable, is a motion to strike,[34] or a motion to elect.[35] If no motion is made the objection will be deemed waived.[36]

(B) Denials and Affirmative Defenses. Unless forbidden by statute,[37] answers both in denial and in confession and avoidance of the cause of action may be filed together, and both may be relied upon at the same time, and one may not be used to destroy the effect of the other, so long as they are set forth in separate paragraphs.[38] In some jurisdictions, however, denials and affirmative defenses will be allowed to be filed together only when they are not inconsistent, that is, so contradictory that one of them must necessarily be false.[39] Where there is only a seeming and logical inconsistency which arises merely from a denial and a plea in confession and avoidance, such defenses are not held to be inconsistent.[40] An affirmative defense, when joined with a general denial, may be deemed a plea in avoidance simply, without confession,[41] or the confession may be considered as made for the purposes of the defense only, like the confession implied in a demurrer, but not an absolute confession of the truth of the facts alleged.[42] A defendant cannot, however, deny a fact in one part of an answer, and then in an affirmative defense expressly admit that same fact, and still claim the benefit of the denial.[43] But he may so adapt his pleadings as to meet the possible conditions and contingencies of the case that his opponent may prove.[44] Thus it has been held that a defendant may deny a fact, and in a separate defense allege that if the fact previously denied is true, then certain other facts are true which avoid its legal effect.[45]

e. Joinder of Defenses and Cross Demands. A counter-claim or other cross demand may be pleaded in the same plea or answer with other defenses, but it must be separate and distinct. A single plea cannot be both an answer in bar and a cross demand.[46] But it has been held that a cross bill in equity cannot be filed in connection with a full legal defense in an action at law.[47] A cross demand is not evidence against defendant upon the trial of a defense or vice versa,[48] nor will it operate as a waiver of the defense.[49] A plea in bar to a part of plaintiff's demand with a set-off to the remainder is good.[50] The rules respecting the pleading of cross demands and defenses which are inconsistent appear to be the same as the rules respecting inconsistent defenses generally.[51]

f. General Issue and Pleas Amounting Thereto. A plea amounting to the general issue is a plea which is in effect a denial of matter which plaintiff alleges or must prove on the general issue to sustain his action.[52] Pleas of this kind the court might possibly place a different construction upon the transaction than he himself placed upon it, and that he desired to protect his rights in case such construction was placed upon the transaction by the court, did not constitute an inconsistent defense.

Although not amounting to the general issue in form a plea which amounts to it in effect is bad. Keedy v. Long, 71 Md. 385, 18 Atl. 704, 5 L. R. A. 759; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 447.

Reasons for holding this kind of plea bad have been given as follows: Because it tends to confusion and uncertainty (Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Ward, 5 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 391, 5 Am. L. Rec. 372); useless prolixity (Bennett v. Cody, 35 N. Brunsw. 277); unnecessary expense and troublesome prolixity (Kennedy v. Strong, 10 Johns. (N. Y.) 289); frivolous (Moore v. Mickell, Walk. (Miss.) 231); and argumentative instead of a direct denial (Hayselden v. Staff, 5 A. & E. 153, 31 E. C. L. 562).

Under statutes permitting defendant to enter several pleas it has been held that a plea may be allowed, although it amount to the general issue. Hopkinson v. Shelton, 37 Ala. 306, construing Code, § 2237, Pamphl. Acts (1853–1854), p. 60. In Mississippi, however, under a similar statutory provision (Rev. Code, p. 16, § 49) a plea amounting to the general issue has been held bad even though the statute allows defendant to plead as many several matters as he may think necessary to his defense. The two pleas distinguished.— There is a great distinction between the case of a plea which amounts to the general issue and a plea that discloses matter which may be given in evidence under the general issue. Under the latter various things may be given in evidence which may also be proved under the general issue, but it is incorrect to say that these amount to the general issue, for they only defeat the cause of action; but what, correctly, may be said to amount to the general issue is that for some reason specially stated the cause of action does not exist in the form in which it is alleged. Page v. Prentice, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 322 [quoting and approving decision of Lord Denman in Hayselden v. Staff, 5 A. & E. 153, 31 E. C. L. 562]. This distinction is discussed fully also in Potter v. Stanley, 1 D. Chipm. (Vt.) 243.

under the general issue does not make the special plea bad, unless it amount to the general issue.[56]

g. Joinder of Pleas in Abatement and Bar — (i) At Common Law. Under the common-law practice it is generally held that pleas in abatement and pleas in bar cannot be joined in the same answer, since the former are waived by the latter.[57] But a plea in abatement, which would otherwise be waived, may be

Matter which may be specially pleaded.— The following matter may be specially pleaded, although admissible under the general issue: Matter in confession and avoidance (Keedy v. Long, 71 Md. 385, 18 Atl. 704, 5 L. R. A. 759; Duvees v. Manhattan Ins. Co., 34 N. J. L. 244; Dibble v. Duncan, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,880, 2 McLean 553; Hayselden v. Staff, 5 A. & E. 153, 31 E. C. (Ind.) 322; Saunders v. Stotts, 6 Ohio 380, 27 Am. Dec. 263; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Polly, supra; Dibble v. Duncan, supra; Paramore v. Johnson, 1 Ld. Co. v. Polly, supra; Hussey v. Jacob, supra).

That it tends to narrow the issues is the reason sometimes given for allowing special pleas in addition to the general issue. Ridenour v. Mayo, 29 Ohio St. 138; Dibble v. Duncan, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,880, 2 McLean 553.

The special plea must give color, express or implied, to plaintiff's claim. Keedy v. Long, 71 Md. 385, 18 Atl. 704, 5 L. R. A. 759; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 447; Dibble v. Duncan, 7 Fed. Cas. No. 3,880, 2 McLean 553; Carr v. Hinchliff, 4 B. & C. 547, 7 D. & R. 42, 4 L. J. K. B. O. S. 5, 10 E. C. L. 697.

Matter of fact or of law.— The distinction sometimes laid down is that mere matter of fact which may be given in evidence under the general issue should not be pleaded specially, but matter of law, or matter of fact mixed with matter of law, although they may be given in evidence under the general issue, may also be pleaded specially (Haines v. Lytle, 1 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 198, 1 West. L. Bul. 1; Baltimore, etc., R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Gratt. (Va.) 447; Carr v. Hinchliff, 4 B. & C. 547, 7 D. & R. 42, 4 L. J. K. B. O. S. 5, 10 E. C. L. 697; Hussey v. Jacob, 1 Ld. Raym. 87), for otherwise plaintiff "should be obliged to commit a point of law to a jury who is ignorant of it, which would be absurd" (Hussey v. Jacob, supra).

preserved by an express reservation of the benefit of the plea in abatement contained in the plea in bar.[58] Under a statute providing that defendant may plead both in abatement and in bar at the same time, and that the plea in bar is not a waiver of the plea in abatement, defendant may interpose a plea in abatement independently, and in case it is overruled file a plea in bar.[59]

(II) UNDER THE CODES. In the code states, on the contrary, it is almost universally held that the statute allowing the joinder of defenses is broad enough to permit the joinder of pleas in abatement and in bar.[60] The code rule is followed in some other states.[61] Where they may be filed at the same time, the plea in abatement must be tried first, and when defendant goes to trial without objection on the plea in bar he waives the plea in abatement.[62] But even under the code, the same defense cannot at the same time be pleaded both in abatement and in bar.[63]

h. Joinder of Pleas in Abatement. There is a difference in authority as to whether several pleas in abatement may be pleaded together, by reason of differences in the statutes authorizing joinder of pleas. In some jurisdictions joinder is permitted,[65] while in others it is refused.[66] It seems that at common law joinder was not permissible.[67]

8. Responsiveness — a. In General. A plea or answer must respond to the allegations of the declaration or complaint.[68] It is sufficient if it substantially answers the whole charge as laid in the declaration or so much of it as it purports to answer,[69] and insufficient if it does not.[70] If it denies, it must deny precisely what is alleged, and not some different fact.[71] If it sets up an affirmative defense, it must state facts which are related to the facts averred by plaintiff and which constitute a defense thereto.[72] A plea in bar which neither traverses nor Matter of abatement can not be answered either after, or concurrently with, matter in bar." confesses and avoids the allegations of the declaration is bad.[73] Substantial responsiveness is sufficient, if the meaning is clear;[74] and where the plea substantially meets the case made by plaintiff irrelevant allegations will be deemed surplusage.[75] The facts only, alleged by plaintiff, need be met, not the conclusions of law.[76] The answer must respond to the complaint, and not to the bill of particulars.[77]

b. As to Time. The time alleged respecting the averments or denials in the plea must correspond with the time alleged in plaintiff's pleadings or with the time when suit was commenced, or plea filed.[78] Thus in a plea of alien enemy, it must be averred that such was the character of plaintiff at the commencement of the action;[79] and a plea in abatement that defendant was a resident of another county must refer to the time when the writ was issued,[80] and need not allege that the ground of abatement has continued up to the time of pleading.[81] But a plea of another action pending must show that it is still pending at the time the plea is filed.[82] If facts are characterized as having occurred on a certain date, the plea must, in answering them, refer to the same date.[83] A plea is by some authorities held to speak from the commencement of the action;[84] but other cases hold the contrary rule that it ordinarily speaks from the time when it is pleaded.[85]

9. Formal Commencement and Conclusion — a. In General. Under the early common-law rule it was necessary that each plea have its own proper commencement and conclusion.[86] Whether a plea is to be deemed a plea in abatement or a plea in bar is to be determined from its formal parts.[87] A plea which concludes in bar will be taken as a plea in bar, no matter what its commencement or substance.[88] Where the commencement is inconsistent with the conclusion or either is inconsistent with the body of the plea, it will be deemed bad.[89]

b. Pleas to the Jurisdiction. A plea to the jurisdiction has usually no formal commencement, but concludes with the prayer, "whether the court will or ought to take further cognizance of the plea aforesaid."[90] Pleas to the jurisdiction should conclude with a verification.[91] Statutes abolishing the necessity for a formal defense in a plea apply to pleas to the jurisdiction as well as to pleas in bar.[92]

c. Pleas in Abatement — (i) Common Law. At common law pleas in abatement were usually pleaded without a characteristic formal commencement, although they had a formal conclusion.[93] The ordinary conclusion for a plea in abatement is, "And this he, the said defendant, is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment of the said writ" or "bill" or "declaration" or "writ and declaration" as the case may be, and that the same may be quashed.[94] A proper conclusion is considered essential,[95] but a plea should not be treated as a mere nullity simply because its conclusion is irregular.[96] Where the plea contains no prayer for judgment it is fatally defective.[97] A plea in abatement for matter not apparent on the face of the record may both begin and conclude with a prayer for judgment.[98] But such a plea has been held bad when it sets up new matter.[99] A plea in abatement setting up new matter should conclude with a verification.[1] Where the objection is to the writ, judgment may nevertheless be prayed of the writ and declaration,[2] although it is sufficient to pray judgment of the writ alone.[3] Where the objection is to the declaration, judgment may be prayed of the writ alone in jurisdictions where the declaration is part of the writ.[4] Where the objection is to both the writ and declaration, a plea in abatement of the writ alone is sufficient.[5] A plea based on a variance between the declaration and the writ may pray judgment either of the writ [6] or of the writ and declaration.[7] A plea in abatement of another action pending is sufficient which prays judgment of the writ alone.[8] But there is authority to the contrary.[9] Where suit is commenced by bill, the plea should pray judgment of the bill.[10]

(II) Under the Codes. The formal parts of pleas in abatement are not required under the code procedure.[11]

d. Pleas in Suspension. A plea in suspension, like other dilatory pleas, is generally pleaded without a formal commencement.[12] It concludes with the prayer that the action may remain without day until a specified act occurs.[13] Thus the plea of alien enemy prays that the action remain without day until the conclusion of a treaty of peace.[14]

It is no substantial objection to a plea in abatement that in the beginning it prays judgment of the writ that it may abate, and in the conclusion prays judgment of the writ that it may be quashed. Lyman v. Dodge, 13 N. H. 197. Note (1) to Foxwist v. Tremaine, 2 Saund. 207, 209, 85 Eng. e. Pleas in Bar. At common law the formal commencement of a plea in bar was actionem non.[15] But the necessity of a formal commencement is now generally obviated by the practice acts of the several jurisdictions.[16] Formal conclusions or prayers for judgment are usually deemed necessary.[17] All pleas which tender issue should conclude to the country, if they are to be tried by jury,[18] or with other appropriate formula in case of a different mode of trial, as by the record, etc.[19] On the other hand, all pleas which set up new affirmative matter should conclude with a verification.[20] The verification is a formula used in addition to the formal conclusion or prayer for judgment, and usually precedes it.[21] If, however, the new matter set up is purely negative, and in effect but denies a material allegation of the declaration, the conclusion should be to the country.[22] New affirmative matter consisting of inducement merely will not require a verification.[23] The special traverse is of this nature, affirmative matter being set up in what is called the inducement, and the absque hoc turning this defense which is affirmative in form into a denial, and hence should conclude to the country.[24]

15. See Lord v. Brookfield, 37 N. J. L. 552. See also Stephen Pl. 395.

Form.— The usual form was, "Says that the said [plaintiff] ought not to have or maintain his aforesaid action against him, the said [defendant], because he says," etc. Stephen Pl. (8th Am. ed.) 395.

16. See the statutes of the several states. And see Stafford v. Anders, 8 Fla. 34.

In Florida it is held that, although the defense "actio non" has been dispensed with by a rule of court, its use will not invalidate a plea in which it occurs. Stafford v. Anders, 8 Fla. 34.

In England it was provided by the Rules Hilary Term 4 Wm. IV, rule 9, that the use of an allegation of actionem non should not be necessary, and the Common Law Procedure Act (1852), § 66, is to the same effect.

17. Wilkinson v. Pomeroy, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,674, 9 Blatchf. 513.

Rules Hilary Term 4 Wm. IV, rule 9, obviated the necessity of a prayer of judgment in a plea in bar, but the necessity of a formal conclusion where an estoppel was pleaded was excepted.

If the plea is to be proved by the record the verification should read, "he is ready to verify by the writ or record." Durand v. Griswold, 26 Vt. 48.

21. The special plea in bar, after setting up the facts constituting the defense, concludes thus: "And this he the said defendant is ready to verify, wherefore he prays judgment if the said plaintiff ought . . . to have or maintain his aforesaid action thereof against him." 1 Chitty Pl. A plea of performance is of this nature. Sherwin v. Bliss, 4 Vt. 96.

In covenant.— It is said in Krog v. Rice, 1 Speers (S. C.) 333, 338, "In covenant, there is no general traverse. All the pleas are special. The plea of performance should have concluded with a verification, and the plaintiff should have replied, and assigned specific breaches." But see Contee v. Garner, 6 Fed. Cas. No. 3,139, 2 Cranch C. C. 162, where it is held that a special plea of non est factum must conclude with a verification.

23. Sampson v. Henry, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 379.

24. Dowding v. Eastwood, 4 U. C. Q. B.

But this conclusion does not preclude plaintiff from pleading over to the inducement when the traverse is immaterial.[25] A plea of matter of defense arising after the commencement of the action must conclude with a prayer as to the further maintenance of the action.[26] Under the code there are neither formal commencements nor formal conclusions.[27]

B. Dilatory Pleas and Matter in Abatement — 1. Time to Plead[28] — a. In General. Inasmuch as dilatory pleas are not favored, the time within which they may be filed is often rigidly limited by statute, rule of court, or rule of practice,[29] and a strict compliance with the established practice in this respect is insisted on.[30] But as in the case of other pleas,[31] dilatory pleas may, in the discretion of the court, for cause shown, be received after the time limited has passed,[32] and such action will not be reviewed on appeal,[33] unless, in the exercise of its discretion, the court overrides well recognized rules of law.[34] A dilatory plea must ordinarily be filed at the return term of the writ,[35] if the declaration has been filed,[36] or at the earliest practicable time.[37] It has been held that a dilatory plea is too late after the expiration of the rule to plead,[38] and that ignorance of a cause for abatement will not excuse the filing of the plea after the time limited.[39] A plea in abatement cannot be filed after a general imparlance,[40] or general continuance,[41] nor after a motion for a continuance has been overruled.[42] But it may be filed after a special imparlance entered of record.[43] A statutory continuance is in the nature of a special imparlance and saves defendant's rights.[44] Where time for pleading is extended, with no limitation as to the kind of plea, a plea in abatement may be filed.[45]

b. Plea to the Jurisdiction. The time at which a plea to the jurisdiction of the court must be interposed is controlled primarily by the grounds upon which it is based. The general rule is that a want of jurisdiction in the court over the subject-matter of the proceedings may be taken advantage of at any time.[46] Where, however, the objection is to the jurisdiction of the person or to the form of the proceedings rather than their substance, the objection may be waived.[47] For example, a plea to the jurisdiction based upon lack of or defective service of process, or other matter going to the jurisdiction of the person cannot be urged after a general appearance,[48] or after a plea to the merits,[49] or after a dilatory plea upon other grounds.[50] Although the objection that the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter may be raised at any stage of the proceedings, it is nevertheless advisable, where there is prima facie jurisdiction, to plead it specially.[51]

2. Order of Pleading — a. In General. The common-law order of pleading which was deemed natural because each subsequent plea admits that there is no foundation for the former, is as follows: (1) To the jurisdiction of the court; (2) to the disability of the person; (3) to the count or declaration; (4) to the writ; (5) to the action itself in bar thereof.[52] Any one of these pleas is a waiver of those preceding it in order.[53] In accordance with this principle, it is too late to file a dilatory plea after pleading to the merits,[54] after the trial has begun,[55] or after the jury has been sworn.[56] A dilatory plea is likewise too late when it is filed after the filing of an affidavit of merits by defendant.[57] But the matter is largely within the control of the court, and under special circumstances a dilatory plea may be allowed after a plea in bar.[58] Even when the statute permits pleas in abatement and in bar to be pleaded together, defendant cannot, after having pleaded in bar, subsequently plead in abatement.[59] The fact that a defendant in attachment appears and replevies the property does not deprive him of his right to plead in abatement.[60] Matters arising after a plea in bar are, however, available in abatement.[61] A default is equivalent to issue joined on the merits, and no dilatory plea can ordinarily be filed thereafter.[62] If defendant has for-

Admission by subsequent plea.— In Denning v. Kelly, 9 Ark. 435, 437, the court said: "The law has prescribed and settled the order of pleading, that the defendant is to pursue when brought into court by the plaintiff. That order is, 1st, To the jurisdiction of the court. 2d. To the disability of the plaintiff. 3d. In abatement. He cannot plead successively two pleas of the same kind or grade, and if he pleads a plea belonging to a subsequent order or division, he thereby loses the privilege of all pleas comprehended in any prior order or division; in other words, such subsequent plea is an admission that none of the previous objections exist."

b. Same Matter Pleadable in Abatement and Bar. Where the same matter may be pleaded either in abatement or in bar, and defendant chooses the latter, he is entitled to all the privileges accorded to a plea in bar, and is not subject to the limitations of a plea in abatement.[64] And where he pleads first in abatement, and his plea is overruled, he is not precluded thereby from subsequently setting up the same matter in bar.[65]

c. Effect of Demand For Bill of Particulars. A demand for a bill of particulars may be made at any time, and does not constitute an appearance nor is it confined to the merits, and hence it does not waive the right to plead to the jurisdiction or in abatement.[66]

d. Plea in Abatement After Demurrer or Motion. There is a conflict of authority as to whether a plea in abatement may be filed after the overruling of a demurrer; some cases holding that it may,[67] others that it may not.[68] It has been held that where the demurrer is withdrawn under leave, matter in abatement may be set up in the answer.[69] After an insufficient motion, the matter contained therein cannot be set up in a plea in abatement.[70]

3. Pleas to the Jurisdiction — a. In General.[71] Under the use of the term pleas in abatement to include all dilatory pleas,[72] pleas to the jurisdiction are frequently termed pleas in abatement;[73] but under the common-law practice they differ from the ordinary plea in abatement in that they must be signed in person and not by attorney[74] and should conclude si curia cognoscere velit.[75] In some cases a distinction is made between technical dilatory pleas to the jurisdiction which admit a general jurisdiction of the court but state a special exemption of defendant or a special privilege of place and pleas which deny the existence of a cause of action within the local limits of the jurisdiction.[76] In other cases a plea to the jurisdiction has been classed as a special plea in bar.[77] It is reversible error for a court to treat a plea to the jurisdiction as a demurrer.[78]

b. Grounds. Where facts not of record must be shown to defeat jurisdiction, a plea to the jurisdiction or in abatement is the proper remedy.[79] Where no court has jurisdiction, the proper plea is one in bar.[80] Where the objection is that the amount involved is less than the requisite sum, this is a good ground for a plea in abatement according to some authorities,[81] but not according to others.[82] The fact that a transitory action is brought in the wrong place is not ground for a plea in abatement.[83] The fact that a local action is commenced in the wrong county does not oblige defendant to plead the fact in abatement.[84] After a motion to dismiss has been overruled, a plea to the jurisdiction on the same ground ought not to be entertained.[85]

c. Contents. In pleas to the jurisdiction of courts of general jurisdiction, it must be shown not only that the court in which the action is commenced has no jurisdiction but that there is another court which has jurisdiction.[86] An exception to this rule is recognized when the plea presents facts showing that the subject-matter is beyond the general jurisdiction of the courts of the state or of the country,[87] and a further exception is made in some cases where lack of jurisdiction depends upon non-residence or venue.[88] In pleading to the jurisdiction of an inferior court of limited jurisdiction however, it is not necessary to allege the jurisdiction to which the plaintiff should have resorted.[89] The plea must negative every fact from which jurisdiction may be presumed.[90] So a plea of want of jurisdiction of the person must negative every means by which jurisdiction might have been acquired.[91] But where there are exceptions in the statute, only such need be negatived as are applicable to the case.[92] Where jurisdiction is objected to on the ground of non-residence, defendant must allege not only that he is not a resident of the locality which would support the jurisdiction, but must show where his residence is.[93] But reasonable particularity in this respect is sufficient.[94] And where the jurisdiction of an inferior court has been ousted by a superior court, it is sufficient for the plea to allege that proper pleadings have been filed invoking the jurisdiction of the superior court, and that it has assumed the exercise of such jurisdiction.[95]

d. Certainty. Mere general conclusions will not be sufficient in a pleading averring lack of jurisdiction,[96] but the facts showing want of jurisdiction must be positively alleged with the utmost degree of certainty.[97] This requirement of rigid certainty does not, however, mean that courts in construing a plea of this character, will misunderstand or refuse to comprehend the ordinary import of language,[98] and it has been said that pleas to the jurisdiction need not exhibit the same technical strictness as pleas in abatement.[99] A plea to the jurisdiction can derive no help from the writ or declaration, unless referred to in such a way as to make it a part of the plea.[1] Facts appearing upon the record need not be alleged in the plea.[2]

4. Pleas in Suspension. A plea in suspension of the action is one which shows some ground for not proceeding at the present time, and prays that the pleading be stayed until that ground be removed. But the number of these pleas was small at common law, and they are of very infrequent occurrence in practice.[3] A plea of alien enemy is a proper plea in suspension.[4] So a plea that defendant, who is sued on a promissory note, has been garnisheed by creditors of plaintiff's assignor on the identical note in suit, is a plea in suspension.[5]

5. Pleas in Abatement[6]— a. In General. The general rule is that a matter of defense which shows that plaintiff has no cause of action should be pleaded in bar; but that which merely defeats the present suit and does not conclude plaintiff from maintaining an action upon the cause stated, should be pleaded in abatement.[7] Thus a plea of former judgment is in bar, and not in abatement;[8] as is a plea of non est factum,[9] or a plea of payment, although pleaded nominally in abatement.[10] Under the codes generally matter in abatement is to be pleaded as a defense.[11] Although in some of the code states pleas in abatement are retained. Some matters are pleadable either in abatement or bar, and in such cases defendant may plead them as he chooses.[12] But he must clearly indicate in which aspect he pleads them.[13] Matter in abatement pleaded in bar is bad,[14] and so is matter in bar

Effect of codes on pleas in abatement.— In Scottish Union, etc., Ins. Co. v. Strain, 70 S. W. 274, 275, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 958, the court, in discussing the effect of the codes upon pleas in abatement, said: "The Code of Practice has virtually abolished pleas in abatement. Defense to an action can be made only by motion, demurrer, or answer. The grounds of demurrer now specifically recited in the Civil Code were, under the old practice, grounds for a plea in abatement; and many other defects and irregularities which were also reached by plea in abatement, such as the want of bond for costs in an action brought by a non-resident, a variance between the writ and declaration, the failure of the plaintiff to file the note sued on with the petition, as required by the statute authorizing suit by petition and summons, the misnomer of the plaintiff or defendant, or the omission of the names of the firm or other person to whom an obligation was given by their title or description only, now must be reached by motion, and not by plea in abatement." In Clark v. Oregon Short Line R. Co., 29 Mont. 317, 319, 74 Pac. 734, the court, quoting Pomeroy's Code Remedies, said: "Defenses still exist of the same essential nature as those which were formerly set up by means of a plea in abatement, and a judgment thereon in favor of the defendant does not forever bar the plaintiff from the further prosecution of his demand. They are governed, however, by the same rules of procedure that regulate all the other defenses which may be relied upon by a defendant. . . . All defenses which are analogous to the ancient pleas in abatement — that is, all which are based upon the same facts — are evidently new matter; they cannot be proved under the general denial, but must be specially pleaded."

pleaded in abatement.[15] A plea or answer in abatement is not required to state facts which constitute a defense, but merely facts sufficient to abate the action.[16] A plea in abatement is not an issuable plea,[17] and on such a plea the merits of plaintiff's case are not open to inquiry.[18] Statutes abolishing special demurrers [19] and special pleading [20] do not apply to pleas in abatement. Nor does a statute authorizing brief statements of special matter in defense supersede the use of pleas in abatement.[21]

b. Grounds — (I) General Rule. Matter in abatement de hors the record is properly presented by a plea in abatement;[22] in case the grounds appear in the complaint the remedy is by demurrer.[23]

(II) Improper Form of Action. The fact that the action is misconceived is ground for a plea in abatement,[24] although such a plea is rarely used.

(III) Prematurity of Action.[25] In case action is brought before the cause of action accrues the objection may be taken by plea in abatement [26] or at the trial under the general issue,[27] or in case the objection appear on the face of the complaint, by demurrer.[28] Some cases, however, hold that the objection must be urged by plea in abatement when not apparent from the complaint.[29]

For example, it should be pleaded in abatement that plaintiff is not in being,[36] is fictitious,[37] that a person suing in a special capacity has no right to do so,[38] that an assignee has no right to sue,[39] that suit has been begun without authority,[40] or that persons suing as husband and wife are not lawfully married.[41] Where a disability exists which does not totally defeat the right of action it must be pleaded in suspension and not in abatement.[42] Where there are two or more plaintiffs a disability of one of them is ground for abatement as to all.[43] But there were some exceptions at common law where the party disabled has been previously summoned and severed.[44] The fact that plaintiff is himself legally liable upon an instrument sued on must be raised in bar and not in abatement.[45] A plea to the merits or of the general issue admits the capacity of plaintiff to sue.[46]

Curing defect.— A plea in abatement for non-joinder of a cotenant in an action for tort is overcome by the execution of a deed by the tenant in common to plaintiff after the commencement of the suit under verbal agreement between them, made prior to the suit, and at the time of the dissolution of their partnership, whereby the land in question put an end to any action for the cause.[67] If one of two part-owners bring an action for tort and defendant neglects to plead the non-joinder of the other in abatement, the latter may afterward sue alone and the non-joinder of the owner who has already recovered is not a ground for abatement.[68] If the cause of action is divisible, and plaintiff cannot sue alone for a part, and this does not appear on the face of his writ or declaration, defendant may successfully plead in abatement to such part, and the action will proceed as to the residue.[69]

(B) Defendants —(1) CONTRACTS. A plea in abatement is proper on the ground of non-joinder of defendants who ought to be joined in actions ex contractu.[70] Where non-joinder of defendants who ought to be joined in an action of contract is not disclosed by the record it must be taken advantage of by a plea in abatement.[71]

The rule applies to certain actions quasi ex contractu.[72] And at common law a non-joinder could be availed of otherwise than by plea in abatement only where it appeared from the face of the record that there was another party still living who was jointly liable.[73] But a plea in abatement, it has been held, will not lie where the defendants not joined are without the state and beyond the jurisdiction.[74] In an action upon a joint and several obligation non-joinder of co-parties cannot be pleaded in abatement, and this rule applies to obligations joint in form, but made joint and several in effect by statute.[75] Defendant cannot plead in abatement a secret partnership.[76] Under the statutes in some jurisdictions upon the filing of a plea in abatement for the non-joinder of a defendant the party omitted may be brought in by scire facias.[77] By statute in some jurisdictions, where the common-law procedure otherwise prevails, the action is not abated for defect of parties, but upon defendant's plea in abatement suggesting the names of the necessary parties process issues against them.[78]

(2) TORTS. In actions of tort a non-joinder of defendants is, not as a general rule ground for a plea in abatement.[79] An exception exists in cases where the title to realty is brought in question.[80] And in certain cases, another exception has been recognized with regard to actions quasi ex contractu.[81]

(x) MISJOINDER OF PARTIES—(A) Plaintiffs. Misjoinder of plaintiffs in tort must be pleaded in abatement;[82] and in some jurisdictions, where the misjoinder of parties plaintiff is apparent on the face of the petition, it may be raised by a special exception.[83] A statute providing that when there has been a misjoinder of parties plaintiff or defendant the court may order the proceeding to abate as to any party improperly joined, and to proceed by or against the others, will not operate to prevent the abatement of an action brought at law when it should have been brought in equity.[84]

(B) Defendants.[85] Misjoinder of party defendants should be pleaded in abatement,[86] although under the statutes in some states an improper joinder of defendants is not a ground for abatement, but the cause may be prosecuted to final judgment against defendants properly joined.[87] Where a joint liability is alleged, however, an answer showing that the liability is not joint is not in abatement but in bar.[88] It is no ground for a plea in abatement that a person really or nominally interested is made a party defendant instead of being joined as a plaintiff.[89]

(XI) VARIANCE BETWEEN DECLARATION AND WRIT. A variance between the declaration and the writ, especially where the statute requires the writ to set out in brief the substance of the declaration,[90] is generally considered ground for abatement.[91] But this is not the case where the variance is such as not to mislead,[92] or where it is immaterial.[93] But some cases hold that inasmuch as a plea in abatement must ordinarily rest upon something de hors the record, and a variance is apparent upon the record, the defect must be availed of by demurrer and not by plea.[94]

(xii) Miscellaneous Grounds.[95] Among other proper grounds of a plea in abatement are the following: Summons issued before note filed, where statute requires its filing;[96] that the promise was made by defendant and plaintiff jointly and not by the defendant severally;[97] an assignment fraudulently made to evade the law as to venue;[98] garnishment of the debt by a third person;[99] or the right to revive a suit against the administrator of the deceased sole defendant.[1] But it is not a proper ground of abatement that the claims of plaintiff are so involved that resort should be had to a court of equity;[2] or that one through whom plaintiff claims is misnamed;[3] or that defendant is imprisoned, since he may defend by counsel while in jail.[4] Nor can it be pleaded in abatement that a defendant administrator's authority has terminated by act of law, for he should have pleaded plene administravit;[5] nor that an attachment is pending in a foreign jurisdiction;[6] nor that the controversy has been submitted to arbitrators who have not yet made an award;[7] nor delay in prosecution which might have been terminated at any time by the act of defendant.[8] A plea in abatement based upon an erroneous theory of the action is bad.[9] A plea in abatement which is disproved by the record is bad.[10]

c. Form and Construction — (i) In General. Matter in abatement must be pleaded with exactness and should be certain to every intent,[11] it cannot be aided by any intendment or inference.[12] A plea of this character must negative every conclusion against the pleader,[13] and all matter which, if alleged on the other side, would defeat the plea.[14] It should be direct and positive, and free from repugnancy or argumentativeness,[15] and should allege facts, not conclusions.[16] But a mere clerical error will not vitiate a plea in abatement.[17] In some jurisdictions, however, this strict rule of construction has been abolished by statute;[18] and generally the court will consider the ground of abatement, and where meritorious, construe the plea with corresponding liberality.[19] If a plea in abatement is inartificially drawn it should not be rejected, but plaintiff should be left to his demurrer.[20] In construing a plea in abatement the words and grammatical construction will be given their most natural interpretation.[21] A plea in abatement cannot be aided by matter in the writ or declaration unless it is expressly referred to.[22] Where bail plead in abatement, the plea must allege the facts authorizing them to defend the suit.[23] A plea in abatement of the writ may be both of the writ and declara-

In Buckles v. Harlan, 54 Ill. 361, 362, the court said: "Though pleas in abatement, being usually of a dilatory character, are therefore not favored, the one in question is not precisely of that character. The injustice of entertaining two suits against the same party, at the same time, for the same cause of action, is so glaring as to give to pleas setting up such facts a more favorable position in courts, than one merely dilatory; still such a plea must not, in its frame, omit any of the essential requirements of the law."

tion; and it must be so where it is intended to plead in abatement only of a part of the writ, and the cause of the abatement arises only on some of the counts in the declaration.[24] Under some statutes it is provided that no dilatory plea shall be received unless the party offering it offers to be filed therewith an affidavit proving the truth thereof, or shows some probable cause to the court to induce them to believe that the matter set forth is true.[25] Pleas in abatement other than to the jurisdiction [26] or for misnomer [27] may be pleaded by attorney.[28]

(II) Under the Codes. Pleas in abatement, under the code practice, do not have the formal characteristics requisite at common law. They are not called pleas, but matter in abatement not open to objection by motion or demurrer, is pleaded by answer.[29] But many defenses in abatement exist under the code as at common law, and the general rules applicable to them are substantially the same as the common-law rules.[30]

(III) Necessity of Giving Better Writ. A plea in abatement should point out specifically the precise defects in such a way that plaintiff may be enabled to correct them. It should, in other words, give plaintiff a better writ or declaration.[31] But this does not apply to cases where the defect is one of substance and plaintiff cannot have a better writ.[32]

(IV) Particular Pleas — (A) Another Action Pending — (1) In General. A plea in abatement upon the ground of the pendency of another proceeding must show in what court such action is pending,[33] that the court has jurisdiction,[34]

may be prosecuted for the same cause of action with leave of court, the plea must negative leave.[48] The pendency of a bill in equity has not usually been deemed a ground of abatement for an action at law,[49] hence the plea must show whether the action is pending at law or in equity.[50] In construing a plea of this nature the court will particularly consider whether the aim of either of the parties is meritorious or merely vexatious.[51] Under the codes the common-law strictness has been much relaxed.[52]

(2) Reference to Record of Pending Action. A plea of another action pending should allege it "as by the record," or "as by the files and record of said court appears." [53] It is also held that the plea should set out the general character and objects of the former suit,[54] and the relief prayed.[55] And some cases still follow the old English practice of requiring the record of the pending suit to be set out in full in the plea.[56]

(B) Misnomer. A plea in abatement for misnomer of defendant must disclose his true name.[57] It must be denied that defendant is known and called by the name employed,[58] or has previously been known or called by that name.[59] In like manner an exception that plaintiff is not suing under his true name must state

51. In Hatch v. Spofford, 22 Conn. 485, 494, 58 Am. Dec. 433, the court said: "It is obvious then, a second suit is not, of course, to be abated and dismissed as vexatious, but all the attending circumstances are to be first carefully considered, and the true question will be, what is the aim of the plaintiff? Is it fair and just, or is it oppressive? Is it possible the defendant may not owe the debt, as the plaintiff claims he does, and may want only to present his defence, in a manner as little expensive and inconvenient as possible,— which right he ought certainly to enjoy; but his plea now is, for delay, and delay only. If the plaintiff, by a second suit, can place his claim in a more favorable condition for obtaining redress, why should he not be permitted to do it? as where he can secure his debt by an attachment, his first suit being a summons,— or where, as in Ward v. Curtiss, 18 Conn. 290, the first suit is found to be premature; so where he is apprehensive that, by reason of error or misapprehension, he is not in as good a condition as he could place himself in, by a second suit. What reason can be assigned, why he may not pursue his best remedy?" A plea of this character was held in Robert v. Moore, 62 N. J. L. 618, 43 Atl. 582, not to come within the statute requiring that defendant should file with his plea or demurrer an affidavit that it was not interposed for delay, since such a plea is essentially dilatory.

under what name he may sue,[60] and it must deny that the name used by plaintiff is his known and recognized name.[61] Where the exception is only to the person of plaintiff the plea must show who is really entitled to be plaintiff.[62] And where it is objected that an action is not brought by the proper officer, exceptions in a statute which permit actions to be brought by others than such officer must be negatived.[63] Where the plea is advanced by one of several defendants it is defective in case it prays judgment generally.[64] The plea must not admit that defendant was the person sued.[65] It must be alleged that the person served was not the correctly named party.[66]

(c) Defect of Parties. A plea in abatement upon the ground of non-joinder of plaintiffs must set forth particularly who the persons omitted as plaintiffs are,[67] and describe them so as to enable plaintiff to make a better writ.[68] Where it is alleged that a part-owner has not joined as plaintiff it must be shown that he is not defendant.[69] So a plea of non-joinder of defendants must give plaintiff a better writ and state the names or descriptions of the persons alleged to have been omitted.[70] So it must state their christian and surnames,[71] and must aver that they are living [72] and within reach of process.[73] It must allege the joint obligation; [74] but when such allegation is made it need not also aver that the person

In a suit against a board of road commissioners for breach of contract a plea in abatement that the contract was made with defendant and certain other persons, naming them, who constituted the board when the contract was made, was sufficient as giving plaintiff a better writ, since it referred him to the proper parties to the suit, although the personnel of the board had changed since the contract was entered into. Continuing liability to the date of suit need jointly liable was omitted, since such fact appears from the record.[75] Possible disabilities of the joint contractors need not be negatived.[76] The place of abode and addition of the party omitted need not be set out,[77] although under an English statute [78] it was provided that a plea in abatement for non-joinder of co-contractors must show the residence of the parties not joined to be within the jurisdiction.[79] A plea which on its face shows that defendant is properly omitted is bad.[80] Where it is pleaded in abatement that defendant has made an assignment for the benefit of creditors it must be alleged that the assignment was bona fide.[81] Where it is pleaded in abatement that the action is not properly brought in the name of plaintiff, the facts showing the truth of such averment must be alleged.[82]

(D) Alienage and Non-Residence. A plea of alienage must aver that the person was born out of the allegiance of the state and within the allegiance of a foreign state,[83] and a plea of alien enemy must state not only that fact but that he had not the license of the government to remain in the country.[84] An answer in abatement, on the ground that plaintiff has been, and is, engaged in inciting, aiding, and assisting in a rebellion against the United States, must allege specifically the particular acts of rebellion which plaintiff has committed.[85] A plea on the ground that defendant, who was a non-resident, was at the time of the service of the writ in attendance upon the court as a witness, must further allege that he was not within the jurisdiction in any other capacity,[86] and should allege the particular court he was attending, the suit in which he was a witness, and that it was then pending, the parties to the suit and the party for whom he was summoned.[87]

(E) Variance Between Declaration and Writ. A plea based upon variance between the declaration and writ should recite the writ.[88]

(F) Defective Execution and Service of Process. A plea alleging a defective execution of the writ should allege that it was not executed in any other way.[89] The writ should be set out on oyer.[90] A plea in abatement for defective service should show what the attempted service was, that it was defective, and that the writ was not served in any other way.[91] All facts going to negative a correct ser-not be alleged. Goodhue v. Luce, 82 Me. 222, 19 Atl. 440.

In New Hampshire it is held that "where an insufficient summons, or one not containing the substance of the writ or declaration, is relied upon as the foundation of a plea in abatement, the defendant must erave oyer of the writ, declaration and officer's return, set them out at large, and also make profert of and enrol the summons." If the writ and return are referred to in the plea and facts are vice should be alleged,[92] and they should be alleged as of the time of the service, not as of the time of the filing of the plea.[93] But it need not be alleged how the writ should have been served.[94] The plea must allege facts showing that the writ could have been served.[95] Time and place of attempted service must be alleged, and cannot be supplied by reference to the writ.[96] If it is claimed that the copy served was defective, it should be enrolled and made a part of the record.[97] A plea on the ground of no service on one of defendants must allege that defendants were co-promisors.[98] The facts should be fully set up; mere conclusions will not avail.[99]

6. Waiver of Pleas. It has already been pointed out that unless pleas in abatement are filed at the proper time and in the proper order, they will be waived.[1] But assuming that they have been filed at the proper time and in the proper order, there are still certain conditions under which they may be waived. Filing a plea in bar is a waiver of a plea in abatement.[2] This is true even after issue joined on the plea in abatement,[3] or after a demurrer has been sustained to the plea.[4] And even though issue be joined on a plea in abatement, it is nevertheless waived by a plea in bar.[5] So also a demurrer or exception is a waiver of the plea.[6] Obtaining a continuance after filing a plea in abatement waives the plea,[7] but consenting to a continuance will not so operate.[8] So, appearing to the merits after plea filed will be a waiver of it,[9] as will allowing the plea to go by default when the case is called alleged showing that the person who served it had no authority to do so, it need not be further alleged that no other person served the writ. Ingraham v. Leland, 19 Vt. 304.

for trial,[10] asking no ruling on the plea within a reasonable time after it is filed,[11] submitting to the hearing of another issue,[12] or seeking a rule for costs.[13] An express statement in a plea to the merits that defendant does not waive his prior plea in abatement will not avail to avoid the waiver.[14] But the benefit of a dilatory plea may be reserved by agreement.[15] And a party waives nothing by merely declaring himself ready at the call of the calendar.[16]

7. Operation and Effect. Defendant is not estopped by allegations or admissions in a plea in abatement, from showing the truth of the case in a subsequent trial on the merits.[17] While the plea in abatement admits plaintiff's claim, it does not admit the damages.[18] The plea is not evidence of the facts set up in it.[19] A plea to the jurisdiction is a waiver of defenses to the merits, within the discretion of the court.[20]

8. Hearing and Decision of Issues — a. Trial of Issues. An issue raised upon a plea in abatement should ordinarily be heard at the first term,[21] and before the issues on the merits.[22] But defenses in abatement, which really affect the merits, may be tried with the peremptory pleas,[23] and so may any defenses in abatement where the issues are so drawn that they can all be better tried together.[24] Where pleas to the merits and pleas in abatement are permitted to be filed at the same time, the latter should be heard first.[25] A plea in abatement, when properly met, presents an issue to be tried and does not authorize a dismissal upon plaintiff's refusal to confess the plea,[26] but a plea upon which no issue has been taken presents nothing to be tried.[27] A plea in abatement upon grounds available to any party regardless of the others may be acted on, although certain of the parties have not been served with process.[28] Pleas in abatement, like other affirmative pleas, cast the burden of proof upon defendant pleading them.[29] Where a plea of another action pending is filed, plaintiff may elect whether to submit to judgment on the plea or dismiss the other suit.[30] If plaintiff confesses the truth of the plea by amending the defects pointed out, defendant is not prejudiced by the court's action in ignoring the plea.[31] A plea in abatement, which is sufficient as a motion to dismiss, may be treated as such.[32] The court will not, on an agreed case, decide whether matter is stated sufficient to abate the writ.[33] Pending the issue of a plea in abatement for non-joinder, it is irregular, upon motion, to grant leave to summon in additional joint promisors.[34] Plaintiff cannot after argument of an exception to the want of capacity on the part of plaintiff to maintain the suit, but before judgment thereon claim the right of making proper parties by amendment, in case the exception should be sustained.[35]

b. Decision.[36] Only the judgment prayed can be given on a plea in abatement: not a proper judgment upon the whole record, as on a plea in bar.[37] If the prayer is too broad, and the writ cannot be abated as prayed the plea should be dismissed.[38] When issue is taken upon the plea and found against defendant, judgment is quod recuperet;[39] and the same jury which tries the issue should assess the damages,[40] although the matter may be submitted to another jury.[41] If judgment be found for defendant on an issue either of law or fact, the judgment is that the writ be quashed.[42] If a plea is rejected or stricken out, final judgment cannot be rendered. Defendant has the right to answer over.[43] And under the practice acts in some jurisdictions it is provided that upon overruling the plea in abatement for a matter of fact defendant may answer over at the discretion of the judge.[44] The objection having been once disposed of cannot be raised again in another form,[45] although an order rejecting a plea is not final and the same plea and issue is taken on the question of baptism, proof that he has always been known by another name will not sustain the plea.

may be allowed to be filed at a subsequent term in the court's discretion.[46] An appeal from the decision on a plea in abatement waives defenses to the merits.[47]

C. Traverses or Denials, and Admissions — 1. Traverses at Common Law — a. Definitions and Classification. A traverse is a denial on one side of some matter of fact alleged on the other.[48] There are, generally speaking, three forms or species of traverse at common law, namely, the common traverse, the general issue, and the special traverse or traverse introduced by new matter.[49] The common traverse denies, by express contradiction, the terms of the allegation traversed, and it may be affirmative or negative in form, depending upon the form of the allegation denied.[50] The general issue denies all the material allegations of the declaration or the principal fact on which it is founded, not by express contradiction, but by a formula, different, and characteristic for each form of action.[51] The special traverse is substantially a combination of a special plea with a traverse, although it is essentially negative in its effect.[52]

b. The Common Traverse — (i) Form and Sufficiency in General. A traverse should raise an issue of fact, not an issue of law.[53] Where any one material fact is put in issue, this is a defense to the whole cause of action.[54] But a traverse which is aimed at particular allegations must be specific, direct, and unambiguous.[55] Allegations of facts inconsistent with the facts alleged in the declaration are argumentative denials, and are bad on demurrer, at common law,[56] although otherwise under the code.[57] Since an issue can only be raised by a traverse of a material averment, a plea traversing merely matter of inducement is bad.[58] The purpose of a traverse is to put in issue some or all of the material averments of the declaration or complaint, and its scope can, in general, be no greater than plaintiff's averments.[59] No facts need be denied which are not alleged.[60] Nor should a traverse be too large, denying more than is alleged.[61] In case plaintiff has anticipated a defense, an issue may nevertheless be taken upon it.[62] A plea denying the allegations of the declaration, paragraph by paragraph, is a good plea.[63]

(II) On Information and Belief or Knowledge and Information. Under the common-law rule, a traverse not made positively, but on information and belief, will be stricken out.[64] In some states statutes have changed the common-law requirement that a denial must be positive, by permitting a defendant, in case he has not sufficient knowledge to admit or deny a fact, to so state, in connection with, or in substitution for, his denial.[65]

c. The General Issue — (I) In General. The various pleas of the general issue at common law are as follows: In assumpsit, non assumpsit;[66] in debt on bond or other specialty, non est factum;[67] in debt on simple contract, nil debet;[68] in detinue, non detinet;[69] in trespass, not guilty;[70] in trespass on the case, not guilty.[71] In covenant there is, strictly speaking, no plea of the general issue,[72] although non est factum may serve for such a plea in some circumstances.[73] Each of these general issues should be used only in the form of action to which it is adapted.[74] General issues are abolished in some states, and a general denial substituted.[75] Under statutes which abolish the forms of common-law actions but do not expressly or by implication forbid the use of the general issue, that form of plea is admissible.[76] Statutes have in a number of states abolished special pleas. In such states the general issue must always be filed, and a demurrer to it cannot be sustained.[77] A defendant can never be estopped from filing a general issue.[78]

(II) Sufficiency. A defense which substantially amounts to the general issue will be so considered.[79] Verbal irregularities will not vitiate it.[80] But it must be more than a mere formless memorandum,[81] although in some states merely having counsel's name marked on the docket at appearance term is equivalent to the filing of the general issue.[82] General issues must be positive, not conditional.[83]

(III) Operation and Effect.[84] The general issue may generally be said to put in issue all the material allegations made by plaintiff, and goes to show that there is no cause of action.[85] But this is not true without qualification.[86] Matters of inducement are not denied by a plea of the general issue.[87]

(IV) Specification of Defenses. Owing to the broad scope of the general issue in many actions, and the multitude of matters that may be shown under it, statutes in some states have made provision for requiring defendant to specify the defenses which he intends to introduce under such a plea, so that plaintiff may be prepared to meet them.[88] Such a specification of defenses does not convert the general issue into a special plea, nor change the burden of proof. Its only effect is to confine the introduction of evidence to the defenses specified.[89]

(V) Notice of Special Defense Under General Issue. In a number of states statutes authorize or require as a substitute for special pleas the general issue with notice in connection therewith of any affirmative defense intended to be presented.[90] But the notice does not take the place of the general issue, and must be filed in connection with it.[91] Matters which cannot be set up by special plea, cannot be set up by notice.[92] The notice should fairly apprise plaintiff of the true ground and substance of the defense,[93] but it need not be drawn with the technical accuracy of a special plea.[94] If it contain the substance of a special plea it is sufficient,[95] and a special plea, although abolished by statute, may be allowed to stand as a notice of defense.[96] The sufficiency of the notice may be tested only by a motion to strike.[97] Or at the trial when defendant seeks to introduce evidence under it,[98] where defendant may use either a notice or a special plea, he cannot use both in presenting the same matter of defense.[99] Facts alone need be stated, not evidence nor inferences;[1] but the facts so stated cannot be taken as evidence against defendant,[2] and they must be alleged with such certainty as would be sufficient to withstand a demurrer.[3] Certainty to a common intent is sufficient in a notice.[4] The right to give notice under the general issue applies to the issue of non est factum, notwithstanding the narrowness of its scope,[5] but not to the plea of nul tiel record.[6] A dilatory defense cannot be made by notice under the general issue, but must be specially pleaded.[7] points raised in it are equivalent to different special pleas.[11] The facts must be alleged with as much certainty and precision as in a special plea.[12] The statute allowing the brief statement applies only to pleas in bar not to pleas in abatement;[13] and it does not apply to a plea puis darrein continuance.[14] The brief statement sets up defenses in addition to and not in substitution for the general issue, and if a party fail on the special defense he still may rely on the general issue.[15] The court may, in its discretion, permit the filing of a brief statement after the cause is ready for trial,[16] or otherwise enlarge the time allowed.[17]

(VII) General Issues by Statute. Where a statute specially allows, in given cases, the pleading of the general issue and the giving thereunder of special matters in evidence, not admissible under the general rules applicable to the general issue, defendant, if he wishes to avail himself of the statute, must expressly indicate it in his plea, by writing "by statute" in the margin or otherwise. And wherever this form of plea is used no special pleas can be added, but defendant must rely upon the general issue alone.[18] If a statute authorizes the plea, the defenses available may be such as are founded on the statute or defenses wholly independent of the statute.[19] A plea of the general issue "by statute" where no statute is applicable is not demurrable, but the reference to the statute may be stricken.[20] An equitable defense is not admissible under this plea.[21] The particular statute defendant wishes to rely upon should be designated, and other statutes may be referred to besides the one by virtue of which the defense is filed.[22] But if defendant relies on a statute not designated, and no objection is taken during the trial, the objection is waived,[23] and additional statutes may be inserted by amendment.[24]

d. The Special Traverse. The special traverse, or traverse with an inducement of new matter, is in substance an argumentative denial of the facts traversed, but in form a direct denial. Where defendant cannot safely deny directly, by reason of certain facts not appearing in the declaration and not admissible under a direct denial, which it is important should be presented in defense, but which do not constitute a defense by way of confession and avoidance, but rather are merely inconsistent with the facts alleged in the declaration, he may make use of this form of traverse. The new facts are set up in his plea, argumentatively denying plaintiff's allegations, and they are followed by the words absque hoc (without this) and a direct denial of the facts already argumentatively denied. The absque hoc is thus a connecting link and sign of equality between the argumentative denial of the important purposes designed to be accomplished by allowing them [brief statements] to be used instead of pleas and replications, was to relieve the parties from the exactness of allegation and denial, by which parties were sometimes so entangled as to prevent a trial upon the merits."

which precedes it and the direct denial which follows it.[25] The inducement of the special traverse should always be an indirect and not a direct denial,[26] but a defect in this respect is one of form only.[27] It must on its face give the pleader a good right or title,[28] and must in substance be a sufficient answer to the declaration.[29]

2. Denials Under the Codes — a. In General. The usual provision in the codes, with respect to denials, is that the answer of defendant must contain a general or specific denial of each material allegation of the complaint controverted by defendant, or of any knowledge or information thereof sufficient to form a belief,[30] although in some of the codes provision for a general denial is not made in terms.[31] A distinction is made under the codes between denials and defenses, and a denial should not be designated as a defense, which term is confined to the affirmative statement of new matter,[32] although in some cases the distinction is not recognized.[33] Denials cannot be included as part of an affirmative defense.[34]

b. Form of Denial — (i) In General. Defendant should simply deny, and not "say" that he denies, but the use of this form of expression does not render the answer bad.[35] It is not sufficient merely to deny the pleading or a paragraph

The English rule is as follows: "It shall not be sufficient for a defendant in his statement of defense to deny generally the grounds alleged by the statement of claim or for a plaintiff in his reply to deny generally the grounds alleged in a defense by way of counterclaim, but each party must deal specifically with each allegation of fact of which he does not admit the truth, except damages." thereof; the allegations contained in it must be denied.[36] A call for proof cannot be regarded as a denial under the code.[37] It is not necessary that the denial be expressed in negative words. The averment of the contrary of what is alleged in the complaint is equivalent to an ordinary denial.[38] The answer must meet the substance and not merely the form of the charge;[39] otherwise it will be deemed evasive and for that reason bad.[40] It must be direct and unequivocal,[41] and must clearly identify the allegations sought to be denied.[42] An answer averring that "no allegation of the complaint is true" does not comply with the code requirement;[43] nor does an averment that "these defendants do not admit," etc.;[44] nor an averment that defendant is informed and believes that certain allegations in the complaint are not true.[45] Admissions made in connection with denials limit their effect;[46] but a valid denial is not vitiated by special defenses,[47] legal conclusions,[48] or immaterial matter[49] alleged in connection with it.

(II) ARGUMENTATIVE DENIALS.[50] While the answer may deny in the exact language of the complaint if it is not thereby rendered uncertain,[51] it need not deny in express terms if it substantially traverses plaintiff's allegations.[52] An argumentative denial, which merely alleges facts inconsistent with the facts alleged by plaintiff, raises an issue and is good against a demurrer.[53] But merely giving a different version of the matter from that contained in the complaint is not sufficient to put the allegations of the complaint in issue.[54]

c. General Denials. Under the codes there is no general issue,[55] although where an answer is sufficient in substance it is not rendered bad because in the form of the general issue.[56] But a mere plea of the general issue is generally bad under the code as denying a conclusion of law and not the facts alleged in the complaint.[57] The general denial under the codes raises an issue as to each one of the material allegations of plaintiff,[58] with certain local statutory qualifications, requiring verified[59] or special[60] denials. Its form, closely following the statute, is commonly as follows: "The defendant, for answer to the complaint herein, denies each and every allegation thereof."[61] Variations of this, equivalent in substance, have been sustained.[62] In some states a general denial cannot be used where the complaint is verified, but the denial must in such cases be specific.[63] A fact impliedly averred is put in issue by a general denial equally with facts expressly averred.[64] A general denial is limited by specific denials coupled with it pointing out the particulars in which the general denial applies.[65]

The plea of the general issue denies no special allegation of the petition. It is simply a conclusion of the pleader that he is not indebted in manner and form as alleged. On the other hand, a denial of the allegations of the petition, whether made in a single sentence or in as many sentences as there are paragraphs in the petition, is specific in its nature, and meets the objections to a plea of the general issue by reducing to an issue each allegation made by the petition"); Schular v. Hudson River R. W. 158. In Snyder v. Free, 114 Mo. 360, 367, 21 S. W. 847, the answer consisted of a general denial of every allegation of the petition "except that which may be hereinafter expressly admitted," and the court said of it: "The central idea of code pleading is that an answer should not be evasive, but should meet the allegations of the petition fairly and squarely, thus presenting sharply defined issues for the triers of the facts to pass upon. Revised Statutes (1889), § 2049. On a former occasion this court denounced the method here employed as a 'vicious method of pleading,' and this was an apt characterization of such a faulty way of pleading. It was never the design of the code that a party plaintiff should have to carefully sift each denial of the answer and to carefully compare it with each paragraph of the petition in order to see what is admitted and what is denied. Such denials may be general or they may be special, but in either event the issue must be sharply defined, and not left to surmise or conjecture."

The following forms have been held bad: "Each and every allegation and statement therein, which is or are in any way inconsistent with the allegations in the petition" and "especially denies all new matter pleaded" in the answer. Young v. Schofield, 132 Mo. 650, 655, 34 S. W. 497. A general denial "except as qualified by the offer of judgment," but containing no offer of judgment. Malcolm v. Lyon, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 210. A denial of "each and every allegation in the complaint, except so far as the court may construe the statements in visions of the code.[68] On the other hand, a general denial of all facts not expressly admitted has been recommended as a suitable method of making use of a general denial when the answer must be verified,[69] although it has also been held that a qualified general denial in a verified pleading is insufficient. Judicial opinion is much divided on the question.[70] A denial of each and every material allegation in the complaint is evasive, indefinite, and uncertain. The pleader should specify what allegations he deems material.[71] But such an answer is good on demurrer.[72] An answer which admits all of the allegations of the complaint, except "such as are hereinafter denied," ontains no denial where, in addition to such averment, it contains only affirmative defenses.[73]

e. Specific Denials. As has been noted, all of the codes permit and some require a specific denial of the allegations of the complaint.[74] Under a code provision requiring a special denial of each material allegation of the petition controverted by defendant the material facts must be denied specifically and separately.[75] Only such allegations as defendant intends to controvert need be denied,[76] but the answer must point out clearly which allegations are intended to be put in issue,[77] and where it cannot be determined what allegations are denied, all will be taken as admitted.[78] Denials which are as specific as the allegations which they are intended to meet are sufficient.[79] The denial should be as broad as the allegation sought to be traversed,[80] but no broader.[81] The sufficiency of a specific denial must be determined by reference to the particular allegation it is designed to traverse, and if, taken by itself, an issue is fairly made, and there is no admission inconsistent with it, the denial is sufficient.[82] But it is not a sufficient specific denial to "deny specifically each and every matter," [83] or to group the allegations of the complaint and deny them as a whole.[84] So a denial of all the allegations in a particular paragraph of the complaint has been held bad,[85] as has the denial of each and every allegation in certain numbered paragraphs.[86] The better rule would seem to be that the denial of all the allegations contained in a designated numbered paragraph of the complaint is good.[87] It is not sufficient, however, to deny generally everything between certain words and folios.[88] A specific denial should not, in most cases, deny in the exact words of the allegation.[89] The denial must be direct; it is not sufficient to put facts in issue to admit all facts except those specified.[90] No issue can be raised by a denial of a fact not alleged.[91]

f. Denials of Knowledge or Information — (i) In General. In many states it is provided by statute that when defendant has no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief respecting any or all of the facts alleged in the complaint, he may deny such knowledge or information in his answer, and this denial will, by virtue of the statute, be deemed to put such facts in issue to the same extent as though they were denied.[92] Unless authorized by statute, a denial

Where this cannot be done, by reason of the existence of some allegation that cannot be denied, the same form should be used expressly excepting such allegation.

Denial of facts after denial of knowledge, etc., superfluous.—After denying any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief, it is superfluous to add a denial of

in this form is insufficient, and constitutes an admission of the facts alleged.[93] This form of pleading is based solely upon statute, and unless the form prescribed by the statute is strictly followed, the answer will be insufficient,[94] although a slight latitude is allowed by some of the cases, in respect to purely unsubstantial variations.[95] A denial of knowledge or information when general, may be qualified as in the case of a positive denial,[96] and made applicable to all facts not otherwise admitted, qualified, or referred to.[97] If defendant denies any knowledge or information respecting facts alleged, he may predicate a defense hypothetically upon those facts.[98] Some codes require defendant, in case the complaint is verified, to deny specifically and positively or according to information and belief.[99] To authorize a denial, a want of belief is sufficient, and it is not improper, where the statute does not authorize a denial of knowledge or information, to state in connection with the denial that defendant has no knowledge or information on which to form a belief.[1] The allegations respecting which defendant has no knowledge or information must be clearly specified.[2] A denial of knowledge or information

it remains on the files it raises an issue, although it might be stricken out.[8] A defendant may use this form of denial, however, if he shows in connection therewith facts which overcome the presumption.[9] A denial of knowledge or information respecting certain facts may be joined with an affirmative defense respecting the same facts.[10]

g. Denials on Information and Belief. A denial upon information and belief is a very different thing from the denial just considered. It is based on the presence of precisely the elements which in the other form of denial are wanting, namely, information and belief.[11] Few of the codes authorize this form of denial in terms,[12] but it was a familiar proceeding under the old chancery practice,[13] from which the codes largely drew their rules, and it has been generally accepted as proper code practice.[14] This form of denial may be made when the facts alleged are not within defendant's positive knowledge, but he has some information or belief concerning them.[15] It cannot be used as to facts which are conclusively presumed within the defendant's knowledge; [16] nor as to facts otherwise presumed within his knowledge,[17] unless he shows in connection therewith why he does not have

11. In Edwards v. Lent, 8 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 28, 29, Harris, J., said: "There are three forms in which a defendant may put in issue the allegations of the complaint. The first is, when the fact alleged is a matter within the personal knowledge of the defendant. The second is, when the matter alleged is not within the personal knowledge of the defendant, but relying upon his information, he either believes or does not believe the allegation to be true. The third is, when he has no such knowledge or information as will enable him to form a belief, whether the allegation is true or not. These forms of pleading may not be indiscriminately adopted. If the matter alleged is such as must, from its very nature, be within the defendant's own personal knowledge, he can not deny it upon information merely. If it be a matter in respect to which he has no personal knowledge, he must deny it upon his information, if he have such information as enables him to say he believes it to be untrue. When he is unable, either from his own knowledge or upon any information he has received, to say whether the allegation is true or not, he may say so, and this will be sufficient to put the allegation in issue."

W. 477, the court said: "The better rule is that a denial made upon information and belief is sufficient when made in a certain class of cases. In strictness, it is the only proper form of denial in a case where, with reference to the fact sought to be denied, defendant has certain information which induces him to believe that such facts are untrue, and yet has not absolute knowledge that such facts are untrue. Having information inducing a belief, which falls short of knowledge, defendant cannot truthfully deny . . . that he has neither knowledge nor information sufficient to form a belief as to the fact."

knowledge of them;[18] nor as to facts which by reason of being on the public records or otherwise, are readily accessible to defendant.[19] But a denial upon information and belief is proper in the joint answer of several defendants when all the facts are not within the knowledge of all the defendants.[20] Where the statute provides for this form of denial, the statutory language must be followed substantially.[21] If some facts are denied positively and some on information and belief, it should clearly appear which facts fall into each group.[22] In some jurisdictions, where the complaint is verified, the denial on information and belief must show why defendant is without knowledge.[23]

3. Allegations Traversed or Denied. Facts, not conclusions of law, should be denied, since denials of conclusions raise no issue.[24] But where plaintiff alleges a conclusion instead of the facts which support it, defendant may treat the allegation

Denial of indebtedness.— In Westlake v. Moore, 19 Mo. 556, and Heath v. White, 3 Utah 474, 24 Pac. 762, a denial of indebtedness was held sufficient. Many of the cases cited supra this note, however, relate to the denial of indebtedness, treating it as a denial of a conclusion. And see Kent v. Holliday, 17 Md. 387, 394 (where the court said: "The declaration neither states in terms, an indebtedness or a promise to pay, but states facts from which both are implied by law, and both were proper subjects of denial by

as a fact, and a denial will raise a material issue.[25] And where conclusions are involved in facts alleged, denials of the facts put them in issue;[26] or where facts are alleged according to their legal effect such effect may be denied.[27] Immaterial matter need not be denied,[28] and if denied raise no issue;[29] but where any material averment is traversed, an issue of fact is created,[30] and the answer cannot be stricken out on motion.[31] A denial which goes only to the damages does not raise a material issue,[32] except where special damages are alleged which are essential to the maintenance of the action.[33] Inasmuch as a pleading is held to allege all facts necessarily implied from facts expressly alleged, such implied facts may be denied by defendant.[34]

4. Negatives Pregnant — a. In General. A negative pregnant is such form of a negative expression as may carry with it an affirmative.[35] It arises from a too literal denial of the allegations of the declaration or complaint,[36] or from a denial which is too large, tendering issue on more than is alleged.[37] A negative pregnant is generally held not to raise a material issue, and the consequences are the same as when, for any other reason, an answer admits plaintiff's allegations without denying or avoiding them.[38] The objection will not be regarded favorably by the court where it is not made before the trial, especially where it does not appear that plaintiff has been misled,[39] and where it clearly appears from other parts of the answer that the allegations formally admitted by reason of the negative pregnant are in fact denied, the answer will be held good;[40] and especially pleas"); Lewis v. Smith, 2 Disn. (Ohio) 434 (where it is said that, although a general denial of indebtedness may not be a "denial of all the material allegations of a petition," within the literal meaning of Code, § 92, yet it would be going too far to entirely disregard such an answer and require no proof from plaintiff).

is this true when the fact is elsewhere expressly denied.[41] Since a general denial puts in issue every allegation in the complaint it can never be a negative pregnant.[42]

b. Denials of Allegations With Qualifying Circumstances. Where a fact is alleged with qualifying or modifying language, and the words of the allegation are literally denied, it is held that the qualifying circumstances alone are denied while the fact itself is admitted.[43] Thus, where the declaration or complaint alleges facts as taking place at a certain time,[44] or in a certain place,[45] or alleges that property or demands are of a certain value or amount,[46] denials of these facts so qualified as to time, place, value, or amount are negatives pregnant, and are deemed to put in issue only the qualifying circumstances. To deny that an act took place at a certain place or time is to admit that it occurred at some different place or time, and to deny that property or demands are of a certain amount or value is to admit them in a different amount or value.[47] The mere addition to the denial of the words "as alleged" has been held to creat a negative pregnant.[48] The addition of the words "or at any other time," [49] "or any part thereof," etc., makes the traverse good.[50] Where, however, the qualifying circumstances is the material part of the averment, as that defendant was engaged in a dangerous business, a literal denial is not a negative pregnant.[51] So where the qualifying language is really surplusage and in fact neither enlarges, abridges, nor qualifies the meaning of the words to which it applies, there is no negative pregnant.[52] And where a written instrument is alleged to have been made in certain words and figures, and this is literally denied, there is no negative pregnant, for the reason that the only admission contained in such a denial is of a writing different from the writing alleged, which is an immaterial admission.[53]

c. Denials of Allegations in the Conjunctive. Where a number of facts are alleged conjunctively by plaintiff, and the answer denies them conjunctively, it is held that the denial goes only to the conjunction and admits the separate existence of each fact, or goes only to certain facts and admits the others.[54] Where a complaint alleges facts conjunctively the answer should deny them disjunctively.[55] But where the existence of several concurrent facts is essential to the cause of action, a denial in the conjunctive is not bad,[56] and where synonymous terms are alleged conjunctively they may be denied in the same way.[57]

5. Admissions — a. In General. Specific admissions in detail of the facts alleged by plaintiff should not appear in defendant's pleading,[58] since all facts not denied are deemed admitted.[59] The legal sufficiency of the facts alleged by plaintiff may be admitted by defendant, and an issue raised as to the truth of the facts. Such an admission is made by omitting to file a demurrer.[60]

b. Form — (i) In General. Where a fact is alleged with qualifying circumstances, and is literally denied, the denial goes only to the circumstances and the fact itself is admitted.[61] Even a hypothetical admission by defendant is sufficient to relieve plaintiff of the necessity of proof.[62] A statement in a pleading that a certain alleged fact appears to be true is not an admission that it is true.[63] A notice of special matter annexed to the general issue is not binding upon defendant as an admission of the matters contained therein.[64] An answer alleging that the sum due plaintiff is not greater then a named sum is an admission that the designated sum is due.[65] An election to stand upon one defense is an admission against the existence of other defenses.[66] Failure to plead not guilty by statute has been held not to obviate the necessity of proving a notice made by statute necessary to the action.[67]

(ii) Affirmative Defenses.[68] Affirmative defenses, whether denominated pleas of confession and avoidance as at common law, or answers by way of new matter under the codes, admit the facts alleged by plaintiff;[69] but they do not admit that the plaintiff has alleged all the facts.[70] An argumentative denial

70. Where, in an action to recover on a contract, the parties are agreed that a contract was made, a plea continuing a tender

when a pleading in such form is permissible is not an admission of the facts against which it is directed.[71]

(III) General Issue or General Denial. The general issue or general denial admits plaintiff's authority and capacity and the character in which he sues.[72] It also admits the capacity in which defendant is sued,[73] and under the statutes frequently such a plea or denial admits the execution of an instrument sued on,[74] at least when not verified.[75] So also corporate existence must frequently be questioned by specific denial.[76] A plea of non est factum admits all facts alleged except the sealing and delivery of the writing obligatory;[77] and non cepit admits the property to be in plaintiff, but denies the taking in the place alleged.[78]

(IV) Failure to Deny [79]— (A) In General. Matters properly pleaded which made before such action was brought only admits that a contract of the general nature pleaded was entered into, and does not estop defendant from alleging that there were provisions of the contract other than those pleaded by plaintiff. Young v. Borzone, 26 Wash. 4, 66 Pac. 135, 421.

that a failure to deny admits them.[81] Not only must there be a denial in order to avoid an admission, but the denial must be unambiguous and must answer substantially the facts of each direct allegation in the sense in which it is made.[82] And the denial must be a positive one and not of knowledge or information, in cases where the latter form of denial is not permissible.[83] No admission arises from the failure to deny an allegation which plaintiff has failed to make.[84] In the case of written instruments, statutes commonly provide that unless their genuineness and due execution be denied specifically,[85] they will be deemed admitted. Sometimes a notice that the execution is to be contested is required to be given, in default of which the execution stands admitted.[86]

In Kansas City Hotel Co. v. Sauer, 65 Mo. 279, 286, the action was on an indemnity bond, and plaintiff alleged that he had been compelled to pay a certain amount which defendant was bound under the bond to pay. The court said: "We have been unable to see why an allegation of the payment of this sort should not, in the absence of a denial, stand admitted as well as any other allegation of payment. Thus, if a surety in a promissory note should be compelled to pay $500 for his principal, and should, in an action for its recovery, allege the payment as a fact, this allegation, if undenied, must result in a judgment in the surety's behalf. . . . No doubt, there are many cases where allegations of value, amount of damages, &c., are immaterial and need no denial. But the allegation before us is that of a specific and material fact, which becomes none the less specific and material because no denial thereof be interposed."

Pleas must be construed separately and distinctly, except when connected by a reference to each other, and plaintiff on the trial

(B) Under Codes and Practice Acts. Where inconsistent defenses are allowable,[99] the general rule is laid down that neither can be construed as a waiver of the other, nor can one be used as an admission to destroy the other.[1] Thus when a defendant files a general denial and follows that with a special plea, the matters averred in the special plea are not to be taken as confessed in favor of plaintiff's cause of action, but plaintiff still has the burden of making out his case.[2] Nor is a denial waived or overcome by an averment in a cross complaint of substantially the same facts which the answer denies.[3] But this rule does not apply where the special matter set up is not by way of defense, but for the purpose of enabling defendant to obtain some equitable relief which he prays for.[4] On the other hand, in those jurisdictions where inconsistent defenses are not allowable, defendant is bound by the one least favorable to him.[5] Whatever is admitted in a special defense operates so far as a modification of a general denial, and is to be taken as true without other proof.[6] Some of the cases qualify the rule as thus broadly stated by making an exception as to admissions unavoidably made in order to enable a party to properly present a defense.[7] A party who formally and explicitly admits, by his pleading, that which establishes plaintiff's right, will not be suffered to deny its existence or to prove any state of facts inconsistent with that admission.[8] As between the denial of a fact alleged in the complaint and a direct of an issue on one plea cannot take advantage of an averment or admission contained in another plea. Clements v. Cribbs, 19 Ala. 241.

admission of the same fact in the answer, the admission, and not the denial, will be taken as true.[9]

(c) Waiver of Admission. Where allegations are not denied and might therefore be deemed admitted, but are treated as in issue on the trial, the omission of the denial is thereby waived.[10]

c. Scope. The admission of a fact does not carry with it the admission of qualifying circumstances alleged in connection with such fact, where these circumstances are elsewhere in the same defense denied;[11] or where the fact is elsewhere expressly admitted with other and different qualifying circumstances.[12] But where a fact which is alleged with qualifying circumstances is admitted without qualification, the admission will be deemed to include the qualifications.[13] And an admission may be qualified by an express or implied limitation appearing elsewhere in the same defense.[14] Where the doing of an act,[15] such as the giving of notice,[16] or the execution of an instrument,[17] is admitted without qualification, its legal sufficiency is also admitted; but the admission of a fact is not an admission that it has a particular legal effect.[18] An admission as to a part is an admission as to the whole, where the fact admitted necessarily applies equally to both;[19] and where a portion of the damages alleged is admitted, this is an admission of some

Dividing an admission.—A judicial admission in an answer cannot be divided against the party pleading it, unless it is in the nature of a confession and avoidance of plaintiff's demand or of some portion of it, as a plea of compensation where the defense pleaded necessarily admits the allegations of

cause of action.[20] An implied admission of the facts alleged by plaintiff does not generally extend to the amount of damages claimed.[21] But a specific admission may be made as to value or amount and it will dispense with proof by plaintiff.[22] The admission of a fact carries with it the admission of other facts necessarily implied from or involved in the one admitted,[23] but the admission will be given a reasonable construction in this respect in the light of all the facts alleged.[24] An answer which refers to property described in the complaint, as "said" property is an admission of the identity of the property;[25] but even where the reference is not so explicit, the admission will be deemed to refer to the same thing as is alleged in the complaint where such would be the natural and reasonable construction.[26] The admissions arising through failure to deny are no broader than the allegations appearing in plaintiff's pleading.[27] Admissions by defendant of facts not alleged by plaintiff cannot avail plaintiff.[28]

d. Construction. In the case of an express admission the apparent intention of the pleader will be followed if possible.[29] An admission, to be available, must be taken with all the qualifying clauses and limitations which the pleader has added to it,[30] and with the facts alleged in connection with it.[31] The whole of a statement must be construed together, and where facts are alleged in connection with an admission, which nullify it, its effect as an admission is destroyed.[32] Where, however, such affirmative allegations are not proved, plaintiff may have the full benefit of the admission.[33] If the alleged admission is apparently at variance with other portions of defendant's plea, it will, in case of ambiguity, be construed in such a way as to make it consistent with the other allegations of defendant.[34]

If it is doubtful to what part of a cause of action an admission refers, it will be held to relate to that part which is most natural and reasonable in the light of the pleadings and proofs.[35] An express admission will not be enlarged beyond the scope apparently intended by the pleader,[36] nor, on the other hand, will it be unreasonably restricted.[37] When a defense contains both an admission and a denial respecting the same fact, the admission will prevail;[38] and the same is true of an admission and an affirmative allegation inconsistent therewith, the latter may be stricken out, even though the admission is merely implied by failure to deny.[39]

e. Effect. When a fact is admitted upon the pleadings, no proof respecting it need be introduced,[40] and it may be presented to the jury as part of the evidence in the case.[41] By admitting in the answer a fact alleged by plaintiff, the fact is as well pleaded for the purposes of the answer as though averred therein.[42] An admission on the pleadings is an admission for all the purposes of the cause.[43] Admissions made on the pleadings are conclusive upon the party making them as long as they stand upon the record, and no evidence can be shown to contradict them.[44] But their effect is limited to the action wherein they are made, and they cannot be regarded as conclusive on the trial of other issues even between the same parties.[45] An admission once made remains so long as the answer is not withdrawn, where no other defense is filed inconsistent with it;[46] admissions of legal conclusions are of no force or effect.[47] Where after a specific denial an allegation is inadvertently admitted the effect of such admission is obviated by a consolidation of the action with another by the pleadings in which the allegation is denied.[48]

f. Protestations. It was anciently the custom to protest facts not denied, instead of admitting them, thus saving to defendant the privilege of contesting them in a subsequent action. This practice was abolished in England by the rules of Hilary Term.[49] A protestation is of no avail in the action wherein it is made, and the facts protested stand admitted in that action;[50] and no protestation can be made of matters of law.[51]

D. Matter in Avoidance[52]— 1. Confession and Avoidance — a. In General. At common law pleas in bar which do not traverse must be in confession and avoidance.[53] Under the codes the office of pleas in confession and avoidance is performed by defenses of new matter.[54] A plea in confession and avoidance or of new matter in the nature of such a plea does not deny the allegations of the declaration, but in legal contemplation confesses them and seeks to avoid them by new affirmative matter.[55] Whether or not a defense is to be deemed a confession and avoidance is to be determined from all the matters appearing therein.[56] A plea in confession and avoidance is necessary only when defendant proposes to admit the truth of a material allegation made by plaintiff, and to avoid liability thereon by affirmative proof of matters which destroy the effect of the allegations admitted.[57] Greater strictness is required in framing pleas in bar than in framing declarations,[58] but pleas in bar are construed with less strictness than dilatory pleas.[59] Hypothetical allegations are permissible in a plea or answer to enable defendant to plead all his defenses.[60] A special plea should be certain, at least to a common intent,[61] and its averments should clearly appear to relate to the same matters

Express color was one of the eurious subtilties belonging to the aneient system of eommon-law pleading. It was used in cases where, from the nature of the defense, there was no implied eolor, was a bare matter of form, was not traversable and served merely to save the plea from amounting to the general issue so as to draw the question upon the substantial parts of the plea from the jury to the court, by compelling plaintiff to demur. Implied confession.— In Mauldin v. Ball, 5 Mont. 96, 100, 1 Pae. 409, the eourt said: "The defense of new matter eontains no denials. It admits that the allegations of the eomplaint are true, and sets up new facts to modify or defeat them. Says Pomeroy (Rem. & Rem. Rights, see. 687): 'A defense of new matter, on the other hand, does not deny any faets. It assumes the averments of the complaint or petition to be true; and, under the aneient system, a plea of confession and avoidanee must give color to thosc averments, or it would be fatally defeetive. The "giving color" was simply the absenee of any denials, and the express or silent admission that the deelaration, as far as it went, told the truth.' . . . And so it may be said generally, that the defense of new matter, neeessarily, either expressly or by implication, admits the averments of the eomplaint, and alleges faets that destroy their effect or defeat them. If what is alleged contains merely hypothetical admissions, is bad.[67] Thus a plea averring that "the several causes of action, &c., if any such there were, or still are, did not accrue," etc., is bad for not giving color;[68] and so also is a plea referring to the cause of action alleged as the "said supposed" debt, "if any such there be";[69] but a plea merely using the term "supposed," in reference to the causes of action alleged, is good.[70]

c. Avoidance. A plea in confession and avoidance or, as it is frequently called, a special plea, must set up matter which, if true, affords a full and complete answer to the action.[71] A plea which confesses without avoiding is bad,[72] and if the truth of the plea may be admitted and the action is still maintainable, the plea is bad.[73] The avoidance must be as broad as the confession.[74] The general rule is that affirmative matter must go to avoid the cause of action and not simply to the amount,[75] or in mitigation of[76] damages, although in some jurisdictions it is held that under the codes matter in mitigation may be set up as a partial defense.[77] Matter in avoidance should consist of facts, not legal conclusions,[78] nor matters amounts to a denial, it is not new matter; nor is it new matter if the facts alleged might have been proven under a denial."

of evidence.[79] It is sufficient for a defendant to allege facts which constitute a defense, and he is not required to anticipate matter in avoidance of his own allegations.[80]

d. Allegations on Information and Belief. Facts in a plea in confession and avoidance should be alleged positively. It is not in the absence of statute sufficient to allege that defendant is informed and believes that they are true.[81] But under the code practice it has been held that affirmative matter in an answer may be alleged on information and belief with the same effect as in a complaint.[82]

2. New Matter Under the Codes — a. General Rule. The ordinary provision of the codes is that the answer may contain a statement of any new matter constituting a defense.[83] A defense cannot be of facts that may be proved under a general denial, but it must consist of new matter.[84] The answers by way of new matter authorized by the codes are substantially the same as the common-law pleas in confession and avoidance.[85] New matter must always be specially pleaded,[86] except where plaintiff's own proof shows such a defense.[87] The common provision of the codes is that the new matter alleged in the answer should be stated in ordinary and concise language, without repetition.[88] But it should be as full and complete in substance as a special plea at common law,[89] and the facts must be set out with the same precision as the facts in a complaint.[90] Uncertainty, however, may be waived by the failure of plaintiff to file a motion against the answer.[91]

b. What May Be Pleaded [92]— (i) In General. New matter means matter extrinsic to the matter which is set up in the complaint as the basis of the cause of action.[93] Hence, where facts are alleged in the complaint which are not germane to the relief asked, they are not thereby divested of their character as new matter should defendant wish to use them as a defense.[94] It is improper to set out evidence, or mere presumptions of facts.[95]

(ii) Lack of Interest in Suit. A defense that plaintiff is not the real party in interest and hence has no right to sue must be specially pleaded in bar.[96] Such matter cannot be pleaded in abatement.[97] An allegation that plaintiff is not the real party in interest must set forth the facts showing such to be the case.[98] An averment that a plaintiff is improperly joined because of lack of interest should point out specifically the defect relied upon.[99] The answer must state the facts showing that plaintiff is not the real party in interest,[1] and must show who is the proper party.[2] Evidence that plaintiff is not the real party in interest cannot be given under a general denial,[3] unless the case is one in which the facts showing interest must be established as an essential element of the cause of action.[4]

(iii) Lack of Capacity or Authority to Sue. A want of legal capacity to sue, which does not affirmatively appear from the pleadings, should be presented by answer.[5] But an objection that the suit was begun and prosecuted without authority of plaintiff cannot be urged by answer.[6] An allegation that plaintiff is not the real party in interest does not present his lack of legal capacity.[7] Defendant cannot abate a suit properly brought against him by afterward creating a state of facts against the ability of plaintiff to sue.[8]

(v) Defect of Parties. A defect of parties not apparent on the face of the complaint should be taken advantage of by answer.[12] But a defect of parties appearing on the face of the complaint cannot be taken advantage of by answer,[13] but must be urged by demurrer.[14] While it has been held that the objection that there is a defect of parties should be taken advantage of by a separate answer and not united in a general answer with matter in bar,[15] the rule usually adopted under the code provision, that the answer may set forth as many grounds of defense as defendant shall have,[16] is that the non-joinder of a party may be pleaded together with matter in bar.[17] The objection that there is a defect of parties must be presented in the answer in a clear and distinct manner.[18] In analogy to a plea in abatement which must be so specific as to omitted parties as to give plaintiff a better writ,[19] an answer setting up a defect of parties must state the omitted parties precisely and truly,[20] and facts should be alleged showing that they are necessary parties.[21] It must be alleged that omitted defendants are living and within the jurisdiction of the court.[22] So an answer setting up a non-joinder of plaintiffs must distinctly set up such defense and specifically show wherein the defect consists and who should have been joined as parties.[23] An issue of fact raised by an answer setting up a defect of parties is to be determined as other fact issues.[24] It is not necessary, in order to sustain an averment that certain necessary plaintiffs are omitted, to show that all the persons named in the averment are parties in interest.[25] Under the rule that all defenses whether in abatement or in bar are to be pleaded in the same answer,[26] a plea in abatement for the non-joinder of a joint promisor will not necessitate the abatement of the entire action, where it is true only as to one item of an account sued on.[27]

(VI) MISJOINDER. As a general rule, under the codes, the proper remedy for a misjoinder is a motion to strike out the parties improperly joined.[28] A misjoinder of plaintiffs, which does not appear on the face of the complaint, may be urged by answer.[29] But a misjoinder of parties defendant is not new matter constituting a defense which may be so presented.[30] It is not sufficient that an answer show a misjoinder exists, but the fact must be specifically presented as an objection.[31] Under a statute requiring the objection that there is an unnecessary party plaintiff to be raised by answer, when not apparent on the face of the complaint, a general denial is not sufficient to raise the objection,[32] nor can the question be urged on a general demurrer to the evidence.[33]

E. Set-Off, Counter-Claim, and Cross Complaint[34] — 1. In General. While there is some conflict with regard to the matter of recoupment,[35] it seems whose names are alleged to be unknown to defendant answering, but who are living and residents of the county in which the action was brought, and known to plaintiff, are jointly liable and should have been made parties defendant, is insufficient because it does not state the names of all the persons who should have been made parties. to be the accepted rule that a set-off or counter-claim [36] must be specially pleaded.[37] Under the codes it is usually expressly provided that new matter by way of counter-claim may be set up in the answer.[38] The matter by way of counter-claim so provided for is usually regarded as including both recoupment and set-off.[39] Under some codes, in case affirmative relief is sought, the pleading is designated a cross complaint, even where used merely by defendant against a plaintiff.[40] Such a cross complaint is properly part of the answer.[41] The general doctrine relating to equitable defenses in legal actions applies to equitable cross demands, and under the code the latter may be availed of in actions at law.[42] The limitations placed by the statute upon the right to file a counter-claim are liberally construed where equitable rights are in controversy, and the statute will not be deemed to narrow the practice as it formerly existed in equity, unless such a construction is clearly and unavoidably necessary.[43]

As a plea in bar.— Matter of set-off may be pleaded in bar (Meriwether v. Bird, 9 Ga. 594), although this rule has been limited to cases in which the sum set up is equivalent to plaintiff's demand (McDowell v. Tate, 12 N. C. 249, where it is said that if the amount of the set-off is less than the demand it must be availed of by annexing it to some plea which, with the sum set off, amounts to a full defense, and giving notice of set-off).

As a defense.— While, strictly speaking, set-off is not a defense at all, but in the nature of a cross action, it may be designated by statute as a defense and a form prescribed for the plea bringing it forward, although it may not in a given case go to the whole action or rather to the whole amount claimed. Rep. 577, the judges were not in accord as to the relation between set-off and counter-claim. Lord Bramwell thought they were identical. But Lord Bagallay and Lord Lush thought there was a difference between them and held that a set-off was defensive merely, while a counter-claim called for affirmative relief.

Some codes distinguish between set-off and counter-claim, the set-off being confined to demands arising upon contract and available in actions upon contract, the counter-claim embracing the other demands coming within the purview of the broader counter-claim in the other codes. Among the codes in which this distinction is made are: Sandels & H. Dig. Ark. § 5725; Burns Rev. St. Ind. (1901) § 351; Kan. Code (1901), § 98; Ky. Code (1900), § 96; Nebr. Upon the peculiar language employed by that section to define a 'counterclaim,' an argument is founded in support of the contention of the plaintiff in error, which would narrow the equity powers of the courts of common pleas of the state to a degree seriously embarrassing their efficiency. If the position taken by plaintiff in error is well founded, the courts of the state would be precluded from listening to any claim asserted by a defendant, unless its character was such that the claimant would be entitled to a 'several judgment' against the plaintiff. . . . From the language of these two sections, alone, the

2. Cross Actions Against Co-Defendants or Third Persons[44] — a. Right to Maintain. A number of the codes make special provision for a cross complaint by a defendant against co-defendants or third persons and prescribe how defendants in such cross complaint shall be summoned.[45] Such a cross complaint is closely analogous to a cross bill in equity,[46] and is not embraced within the meaning of the term "counter-claim" as usually employed by the codes.[47] In the absence of such an express authorization, the practice of allowing cross complaints to be filed against co-defendants in analogy to the cross bill of the chancery practice has contention of plaintiff in error is fairly plausible. But even if these two sections stood alone, it is doubtful if such contention should prevail. It would defeat one well understood purpose of the code of civil procedure, which was to prevent multiplicity of actions, and would absolutely abrogate the former jurisdiction in equity by which those courts administered complete justice between all the parties to an action, defendants as well as plaintiffs, respecting the subject matter thereof. These two sections, however, do not stand alone. . . . When all the provisions of the code of civil procedure are brought into view they clearly demonstrate a purpose to broaden the practice pertaining to the administration of justice as it existed before the code was adopted. . . . We find nothing in the code of civil procedure when considered as an entirety, that narrows the former power of a court of equity to fully adjudicate every question legitimately arising between the parties before it, respecting the subject matter of the action."

Distinction between complaint and cross complaint.— The only real difference between a complaint and a cross complaint is that the first is filed by plaintiff and the second by defendant; both contain a statement of facts, and each demands affirmative relief upon the facts stated. White v. Reagan, 32 Ark. 281.

Distinction between a counter-claim and cross complaint.— The difference between a counter-claim and a cross complaint is that in the counter-claim defendant's cause of action is against plaintiff, while in a cross complaint it is against a co-defendant or one not a party to the action. been sanctioned by the courts in the code states generally as a means of effectuating the provision ordinarily made in the codes, that the judgment rendered may, when the justice of the case requires it, determine the ultimate rights of the parties on each side as between themselves.[48] A cross action by a defendant against a co-defendant or third party must be in reference to the claim made by plaintiff and based upon an adjustment of that claim. Independent and unrelated causes of action cannot be litigated by cross actions.[49] Under some statutes, while a counter-claim must exist in favor of defendant and against plaintiff, it may in other respects be broader in its scope than a cross complaint, which is restricted to matters which relate to or depend on the contract or transaction on which the main case is founded, or affect the property to which the action relates.[50] Under some statutes an equitable cross complaint in an action at law must state facts requiring the interposition of equity to grant relief.[51]

b. Bringing in New Parties. In analogy to the equity practice [52] new parties may be brought in upon cross complaint where they are necessary to the full determination of the rights of the parties then before the court, touching the matter in litigation, where proper relief cannot be given without their presence.[53] And in some cases the power to bring in such additional parties is held to arise independently of the equity practice from the provision of the codes, that when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court shall order them to be brought in,[54] or may order a cross complaint to be filed and summons thereon to be issued and served.[55] Under such a statute the parties who may be brought in must be persons whose presence is essential to the complete determination of a controversy between parties who are already before the court.[56] One who by cross petition brings in a third person cannot, after such person has filed an answer, amend so as to deprive the person brought in of the opportunity to establish the allegations of his answer and to obtain the relief to which he is entitled.[57]

3. Same Facts Constituting Both Defense and Counter-Claim. If the same facts constitute both a defense and a counter-claim defendant may use them as either,[58] or he may separately plead them as both, in which case he cannot be compelled to elect upon which he will rely,[59] but the same portion of a single pleading cannot constitute both a defense and a counter-claim.[60] The fact that matter alleged in a counter-claim may be shown also under a general denial which is pleaded does not in itself render the counter-claim bad, since defendant may, under the counter-claim, obtain relief not available under the denial.[61]

4. Time For Pleading. The time for pleading a cross demand is frequently fixed by statute [62] or rule of court,[63] but the trial court has considerable discretion in allowing pleas of this nature to be filed after it is too late to file them of course.[64] As a general rule such a plea may be filed at any time that a plea of the general issue would be proper.[65] It comes too late after the trial of part of the issues in the original action,[66] or at the trial.[67] Where a special plea or notice is necessary, it must be filed in sufficient time to enable plaintiff to prepare to meet it.[68] In no case can it be filed before the declaration or complaint is filed.[69] A counter-claim cannot be pleaded after a nonsuit has been entered, since no action is then pending between the parties.[70]

5. Designation and Misnomer. A counter-claim or set-off should be pleaded as such and its character should be clearly indicated either by the name given it, or by the prayer, or in some other manner.[71] Still more precision is necessary where the question turns upon the want of a reply. In such case defendant must expressly designate his pleading a counter-claim or he will be presumed to intend it merely as a defense,[72] and some cases hold that in any event the counter-claim must be expressly designated as such and affirmative relief prayed, or it will not be regarded as a counter-claim.[73] But calling a pleading a counter-claim or cross complaint will not make it one,[74] and, in general, if a pleading is misnamed or has no name, it will nevertheless generally be treated as constituting what its allegations make it,[75] or it will be treated as the parties treat it on the trial.[76] But a stricter rule is laid down in some cases, where it is held that if a defendant designates his answer as a defense merely he is bound thereby and cannot subsequently contend that it is a counter-claim,[77] and conversely where an answer is designated as a counter-claim it cannot be sustained as a defense.[78] But in case matter is pleaded both as a defense and a counter-claim, it may be good as a defense, although bad as to the affirmative relief sought.[79] Where it is doubtful whether or not an answer is to be deemed a counter-claim, the substance and form of the entire answer will be considered so far as it throws any light on the question.[80] Where the answer is susceptible of being construed as setting up a mere defense or of setting up a counter-claim it should be construed as setting up the defense.[81] But where the evident intention of the pleader is to obtain a judgment against plaintiff, his answer will be deemed a counter-claim.[82]

6. Statement of Cross Demand[83] — a. In General. The only substantial difference between an original cause of action and a cross demand is that the first is filed by plaintiff and the second by defendant. be bad.[90] A plea of set-off which purports to answer the entire complaint but in fact answers only a portion of it, is not for that reason bad, since such a plea is not strictly a defense.[91] A cross complaint which contains no allegation in the form of denials cannot be construed as a denial of the allegations of the original complaint.[92] The fact that the allegations relating to a counter-claim are unnecessarily divided and are not all contained in that portion of the answer which relates to the counter-claim does not render such allegations irrelevant.[93]

lated by statute, or rule of court, the provisions of the statute or rule should be closely followed,[94] and if followed the pleading is to that extent sufficient.[95]

c. Requisites of Notice of Set-Off. If, instead of a plea of set-off, notice is given under the general issue, this stands in place of the special plea and fills the same office.[96] Some statutes make this method exclusive.[97] But such notice is admissible only under the general issue,[98] or under the plea of payment.[99] A notice of cross demand should describe with certainty defendant's claim.[1] The particular sums claimed and the accounts in which they are due should be specified.[2] It should contain the substance, although it need not have the form, of a declaration.[3] But the notice need not be drawn with the same strictness as a special plea and it is sufficient if it describe the demand with reasonable certainty.[4]

d. Cross Demand in Affidavit of Defense. A set-off in an affidavit of defense need not be pleaded with the formality and technical precision requisite in a special plea, but it is sufficient if it informs plaintiff, with reasonable certainty, of the nature of defendant's demand.[5] But it must exhibit all the elements of a substantial defense and nothing should be left to inference except what will be necessarily inferred.[6] It should show the source and extent of the damage and the items of loss.[7] Mere general averments will be disregarded.[8] If a breach of an independent written contract is relied upon, a copy thereof must be attached to the affidavit of defense.[9]

e. Several Items of Set-Off. The rule against duplicity [10] does not apply to pleas of set-off, and defendant may set up as many demands as he has in the same division of his pleading.[11] Accordingly while it is a general rule that a plea bad in part is bad as to the whole, this is not true of pleas of set-off which contain several distinct matters. Each is to be considered separately and its sufficiency is to be determined without reference to the others.[12]

f. Conclusion and Prayer For Judgment. In some jurisdictions a plea of set-off must conclude with an offer to set off defendant's claim against plaintiff's claim.[13] Where cross demands are pleaded and defendant proves a claim larger than that of plaintiff he will be entitled to judgment for the balance, although he does not pray for judgment.[14] Under the code, any relief to which defendant may properly prove himself entitled will be given, irrespective of the prayer,[15] although some cases hold that no relief can be given not specially prayed for or within the general prayer.[16] Where no issue is taken on a cross demand, no relief can be obtained which is not specifically asked for.[17]

F. Affidavit of Defense or of Merits — 1. Office of Affidavit. Under the practice in some jurisdictions, an affidavit of defense or of merits is required to be filed by defendant in order to prevent the signing of judgment by default,[18] to avoid an inquest,[19] or to enable defendant to file a plea.[20] In some of these jurisdictions the matter is regulated by statute,[21] in others by rule of court.[22] Where such an affidavit is required, failure to file it is a conclusive admission, for the purposes of the suit, of the validity of plaintiff's claim,[23] and a plea filed without it may be treated as a nullity,[24] or may be stricken from the files.[25] A default will not be sustained merely because the affidavit of defense is lost.[26] The filing of an affidavit of defense is not an admission that plaintiff has stated a good cause of action.[27] Where the facts constituting the defense are clearly set forth in the affidavit, no other notice of special matter is necessary.[28] No other proceeding in substitution therefor will be allowed. Thus a motion to strike from the files plaintiff's affidavit of claim will not obviate the necessity for an affidavit of defense, notwithstanding such an affidavit on the part of plaintiff is a prerequisite to defendant's obligation to file an affidavit of merits.[29] The facts set up in the affidavit must be assumed by the court to be true, so far as the sufficiency and effect of the affidavit are concerned.[30] But portions of an affidavit denied under oath cannot be received in evidence.[31]

2. Nature of Affidavit. There is a marked distinction between an affidavit of merits and a verified plea.[32] The affidavit precedes [33] or accompanies [34] the plea, and cannot be substituted for it; and it is the plea and not the affidavit which answers plaintiff's pleading.[35] The affidavit of defense is in fact no part of the pleadings.[36] An affidavit of defense may be directed against the legal sufficiency of plaintiff's statement of his cause of action, and in such case it is deemed in the nature of a demurrer and should be disposed of as such.[37] But an affidavit which denies the facts alleged by plaintiff or pleads facts showing a defense cannot be treated as a demurrer.[38] An affidavit is insufficient which purports to set up a defense and in fact merely sets up facts showing a set-off.[39]

3. When Required [40]— a. In General. The affidavit of defense or of merits is usually required only in certain actions on contract, but statutes and rules of court differ in their wording as to the cases in which the affidavit is necessary.[41]

Those facts the court is bound, for the purposes of securing to the defendant the right of trial, to assume as true, and that, too, without reference to what the plaintiff may have stated in his affidavit. If the facts stated by the defendant, by any reasonable or fair construction, will constitute a defence to the action or claim of the plaintiff, within the scope of the pleas pleaded, it is the absolute constitutional right of the defendant to have that defence regularly tried and determined, in due course of judicial investigation."

Where the statute or rule enumerates the cases in which an affidavit of merits is necessary, such enumeration excludes other cases.[42] Executors and administrators, not being privy to the transactions of the deceased, have been held exempt from the operation of these provisions and so also have infants;[43] but an affidavit is required where an executor is sued for a debt lawfully contracted in his representative capacity.[44] The requirement of an affidavit of merits or of defense is not generally applicable to non-resident defendants, or to absent defendants not actually served with process,[45] nor to actions begun by foreign attachment.[46] A provision that an affidavit of merits shall be filed before defendant shall be permitted to plead is an imperative law which admits the exercise of no discretion in respect thereto.[47] Where no affidavit of defense is necessary, it is immaterial whether one filed is good or not.[48]

b. After Default For Plea. When a party is in default for a plea, the court has authority to require the filing of an affidavit of merits as a condition of allowing the plea to be filed, even though it has no authority to require such an affidavit when the plea is filed in time.[49]

4. Sufficiency of Plaintiff's Statement to Require Affidavit. No judgment for want of affidavit of defense will be sustained where plaintiff's statement of his cause of action is insufficient, or where he has waived the want of an affidavit.[50] Under the statutes in some jurisdictions no affidavit of merits is necessary except when plaintiff has filed with his declaration an affidavit of claim.[51] Under such a provision an affidavit must be filed by defendant when the affidavit of claim shows on its face that it conforms fully to the requirements laid down respecting it.[52] Under other statutes,[53] an affidavit of defense is required only when plaintiff files with his declaration a copy of the bill, note, bond, or other instrument or book-account on which the action is founded, or files an affidavit of the amount of

Where instruments are on record it is Sufficient for plaintiff to give a full reference to the office, book, and page where the money loaned or advanced. The copy filed must be full and complete.[54] A mere bill, although it accurately specifies the items of a book-account, is not strictly a copy, and hence its filing will not make necessary the filing of an affidavit of defense.[55] And under these statutes no affidavit is necessary unless the instrument or account filed is admissible in evidence in support of plaintiff's claim.[56] Court rules sometimes require plaintiff to serve notice on defendant to file the affidavit, but where defendant files his affidavit without having received the notice, he is deemed to have waived service of the same.[57]

5. Persons Who May Make — a. Defendant. The affidavit should regularly be made by defendant.[58] Where two or more joint defendants plead jointly, the affidavit of one of them is sufficient;[59] but where several defendants plead severally each plea must be sustained by a separate affidavit.[60] The mere fact that defendant is incompetent to testify in his own behalf does not invalidate his affidavit.[61]

b. Third Person. It is not indispensable, however, that defendant make the affidavit. A third person fully acquainted with the circumstances may make it, when defendant himself is unable to do so by reason of sickness or absence.[62] But it must clearly appear that defendant could not have made the affidavit himself,[63] and the means of knowledge possessed by the affiant should be stated.[64] The affidavit of a third person interested in the event of the suit is sufficient,[65] but the extent of his interest must be stated.[66] So also one who is a party to an instrument sued on, although not the nominal defendant, may make the affidavit;[67] and the affidavit of the real defendant, although not defendant of record, is sufficient.[68] But it must appear that the affidavit, if not made by defendant, was made by someone acting for him;[69] and the reason must be assigned why it is not made by defendant himself.[70] If defendant does not know all the facts, the better practice is to state them in his affidavit as facts of which he is informed, but several affidavits may be filed, each made by a person having actual knowledge of the facts therein stated.[71] The attorney of defendant, if he knows the facts, may make the affidavit;[72] but he cannot make it merely upon the information of his client.[73] The affidavit should state what knowledge he has of the facts, and the source of his knowledge.[74]

6. Time of Filing. The time when the affidavit must be filed is generally determined by statute [75] or rule,[76] and no judgment for want of an affidavit is valid if signed prior to the expiration of the time allowed for the affidavit.[77] Where the statute prescribes the time when the affidavit shall be filed, a court has no power to extend the time so limited,[78] unless the statute gives the court power.[79] But an agreement between the parties to extend the time for filing the affidavit is valid and enforceable.[80] And so long as plaintiff has not signed or moved for judgment, the affidavit may be filed, even though the time set has expired;[81] but the moving for judgment by plaintiff after the law permits him to do so precludes defendant from thereafter filing his affidavit.[82] It is an improvident exercise of the court's discretion to allow an affidavit to be filed, after the cause has been reached for trial, which will materially change the issues.[83] No affidavit can be filed until after plaintiff has filed his declaration; [84] and an affidavit once filed extends through the whole progress of the case, although it be several times noticed for trial.[85] The time for filing the affidavit does not run pending a demurrer to the

An affidavit in the following words is sufficient, under the Rhode Island statute: "I have a good and valid defence to a part of the plaintiff's claim; that said defence consists in this, that the account rendered is incorrect and that prices charged for materials furnished are higher than was agreed upon at the time of purchase. In Illinois and Michigan it is not deemed necessary for defendant, in the affidavit of merits, to set up his defense in detail (Beardsley v. Gosling, 86 Ill. 58; Hays v. Loomis, 84 Ill. 18; McCormick v. Wells, 83 Ill. 239), although if he undertakes to do so he will be held to the same strictness in matters of substance as is required in pleadings (McCord v. Crooker, 83 Ill. 566). No greater particularity is necessary than in affidavits to set aside defaults, and it is sufficient for defendant to state that he has a good defense to the action on the merits, as he believes or is advised by counsel, without specifying the nature and extent of the defense. Wadsworth v. Ætna Nat. Bank, 84 Ill. 272; McCormick v. Wells, supra; made in favor of an affidavit of defense,[92] and if there is any doubt as to the sufficiency of an affidavit, judgment will not be given at the first term.[93] This liberal interpretation seems to be required, since summary judgment may be had against defendant in case the affidavit is deemed insufficient.[94] In some cases, however, affidavits of defense seem to be somewhat strictly construed.[95] An affidavit of defense, it has been held, means an affidavit as to the merits, and an affidavit supporting a plea in abatement is not sufficient as an affidavit of defense.[96] The affidavit must not be evasive, but should fairly meet as much of plaintiff's case as it purports to answer.[97] It should be specific, leaving nothing to inference,[98] but it need be no more specific than the statement required of plaintiff in setting up his cause of action.[99] Stating the facts in the participial form instead of in the indicative will not render the affidavit insufficient.[1] The affidavit must be responsive to plaintiff's statement,[2] but it need answer nothing beyond what plaintiff alleges;[3] and it should be in harmony with the plea.[4] Defendant need not, in his affidavit, anticipate plaintiff's reply;[5] nor is a defendant required to reply to matters set up by plaintiff for the purpose of rebutting an anticipated defense.[6] An affidavit which purports to set up a defense to the entire demand when in fact it contains only a partial defense is insufficient.[7]

Hurd v. Burr, 22 Ill. 29. An affidavit of defendant that "he has a good and valid defense to the whole of said suit, upon the merits, as he verily believes," has been held to be sufficient. Harrison v. Willett, 79 Ill. 482.

In Delaware the statute requires defendant to state whether he has a legal defense to the whole or a part of plaintiff's claim, and it is held under this statute that an affidavit is insufficient which does not state whether it purports to answer the whole or a part of the claim. Potts v. Wells, 3 Pennew. 11, 50 Atl. 62.

Formal defects will not vitiate an affidavit in case it sets forth substantially a good defense.[8]

b. Caption. The affidavit should be entitled in the court and cause;[9] but this is not necessary if it follows a properly entitled plea upon the same paper,[10] or if it can readily be identified as to court and cause.[11] And where the names of the parties are transposed, as was customary at common law with pleas, the affidavit is sufficient.[12]

c. Denials. Where the defense is negative and consists of denials of plaintiff's allegations, the affidavit must deny material facts,[13] and the denial must be broad enough to constitute a valid defense.[14] If any facts material to plaintiff's cause of action are denied the affidavit shows a good defense.[15] Denials should be direct, not argumentative [16] nor hypothetical.[17] A denial to prevent a judgment must be specific.[18] Facts not denied are to be taken as admitted.[19]

d. Affirmative Defenses. Where the defense is affirmative, all the facts necessary to constitute a substantial defense must be explicitly set forth.[20] Where a written instrument forms the basis of the defense, it should be set out in full in the affidavit,[21] or attached thereto.[22] If the facts alleged constitute a prima facie defense, the affidavit is sufficient in substance; [23] but if they do not, the affidavit will not be sustained.[24] Nothing should be left to inference, and what is not stated in the affidavit must be taken not to exist.[25] But where the elements of a valid defense are found by necessary inference from the facts alleged, the affidavit is sufficient.[26] If the declaration is in general terms, as in the case of the common counts, the affidavit may be general.[27] An affidavit not sufficiently specific as to the date of an instrument sued on may be held good when plaintiff has failed to furnish a copy of the instrument as required by rule of court [28]

e. Certainty. The facts constituting the defense should be alleged with certainty, but ordinary certainty is sufficient.[29] Vague, indefinite, and uncertain allegations will not be deemed sufficient to satisfy the requirements of an affidavit of defense,[30] and this is especially true where the facts are within defendant's knowledge.[31] The affidavit should state the facts with sufficient detail to enable the court to say whether they amount to a defense and to inform plaintiff what will be interposed to defeat his claim.[32] It is not necessary to state the manner in which the facts alleged will be proved, nor the evidence by which they will be established,[33] and it has been held unnecessary for the affidavit to state whether an agreement referred to was made orally or in writing.[34] Where defendant has a defense to a part only of the claim set up he should specify particularly what part.[35]

f. Averments on Information and Belief. The party making the affidavit must swear to the facts stated therein from his own knowledge, and not from information [36] or information and belief.[37] But he may state that the facts are true "to the best of his knowledge and belief," such a statement being positive as to their truth.[38] So a statement that defendant has a defense to the action "as he believes" is sufficient,[39] although the rule is otherwise if knowledge of the facts is in his power.[40] However, an affidavit is sufficient which is stated to be on information and belief, if to that statement the party adds the averment that he expects to prove the facts so stated, or sets out specially the sources of his information or the facts upon which his belief rests.[41] Where facts are sworn to as within the affiant's own knowledge, it is unnecessary to state further that the affiant expects to be able to prove them.[42] The usual form of affidavit is that the affiant "verily believes" the facts which he alleges; but it is sufficient to allege their positive existence without alleging belief in them,[43] and a statement in the affidavit that the party expects to prove the facts alleged is sufficient without an averment of belief in their truth.[44] An affidavit which merely states that defendant's counsel is of opinion that defendant has a good and meritorious defense to the suit is insufficient.[45]

g. Legal Conclusions. Facts, not legal conclusions, must be stated in the affidavit.[46]

h. Attestation and Jurat. An affidavit of defense may be sworn to before a notary of another state.[47] But an affidavit attested by defendant's counsel as notary is null and void,[48] except where the affidavit is in substance nothing more than a demurrer.[49] The mere clerical omission of the officer administering the oath to put his signature to the jurat, after swearing the affiant, does not vitiate the affidavit, when the affiant appears in court and states that he is willing to be resworn.[50]

V. REPLICATION OR REPLY AND SUBSEQUENT PLEADINGS.

A. Replication or Reply — 1. In General.[51] The next fact pleading after the answer is the replication which is usually called a reply in the code states. The office of a reply is to meet matter averred in the answer.[52]

2. Necessity For — a. At Common Law. At common law the necessity for a replication is always governed by the plea, and is required whenever the plea does not conclude to the country.[53]

b. Under Codes and Practice Acts — (i) In General. In many jurisdictions the necessity for a reply has been removed or limited by statute.[54] Among the various codes of procedure there is a difference in respect to the necessity for a reply, and in many of the code states different rules have been in force at different times. One group of codes requires a reply in all cases where the answer sets up

In Texas the statute provides that plaintiff need not deny any special matter of new matter, whether as counter-claim or merely as defense.[55] In a second group of codes and practice acts, a reply is necessary only to a counter-claim; and where the answer merely contains new matter by way of defense, an issue is raised thereon by operation of law.[56] Another group of codes requires a reply in case of a counter-claim, and also, in the discretion of the court, on defendant's application, where new matter in defense is set up in the answer.[57] In another group no reply is authorized in any case.[58] In some jurisdictions an answer of certain defendants, defense pleaded by defendant but the same shall be regarded as denied unless expressly admitted. Missouri, etc., R. Co. v. Avis, 100 Tex. 33, 93 S. W. 424; Brooks v. Pegg, (1888) 8 S. In California the code provides that the statement of any new matter in the answer, in avoidance or constituting a defense or counter-claim, must, on the trial, be deemed controverted by the opposite party. Under not made a cross petition against their co-defendants, need not be replied to by the latter;[59] and in other jurisdictions no answer or reply is required of a defendant on whom a co-defendant has served an answer asking affirmative relief.[60]

(II) Discretion of Court. Where occasion demands it, the court has discretion in some jurisdictions to require a reply which would not otherwise be necessary.[61] By statute, in a few states, it rests in the discretion of the court to require a reply to new matter not constituting a counter-claim,[62] but the order can be granted only on the application of defendant.[63] This discretion is a legal one, which should be so exercised as to prevent surprise and promote the interests of justice,[64] although the necessity to prevent surprise is not the only test.[65] This discretion is usually exercised by ordering a reply where the new matter is of such a character as to indicate that if true it will constitute a defense to the action.[66] Where any substantial advantage will accrue to defendant without prejudice to plaintiff by the granting of such an order, it should be granted;[67] but the motion may properly be denied when defendant will not be prejudiced thereby or when plaintiff would be prejudiced by having it granted.[68] So where the matters alleged in the answer do not constitute a defense, the court should not, in the exercise of its discretion, order a reply.[69] Where there are several defenses pleaded, the court may order them to be replied to separately.[70] Where the filing of a reply is a matter within the court's discretion, the pleadings are brought to an issuable conclusion without a reply in the absence of an order

this provision no demurrer is necessary to an answer. requiring it,[71] and evidence may be introduced by plaintiff of affirmative matters tending to avoid the defenses pleaded.[72]

c. Nature of New Matter — (I) In General.[73] The new matter which calls for a reply must be material,[74] and such as directly, or by necessary implication, admits the truth of the essential allegations of the complaint, and purports to avoid the same.[75] It must be matter which plaintiff is not bound to prove in the first instance in support of the action.[76] The purported admission of a fact in an answer which is not in fact alleged in the complaint will not be deemed such an affirmative allegation by defendant as to require a reply.[77]

(II) As Distinguished From Denials. Whether matter is new or not must be determined by the matter itself, and not by the form in which it is pleaded — the test being whether it operates as a traverse or by way of confession and avoidance.[78] A reply is never necessary to allegations which are in form new matter but in substance amount merely to denials.[79] Likewise, where all the evidence admissible under affirmative allegations in an answer or special plea could have been shown under a general denial or general issue also pleaded, no reply is necessary.[80] And where a special plea, under the common-law system, amounts in substance to no more than the general issue, no replication is necessary.[81] Likewise, no replication is necessary to matter set up by way of notice of special defense under the general issue.[82] But an answer sets up new matter requiring a reply, although it merely alleges facts inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint, if such allegations in the complaint are not necessary for plaintiff's cause of action but merely anticipate a defense.[83]

d. Nature of Counter-Claim or Cross Complaint. A counter-claim which makes a reply necessary is one showing matter sufficient to sustain an independent action by defendant against plaintiff.[84] But if defendant asks merely that his demand be used defensively to reduce plaintiff's demand, without seeking an affirmative judgment, such a demand is not a counter-claim requiring a reply.[85] And it has been held that a counter-claim should be so designated, and where facts constituting a counter-claim are pleaded as a defense merely, they do not constitute such a counter-claim as requires a reply.[86] Where an answer may be construed as setting up either a defense merely or a counter-claim, it will, in order to raise an issue, in the absence of a reply, be construed as a defense.[87] Where a cross complaint, as distinguished from a counter-claim, is provided for by statute as a separate pleading,[88] a reply is not necessary where the answer does not in fact contain a cross complaint,[89] and merely naming a pleading a cross complaint does not necessarily make it such so as to require a reply.[90] Likewise a reply may be unnecessary where the cross complaint is irrelevant to the case stated by plaintiff,[91] or where the cross complaint is styled an "answer" by defendant.[92] But a cross complaint directed solely against other parties who are not in court cannot be taken as confessed against plaintiff for failure to reply.[93] So where every fact pleaded in the cross bill is put in issue by the allegations of the complaint and amended answer, no reply need be filed.[94]

e. Defective, Insufficient, Unauthorized, or Unnecessary Answer. Where the allegations of new matter, admitting their truth, do not constitute a defense,[95]

or counter-claim,[96] a reply is not necessary. So evidence set up in the answer,[97] or a defense defectively pleaded,[98] or a counter-claim insufficiently pleaded,[99] need not be replied to. So no reply is necessary to a plea which, being unauthorized, should be stricken from the files or disregarded by the court;[1] nor to an unnecessary answer which is nevertheless filed.[2]

f. Effect of Dismissal of Part of Complaint. Where the dismissal of a count in a declaration carries with it a plea, no reply is necessary to such plea.[3] So, if a replication contain a nolle prosequi as to certain of the counts to which defendant has pleaded, this removes the necessity of replying to so much of defendant's plea as relates to those counts.[4]

g. Successive Replies. Facts alleged by a defendant need be replied to but once, and where defendant again answers after the filing of a supplemental petition, but sets up no new facts, the reply to the original answer is sufficient as a reply to the second answer;[5] but if a new defense is set up in an amended answer, the reply to the original answer cannot stand as a reply to the new defense.[6] Similarly, refiling a reply to an original answer is sufficient to put in issue facts realleged in an amended answer.[7]

3. Right to Reply and Effect of Unnecessary Reply. Generally a plaintiff has no right to file a reply when a reply is not required by statute or order of court,[8] although in some jurisdictions the rule seems to be to the contrary.[9] So, under the common-law system, where the plea concludes to the country, plaintiff cannot reply with any new matter but must either accept it by a similiter or demur.[10] Accordingly it is generally held that if a reply is filed in a case where no reply is required, it is to be treated as a nullity;[11] and may be stricken out on motion,[12] except where it appears that defendant will not be embarrassed by such a reply.[13]

4. Time For Filing or Service.[14] The time when a reply must be filed or served is usually fixed by statute or rule of court,[15] but these statutes are given a liberal construction in the interest of justice.[16] Unless leave is first obtained, a reply cannot be filed after the expiration of such time.[17] But an extension of time is permissible in the discretion of the court upon good cause shown,[18] and a reply may be allowed even after the trial is commenced;[19] and even though an extension is granted without a sufficient reason, it is not ground for reversal.[20] It is not, however, an abuse of discretion to refuse leave where plaintiff is many months in default and no reason is given for the failure to plead.[21] Under a statute allowing amendments in furtherance of justice, a party may be allowed to file his reply after resting his case on the evidence.[22] But it has been held that an offer to file a reply after the argument to the jury is closed comes too late;[23] and that no issue can be taken on an unanswered plea after trial and judgment.[24] Where, however, both parties try a case upon the theory that the issue sought to be made by the reply was made, leave to file a reply after verdict is not an abuse of discretion.[25] And when leave is given to file a reply after trial and verdict, the court may allow it to be filed nunc pro tunc, as of the date of trial.[26] So, where leave is given to file a reply after the trial is in progress, it may be allowed to be filed nunc pro tunc as of the time the case was called for trial.[27] Where an affidavit of merits should properly accompany a request for leave to file, it may nevertheless be dispensed with by the court under proper circumstances.[28] Terms may be imposed when the filing of a reply is allowed after the proper time for it.[29]

5. Form and Contents[30] — a. In General — (i) Whether Pleading Is a Reply. Whether or not a pleading shall be treated as a reply depends upon its allegations, and not upon the name given it.[31] A plea bad in law should regularly be demurred to, but where a reply instead of a demurrer is filed, setting up facts appropriate to a demurrer, and issue is taken thereon, the plea is thereby effectually met.[32] Where, to a proper plea, the mere word "issue" was appended, without any signature of counsel, this was held no replication whatever.[33]

(ii) Formal Requisites — (a) In General. The formal requisites of a reply or a replication are the same as in case of other pleadings,[34] except that a reply differs from a complaint in that it need contain no prayer for relief.[35]

(b) Formal Conclusion.[36] As in the case of pleas, the common-law rule is that the replication should, generally speaking, conclude to the country when it tenders issue, and with a verification when it consists of matter in avoidance.[37]

A special traverse, however, should conclude with a verification, and not to the country.[38] Even where there is no formal negative and affirmative, if the replication substantially disaffirms the plea, it should conclude to the country.[39] If the new matter in the replication is introduced merely to explain and fortify the declaration, the conclusion should nevertheless be with a verification.[40] The verification should be by the record where the replication alleges merely matters of record;[41] but a replication of nul tiel record, where the evidence of the record is a matter to be inquired of by a jury, should conclude to the country.[42] The addition of a wrong conclusion is merely a formal defect.[43]

(III) What May Be Pleaded. The reply should present matters of fact, not matters of law.[44] At common law the replication may either present matter of estoppel, deny the truth of the matter alleged in the plea in whole or in part, confess and avoid the plea, or, lastly, in the case of an evasive plea, new assign the cause of action.[45] Under the codes and practice acts, the reply may contain a general or specific denial,[46] or new matter constituting a defense to the answer;[47] but generally cannot set up a counter-claim to defendant's counter-claim.[48] In some jurisdictions the statute allows new facts which have occurred since the institution of the action to be set up by reply,[49] but leave of court is often required.[50] All the matters pleaded in the reply must be germane to the allegations of the plea or answer,[51] and a reply which neither denies those allegations

Many refinements upon this rule were developed at common law, and Justice Van Ness, in Patcher v. Sprague, 2 Johns. (N. Y.) 462, 466, says: "When a replication ought to conclude to the country, and when with a verification, has frequently embarrassed the ablest special pleaders on this subject, and it is difficult to lay down any general rule. Each case must, in a great measure, depend on its own circumstances." And he says further: "It seems now to be considered, as the best and safest rule, where a defendant cannot take any new or other issue in his rejoinder, than the matter he had pleaded before, without a departure from his plea, or where the issue on the rejoinder would be the same in substance as on the plea, for the plaintiff to conclude to the country."

The conclusion to the country in a replication should be "this he prays may be inquired of by the country," and not, "of this he puts himself on the country." Hartwell v. Hemmenway, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 117.

nor confesses and avoids them is bad.[52] But if the whole reply taken together amounts to a denial or confession and avoidance, it is at most only formally, but not substantially, defective.[53]

(iv) Scope of Pleading. The reply should point out precisely to which of several pleas filed it is directed,[54] but it is sufficient if the pleadings, by their nature, indicate which plea the reply is intended to answer.[55] A failure to indicate is not, however, a fatal defect so as to be ground for a judgment on the pleadings.[56] The reply should be a complete answer to the plea to which it is directed, and when, purporting to answer all, it answers but a part, leaving a material part unanswered, it is insufficient.[57] Accordingly, if a plea is double, and, instead of demurring for the duplicity, plaintiff replies, the reply must answer both parts of the plea.[58] But where the plea covers several distinct causes of action set forth in the declaration, the replication may single out one cause of action and make a good answer to the plea in that regard, without answering the plea as to the other causes of action.[59] It is enough to answer the plea itself and the replication should not attempt to put in issue matters alleged in a bill of particulars filed with the plea.[60] A single replication to several pleas must be good as to each one singly.[61] It does not render a reply insufficient that it is directed to the entire answer when parts of the answer do not require a reply.[62] A replication to a single plea to a declaration containing several counts, which applied to only one count, is no answer to the plea as to the other counts.[63] Under the common-law system, where a plea contains affirmative matters and also a special traverse, but the special traverse is bad because it does not go to the point of the action, the replication is complete, although it does not notice the special traverse.[64]

under the common-law system,[65] but this rule has been modified by statute in some of the common-law states.[66] Where it is sought to take issue on the allegations of a plea, the reply should traverse them directly, and not merely set up facts inconsistent with those alleged in the plea.[67] Such a reply is an argumentative traverse, but is sufficient nevertheless to raise an issue.[68] A traverse of a material allegation in the express words of the plea is sufficient,[69] and surplusage in a replication will not render it bad.[70]

(B) Traverse De Injuria. The traverse de injuria is a special form of replication at common law used chiefly in actions of trespass and case, consisting of a traverse in general and summary terms and not in the words of the allegation traversed.[71] It may, however, be used in actions ex contraciu.[72] When the defense alleged in the plea consists of matter of excuse, this form of replication may be used;[73] but it cannot be employed where the plea is in justification,[74] or amounts to a denial of plaintiff's cause of action.[75]

(C) Special Traverse.[76] The form of pleading known as the special traverse may be used in the replication, and is sufficient when the inducement amounts in substance to a sufficient answer to the last pleading.[77]

(II) UNDER THE CODES — (A) In General. Where a reply is proper, one in the form of a general denial is usually deemed sufficient.[78] The use of the denial in a reply is, in the code states, exactly similar to its use in an answer.[79] The form of the denial must be in accordance with the statute,[80] and should be definite and certain and indicate precisely what allegations are denied.[81] The traverse should not be made as to mere matters of evidence, but a traverse has been held good where it denies the ultimate fact which the evidence goes to prove.[82] Nor should the reply deny argumentatively, by alleging facts inconsistent with the facts alleged in the answer, although an argumentative denial is good on demurrer,[83] or at the trial,[84] or after verdict and judgment.[85] The remedy for an argumentative denial under the code is a motion to make more definite and certain.[86]

(iii) Matter to Be Traversed. Although the replication must answer the whole plea, the traverse in a replication will be sufficient if properly directed against but one material allegation.[90] And where a reply controverts one of several items pleaded in a set-off based on an account, the set-off in its entirety cannot be deemed confessed.[91] But no facts should be denied in the replication which are not material,[92] or are not alleged in the plea.[93] Although whatever is necessarily implied in a plea is traversable equally with facts expressly alleged.[94] So the traverse in a replication should raise an issue of fact and not of law, and hence a traverse of a conclusion of law is bad.[95] It should always be directed to some affirmative matter, and not a negative averment in the plea.[96]

(iv) Negative Pregnant. A negative pregnant in a reply is bad, equally with a negative pregnant in a plea,[97] and it puts nothing in issue.[98]

c. New Matter in Avoidance. A plaintiff may plead in his reply new matter,[99] and must specially plead it if he wishes to rely thereon unless a reply is dispensed with by statute.[1] But matter of inducement alleged by defendant should not be answered by new matter in confession and avoidance, since it is not issuable.[2] So a replication avoiding merely an immaterial averment of a plea is insufficient.[3] A reply setting up new matter as a defense under the codes is the same as the plea of confession and avoidance under the common-law system, and the requirements of the common law as to such a plea is not changed by the codes.[4] The new matter pleaded must confess the facts alleged in the answer,[5] and avoid their Mode of confessing.— A reply setting up new matter must confess that, but for the matter pleaded in avoidance, the defense to which it applies would entitle the party pleading the same to succeed thereon; but this confession need not be in terms but may be by implication. It is sufficient if it "give color" to the alleged right of the adverse party and no more than this was required at common law. Day v. Mill-Owners' Mut. F. Ins. Co., 75 Iowa 694, 38 N. W. 113. It is not necessary that a pleading in confession and avoidance should admit the truth of the adverse statement absolutely and to all pur-effect.[6] All the ultimate facts relied upon to answer the defense pleaded should be alleged,[7] without reference to independent documents.[8] No facts should be alleged in the reply which are inconsistent with the allegations constituting plaintiff's cause of action,[9] nor facts which are already in issue,[10] or already appear upon the record.[11] More general averments are allowed, it seems, in a replication than in a declaration.[12] In jurisdictions where equitable defenses are not permissible in legal actions, an equitable reply cannot be received to a legal defense.[13] Under some codes, allegations in the reply may be made in the alternative, where plaintiff does not know which of two states of facts is true.[14]

d. New Assignment. A new assignment is merely a restatement, in a more minute and circumstantial manner, of the same cause of action, or some part thereof, already alleged in the declaration, and does not profess to be a reply to anything set up by defendant. It was used at common law in those cases where the law allows a general form of pleading on the part of plaintiff, equally applicable to two or more states of facts, which leave it doubtful which was intended. In such cases, if defendant answers a state of facts not intended, plaintiff must new assign.[15] This form of replication is most usually employed in actions of trespass, but it is possible for a new assignment to become appropriate in most forms of action.[16] Whenever it is necessary to new assign, the new assignment, being in the nature of a new declaration, must be as certain as to time, place, poses. It is sufficient if the pleading gives color, that is, confesses the matter adversely alleged to such an extent, at least, as to admit some apparent right in the opposite party which requires to be encountered and avoided by the allegation of new matter. and other circumstances as an original statement of a cause of action.[17] The new assignment admits the plea, so that where but a single trespass is charged plaintiff's new assignment in effect puts him out of court.[18] Under the codes of procedure it would seem that, inasmuch as the facts are always to be set out fully in plaintiff's complaint, there would seldom be a case where a new assignment would be necessary. The English and Irish codes expressly make it inadmissible,[19] but it has been at least recognized as possible under the code procedure in this country.[20]

e. Departure — (i) In General.[21] A departure in pleading is where the party quits or departs from the case or defense which he first made, and has recourse to another — the statement of matter which is not pursuant to the previous pleading of the same party and which does not support and fortify it.[22] It is the abandonment of a previous ground and the assumption of another.[23] The common-law term "departure" embraces and is equivalent to the code provision that the new matter in the reply must not be "inconsistent with the complaint."[24] The reply or replication must not depart from the complaint, petition, or declaration;[25] and it follows that new causes of action cannot be set up in the reply,[26]

The reason is that if parties were permitted to wander from fact to fact, and to supply a new cause of action as often as defendant interpose a legal bar to that which plaintiff first set out, it would lead to useless prolixity and it would even be possible by this means to prevent them from ever coming to issue. nor can the original cause of action be enlarged.[27] When a party's subsequent pleading contains matter which does not fortify his antecedent pleading, there is a departure;[28] but there is no departure when the averments of the second pleading substantiate and are consistent with those of the first,[29] nor when they avoid the new matter set up by the other party, even though they do not affirmatively support the party's former pleading, provided they are not inconsistent with such former pleading.[30] So there is no departure where the facts alleged are inconsistent merely with facts set up in the pleadings of the other party;[31] nor where a reply merely denies a material averment in defendant's plea.[32] Facts do not ordinarily constitute a departure unless they are inconsistent with those formerly alleged.[33] But if the reply is inconsistent with the com-

There is a departure where the petition alleged that a judgment was not a lien on certain land because not properly docketed, plaint,[34] or if it leads to the granting of relief to which plaintiff would not be entitled on the complaint,[35] there is a departure. So there is a departure where a reply shows or admits that some of the facts alleged by plaintiff in his first pleading are not true.[36] If the reply alleges nothing which could not have been given in evidence under the complaint, it is not bad as constituting a departure;[37] and there can be no departure as to merely immaterial matter only,[38] nor as to mere matters of inducement.[39] A reply should not be used as a substitute for an amendment to plaintiff's first pleading.[40] However, to set out a part of the cause of action in the complaint and the balance in the reply is not a departure, however defective the pleadings may otherwise be.[41] A departure in pleading in a suit in equity is less prejudicial to a party than in an action at law, since the court can readily segregate the testimony applicable to the allegations in the prior pleading.[42]

(II) New Assignment. A "new assignment," being merely a restatement, with greater particularity and exactness, of the same cause of action already set up in the complaint, is not objectionable as a departure.[43]

(III) Where Answer Sets Up Counter-Claim or Set-Off. The reply of a set-off to a set-off is bad as constituting a departure in pleading,[44] as is a plea of payment to a plea of set-off.[45] But there is ordinarily no departure in the reply when the allegations therein are pleaded in defense to a counter-claim[46] or set-off,[47] although there can be no counter-claim to a counter-claim.[48] Where a counter-claim is based on an alleged failure to perform the contract sued on by plaintiff, a reply alleging an excuse for non-performance is a departure.[49]

(iv) Particular Illustrations — (a) In General. Whether, in a particular case, a reply is bad as a departure, is to be determined by the rules already laid down, after consideration of all the allegations in both the complaint and the reply.[50] A reply pleading a waiver of conditions alleged in the plea to be

In trespass for removing goods from plaintiff's dwelling-house, where defendant justifies, under a writ of possession, a reply, seeking damages for wrongfully obtaining the issuance of the writ constitutes a departure (Steele v. Davis, 75 Ind. 191); and the same is true where a declaration alleges a trespass ten years before, and the replication sets up a continuing trespass for ten years (Shoults v. Kemp, 57 Miss. 218).

Bishop v. Travis, 51 Minn. 183, 53 N. W. 461.

A reply based upon the law of another jurisdiction is a departure from a complaint based on the law of the forum. Will v. Whitney, 15 Ind. 194; Wells v. Teall, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 306; Yeatman v. Cullen, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 240; Midland Steel Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 26 Ind. App. 71, 59 N. E. 211; Brown v. Canadian Pac. R. Co., 4 Manitoba 396.

Capacity in which plaintiff sues.— A reply showing that plaintiff is a trustee and has no right to maintain the action in the individual capacity in which he sues (Laws v. Carrier, 2 Cinc. Super. Ct. (Ohio) 80), or vice versa (Parkhill v. Union Bank, 1 Fla. 110), constitutes a departure. But, in conversion, where defendant alleges that plaintiff's only claim was as administrator and that he was without authority, and a reply alleges a title other than as administrator, there is no departure. McFadden v. Schroeder, 4 Ind. App. 305, 29 N. E. 491, 30 N. E. 711.

A reply setting up a ratification of acts alleged by defendant to have been unauthorized does not constitute a departure. German F. Ins. Co. v. Columbia Encaustic Tile Co., 15 Ind. App. 623, 43 N. E. 41; Cravens v. Gillilan, 73 Mo. 524; McLachin v. Barker, 64 Mo. App. 511.

Reply claiming different relief.— Where a complaint declares on a written contract, a reply asking for a reformation thereof constitutes a departure. Wood v. Deutchman, 75 Ind. 148. But see MacLaughlin v. Lake Erie, etc., R. Co., 2 Ont. L. Rep. 151. So, in ejectment, where plaintiff demands possession of the whole of the premises, and the replication alleges a claim to only a part in order to avoid a plea to the jurisdiction filed by defendant. Logiodice v. Gannon, 60 Conn. 81, 21 Atl. 100. And a replication in mandamus showing that a decree should have its date corrected is a departure from a petition filed for the purpose of compelling the judge to render and record it. State v. Williams, 69 Ala. 311. But it has been held that in an action for an accounting, where the answer set up an award, a reply admitting the award and asking judgment thereon is not a departure. Benson v. Stein, 34 Ohio St. 294.

Different grounds for relief.— There is a departure where the complaint alleges certain grounds for rescission or reformation and the reply alleges other grounds. Teal v. Langsdale, 78 Ind. 339; Boardman v. Handley, 4 Northwest. Terr. 266. And in a suit against an administrator for arrears in particular as to the sale of certain real estate, after an answer alleging an accounting had, a reply alleging arrears generally on a subsequent accounting constitutes a departure. Burtch v. State, 17 Ind. 506.

In an action by a receiver of an insolvent corporation on a note given for subscription to corporate stock, allegations in the reply counting on a right of action in the creditors only was not a departure from the complaint, which alleged that the note was due "for the benefit of creditors, and that said creditors have no other assets to rely upon for the payment of said claim." Marion Trust Co. v. Blish, (Ind. App. 1906) 79 N. E. 415.

Miscellaneous replies as departures.—Where plaintiff's petition alleged that he was a member of a beneficiary association at the time of unperformed does not constitute a departure,[51] but it is otherwise as to a replication setting up a new and different breach from that alleged in the declaration.[52]

(B) Change From Tort to Contract or Vice Versa. Where the complaint alleged fraudulent representations as to goods sold, a reply setting up a promise by defendant to pay the damages claimed is a departure.[53] Likewise a reply based on the theory that plaintiff's original cause of action is in tort when in fact he sues in contract is a departure;[54] as is, in an action on a contract, a reply setting up facts which show that the contract is void and that plaintiff's remedy is in tort.[55]

(C) Estoppel. A reply alleging as an estoppel facts not inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint, against the defense set up in the answer, does not constitute a departure from the complaint;[56] but it is otherwise if the facts constituting the estoppel are inconsistent with prior allegations of the party.[57]

(D) Fraud. In an action on account for goods sold and delivered, a reply of fraud in obtaining the goods constitutes a departure.[58] On the other hand, a reply alleging fraud in procuring a release, discharge, or settlement, pleaded in the answer, is not a departure.[59] So where a complaint is in assumpsit for goods sold and delivered on a quantum valebat, and the answer pleads a specific contract therefor, a reply showing that such contract was a nullity because induced by fraud is no departure.[60] And a reply alleging false representations substantially the same as in the complaint, but with more minuteness, is not bad.[61] But a replication, on equitable grounds, to a plea of infancy, that defendant fraudulently contracted the debt by means of a false and fraudulent representation that he was of age, is a departure.[62]

(E) Justification or Excuse. Where plaintiff alleges performance of a contract, and defendant denies it in certain particulars, a reply pleading an excuse for nonperformance is a departure.[63] So where plaintiff alleged delivery, and defendant his death, and the answer alleged that he had been suspended, a reply alleging facts showing that the suspension was no defense to the action is not a departure. Smith v. Sovereign Camp W. W., 179 Mo. 119, 77 S. W. 862. In a suit to foreclose a mortgage, where the answer alleges that plaintiff realized out of the sale of personal property mortgaged an amount greater than the mortgage debt, a reply alleging that the proceeds were applied at defendant's request, to the payment of other debts, does not constitute a departure. pleaded non-delivery, a replication alleging tender and refusal to receive was held to constitute a departure.[64] But there is no departure where plaintiff sues in trespass, and defendant justifies as an officer under an execution, and the reply alleges that the goods were exempt,[65] or shows that the officer abused the process so as to make him a trespasser ab initio;[66] or where defendant justifies as an act of public necessity a reply showing that diligence would have removed the necessity.[67]

If a carrier's contract limits the amount of the liability, that need not be stated in the declaration, but if it provides that in respect to certain matters he shall not be liable at all, this must be stated, and it cannot be left for the reply, since it would constitute a departure. But there is no departure where a reply avers an agreement in completion of an incomplete contract set up in the complaint (P. C. Hanford Oil Co. v. Findlay, 80 Wis. 91, 49 N. and an express contract is admitted or alleged in the reply,[70] where one consideration is alleged in the complaint and a different consideration in the reply,[71] or where a reply sets up an account stated, although the action is brought on an account.[72]

(G) Title. Plaintiff's title, as alleged in the complaint and reply, must correspond,[73] and the same rule applies to the allegations as to defendant's title.[74] But there is no departure where, in an action to quiet title, the answer alleges that defendants are tenants in common as to a third interest and the reply alleges a conveyance of that interest.[75] And a reply setting up plaintiff's title, when the complaint has omitted to state it, is not bad as a departure.[76]

(H) As to Parties. There is a departure where a replication relates to but one defendant, when the declaration and plea related to several jointly;[77] and also where a replication is in the name of one plaintiff, when the declaration was in the name of two.[78]

(V) Remedy For.[79] Generally the objection that a reply constitutes a departure may be urged by a demurrer, but in some jurisdictions a motion to strike is an alternative or exclusive remedy.[80] So it has been held that the objection may

It has been held, however, that, in an action on a contract, where defendant pleads a discharge in bankruptcy, a replication setting up a new promise to pay the debts contracted prior to the discharge does not constitute a departure (Shippey v. Henderson, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 178, 7 Am. Dec. 458; Farmers', etc., Bank v. Flint, 17 Vt. 508, 44 Am. Dec. 351. But see Walbridge v. Harroon, 18 Vt. 448); nor does a reply alleging a new and valid promise to pay notes alleged by defendant to have been obtained without consideration (Brown v. Indianapolis First Nat. Bank, 115 Ind. 572, 18 N. E. 56).

73. Bearss v. Montgomery, 46 Ind. 544. Compare Lamme v. Dodson, 4 Mont. 560, 2 Pac. 298.

For instance, there is a departure where a replication alleges a joint ownership of property which was alleged in the declaration to be held by plaintiffs as partners (Moore v. Stevens, 42 N. H. 404); and where a replication alleges title in certain federal officers, when the declaration alleged title in the United States (U. S. v. Morris, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,816, 1 Paine 209); and where a reply avers a different source of title from that alleged in the declaration (Bearss v. Montgomery, 46 Ind. 544; Brown v. Baker, 39 Oreg. 66, 65 Pac. 799, 66 Pac. 193. Contra, Berney v. Steiner, 108 Ala. 111, 19 So. 806, 54 Am. St. Rep. 144). So also a reply setting up facts in derogation of plaintiff's title for the purpose of destroying defendants' title constitutes a departure (Etter v. Anderson, 84 Ind. 333), and where a declaration counts on title to a note through one indorsement, a reply is bad alleging title through another (Bell v. Moffat, 19 N. Brunsw. 261); and so is a reply alleging a right to water in a stream by riparian proprietorship, when the complaint sets up the incompatible right to the water by appropriation (Brown v. Baker, 39 Oreg. 66, 65 Pac. 799, 66 Pac. 193).

But there is no departure where plaintiff alleges title in fee to land, and defendant pleads title to the surface, and a replication alleges title to the surface acquired prior to defendant's title (Turner Coal Co. v. Glover, 101 Ala. 289, 13 So. 478); nor, in an action to enjoin the cutting of timber on certain land, where the answer pleads title in defendants of timber on part of the land, is there a departure where the reply alleges that defendants had cut all the timber thereon (Davis v. Ford, 15 Wash. 107, 45 Pac. 739, 46 Pac. 393).

In an action on a fire insurance policy, where the answer alleges title in another person at the time the policy was issued, a reply averring that a deed purporting to convey such title was void as without consideration, is not a departure. Franklin Ins. Co. v. Feist, 31 Ind. App. 390, 68 N. E. 188.

A reply alleging a special ownership as pledgee or mortgagee while the petition alleges ownership generally does not constitue a departure. Merchant's Nat. Bank v. Richards, 74 Mo. 77. Contra, Johnson v. Seneca State Bank, 59 Kan. 250, 52 Pac. 860.

be raised by objecting to the introduction of evidence and moving for a nonsuit.[81]

f. Duplicity and Joinder — (I) At Common Law — (A) Duplicity. A replication should not be double,[82] that is, it should not contain as one ground of reply, two or more distinct allegations[83] or denials,[84] either one of which is a complete answer to the plea So a traverse together with a new assignment makes a replication bad for duplicity.[85] But if one of the two matters alleged in answer to the plea is a good answer and the other not, the replication will not be deemed double, but the latter ground will be treated as surplusage.[86] Several facts, which together constitute but a single point, may be alleged together, without rendering the replication bad for duplicity,[87] or several facts which together make up a single connected proposition may be traversed together.[88]

(B) Joinder. Except where allowed by statute,[89] it is equally inadmissible to Hill v. Russell, supra. Where the statute declares an affidavit necessary as a condition for obtaining leave, the court has no power to dispense with it. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Green, 52 Miss. 332. Statutes allowing several pleas to be pleaded are not to be taken to authorize the pleading of several replications (Stiles v. Lacy, 7 Ala. 17; Gray v. White, 5 Ala. 490), except in case of replications to pleas of set-off (Watts v. Greenlee, 13 N. C. 87; Worth v. Fentress, 12 N. C. 419; Williams v. Lenoir, 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 395; Ridley v. Buchanan, 2 Swan (Tenn.) 555).

In North Carolina, by statute, several matters could be replied to a plea of set-off. Watts v. Greenlee, 13 N. C. 87; Worth v. Fentress, 12 N. C. 419; Holdings v. Smith, 5 N. C. 154.

plead two distinct and separate defenses to the plea,[90] and matter of confession and avoidance cannot be joined with a traverse.[91] Where, however, the declaration consists of several counts, and a single plea is filed to all of them, as many replications may be filed as there are counts, each replication being an answer to the plea in so far as it applies to one particular count.[92]

(II) Under the Codes. Under the codes plaintiff may, in his reply, tender as many issues as he pleases, so long as they are not inconsistent with the complaint, or frivolous.[93] Plaintiff may both traverse the defense set up in the answer and confess and avoid it;[94] but if the facts set up in confession and avoidance are admissible in evidence under the traverse, the reply by confession and avoidance is bad.[95] Each defense in a reply should be separately stated and numbered.[96] If there are several replications to a plea and any one is good, a good issue is raised,[97] and it is not prejudicial error to sustain a demurrer to one replication when the issue raised thereby is equally well raised by another.[98] Whether or not the several replications should be mutually consistent is a question which seems to be identical with the question of inconsistent defenses in an answer.[99]

6. Admissions — a. In General.[1] Admissions in a reply may be express or implied and are governed by the same rules applicable to admissions in the answer.[2] Where a reply contains a general denial and also affirmative matter, it has been held that the implied admission of the latter does not operate as an admission of the allegations of the answer.[3] So it has been held that an implied admission resulting from a plea of confession and avoidance in a reply does not affect a general denial interposed by operation of law to the matters pleaded in the answer, the effect of which can only be overcome by an express admission in the reply.[4] An express admission in a reply controls a denial of the same fact.[5] To refer to an averment in an answer as "an alleged fact" is not an admission of it.[6] An express admission of a contract is an admission of the consideration on which it rests.[7] A complaint shall be deemed denied.[10] Unless within such a statutory exception, new matter pleaded as a set-off or counter-claim will be taken as admitted unless denied.[11] But failure to reply to a counter-claim does not admit the amount of damages claimed therein; that is still a matter to be determined by the jury.[12] But neither legal conclusions,[13] matters of inducement,[14] nor facts pleaded by way of recital,[15] are admitted by failure to deny. So if material matter be denied anywhere in the pleadings of plaintiff or defendant it will not be deemed admitted by a failure to reply.[16] A reply denying the allegations in but one of several defenses admits the facts alleged in the others,[17] but not where another defense is in fact made up merely of repetitions of matter appearing in defenses which have been put in issue.[18]

(II) EXCEPTIONS TO RULE. The filing of an agreed case is an abandonment of the pleadings, and therefore the want of a replication in such a case does not admit the facts pleaded.[19] Nor does a plea stand admitted because not answered pending the decision on an issue of law raised on another plea,[20] or pending a motion to reject it.[21] And failure to deny allegations in the separate answer of one defendant is not an admission of such facts as to defendants not setting it up.[22] Similarly, where an answer is double, and a reply is filed to one of the defenses pleaded, the other is not admitted by failure to deny.[23]

c. Construction. The scope of a denial will not be enlarged by construction,[24] and where plaintiff denies an allegation which consists of an averment coupled with a qualification, it has been held to put in issue only the qualification.[25] Nor on the other hand will an express admission be held to be any broader than its terms clearly indicate.[26] Where a reply consists of a general denial except as to matters thereafter in the reply admitted, stated, or qualified, if it is doubtful whether an allegation comes within the denial or the exception, it will be deemed to come within the exception and to stand admitted.[27]

7. Failure to Reply.[28] If a reply is necessary in order to produce an issue, it has been held improper to go to trial without it.[29] But a plaintiff who files no reply may nevertheless bring his case on for trial and take the consequences of such a step,[30] and if defendant makes no objection there may be a waiver and the defect is generally held to be cured by verdict.[31] Under the common-law system, where plaintiff fails to file a reply within the time fixed for a reply, defendant may move for a rule to compel plaintiff to reply or suffer a judgment of non pros.[32] Under the codes and practice acts, defendant may move for, and is entitled to, judgment on the pleadings.[33] So a motion to dismiss the action before the introduction of evidence but after a witness has been sworn is properly granted,[34] as is a directed verdict after plaintiff rests,[35] or a judgment of nonsuit.[36] However, failure to serve a reply is not ground for striking the cause from the calendar on defendant's motion.[37] So failure to reply to a counter-claim for unliquidated damages does not entitle defendant to a verdict without proof of damages.[38] And failure to reply does not waive the objection that the matter alleged in the answer does not give a right to a counter-claim, since that is matter of law.[39]

B. Rejoinder — 1. In General.[40] After the reply or replication, the next pleading tendering issues of fact is the rejoinder which is defendant's answer to the reply. The rules respecting rejoinders and subsequent pleadings are in general the same as those respecting the replication, where such pleadings are authorized by the system of pleading in use. Where the reply sets up new matter, an issue can be raised, under the common-law system of pleading, only by a rejoinder.[41] Under the codes of procedure no pleading subsequent to the reply is provided for.[42] There need be no rejoinder to an irrelevant reply.[43] Where the course of the pleadings is interrupted by interlocutory proceedings, a reasonable time must be allowed for the filing of subsequent pleadings.[44] Where a motion for leave to file rejoinders is not made until the case was called for trial the second time and no reason was given for delay in applying for leave, the granting or refusing leave is within the sound discretion of the court.[45]

2. Form and Requisites — a. In General. A rejoinder must answer the replication,[46] and must answer it fully.[47] If it evades the issues tendered by the replication, it will be stricken out on motion.[48] But if the replication in avoidance is bad for duplicity, it is not essential that defendant demur on that ground, but he may take issue on either of the matters set up.[49] A rejoinder is insufficient where it merely puts in issue immaterial facts,[50] or matters of law.[51] Where it denies a material fact it should conclude to the country,[52] and if it sets up facts in avoidance it should conclude with a verification.[53] A rejoinder containing only facts admissible under the plea is insufficient.[54] A rejoinder cannot be said to amount to a general denial because no confession is made in terms, but it is sufficient if the plea of avoidance contain either an express or implied admission that the allegations replied to are true.[55]

b. Duplicity. A rejoinder which alleges several distinct answers to a replication is bad for duplicity,[56] but it may include several facts if they constitute but a single point.[57] Surplusage will not render it double.[58]

rejoinder to a replication.[59] But in some states it may be done by leave of court.[60] If, under leave of court, several rejoinders may be pleaded, all but the first will be considered surplusage when leave has not been obtained;[61] but the want of leave may be waived by tendering issue on all of them.[62] A statute allowing the pleading of several pleas or replications does not authorize the pleading of several rejoinders.[63]

d. Departure.[64] The rejoinder may set up any defense to the replication not inconsistent with the plea, but there must be no departure.[65] In other words, defendant must conform his rejoinder to a maintenance of the defense made by his plea.[66] But there is no departure where the rejoinder consists merely of a more minute and circumstantial restatement of the ground of defense set up in the plea.[67] It is a departure, after a plea of performance, to allege an excuse for non-performance in the rejoinder.[68] But there is no departure, after a plea of plene administravit, where the rejoinder alleges that defendant had assets but not more than enough to pay a judgment against the estate;[69] nor, after a plea of liberum tenementum, when the rejoinder sets up a demise containing a reservation to do the acts complained of as trespasses;[70] nor does a rejoinder setting up the statute of limitations constitute a departure when the replication was the first pleading which disclosed the applicability of such defense.[71]

answer the whole of a new assignment, but in fact answering but part, is bad.[73]

3. Admissions by Failure to Deny. Matters alleged in the replication which require a rejoinder must be deemed admitted if not denied.[74] But matters of inducement are not admitted by failure to deny.[75] And the denial constructively made, by virtue of the statute, is as effective as an actual denial.[76]

C. Surrejoinder and Subsequent Pleadings.[77] The surrejoinder is the reply, under the common-law system, to the rejoinder, but is not recognized under the codes. The reply to the surrejoinder is a rebutter, and to the rebutter a surrebutter. An argumentative denial in a rejoinder does not call for a surrejoinder,[78] nor does an irrelevant rejoinder.[79] It amounts to a simple traverse only and should conclude as such.[80] A direct denial of a material averment of the rejoinder should conclude to the country.[81] Double surrejoinders are not allowable,[82] nor is a departure.[83] Where there is no demurrer, a surrejoinder is bad where it does not answer both parts of a double rejoinder.[84] A surrejoinder is insufficient where all that is attempted to be set up thereby can be shown under a traverse.[85] The filing of a surrejoinder may be allowed after the trial has commenced.[86] If it constitutes but a repetition of the replication, the surrejoinder should be stricken,[87] and so with subsequent pleadings.[88]

as stated by the party making it, it has yet shown no cause why the party demurring should be compelled by the court to proceed further;[92] and the import of the demurrer is that the objecting party will not proceed but will await the judgment of the court whether he is bound so to do.[93] Its office is to sweep away a defective pleading,[94] by raising issues of law upon the facts stated in the pleading demurred to.[95] It is not the office of a demurrer to allege facts,[96] and it does not necessarily test the rights of the parties in the suit, but merely the mode of statement in the pleadings demurred to; and the rights of the parties are thus brought in question only in so far as they are correctly stated in the pleadings.[97] It should be used to test the legal sufficiency of a pleading;[98] but when the objection is not to the pleading itself, but to the right to file it, a motion to strike and not a demurrer is the proper remedy.[99] So questions of practice, as distinguished from questions of pleading, cannot be raised by demurrer.[1] There is a difference in the functions performed by a motion to strike out and a demurrer, and one cannot be used interchangeably for the other.[2] But if a demurrer is sustained to a pleading which might have been stricken on motion, such ruling is not prejudicial error.[3] It is generally considered as a pleading,[4] and a compliance with a rule to plead.[5] So a demurrer to the complaint is usually considered as embraced within the term "answer,"[6] and this is so where the word "answer" is used in a statute.[7] A demurrer to a declaration cannot properly be said to be a plea to the merits, except in cases where a judgment on the demurrer in favor of defendant would be a bar to a subsequent suit on the same cause of action;[8] and a special demurrer cannot be deemed an issuable plea.[9] A demurrer is, however, always deemed in the nature of a plea in bar, and cannot partake of the nature of a plea in abatement, even though it assign matter in abatement as a special cause of demurrer.[10] In some states a demurrer is usually called an exception.[11]

B. Kinds of Demurrers[12]— 1. General and Special. Under the common-law system of pleading, demurrers are either general or special: General, when no particular cause is alleged; special, when the particular imperfection is pointed out and insisted upon as a ground of demurrer. The former is sufficient when the pleading is defective in substance and the latter is requisite where the objection is only to the form of the pleading.[13] An exception to this rule is that a general

In Texas the office of a general demurrer is similar to that assigned to it in the common-law system of pleading, and the only question which will be entertained under it is whether the pleading demurred to discloses the existence of any cause of action or ground of defense; but the office of exceptions is similar to that of a special demurrer in the English pleadings, namely: not only to question the existence of any cause of action or ground of defense, but to point out particularly wherein the pleading is defective. In Illinois a special demurrer lies to a fatal defect in the plea which, if called to the attention of the court, can be cured, but if not pointed out, is not fatal to the plea. Leathe v. Thomas, 109 Ill. App. 434 [affirmed in 218 Ill. 246, 75 N. E. 810].

A demurrer to an entire pleading is sometimes called a general demurrer, in reference to its scope rather than its character, but this is a loose use of the term. See Churchdemurrer to a plea in abatement raises questions of form as well as substance.[14] As to what is form, and what is substance, that without which the right doth sufficiently appear to the court is form, while a defect by reason whereof the right appears not is a defect of substance;[15] or, in other words, if the fault lies in the matter pleaded, it is substantial, but if in the manner of pleading it, it is formal.[16] However, defects of substance which might be availed of under a general demurrer can be taken advantage of on special demurrer, although not specified;[17] and if the pleader attempts to draw a special demurrer, but fails to adequately specify the grounds, it will be deemed a general demurrer.[18] But a demurrer which adds to its special grounds a general one is nevertheless to be regarded as a special demurrer.[19] In some jurisdictions special demurrers have been abolished by statutes which have the effect of making a pleading subject to demurrer only in case of substantial defects,[20] except pleas in abatement which are subject to Historical.—At the early common law all faults, whether of substance or form, were reached by general demurrer, with the single exception of duplicity. Anonymous, 3 Salk. 122; 1 Chitty Pl. (16th Am. ed.) 694; Gould Pl. (Hamilton ed.) 443. But the abuses to which this practice naturally led caused the enactment of the statute of 27 Eliz. c. 5, which required the judges to render judgment according to the very right of the cause, without regarding any imperfection, defect, or want of form in any pleading, except those only which the party demurring should specifically and particularly set down and express in his demurrer. Doubts having arisen as to what defects were aided by this statute, the statute of 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, was passed enumerating special defects which were to be deemed within the former statute. Since the passage of these statutes, matters of form can be reached only by special demurrer, while matters of substance may be attacked by general demurrer.

general demurrer for formal defects.[21] Under the codes and practice acts fixing the grounds of demurrer, demurrers are neither general nor special,[22] and a great number of the objections formerly reachable only by special demurrer can now be urged only by motion.[23] The code ground that the facts stated are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action or defense is substantially the same as the general demurrer at common law,[24] and is commonly designated a general demurrer, and demurrers on other statutory grounds are frequently called special demurrers.[25]

2. Frivolous. A demurrer is frivolous only when it is apparent without argument, from a mere inspection of the pleading, that there was no reasonable ground for interposing it.[26]

C. Right to Demur — 1. In General. A party has a right to demur in a proper case,[27] except where demurrers have been abolished,[28] or in particular courts where demurrers are not recognized.[29]

2. Pleadings to Which Demurrer Lies. A demurrer addresses itself to a pleading which, however defective, or insufficient it may be, is properly in court.[30] Either the complaint,[31] answer,[32] reply,[33] or subsequent pleadings,[34] may be demurred to. So an amended pleading may be demurred to.[35] But there can be no demurrer to a demurrer.[36] A demurrer lies to a supplemental pleading but only to a limited extent.[37]

3. Demurrer as Cumulative Remedy. It is no objection to a demurrer that Demurrers are in form abolished, but Ord. XXV takes notice of three forms, in which the object of demurrers may be obtained: (1) By raising on the pleadings a question of law, so that the parties may have it decided quickly: (2) by raising the question on a pleading whether it discloses any reasonable cause of action or answer, in which case the court may order the pleading to be struck out, not necessarily disposing of the whole action; and (3) in case an action or defense is shown by the pleadings to be frivolous or vexatious, then the court or a judge can dismiss the whole action, or order it to be stayed, or judgment to be entered accordingly as may be just. the defect might have been urged in another way.[38] For instance, the fact that a complaint may be attacked by a motion for a bill of particulars does not impair the right to demur.[39]

D. Who May Demur. Where several defendants are joined and no cause of action is alleged against one of them, he may demur separately;[40] but a joint demurrer cannot be sustained.[41] But one defendant cannot demur on the ground that the complaint shows no jurisdiction over, or cause of action against, another defendant;[42] although he may demur for misjoinder of causes of action if any of the defendants are not affected by all the causes set up.[43] Where misjoinder of parties plaintiff is expressly made ground of demurrer all of the defendants may demur therefor.[44] On the other hand, only the party alleged to have been improperly joined may demur for misjoinder of parties defendant, and this is so without regard to whether the ground of demurrer is misjoinder or failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.[45] Whether or not one of the defendants has answered has no effect upon the right of another defendant to demur;[46] and failure to serve one defendant with a summons is not ground for a demurrer by another defendant.[47] Under the code practice, one defendant cannot demur to the answer of a co-defendant unless there is a special statute permitting it.[48] So one made a party at his own request is not entitled to demur.[49]

E. Time For Demurring — 1. In General. Statutes or rules of court usually provide when demurrers must be filed, and they come too late after the time so fixed has expired.[50] A demurrer is usually in time if filed before the expiration of the time for pleading, in the absence of any special limitation, and an extension of time to plead is equally an extension of time to demur.[51] Where a judgment is opened at the instance of a party who had no opportunity to demur before it was rendered, he has the same liberty to demur that he should have had in the first instance.[52]

2. After Taking Other Steps — a. In General. The general rule is that a party will not be permitted to demur after he has pleaded to the merits, unless the pleading is first withdrawn.[53] So a party cannot demur of right after he has filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings,[54] after a judgment by default,[55] after the day the cause is set for trial,[56] after issue of fact joined,[57] after the jury is sworn,[58] after the evidence is in,[59] at the trial,[60] or after trial had on an issue of fact.[61] But other cases hold that if the time for demurring has not expired, a party may demur

Notice of intention to suffer default.— The service of a notice of intention to suffer default is not a bar to a subsequent demurrer. Pitkin v. New York, etc., R. Co., 64 Conn. 482, 30 Atl. 772.

even though both parties have noticed the case for trial;[62] and after a rule of reference is entered, it has been held that a demurrer may still be filed, provided the arbitrators are not yet chosen.[63] These rules, however, do not apply to a demurrer for failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, as such a demurrer may usually be filed at any time,[64] even after an issue framed and submitted to a master or jury,[65] or after judgment.[66]

b. After Motion. A demurrable objection may still be raised by demurrer notwithstanding it has previously been raised by motion and disallowed.[67] Even where certain allegations are stricken out on motion, it has been held that the party may subsequently demur on the ground that the pleading is defective for want of such allegations.[68]

3. Extension of Time. The time may be extended, or leave granted for filing, on proper terms, for cause shown,[69] the matter being largely within the discretion of the court.[70] But it must appear that the pleading is apparently subject to demurrer on the ground stated, and that some advantage will result from permission to demur.[71] Demurrers going to defects of form are accorded less consideration when not filed seasonably, than those going to defects of substance.[72] The allowance of an amendment will usually operate to extend the time allowed for demurrer to the original pleading,[73] unless the amendment is merely a fuller statement of the same cause of action or defense set up in the original pleading.[74]

F. Grounds — 1. In General — a. Common Law as Distinguished From Statutory Grounds. The grounds of demurrer at common law are much more extensive than under the codes and practice acts, many of the grounds under the common-law system of pleading now being reachable only by motion instead of demurrer.[75] No pleading is demurrable under the codes unless it is subject to one or more of the objections specified in the provisions of the code defining the grounds of demurrer.[76]

a ground for demurrer under the codes,[81] nor indeed does it seem a ground for objection of any kind.[82]

(II) Commingling of Counts or Defenses. A demurrer seems the proper common-law remedy for intermingling in one count two or more causes of action.[83] But mere commingling in one count or paragraph of several causes of action or defenses which may be joined does not render the pleading bad on demurrer, under the codes,[84] the proper remedy being by motion.[85] If the commingled counts are not such as may be joined, a demurrer for misjoinder will lie.[86] But where two causes of action, which cannot be joined in one complaint, are united in one count, the better remedy, under the code, is, in the first instance,

The presence of unexplained interlineations in a pleading is ground for special demurrer. Stillwell v. Smith, 18 York Leg. Rec. (Pa.) 99.

Exceptions to rule.— A failure to properly entitle a petition or declaration has been held ground for a motion to dismiss it (Blackwell v. Montgomery, 1 Handy (Ohio) 40, 12 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 16), or to set it aside for irregularity (Parker v. Burgess, 64 Vt. 442, 24 Atl. 743), but not ground for demurrer (Cunningham v. Phillips, Tapp. (Ohio) 184). So it is no ground for special formal defects in a plea in abatement make the plea bad on general demurrer.[92] Mere clerical errors will not, however, render a pleading bad even on special demurrer.[94] So where a matter is so purely formal that it may be inserted at any time before judgment, even a special demurrer will not lie by reason of its omission.[95] In some jurisdictions, where the common-law system of pleading prevails, special demurrers have nevertheless been abolished and there formal defects do not render a pleading subject to demurrer except pleas in abatement.[96]

(11) Under the Codes. Under the codes, formal defects cannot be taken advantage of on demurrer, but only on motion to make more definite and certain, or other appropriate motion.[97] But in a few western code states demurrers are expressly authorized for ambiguity and uncertainty.[98]

e. Frivolousness. At common law a pleading frivolous on its face is bad on demurrer,[99] but under the codes the proper remedy is a motion to strike or for judgment on the pleadings.[1] If, however, the pleading is also bad in substance, a demurrer will reach it.[2]

f. Hypothetical Pleading. At common law the remedy for hypothetical pleading was a demurrer,[3] but under the codes the remedy is by motion and not by demurrer.[4]

g. Legal Conclusions. Under the codes, the allegation of a legal conclusion instead of the facts upon which it is based, does not usually make a pleading bad on general demurrer; but other cases hold that a demurrer on the ground of demurrer that the pleading is not dated as required by rule, nor that in the commencement plaintiff appears in person and the signature is by his attorney. Murphy v. Burnham, 2 U. C. Q. B. 261.

h. Names.[7] A mistake in a pleading as to the name of a party is not a ground of demurrer,[8] without regard to whether the mistake is as to defendant's or plaintiff's name;[9] the remedy being by plea in abatement,[10] or by motion.[11] So if the identity of persons bearing the same name is to be questioned, it should be by pleading and not by demurrer.[12] That a pleading describes parties by the initials only of their christian name is not a ground of demurrer,[13] nor is the omission of a party's christian name.[14]

i. Pleading by Way of Recital. The averment of facts by way of recital instead of positively may, in some jurisdictions, be reached by demurrer, some cases holding, however, that the demurrer must be a special one,[15] while others hold that the objection may be urged under a general demurrer.[16]

k. Want of Profert.[22] Where profert should be made, want of it is ground for demurrer under the common-law procedure.[23] Before the statute of Anne,[24] want of profert was a substantial defect of which advantage might have been taken on general demurrer;[25] but that statute required the objection to be taken by special demurrer,[26] and in this country, while there has been some conflict in the authorities as to the nature of the defect as formal or substantial, and as to the propriety of the remedy by general or special demurrer, it is generally held

Where special demurrers are abolished and the omission of profert is considered of such formal nature as before could have been raised only by special demurrer, the objection is held to be one which cannot be noticed on demurrer at all. Strange v. Powell, 15 Ala. 452; U. S. v. Ritchie, 3 Mackey (D. C.) 162. So in Anderson v. Barry, 2 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 265, it was held that under the statute of jeofails in Kentucky, an omission to make profert was no cause for general demurrer and that as by statute all defects in form were cured and special demurrers were abolished, want of profert could not thereafter be fatal at any stage; that under the statute of Anne the defect was a formal one in Kentucky; that the discrepancy between Chitty (1 Chitty Pl. 350), in stating that the omission could only be taken advantage of by special demurrer, and the contrary view as expounded in Leyfield's Case, 10 Coke 88, 77 Eng. Reprint 1057, may be reconciled on the statute of Anne, the one stating the law before and the other stating it after the statute; and that Metcalf v. Standeford, 1 Bibb (Ky.) 618, is based upon the authority of Leyfield's Case, 10 Coke 94.

that the demurrer must be a special one.[27] The code practice does not require profert to be made;[28] but the failure to file or attach a copy of a written instrument sued on, where such filing or attaching is required by statute, is ground for demurrer in some states,[29] although in most of the code states a demurrer does not lie.[30]

l. Want or Insufficiency of Signature or Affidavit. Neither the want of a signature,[31] or of an affidavit or verification,[32] to a pleading, nor its insufficiency,[33] is ground for demurrer, but a motion to strike from the files should be employed.[34] But the sustaining of a demurrer to a pleading which required an affidavit in order to authorize the introduction of evidence is not prejudicial error.[35] versed for default, of alleging the bringing into court any bond, bill, or other deed mentioned in the pleadings, or of any letters testamentary or of administration"; that this statute did not, in terms, declare that such omission was only a matter of form, although that it was so was the interpretation of the spirit of the statute by the courts, and that this construction, was no doubt questioned, and for good reason; and therefore the statute of Anne, recapitulating the substance of that of Charles, expressly legalized the judicial construction, by declaring that advantage shall not be taken of a lack of profert, except by special demurrer).

In some cases, however, it has been held that where the ultimate facts constituting the cause of action or defense are not alleged, but only the evidentiary facts which go to prove them, the pleading is bad on demurrer, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action or defense. Simons v. Bedell, 122 Cal. 341, 55 Pac. 3, 68 Am. St. Rep. 35; McCaughey v. Schutte, 117 Cal. 223, 46 Pac. 666, 48 Pac. 1088, 59 Am. St. Rep. 176; Corwin v. Corwin, 9 Barb. (N. But in other cases it has been held that a motion, and not a demurrer, is the proper remedy. Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Hemingway, 63 Nebr. 610, 88 N. W. 673; Jaques v. Dawes, 3 Nebr. (Unoff.) 752, 92 N. W. 570; Childers v. Verner, 12 S. C. 1. However, if the pleading contains evidence which is merely in addition to, but not in place of, ultimate facts, and sufficient ultimate facts appear to constitute a cause of action or defense, the evidence will be deemed surplusage and will not render the pleading bad on general demurrer (Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Pool, 70 Tex. 713, 8 S. W. 535; Croft v. Rains, 10 Tex. 520; Nipp v. Parrish, 63 Fed. 677, 11 C. C. A. 398), but the pleading will be held good for only what the evidence proves (Ohm v. San Francisco, (Cal. 1890) 25 Pac. 155).

At common law, if a pleading states evidentiary instead of ultimate facts, and the evidentiary matters alleged are sufficient to establish the ultimate facts, the pleading is bad on special but not on general demurrer, but if the evidentiary matters alleged are not sufficient to establish the ultimate facts, the defect is substantial and may be reached by general demurrer. rendered incomprehensible;[50] and verboseness.[51] So the propriety of permitting an amendment to a pleading should be raised by objection to the allowance of the amendment or by motion to strike, and not by demurrer to the pleading as amended.[52] The remedy at common law for an insufficient venue was a demurrer,[53] and an informal commencement or conclusion of a pleading was a ground for special but not general demurrer.[54] An innuendo is not issuable, and furnishes no warrant for sustaining a demurrer.[55] discloses any cause of action,[62] in favor of the party pleading it.[63] That a defect might be cured by amendment has been held in some cases a test to determine whether a general demurrer will lie.[64] It has been held that the complaint will be sustained if it is good on any theory,[65] even if the action is brought on the wrong theory,[66] especially where there is a general prayer for relief.[67] Other cases hold that the court must determine the theory upon which a pleading rests, and unless a good cause of action is stated on that theory a demurrer should be sustained even though facts are stated sufficient to show that plaintiff has a cause of action of a different character.[68] A pleading which defectively states a good cause of action or defense as distinguished from a good statement of a defective cause of action or defense is good as against a general demurrer.[69] If a pleading states a good cause of action or defense, the presence of additional matters which are open to special demurrer will not make the pleading obnoxious to a general demur-

In other words a demurrer to a complaint for insufficiency can only be sustained where it appears that, admitting all the facts alleged, it presents no cause of action whatever; it not being sufficient that the facts are imperfectly or improperly averred or that the pleading lacks definiteness and precision or that the material facts are only

rer;[70] and conversely, if a general demurrer is well founded, it should be sustained even though special exceptions assigned in connection therewith are not well taken.[71] So surplusage does not make a pleading subject to demurrer on this ground,[72] nor does any mere defect of form.[73] So where the impossibility of the production of proof to sustain allegations legally sufficient does not appear with certainty, the cause should be sent to trial on its merits, and not dismissed on exception of no cause of action.[74] The complaint is demurrable on this ground where it states facts constituting a defense to the cause of action.[75]

(II) PREMATURE ACTION. The objection that an action is prematurely brought may be urged by demurrer if the facts appear on the face of the pleading.[76] If, however, the fault appears to be a mere clerical error, the demurrer under the common-law practice must be a special one.[77]

c. Form of Action. Where the action is brought in assumpsit and the declaration sets out a cause of action in tort, a demurrer will lie at common law.[78] And, in general, objections to the form of the action are deemed substantial and may be taken on general demurrer.[79] In those code states where different dockets are maintained for legal and equitable proceedings, if the wrong kind of proceeding be adopted, the proper remedy is a motion to transfer to the other docket and not a demurrer.[80] And it is no ground for demurrer in code states that equitable relief is sought in a legal action or legal relief in an equitable action.[81]

d. Misjoinder of Causes of Action.[82] The joinder, in the same declaration or complaint, of two causes of action which cannot be joined, is ground for demurrer, both at common law,[83] and under the codes.[84] In a few states, however, by statute, this is not a ground for demurrer, but only for a motion to strike out.[85] If a complaint contains several causes of action which are improperly united, the omission to state the causes in separate counts properly numbered will not deprive defendant of the right to demur.[86] But where one of the claims is not well pleaded and does not constitute a cause of action, a demurrer for misjoinder should be overruled.[87] If one cause of action is sustainable and the other not, the facts constituting the latter will be deemed immaterial and irrelevant on demurrer to the whole complaint.[88] Mere surplusage cannot make a pleading bad for misjoinder.[89] So also, if by rejecting a portion of one count as surplusage it may be so altered as to make the pleading good as against a demurrer for misjoinder, it should be done.[90] And a prayer for inconsistent forms of relief will not make a pleading bad for misjoinder of causes.[91] If it is doubtful whether or not the allegations are such as to make the pleading demurrable for misjoinder, that construction should be adopted which will sustain the pleading.[92]

An objection that certain interveners were not entitled to file intervening petitions may be raised by demurrer because of an alleged defect of parties; that several causes of action were improperly united; or that such interveners are not necessary parties to a complete determination of the action, as provided by Rev. from a necessary, party is not ground for demurrer.[1] A "defect of parties" means too few and not too many parties,[2] and hence is not synonymous with misjoinder of parties which means an excess of parties.[3]

(II) Misjoinder of Parties.[4] Under the common-law system of pleading, misjoinder of parties is ground for demurrer.[5] Under the codes and practice acts, the misjoinder of parties is generally not enumerated as a ground of demurrer,[6] although in some jurisdictions misjoinder of parties plaintiff is made a ground of demurrer,[7] while in other jurisdictions the statutes expressly authorize a demurrer for misjoinder of either parties plaintiff or defendant.[8] Under the statutes, a misjoinder of parties plaintiff is ground for demurrer in some states,[9] but not in

In Virginia, where a statute provides that in case of misjoinder of parties, the court may order the action to abate as to the party improperly joined and proceed against the others, misjoinder of parties is not a ground of demurrer, but the remedy is to move for the abatement of the suit as to the parties improperly joined. Riverside Cotton Mills v. Lanier, 102 Va. 148, 45 S. E. 875; Lee v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assoc., 97 Va. 160, 33 S. E. 556.

acts, it is a statutory ground for demurrer that plaintiff has no "legal capacity to sue."[13] There is a difference between capacity to sue, which is the right to come into court, and a cause of action, which is the right to relief in court.[14] Incapacity to sue exists when there is some legal disability, such as infancy, lunacy, coverture, or a want of title in plaintiff to the character in which he sues.[15] It means a want of capacity to appear in court and maintain an action regardless of in whom is vested the right of action,[16] and hence does not include the objection that the action is not prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest.[17] The want

A defect going to the cause of action itself as regards plaintiff, such as one showing that in no event or under no circumstances, and in no capacity, does plaintiff own or represent the cause of action sought to be enforced, is not a want of legal capacity to sue. McKenney v. Minahan, 119 Wis. 651, 97 N. W. 489. It is in case the complaint on its face discloses an interest in the subject-matter of the action and also want of capacity to sue that the question of a want of legal capacity arises; but where the complaint shows that the party plaintiff is not interested in any way in the litigation, or in other words can maintain no such action, the objection can be reached by a general demurrer. For instance, a general demurrer lies where an action is brought by a foreign administrator not authorized by statute to sue outside of the state of his appointment, the rule being that no administrator appointed in a foreign state can maintain an action in another state unless authorized by statute. Where one has neither a legal nor beneficial interest in the controversy either in his own right or as the representative of another, and this appears on the face of the complaint, the objection is properly raised by a general demurrer as the legal capacity to sue is not involved. Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Brantley, 96 Ky. 297, 28 S. W. 477, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 691, 49 Am. St. Rep. 291. f. Objections Relating to Prayer For Relief — (i) Absence of Prayer. The omission to claim damages in some amount is, at common law, in an action sounding in damages, fatal on demurrer.[19] Under the reformed procedure, however, the absence of a prayer for relief does not make the complaint bad on demurrer.[20]

(ii) Defects in Prayer. A defect in the prayer for relief is not a ground for demurrer under the codes, but for a motion to make more specific.[21] So the fact that a prayer for relief is objectionable in form does not constitute a ground for demurrer.[22]

(iii) Demand For Insufficient, Excessive, or Wrong Relief. Except where otherwise provided by statute,[23] the demand for judgment or prayer for relief is generally not itself subject to demurrer.[24] While in some of the states where the common-law rules have not been abolished a demurrer lies where the claim is in excess of the right disclosed by the declaration,[25] the general rule, even in the common-law states, is to the contrary.[26] Nor is it a ground for demurrer at common party shows himself entitled is equitable relief, no demurrer will lie,[29] and conversely.[30] In at least one jurisdiction, however, the rule is that where plaintiff is entitled to no part of the relief prayed for, although he is entitled to some relief under the facts stated, a demurrer will lie for failure to state a cause of action.[31] Where a part of the damages alleged are such as cannot form the basis of a recovery, the remedy is a motion to strike out and not a demurrer.[32]

In Iowa, however, it is expressly made a ground of demurrer that the facts stated in the complaint "do not entitle plaintiff to the relief demanded." The statutory ground of demurrer formerly was the failure to state "facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action," but under Code, § 2648, the ground of demurrer is changed so that a demurrer lies where the facts stated in the petition do not entitle the plaintiff to the relief demanded, which makes the ground of demurrer broader. For instance, in an action upon a judgment, where the relief demanded in the petition was a judgment upon the record set out by plaintiff, but it is not averred in the petition that plaintiff has obtained leave to prosecute the action as required by statute, a demurrer lies under such code provision, although it would seem that in those states where the code ground is failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action the petition could not be successfully demurred to. Watts v. Everett, 47 Iowa 269. However, it has been held in a later case that a petition is not vulnerable to a demurrer because it claims more than plaintiff is entitled to. part between the instrument as set out on oyer and the declaration.[35] If the declaration allege the date of the instrument, and the copy thereof put on record by oyer bears no date, this is proper matter for plea and not for demurrer.[36] Setting out the instrument in the declaration will not constitute oyer so as to enable defendant to demur for variance.[37]

(II) Between Declaration and Record. A variance between a record and the recital thereof in a pleading is not ground of demurrer, but should be urged by a plea of nul tiel record.[38] However, a variance between the docket entry of the action and the declaration may be taken advantage of by demurrer.[39]

(III) Between Allegations in the Declaration. It is not a ground of demurrer that there is a variance between the demand made in an action of debt and the amount shown to be due by the note described in the declaration;[40] nor that there is a variance between the debt demanded and the several sums alleged in the different counts to be due;[41] nor that one amount is stated in the caption and another in the body of the declaration;[42] nor in any case where the variance is purely a question of evidence.[43] So an omission, in a complaint whose title describes the plaintiffs as partners, to allege a partnership, is a defect which cannot be reached by demurrer.[44]

(IV) Between Declaration and Writ. A variance between the writ and the declaration cannot be taken advantage of by demurrer,[45] although a few cases hold the contrary view.[46] But if oyer is obtained of the writ it is held that a special demurrer will lie.[47]

(V) Special Demurrer Necessary. A demurrer for variance, under the common-law practice, must always be special.[48]

Dwyer v. Bassett, 63 Tex. 274.

When jurisdiction matter of discretion.— But when a court may or may not take jurisdiction of an action, according as it is satisfied or not respecting the reasons therefor, the question whether the court should entertain the action should be taken by motion to dismiss rather than by demurrer, so that affidavits may be filed showing the special facts. jurisdiction, a demurrer for want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter will not lie unless the complaint shows affirmatively that there is no jurisdiction;[54] but in courts of inferior jurisdiction, a complaint is demurrable which does not affirmatively show that the court has jurisdiction.[55] An informal allegation of jurisdictional facts will be sufficient to sustain a pleading as against a general demurrer.[56] A demurrer for want of jurisdiction over the person of defendant will not lie merely for want of a proper service of summons,[57] such defect not being apparent on the face of the pleadings and hence available only on motion or plea in abatement; nor on the ground that, for any other reason, defendant has not been properly brought before the court.[58]

of only by objection to the introduction of evidence thereunder.[66] Under the codes in some of the states the only ground for a demurrer to a defense consisting of new matter is that it is "insufficient in law, on the face thereof," [67] as where a defense pleaded as a complete defense only amounts to a partial one.[68] So where a demurrer lies only to a defense or counter-claim, matter pleaded in mitigation of damages is not demurrable.[69] An answer is subject to demurrer where the defense set up is insufficient in matter of substance.[70] But a general demurrer to the answer will not reach defects of form.[71] At common law omission to crave oyer when oyer should be craved has been held ground for demurrer,[72] as has merely giving notice of special matter when it should be pleaded; [73] and where a short form of plea is allowable only by consent, such a plea is open to special demurrer where the record shows no consent.[74] But if a plea in abatement is joined with a plea in bar, it may, at common law, be stricken out, but it is not subject to demurrer; [75] and where two pleas set up substantially the same defense defendant may be compelled to elect, but the defect cannot be reached by demurrer.[76]

rule is generally that a demurrer does not lie.[78] But conceding that no demurrer lies yet the sustaining of a demurrer to such a special defense is harmless error.[79] On the other hand, the refusal of the court to sustain a demurrer on this ground is not available error, as such a plea merely serves to give notice of a defense which might be made under the general issue.[80] In any event, a general demurrer will not lie,[81] although the sustaining of such a demurrer is not reversible error when the general denial is also pleaded in the answer.[82] If a special defense is legally insufficient, it is error to overrule a demurrer thereto, even though such defense is admissible under a general denial also pleaded;[83] but it is not prejudicial error to improperly sustain a demurrer to such a special defense.[84] A defense of new matter may be tested by demurrer, whether or not the facts alleged are admissible under the general denial.[85]

c. Inconsistent Defenses. The common-law remedy for inconsistent defenses is a demurrer.[86] But, under the codes, where inconsistent defenses are not allowed, the objection must be taken by motion to strike out, and not by demurrer.[87]

d. Partial Defense Pleaded as Complete Defense. A plea or answer that purports to be a defense to the entire complaint or declaration, but which in fact answers only a part thereof, is demurrable.[88] But if it purports to answer but a part and is good to that extent, it is sufficient against a demurrer.[89]

e. Unresponsive Plea. An unresponsive plea is demurrable,[90] especially where it is entirely insufficient as a defense.[91] So if the answer avowedly answers the bill of particulars, and not the complaint, it is held that the remedy is by demurrer and not by motion.[92]

f. Demurrer to Counter-Claim or Set-Off. The sufficiency of a counter-claim, set-off, or other cross demand may be tested by demurrer.[93] A counter-claim may generally be demurred to because it fails to state a cause of action,[94] or because another action is pending for the same cause,[95] or for want of legal capacity to recover on the counter-claim,[96] or on the ground that the counter-claim is not of the character specified in the statute,[97] or on other statutory grounds.[98] It has been held no ground for demurrer that the prayer for relief is omitted,[99] or is insufficient,[1] or that the counter-claim is insufficient to constitute a "defense."[2] Under some statutes the grounds of a demurrer to a counter-claim where defendant does not demand an affirmative judgment are different from when the counter-claim demands an affirmative judgment.[3] Where a counter-claim or set-off is filed in a case where it is not permissible, it has been held not subject to demurrer if it states a cause of action, the remedy being by a motion to strike or an objection to evidence;[4] but under the common-law system such a plea has been held bad on demurrer.[5] And similarly, if a mere defense is set up as a set-off or counter-claim, or a set-off is pleaded as a counter-claim, a demurrer will not lie because thereof.[6] The intermingling of a defense and a counter-claim or set-off is ground for a motion, and not for a demurrer, under the code practice.[7]

Mistake as to damages.— The fact that a defendant who sets up a counter-claim cannot, on the facts pleaded, recover the damages which he demands, or that the rule of damages is not as he asserts it to be, is not ground for demurrer to the counter-claim if the facts stated show a good cause of action. Isbell-Porter Co. v. Heineman, 113 N. Y. App. Div. 79, 98 N. Y. Suppl. 1018.

Defendant as plaintiff.— When an answer sets up a counter-claim, defendant makes himself in respect to such demand a plaintiff in fact, although not in name, and the sufficiency of the facts to constitute a counter-claim is to be determined in the same manner as when a demurrer is interposed to a complaint, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. rejoinder,[9] by a demurrer. Under the code practice in some states, however, the only ground for demurrer to a reply is that it is insufficient in law upon the face thereof.[10] In cases where the answer is such as to call for no reply, a reply filed should be met by motion to strike, and not by demurrer.[11] So a replication filed to a plea not in the record is not subject to demurrer, but may be stricken from the files.[12] And the erroneous use of the general replication de injuria cannot be reached by general demurrer.[13] Repugnancy between a protestation and an averment in a replication is not ground for demurrer.[14]

The ground of demurrer need not be stated in the precise language used in the code.— Hanna v. Hawes, 45 Iowa 437. It is only necessary that the ground of demurrer should be so plainly stated that it may be clearly understood. If the answer alleges new matter arising subsequent to the action as a defense, and also denies material allegations of the complaint, the demurrer must not be general but must specifically attack the allegations of new matter. McBride v. American Surety Co., 70 Hun (N. Y.) 369, 24 N. Y. Suppl. 371. A demurrer to "each and every defense contained in the answer" has the same effect as if plaintiff had demurred separately to each defense (Kennagh v. McGolgan, 4 N. Y. Suppl. 230), but such a demurrer is too indefinite where the answer does not set up the facts as separate defenses but denies plaintiff's right to the money in question and practice to file successive demurrers to separate parts of a pleading.[26] So where a party wishes to demur on different grounds to the same pleading, all the grounds should be specified in one demurrer, instead of filing different demurrers,[27] it not being necessary that the grounds of demurrer be consistent with each other.[28] In some jurisdictions a demurrer must be accompanied by a certificate of counsel that he believes it good in law and that it is not interposed for delay.[29] Where plaintiff's demurrer to a defense was sufficient, a further demurrer to the same defense, bad in form and insufficient for that reason, may be regarded as mere surplusage.[30]

2. Demurrer Ore Tenus.[31] In some jurisdictions demurrers ore tenus are not allowed in courts of record,[32] but they are held proper in others where it is sought to raise substantial objections to the sufficiency of the pleadings.[33]

3. Incorporating Demurrer in Answer or Reply.[34] In some jurisdictions, by statutory provisions, a demurrer may be included in the answer.[35] But where not authorized by statute, such practice is not permissible,[36] although it has been held that if the court fix a time for filing an answer defendant may insert a demurrer in

4. Plea, Answer, or Reply With Demurrer [40] — a. In General. It is not allowable to demur and plead to the same matter at the same time, at any stage of the pleadings,[41] except where authorized so to do by statute,[42] or by leave of court.[43] In such a case, it has been held that a motion lies to strike out either the answer or demurrer,[44] and that plaintiff may disregard both plea and demurrer and take a judgment,[45] although generally the answer or plea is deemed to overrule the demurrer.[46]

b. Demurrer and Answer to Different Parts of Pleading. It is not allowable to plead and demur at the same time to different parts of an indivisible count or defense.[47] But it is permissible to plead to one count or defense and demur at the same time to another,[48] or, where the matter of a count or defense is divisible, a plea or answer may be filed to a part and a demurrer to the residue.[49] And where a defendant is sued in a single count in two distinct capacities, he may demur in one capacity and plead in another.[50] A plea of set-off, containing several distinct matters, is of this divisible character.[51]

5. Specifying Grounds — a. Necessity. It has been held that a demurrer which specifies no grounds whatever is insufficient;[52] and under the codes it is necessary that the demurrer should always point out the particular statutory grounds upon which it is based.[53] However, at common law, a demurrer which does not specify or adequately specify any grounds will be taken as a general demurrer,[54] and the same rule applies under the codes where the party whose

The common-law rule is that where a special demurrer is filed, the demurrant may take advantage not only of causes specified

pleading is demurred to proceeds to the hearing of such demurrer without objection.[55]

b. Right to Rely on Grounds Not Specified. Grounds not enumerated in the demurrer cannot be relied on,[56] except that at common law the failure to state a cause of action may be urged though not specified in a special demurrer.[57] For instance, a demurrer to a complaint for failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action does not raise the objection of want of jurisdiction,[58] misjoinder

Joint cause of action.— If the complaint purports to set up a cause of action in favor of several plaintiffs jointly which in its nature cannot be joint, a general demurrer for want of facts will lie. Hellams v. Switzer, 24 S. C. 39.

Unless a cause of action is shown in favor of all of joint plaintiffs, a general demurrer courts refuse to sanction such a rule.[66] A demurrer on the ground of a defect of parties does not include the objection of a misjoinder of parties,[67] and a demurrer for misjoinder of parties does not raise an objection as to defect of parties.[68] A demurrer on the ground that a complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action does not present the question of the legal capacity of plaintiff to sue,[69] and conversely.[70] And a demurrer based on the ground of improper joinder of causes of action does not reach the objection that the court on the ground that no cause of action is stated will be sustained. State v. Holt, 163 Ind. 198, 71 N. E. 653; McIntosh v. Zaring, 150 Ind. 301, 49 N. This is so as to all wards and cestuis que trustent, generally. The cause of action is in the beneficiaries, but the capacity to maintain it is in the trustee; and when want of capacity is relied on by the defendant as an objection to the maintenance of the action by the plaintiff, it should be made by demurrer or answer, and when taken by demurrer it should be specially assigned." Legal capacity to sue.— A demurrer to the complaint on the ground that plaintiff is a minor, and has no legally appointed guardian and therefore has no legal capacity to sue, does not raise a question as to the sufficiency of an allegation of appointment of

has no jurisdiction of one of the causes of action.[71] Likewise, the question of misjoinder of parties is not raised by a demurrer on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action, unless there are several causes of action in favor of different plaintiffs,[72] and conversely a demurrer for misjoinder of parties is not equivalent to one for misjoinder of causes of action.[73] So where the demurrer to a counter-claim is for insufficiency the objection cannot be urged that the counter-claim does not disclose a cause of action arising out of the contract set forth in the complaint.[74]

c. Mode of Specifying Grounds — (i) In General. At common law objections to matters of form cannot be reached by a special demurrer unless specially pointed out.[75] Under the codes, it is sufficient to set forth certain grounds of demurrer in the words of the statute or words equivalent thereto, while as to other grounds of demurrer the demurrant must go further and point out the specific defect.[76] In other states the rule is more rigid and, with practically no exceptions, it is required that the specific defect relied on be pointed out.[77] In both classes of states, however, it is generally held that a demurrer for argumentativeness must show with precision wherein the pleading exhibits the fault coma guardian for such minor. Morrell v. Morgan, 65 Cal. 575, 4 Pac. 580.

In Alabama it does not seem to be necessary to go into all the particulars and minutiæ which go to make up the objection but merely to "point out the particular defects or objections" or, in the language of the statute, "specify" them. Wallace v. Markstein, 147 Ala. 262, 40 So. 201.

Failure to specify causes of action claimed to be improperly joined.—Merely stating that there are several and distinct causes of action set forth in the complaint which do not affect defendant, or that several causes of action therein stated do not belong to any one of the subdivisions of the code section authorizing the joinder of causes of action, or alleging that causes of action upon claims not arising out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action are included in the complaint, or alleging that legal and equitable actions not referring to the same persons or the subject-matter are united in the complaint, is insufficient where the causes of action claimed to be improperly united are not themselves specified. defect in the pleading to which it applies;[85] but if demurrant thinks proper to point out faults, it does not vitiate it.[86] So, under the codes, a demurrer to a complaint on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action need not, in most jurisdictions, specify the particular defects complained of, but may assign the defect in the language of the statute,[87] or words equivalent thereto;[88] but where the allegations are not equivalent thereto the demurrer is insufficient.[89] In some jurisdictions, however, it is not sufficient to allege the

Where complaint states no cause of action whatever.— A demurrer on the ground that the petition "does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action" is sufficiently specific where the petition states no cause of action whatever; but, where the petition is apparently good, a demurrer directed to some minor imperfection must specifically state it. Morgan v. Bouse, 53 Mo. 219.

It is immaterial that averments of particular objections to the complaint follow the statement of the ground of demurrer in the language of the statute, and that such particular objections are insufficient. Howland v. Kenosha County, 19 Wis. 247.

In South Carolina, circuit court rule 18 requires the demurrant to state in writing "wherein the pleading objected to is insufficient," but it is a sufficient compliance with this rule to demur in the words of the statute and on the hearing submit in writing the specific grounds of objection. So a demurrer for misjoinder of parties plaintiff,[95] or defendant,[96] must specify wherein the misjoinder consists. Under the statutes in some states, it is provided that the non-joinder of a party plaintiff cannot be objected to by defendant unless he gives written notice of such objection to plaintiff within a certain number of days after filing his plea or demurrer, and states in such notice the name of the person alleged to have been omitted.[97]

(iv) Demurrer to Defense in Answer. While in some jurisdictions it is not sufficient to allege as a ground of demurrer to a defense in an answer that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, without stating wherein the allegations are deficient,[98] the rule in most of the states is to the contrary, it being sufficient to state the objection in the words of the statute or words equivalent thereto.[99]

Stating reasons.— A demurrer to a complaint upon the ground of a misjoinder of parties which designates the defendants who are improperly joined with the demurring party sufficiently calls plaintiff's attention to the objection to the complaint and is sufficient in form. (VII) Reliance on Objections Not Urged. Where not only the ground but the specific objection is set forth, the demurrer cannot be sustained if the objection is not tenable, although the pleading is subject to demurrer on the ground stated.[5]

H. Joinder in Demurrer. Under the codes no joinder in demurrer is necessary,[6] but at common law a joinder in demurrer by the party to whom it is tendered is necessary to prevent a discontinuance, the result of a refusal to join in demurrer being the same as of an omission to plead when pleading is necessary.[7] But while such a joinder is necessary to constitute a technical issue, as in the case of a similiter to the general issue, a judgment is not invalid merely because rendered on a demurrer without a formal joinder.[8] The joinder in demurrer is a concise contradiction of the demurrer, contains an offer to verify the declaration or plea, and concludes with a prayer for judgment;[9] but no new facts, supplemental to the party's last pleading, can be set up in his joinder.[10] A mere informality in the demurrer will be waived by the joinder,[11] as will a prior discontinuance by the other party,[12] or the objection that the ground of special demurrer was waived.[13]

declaration, it cannot be looked to on demurrer to the declaration;[29] nor can an affidavit filed with a pleading,[30] or a copy of an account delivered to the other party on demand pursuant to a statute.[31] However, it has been held, in analogy to the equity practice, that an admission by counsel, during the progress of an argument on a demurrer, as to the facts, may be considered in ruling upon the demurrer.[32] On demurrer for want of facts, the whole pleading must be considered, as well the allegations tending to defeat the pleader as those tending to support him.[33] On demurrer to one defense the sufficiency of other defenses should not be decided,[34] and the defense demurred to, if one of several, cannot be aided by other defenses or denials unless repeated or incorporated by reference in such defenses.[35] However, allegations of the complaint referred to in the answer are considered as incorporated therein for the purpose of a demurrer.[36] Each defense, unless otherwise designated, will be considered as intended as a complete defense and so tested.[37] Craving and obtaining oyer of an instrument makes it a part of the pleading so that a demurrer will reach it.[38]

(II) Demurrer Raising Objections as to Parties. For instance a demurrer will not lie for defect of parties unless the defect appears on the face of the complaint.[39] And the same rule applies where the defect is based on the misjoinder of parties.[40] So a demurrer on the ground that plaintiff has no legal capacity to sue cannot be sustained unless it affirmatively appears on the face of the complaint that he has not such capacity.[41] The common-law rule applicable to a plea in abatement based on a defect of parties, that it must show that the persons claimed to be necessary parties were alive at the time of the commencement of the suit,[42] was applied to demurrers by some of the earlier decisions by holding that a demurrer for defect of parties did not lie unless it appeared from the complaint that the person claimed to be a necessary party was alive;[43] but the later decisions repudiate this rule and hold almost unanimously that it need not affirmatively appear from the complaint that the alleged necessary party is alive.[44]

Averments held equivalent to allegation that persons not joining were living see Hees v. Nellis, 65 Barb. (N. Y.) 440. A declaration which, after stating that two defendants were jointly bound in the contract sued on, proceeds to declare against one only, is demurrable; the joinder of both in the commencement of the declaration sufficiently implying that the other defendant was still living. c. Demurrer to Part of Pleading. Under the common-law system of pleading, a demurrer will lie only to the whole of a pleading.[45] But under the codes and practice acts, the general rule is that it can be directed to a particular count or defense.[46] However, a demurrer must go to the whole of a count or defense, where the same is single and entire, and a demurrer to only a part thereof cannot be considered.[47] But if a count or defense is made up of divisible portions as in case of separate breaches, distinct defenses, intermingled counts, and the like, a demurrer may be directed against any one or more of them.[48] However, a demurrer based on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action must be to the whole complaint and not merely to the count or cause of action objected to.[49] Whether a demurrer is joint as to a number of paragraphs, counts, or defenses, or several as to each of them, can be determined by no fixed rule, but each demurrer must depend upon its own phraseology.[50] A demurrer to one paragraph, count, or defense goes only an affirmative defense "set forth in subdivisions third and fourth of said answer," on the ground that "each of the same" is insufficient in law upon the face thereof is not to be construed as a demurrer to each of such subdivisions separately but as a demurrer to the entire defense. d. Demurrer by Part or All of Parties.[56] A demurrer may generally be filed by all or more than one co-party,[57] but in such case it will be overruled if not good as to all the parties joining therein.[58] But the mere fact that two or more co-parties unite in a demurrer in the same paper does not necessarily make the demurrer a joint one as parties may demur separately, although they unite in the same paper.[59] Whether a demurrer is joint or several as to the parties uniting therein depends on its phrascology.[60]

Special demurrer.— When the special demurrer is to the whole complaint, the rule should be the same as in the case of a gen-counts.[62] Similarly, if different kinds of relief are sought, and the facts alleged are sufficient to authorize one but not sufficient to authorize another, a demurrer for want of facts directed to the entire cause of action should be overruled.[63] And where several cumulative negligent or wrongful acts are alleged in one count,[64] or several breaches,[65] or several divisible matters of damage,[66] and any one of them is sufficient, a demurrer to the entire count must be overruled. A plea of set-off or counter-claim is to be construed as a declaration, and the same rules apply.[67] So also if a demurrer be directed generally to an entire plea, answer, reply, or other pleading, which contains several separable parts, and any one of them is good, the eral demurrer to the whole complaint. If in a portion of the complaint there is stated a good cause of action, free from ambiguity or uncertainty, or which, in short, is not amenable to any of the grounds urged in the special demurrer, it is error to sustain such a special demurrer as to the entire complaint. Jones v. Iverson, 131 Cal. 101, 63 Pac. 135.

Whether the ground be, that one of several counts, or that one of several breaches, or that part of plaintiff's demand of a distinct and divisible nature is bad, in every of these cases, defendant should demur to that count, or to that breach, or to that part of the demand, as the case may be, which is bad. In no case can he demur to the whole, and ask that judgment be given in his favor in part only. Henderson v. Stringer, 6 Gratt. (Va.) 130.

demurrer must be overruled.[68] If a pleading can be made sufficient by striking out certain objectionable matter, a demurrer going to the whole plea will be overruled.[69] The specification of error in a particular part of a pleading does not narrow a demurrer directed to the entire pleading into a demurrer to that part only.[70]

Illustrations of rule.— While, in considering a demurrer, allegations in a petition are accepted as true, a mere statement of a conclusion will be controlled by the facts which clearly appear from the entire pleading; and hence an allegation in a petition in an action against a city to recover for the death of plaintiffs' decedent, an experienced man, while reading a water meter placed in the ground so close to a railroad track that cars would extend over the box, that deceased did not know that the place was unsafe, is a legal absurdity, and will not be accepted as a fact. pleader which the party demurring is estopped to aver;[86] but not facts which the pleader, as appears by the pleading filed, is estopped to assert.[87] So the demurrer admits that the pleading demurred to is properly filed.[88] On a demurrer to a special defense the allegations of the complaint will be taken as true,[89] notwithstanding a separate paragraph of the plea or answer denies such allegations.[90]

b. Facts Not Admitted. The general rule does not apply where the court will take judicial notice that the facts are not true,[91] nor does it apply to legally impossible facts,[92] nor to facts which appear unfounded by a record incorporated in the pleading,[93] or by a document referred to,[94] nor to general averments contradicted by more specific averments.[95] A demurrer does not admit allegations as to the amount of damages sustained,[96] other than the right to nominal damages,[97] except in cases where the establishment of the cause of action necessarily carries with it the right to recover the precise amount alleged.[98] So scandalous matter inserted merely to insult the opposing party is not admitted,[99] nor are allegations of foreign law.[1]

c. Character of Admission. The admissions by demurrer can be used only for the purposes of the argument on the demurrer and they are not evidence for the party alleging the facts demurred to.[2] The admission is confined to the portion of the pleading demurred to.[3] A demurrer to an answer does not constitute such an admission of the facts therein alleged as to make them a part of the petition and thus render the petition bad.[4] If a demurrer is filed by a party who has already filed a prior pleading, the admission of the demurrer, being later in time, must be taken as revoking any allegation of the prior pleading inconsistent with the allegations of the pleading demurred to.[5] When a demurrer is sustained the facts alleged in the pleading demurred to are not in the case,[6] and when the demurrer is overruled they must be proved and may be controverted as if no demurrer had been filed.[7]

must be held good on demurrer.[9] This general rule applies at common law without regard to whether the demurrer is a general or special one.[10] So it makes no difference whether the pleading demurred to is good or bad, but the first defective pleading will nevertheless be searched out.[11] Under the common-law practice, when the party against whom a demurrer was filed took advantage of this rule to object to his adversary's earlier pleading, the court usually took up this question first, and if the objection was sustained declined to consider the sufficiency of the pleading demurred to.[12]

In some jurisdictions, however, this rule has never been recognized (Wynn v. Lee, 5 Ga. 217), while in other jurisdictions the rule has been held to be abrogated by statute (Russ v. Mitchell, 11 Fla. 80). It is held in some states that the code provision that all demurrers shall state the objection relied on, the rule including what was formerly known as general demurrers, abrogates the rule that a demurrer opens the record. Whole record to be looked into.— In applying the rule that a general demurrer reaches the first substantial defect, the whole record must be looked into. So where the plea is good upon its face, the replication bad, while the rejoinder contains matter which shows that the plea is not good in fact, judgment upon general demurrer to the rejoinder should be for plaintiff. b. Pleadings to Which Rule Applies. The rule applies not only to a demurrer to an answer,[13] including a demurrer to a counter-claim,[14] but also to a demurrer to any other pleading including a reply or replication,[15] rejoinder,[16] surrejoinder,[17] etc.

c. To What Pleadings Demurrer Carried Back. A demurrer cannot be carried back to a pleading which the pleading demurred to does not profess to answer and with which it has no connection,[18] but only to pleadings or portions thereof to which the pleading demurred to relates.[19] However, a counter-claim is so related to the complaint that a demurrer thereto may be carried back to the complaint.[20]

d. Limitations of, and Exceptions to, Rule — (i) In General. But the court will only consider defects of substance as distinguished from defects of form in the earlier pleadings.[21] Thus, under the code, it can be shown only that the prior pleading does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, defense, or reply, as the case may be, or that the court has no jurisdiction of the action,[22] all other defects being waived by answering over.[23] Hence the effect of a demurrer upon antecedent pleadings is only that of a general demurrer,[24] and where general demurrers without the specification of grounds are abolished by statute, the demurrer cannot be carried back,[25] unless in some states the prior pleading is so defective that a judgment could not be rendered upon it.[26] Likewise the demurrer can be carried back only so far as the proceedings remain under the control of the court.[27]

(II) Defects in Prior Pleadings Which Have Been Cured. A demurrer will not be carried back to a bad pleading which has been cured by a subsequent pleading,[28] nor will it reach any defect which has been in any way cured.[29]

(III) After Demurrer to Prior Pleading Overruled. Some cases hold that after a demurrer to a pleading has been overruled, a demurrer to a subsequent pleading cannot be carried back to such pleading, on the ground that by pleading over after demurrer overruled the legal sufficiency of the pleading is admitted.[30] But other cases hold that an overruled demurrer is off the record and a demurrer to a subsequent pleading may be carried back just as though it had not been filed.[31]

(IV) Effect of Previous Issue Taken. The rule does not allow the demurrer to be carried back, in favor of the party demurring, to a pleading upon which he has previously taken issue,[32] for the contrary doctrine would in effect allow a party to plead and demur to the same pleading at the same time.[33] Thus, although there is authority to the contrary,[34] the rule is well settled in some jurisdictions that the demurrer cannot be carried over a plea of the general issue,[35] fact,[46] or proceeds to trial on the merits without a ruling thereon.[47] So joining in a motion for auditors,[48] noticing the issue of fact for trial on the merits,[49] moving in arrest of judgment after trial on the merits,[50] or taking issue or going to trial on an amended pleading,[51] is deemed a waiver or abandonment of the demurrer. Where the pleading demurred to is amended before the demurrer is acted on, the demurrer is not waived by failure to demur to the amended pleading where the amendment is merely formal.[52] On the other hand, an objection based on want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter or want of facts in the pleading is not waived by pleading after demurrer filed,[53] or the withdrawal of the demurrer.[54] So it is only the demurrant, and not the other party, who is concluded by the waiver by pleading over, except where the latter joins issue on the pleading filed.[55] Of course a demurrer is not pending where it has been withdrawn pursuant to leave granted by the court.[56] And consenting that a demurrer should be overruled is tantamount to its withdrawal.[57] A general demurrer waives grounds for special demurrer,[58] but the converse is not true.[59]

K. Hearing. The decision of a demurrer is a question of law for the court and not a question of fact for the jury.[60] A notice of trial or other notice is usually necessary, by statute or rule, to bring on a hearing of the issue raised by a demurrer;[61] but no notice is necessary unless required by statute or rule.[62] The demurrant should bring on the demurrer for hearing,[63] although the other party may notice it for hearing.[64] The time and place for hearing or decision of demurrers are matters largely regulated by statutes or rules of court,[65] but the courts exercise considerable discretion in the matter.[66] Where there are demurrers to different pleadings on file at the same time, they should be heard in the order of the pleadings to which they are directed,[67] since the first demurrer that is sustained makes the consideration of the subsequent pleadings unnecessary.[68] It is irregular to hear a demurrer after a jury has been impaneled to try the cause, but the validity of a judgment rendered on the demurrer is not affected thereby.[69] The decision of a motion for change of venue must precede a ruling on demurrer.[70] An amended pleading properly on the files supersedes the original, and a demurrer to the latter cannot thereafter be heard or passed upon.[71] In arriving at a determination as to whether the demurrer shall be sustained or overruled, the copy of the pleading served on the demurrant rather than the original is to be considered.[72]

The question of what the party whose pleading is demurred to will be allowed to prove under his pleading cannot be considered,[73] nor can the proof heard at the trial of the cause.[74] The validity of the statute under which relief is sought in the complaint may be considered on a demurrer to the complaint.[75]

L. Decision, Order, or Judgment — 1. In General.[76] After the hearing of the demurrer, the court must decide it either by sustaining or overruling it.[77] But any action of the court having the same effect as sustaining or overruling a demurrer may be so treated.[78] So the failure to enter a formal order overruling a demurrer is not fatal to further proceedings.[79] A formally correct judgment on demurrer should recite the submission of the cause on demurrer to a specified pleading and that the same was considered by the court, and should conclude with a formal statement that it is therefore considered and adjudged by the court that the demurrer be, and the same is hereby, overruled or sustained, as the case may be;[80] but a judgment stating merely that the court renders judgment for a designated party has been held sufficient.[81] A general judgment sustaining a demurrer extends and applies only to the pleading demurred to.[82] It is unnecessary and improper for the court to make a finding of facts on its decision of a demurrer;[83] nor is the court required to specify in the judgment the ground of its ruling, where several causes are assigned.[84] Where a demurrer is carried back from one bad pleading to a prior bad pleading by the other party the form of the judgment is that the pleading demurred to is sufficient.[85] A judgment for an amount in excess of the showing made in the pleadings is erroneous.[86]

2. Decision as Substitute For Order. In some jurisdictions statutes require a "decision" on the determination of a demurrer,[87] and it has been held thereunder that an "order" is insufficient,[88] while other cases hold that an "order" is a "decision" within the statute.[89] The decision must be in writing,[90] and in some jurisdictions must be filed in the clerk's office within a specified time after the term.[91] The decision need not include any finding of fact but must direct the final or interlocutory judgment to be entered thereon,[92] and the party demurring is not in default until the entry of the interlocutory judgment,[93] and the time given to plead does not begin until such entry.[94]

3. Where There Are Issues of Both Law and Fact. Where issues of fact as well as law are raised, final judgment on disposing of the demurrer should not be rendered until the former are tried,[95] unless it appears, upon the whole, that plaintiff has no cause of action or defendant no defense.[96] It is also error to try a cause on the facts while a demurrer to any pleading or portion thereof which has not been waived [97] remains undisposed of upon the record,[98] although there are cases to the contrary.[99] Some cases have held that if the trial is had before the court without a jury, it will be presumed that the demurrer was decided in the general finding.[1] For the purposes of the trial, a count to which a demurrer has been sustained is no longer a part of the declaration.[2]

4. Where There Are Several Counts or Defenses — a. In General. Judgment may go against a plaintiff on one count and in his favor on another,[3] but the usual practice is merely to strike out such counts as are held bad on demurrer.[4] In no case should judgment go against plaintiff on the whole declaration when one or more counts are good,[5] unless plaintiff declines to proceed further in the cause; [6] nor can judgment be rendered against a defendant on a count to which his demurrer has been sustained.[7] If any one plea in bar is held valid on demurrer judgment must go for the defendant though demurrers are sustained to other pleas,[8]

unless plaintiff tenders a sufficient replication or there is something else to prevent it.[9] On the other hand, plaintiff will not be entitled to judgment where his demurrer to one plea is sustained, if another plea sets up a good defense.[10]

b. Demurrer For Misjoinder of Causes of Action. The effect of misjoinder, on demurrer, is to separate the causes of action, not to put an end to the suit.[11] The court may, in some jurisdictions, grant leave to withdraw one or more of the causes and overrule the demurrer.[12] In other states, by statute, the court may, in its discretion, direct that the action be divided into as many actions as are necessary for the proper determination of the causes of action therein stated.[13]

5. Where There Are Several Parties. Judgment on a demurrer should be given for or against all the parties that join in it.[14] Ordinarily the demurrer of one of several parties may be passed upon without affecting the rights of the others.[15] If one of several defendants raises an objection by way of demurrer which goes to plaintiff's right to recover, and not merely a personal matter of discharge, judgment rendered on such demurrer will inure to the benefit of all the defendants.[16] If a complaint is held insufficient as to certain defendants, final judgment may be given in their favor where plaintiff fails to amend.[17]

6. Assessment of Damages. Judgment in chief for plaintiff should not be entered without assessing the damages by a jury of inquiry or other proper proceeding,[18] except where the action is brought for a liquidated sum.[19] And where the damages have already been determined on an issue of fact raised, no further hearing on the question of damages is proper after demurrer.[20]

7. Effect of Decision — a. In General. The effect of overruling a demurrer is to declare the pleading good both in law and fact, so long as the demurrant does not plead over.[21] After a demurrer to a pleading has been sustained no evidence can be admitted to support or rebut such pleading,[22] nor can any issue of fact be raised thereon.[23] A judgment sustaining a demurrer to one portion of a pleading does not itself authorize the exclusion of evidence admissible under the pleading demurred to when such evidence is properly offered under another portion of the pleading.[24]

b. Finality of Ruling on Demurrer.[25] A ruling on a demurrer is not such a final adjudication that the court may not reconsider its action and enter a contrary order;[26] and the overruling of a demurrer does not preclude the same matter being differently decided when subsequently presented by another demurrer,[27] by plea or answer,[28] by motion for judgment on the pleadings,[29] by objection to the admission of any evidence,[30] or by motion for a directed verdict [31] or for a nonsuit.[32] But error cannot be predicated upon an exclusion of evidence admissible only under a pleading to which a demurrer has been wrongly sustained.[33] Other cases hold that no reconsideration can be had after issues of fact have subsequently been formed on the pleading demurred to,[34] at least when no opportunity has been given the other party to amend.[35] A final judgment for defendant on a demurrer to the complaint is a final determination of the action and no trial of the issues can be had until such judgment is set aside.[36]

8. Amending or Pleading Over — a. In General. Where the issue of law raised by a demurrer to any of the pleadings is found for plaintiff the judgment, at common law, should be quod recuperet, that is, that plaintiff "do recover," [37] except that on a successful demurrer to a dilatory plea or plea in abatement the judgment should be "respondeat ouster," that is, that defendant "do answer over." [38] When the demurrer is determined in favor of defendant the judgment is final unless leave is granted to amend the pleading, or withdraw the demurrer, as the case may be.[39] If, however, the demurrer be to a pleading in abatement, the judgment for defendant at common law is that the writ be quashed.[40] A judgment by default on overruling or sustaining a demurrer is improper in some jurisdictions, the rule being that there should be final judgment on the demurrer if no leave was given to amend or plead over.[41]

b. Power of Court to Refuse Leave. In some jurisdictions it has been held that the court has no power to render final judgment, against the request of a party to be allowed to amend or plead over, on sustaining [42] or overruling [43] a demurrer. In most jurisdictions, however, the court has the "power" to order final judgment on sustaining [44] or overruling [45] a demurrer. But the court has no power to order a nonsuit on sustaining a demurrer.[46]

c. Power of Court to Grant Leave to Amend. The court has power to permit a pleading to be amended after it has been held insufficient on demurrer.[47]

d. Discretion of Court — (i) In General. In the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary,[48] in most jurisdictions the granting of leave to amend or plead over, on the sustaining or overruling a demurrer, rests in the discretion of the court,[49] which will not be interfered with unless clearly abused.[50]

frivolously put in to obtain time without any intention to rely upon it, it is proper to refuse to allow the demurrant to plead over.[57] Under some decisions leave to plead over cannot be granted after demurrer overruled to a plea in abatement.[58] Other cases hold that, after judgment of respondeat ouster on a plea in abatement, no other plea in abatement can be allowed,[59] at least no other of the same degree.[60]

within the discretion of the court.[65] The time should not be left indefinite, and where not fixed otherwise should be definitely fixed by the court.[66] Where, by statute, an amendment, after demurrer sustained, may be made without leave of court, the amended pleading must be filed within a reasonable time.[67] If a certain time is allowed after a demurrer is passed upon in which to plead over or amend, it is error to give final judgment on the demurrer before the expiration of that time,[68] unless there is a waiver;[69] but such judgment may always be rendered as soon as the designated time has expired,[70] except where the time has been extended.[71] Whether, after the lapse of the time fixed, further time shall be given, rests within the discretion of the court.[72] But if there is judgment dismissing the action unless plaintiff amends within a certain time, if no amendment is filed as directed, the court thereupon loses jurisdiction of the case.[73] Other cases, however, hold that an amendment may be allowed after judgment of dismissal, if such judgment is first set aside.[74] In some jurisdictions it is required that when a demurrer to any pleading is sustained or overruled, and time to amend or plead over is given, notice of the decision must be served on the party who is to amend or plead over in order to start the time running.[75] But if the attorney of the party hears the order given in court, this waives the necessity for the notice.[76]

g. Application For Leave — (1) In General. To obtain leave of court to amend or plead over, the party should satisfy the court that it is necessary to obtain justice and that it is not for delay.[77] A plea of limitations is not favored, and leave may be refused to file such a plea.[78] So if the party offers to file a bad pleading leave may be refused.[79] Strictly speaking, leave to amend a pleading to which a demurrer has been sustained, or to withdraw an overruled demurrer and plead over, should be obtained before judgment is rendered on the demurrer,[80] but it is common practice to permit an amendment thereafter.[81] Unreasonable delay in applying for leave will, in the absence of satisfactory explanations, authorize refusal;[82] but mere lapse of time does not deprive the court of power to grant leave.[83] It has been held too late to amend after judgment sustaining a demurrer and dismissal of the action has been affirmed on appeal;[84] but an amendment may be made after a judgment overruling a demurrer has been reversed on appeal, providing the remittitur has not yet been made the judgment of the trial court.[85] If amending or pleading over will not help the case, leave may be refused and the judgment made final.[86] If the party declines to amend in the lower court, he cannot obtain leave on appeal.[87] Asking leave to amend a pleading which has been demurred to is equivalent to confessing the demurrer.[88]

(II) AFFIDAVIT OF MERITS. In some jurisdictions it has been held that an affidavit of merits must be filed as a condition precedent to pleading over,[89] and it is frequently employed to obtain leave of court.[90] Under some statutes of amendments, it is held that the court cannot demand an affidavit showing facts constituting a meritorious defense as a condition of allowing an amendment after demurrer sustained.[91]

The necessity for a formal judgment of respondeat ouster is superseded by the express declaration of the demurrant that he would abide by his demurrer. Smith v. Harris, 12 Ill. 462.

Where there are several pleas, and a demurrer is overruled to one of them, which answers the whole declaration and is in bar of the action, if plaintiff elects to stand by his demurrer, defendant is entitled to final judgment. Bissell v. Kankakee, 64 Ill. 249, 21 Am. Rep. 554.

Where an answer does not go in bar of the whole cause of action it is error to give final judgment for defendant upon overruling a demurrer thereto. Brevoort v. Brevoort, 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. 211.

The interposition of a defective answer to which a demurrer was sustained is a failure to plead over within the meaning of the statute providing that the judgment upon overruling a demurrer shall be that the party plead over and if he fails so to do, judgment shall be rendered against him as

An election to stand on a demurrer is equivalent to a refusal to plead over,[1] and a neglect to reasonably file a pleading will be taken as such election.[2] Where the demurrer is sustained, and the party whose pleading is demurred to is not granted, and does not seek, leave to amend or plead over, or fails or refuses to amend or plead over when leave is granted, a final judgment should be entered on the demurrer in favor of demurrant.[3] So where a demurrer is sustained and application to amend is refused, final judgment may be entered.[4] On overruling a demurrer, where the demurrant declines to plead further, a judgment entered against him is on the merits.[5]

9. Error in Ruling as Harmless. No ruling on demurrer can constitute reversible error which does not prejudice the party complaining.[6] For instance, error in sustaining or overruling a demurrer to a portion of a pleading, the allegations of which can be proved under the allegations of another portion or on the assessment of damages, is harmless.[7] So improperly sustaining a demurrer to a pleading or portion thereof which might have been stricken out on motion is not reversible error.[8] And it is immaterial that a demurrer has been sustained to a pleading the averments of which apparently cannot be proved.[9] So also where a pleading has

If a demurrer is sustained on one ground and plaintiff declines to amend, it is sufficient to warrant a judgment, although it be overruled as to other grounds. Terry v. Allen, 132 Ala. 657, 32 So. 664.

Where replication not allowed.— Under a statute providing that there shall be no reply unless a set-off or counter-claim is pleaded, judgment cannot be entered against plaintiff on refusal to plead further after the sustaining of a demurrer to an answer setting up new matter constituting a defense, but not a set-off or counter-claim. Madden v. Anderson, 5 Indian Terr. 552, 82 S. W. 904.

If, however, the demurrer is to some counts only and the demurrer is sustained, plaintiff may amend by the addition of other counts or may stand on counts admitted to be good. Strictly speaking defendant is entitled to judgment on the demurrer to the defective counts but the usual practice is merely to strike out the bad counts unless defendant insists on judgment as to such counts. Riddell v. Douglas, 60 Md. 337.

Where demurrers are sustained to replications limited to certain pleas, leaving other pleas not replied to which set up a complete defense to the action and plaintiff declines to plead further and suffers judgment to go against him, such judgment will be referred to the sufficient pleas and the case will not be reversed for the ruling upon the sufficiency of such replication. become irrelevant by an amendment of the pleading to which it was directed, the ruling upon a demurrer thereto is immaterial.[10] Likewise, even if a demurrer is so defective in form as to present no question, it is not reversible error to sustain it, if the pleading to which it is addressed is bad.[11] Furthermore, the party against whom judgment is rendered cannot himself complain that it ought to be quod recuperet instead of respondeat ouster,[12] and plaintiff is not prejudiced by a failure of the court to render a judgment of respondeat ouster if he in fact has an opportunity to plead over.[13]

ment" as applied to pleadings has been defined as the correction of some error or mistake in a pleading already before the court.[16] In a broad sense a pleading is amended when a correction of its faults has been made; when its defects have been cured, whether that change has been brought about by the action of the court in striking out and lopping off improper, irrelevant, and unnecessary matter contained therein, or whether a new frame of words has been filed embodying the good of the original, with the improper, irrelevant, and unnecessary matter left out in obedience to the view of the court expressed in sustaining the motion to strike out.[17]

2. Authority of Court to Allow or Make Amendments, and Law Governing. In order to promote justice, courts in the exercise of their general common-law jurisdiction, in the absence of any prohibitory statute, and independent of any express statutory authority, may, in their discretion, permit pleadings to be amended at any time before verdict found,[18] wherever such amendment is not in violation of some positive rule of law,[19] and does not surprise or prejudice the opposite party.[20] And the fact that an amendment is so framed that, if demurred to, it might be held insufficient is not necessarily fatal to its allowance.[21] To allow amendments is the rule; to refuse them, the exception.[22] Upon the question whether a court may of its own motion, without application by one of the parties, make or order an amendment, the authorities differ, it being held in some decisions that it may,[23] while in others the power of amendment sua sponte is Restatement of doctrine.—Amendments, at common law, independently of a statutory provision on the subject, are in all cases in the discretion of the court for the furtherance of justice. Under statutes in modern practice they are very liberally allowed in all formal and most substantial matters, either without costs to the party amending or upon such terms as the court may think proper to order. 1 Bouvier L. denied.[24] Proper application being made, however, it is the duty of the court to allow parties to amend their pleadings so that their cases may be tried on the merits.[25] The practice of the lex fori in respect to amendments is controlling where it differs from the practice of the state where the cause of action arose.[26]

3. Statutory Provisions. The whole subject of amendments is controlled largely by statutes, the provisions of which vary in different jurisdictions.[27] All these statutes, however, tend toward liberality in the allowance of amendments, the underlying principle being that amendments shall be permitted in the furtherance of justice whenever the other party is not prejudiced thereby.[28] Certain statutes providing that, if pleadings are defective, it shall be the duty of the court, and the judge is thereby "required" to cause the same to be amended, are held to be mandatory, leaving no discretion to the court.[29] By statute in some states a referee has power concurrent with that of the court to allow amendments.[30] Although under the circumstances of a given case the laws of a state may forbid an amendment, it may be allowable under statutes which govern actions pending in the United States courts.[31] In most jurisdictions having the code procedure it is provided by statute that the court may, either before or after judgment, on such terms as may seem proper, permit the amendment of any pleading by adding or striking out the name of any party, by correcting a mistake in the name of any party, or a mistake in any other respect, by inserting other allegations material to the cause, or, when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense, by conforming the pleadings or proceedings to the facts proved.[32] In those states which follow the code procedure, in addition to the general statutes authorizing amendments, there is usually a section authorizing the courts to disregard, in every stage of the action, any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which shall not affect the substantial rights of the parties.[33] The codes usually provide also that no variance between the allegations in a pleading and the proof is to be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. Whenever it shall appear that a party has been misled the court may order the pleading to be amended upon such terms as may be just.[34] While in those which retain the common-law procedure the statutes are not so uniform nor so specific or comprehensive as in those states where the code procedure prevails, they are nevertheless in most instances fully as liberal in their nature. The typical statute of this class confers upon the court, in which any action shall be pending, the power to amend any process, pleading, or proceeding in such action, either in form or substance, for the furtherance of justice, on such terms as shall be just, at any time before judgment rendered.[35] There are numerous modifications of this general provision, respecting the method of making application to the court, the service of the amended pleading on the opposite party, the time when various other steps should be taken, and the like;[36] but on these points the local statutes must be consulted.

4. Necessity For Something to Amend By. In general, before an amendment will be allowed as to a matter of form, there must be something to amend by, that is, there must be something in the record to show that what is sought by the amendment was originally designed, but has been omitted through mistake or oversight.[37] Some cases restrict this rule to amendments as to matters of form, holding that amendments as to matters of substance must conform to the facts, and as to these the record can be no guide.[38] But other cases apply the rule to all classes of amendments, holding that the right to amend presupposes that the pleadings disclose at least the semblance of a subsisting cause of action.[39]

5. Amendments as of Course — a. Right — (i) In General. That the pleadings can only be amended by leave of court is an elementary rule of practice, so far as concerns amendments at common law;[40] and in some jurisdictions this rule has been made statutory, so that the power to amend is in the court, not the party.[41] In other jurisdictions, however, the common-law rule of practice has been changed by statutes, giving parties the absolute right, within certain limits, to amend a pleading once as of course.[42]

(II) Restriction That Amended Pleading Cannot Be Served For Delay. In one jurisdiction, at least, the right exists by statute to amend a pleading once as of course, either before or after reply to it shall have been made, and this right is absolute and unqualified, with the single restriction that it shall not be exercised for purposes of delay.[43]

(III) Manner of Exercise. The right to amend as of course must be exercised in the manner specified in the statute or rule authorizing it.[44]

(IV) Exhaustion. The right to amend as of course an amended pleading did not exist at common law,[45] and generally the right to amend as of course, given by the codes and practice acts, is exhausted by one exercise,[46] and all other amendments are addressed to the sound discretion of the court.[47] Thus where a party has a right to amend his pleading as of course, either before or after a response thereto, he cannot amend once before, and again after, such response;[48] but his right to amend his pleading as of course is exhausted by an amendment before a response thereto.[49] So too where plaintiff files an amended complaint after motion by defendant to require amendment, there being no order of court compelling him, his right to amend as of course is exhausted.[50] But a defendant, by serving an amended answer to the original complaint, does not exhaust his right to amend as of course his answer to plaintiff's amended complaint within the prescribed time.[51] Nor is the right to amend as of course exhausted by filing an amendment under compulsion of an order of court.[52] And where the court, on a contested motion, strikes out a portion of the party's pleading, it is the act of the court, and not the act of the party, and cannot be considered an amendment once, so as to exhaust the right of amendment as of course.[53]

But where the leave to amend is given to a party on a contested motion to strike out a portion of his pleading, and without his consent, and he serves a notice that he elects not to amend under the leave given, there is no waiver of the right to amend as of course, but only a waiver of the right to amend in the present stage of the action.[59]

Where the statute permits an amendment as of course to a pleading after a demurrer thereto, a party may, after motion for judgment, on account of the frivolousness of his pleading, amend as of course, as after a demurrer, since such a motion is equivalent to a demurrer. Burrall v. Moore, 5 Duer (N. Y.) 654.

Amendment within forty days.— Under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 798, providing that where service of notice or pleading is by mail the adverse party has double the time specified for the doing of an act by him, and section 542, providing that, within twenty days after a pleading is served, or at any time before the period for answering it expires, it may be once amended by the party of course, where an answer is served by mail defendant may amend it of course within forty days. Schlesinger v. Borough Bank, 112 N. Y. App. Div. 121, 98 N. Y. Suppl. 136.

A party may amend his complaint without leave of the court before summons issued, where there has been no appearance by defendant. Allen v. Marshall, 34 Cal. 165.

Under Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 472, providing that any pleading may be amended once by a party as of course at any time before answer or demurrer filed, or after demurrer and before trial of the issues of law thereon, ment, the right to amend must be exercised within that period,[62] a pleading filed thereafter being subject to the motion to strike it out.[63]

(II) ABRIDGMENT. If the statute secures to a party a certain and definite time in which to amend as of course, it is not within the power of the adverse party to abridge it or cut it off entirely at his pleasure.[64]

(III) EXTENSION — (A) In General. By obtaining an extension of time in which to answer, defendant extends the time of plaintiff to serve an amended complaint.[65] Likewise where a party is relieved from his default in pleading,[66] or, after demurrer sustained, is given leave to plead anew,[67] he is entitled to amend once as of course the pleading served under such leave. But an order extending the time of plaintiff to serve a reply to a counter-claim set up in the answer does not extend the time to amend the complaint as of course.[68]

(B) Service of Previous Pleading by Mail. The rule obtains in one jurisdiction at least that a party, by serving his pleading by mail, thereby secures for himself double the time in which to amend it as of course authorized where the service is a personal one;[69] but this rule does not apply where the pleading served by mail is an answer which, in its nature, does not admit of a reply or demurrer.[70]

c. Subjects of Amendment [71] — (I) IN GENERAL. The amendment may add new allegations to strengthen and complete the cause of action or defense originally set up,[72] or leave out redundant or irrelevant matter,[73] or strike out a cause of action.[74]

(II) ALLEGING NEW CAUSES OF ACTION AND DEFENSES.[75] Under statutes permitting amendments as of course and silent as to the nature of such amendments, it is held that such amendments are not restricted to the matters of the plaintiff has a right to amend his complaint as of course only while an issue of law on a demurrer is undetermined, or up to the time an answer is filed in case of no demurrer, and defendant has a right to amend his answer as of course only during the time that a demurrer to the answer is undetermined, or up to the time when the right to demur expires. Where the time for joining an issue of law and of fact upon the pleadings has expired, and issue so joined, there is no authority for an amendment merely because issues upon subsequent pleading by the same party may not have been concluded. Holm v. Appelby, 27 Misc. (N. Y.) 49, 57 N. Y. Suppl. 266.

original pleading,[76] that the complaint may be amended by alleging an entirely new cause of action,[77] subject to the restriction that all of the causes of action set forth in the amended complaint must be of the same class and of the same class to which the summons belongs,[78] and that the answer may be amended by setting up a new and different defense.[79]

(III) Alleging Matters Occurring Subsequent to Commencement of Action.[80] The complaint may not be amended as of course by alleging matters occurring subsequent to the commencement of the action.[81]

(IV) Changing Issue of Law to Issue of Fact. A provision of law allowing an amendment as of course, within a given time after service of the original pleading does not authorize a defendant who has demurred to the complaint, under pretense of an amendment, to change the issue of law thus presented to one of fact by serving an answer.[82]

d. What Pleadings May Be Amended. A summons by which suit is commenced is process, not pleading, and not within a statute or rule allowing any pleading to be amended as of course.[83] And if the right of amendment as of course given by the statute exists only where the pleading to be amended requires or admits of a response in the shape of an answer, reply, or demurrer, a pleading consisting only of a general denial cannot be amended as of course.[84] But a supplemental complaint is a pleading, and as such may be amended once as of course.[85]

e. Unauthorized Amendments — (I) In General. An amendment of a pleading as of course, when not authorized by statute or rule of court, is a mere nullity and may be disregarded by the adverse party,[86] or stricken out on motion.[87] It has been held, however, that if an amendment be proper and in proper time, and the omission to obtain leave has not been the occasion of surprise or prejudice to the adverse party, it will be considered by the court.[88]

(II) Ratification. A party may, by consent, ratify the making of an unauthorized amendment.[89]

f. Effect — (I) On Issues Previously Joined. The service of an amended pleading, as of course, destroys issues previously joined, and nullifies a notice of trial thereof.[90]

(II) On Pending Motion For Bill of Particulars. The service in good faith of an amended pleading, as of course, after notice of motion for a bill of particulars, supersedes the original pleading, and thus deprives the motion of the basis on which it rests.[91] But the service of an amended pleading will not be permitted to defeat a motion for a bill of particulars, where such pleading throws little or no light on the particulars demanded, and is evidently made only to defeat the motion.[92]

(III) On Pending Motion to Strike Out Pleading Amended. The effect of the service of an amendment as of course curing an irregularity in a pleading is to defeat a pending motion to strike out such pleading for the irregularity so cured.[93]

g. Striking Out Pleading Served For Delay. When an amended pleading as of course is served for the purpose of delay, the remedy of the party aggrieved is by motion to strike it out;[94] but, to authorize the striking out of such pleading on the ground that it was interposed for delay, it must appear not only that the pleading was served for that purpose,[95] but that its effect would be to prevent a trial at the ensuing term.[96] And if the amendment is made in good faith, and not for the purpose of delay, the amended pleading cannot be stricken out, although the effect may be to deprive the adverse party of the benefit of a term.[97]

6. Amendments by Leave of Court[98] — a. In General. In many jurisdictions it is provided by statute that in addition to voluntary amendments of course, the court may, upon seasonable application, permit an amendment at any time before, and in many of the states, after, judgment, upon such terms as may seem reasonable.[99] Leave to amend will be liberally granted where the proposed amendment will not so change the case as to cause surprise to the other party.[1] Pleadings can be amended only in the court where the case is pending,[2] and not in a court having no jurisdiction;[3] and leave to amend should be deemed leave to amend in the existing stage of the action.[4] If an amended pleading be irregularly filed without leave, and the court later overrules a motion to strike such pleading from the files,[5] or recognizes it and embodies it in his instructions to the jury,[6] the irregularity of the filing is cured. court,[10] and the determination thereof will be reviewed only in case the court grossly abuses its discretion;[11] but the presumption is always against such abuse.[12] The court, however, must exercise its sound legal discretion, and not its arbitrary will.[13] The improper allowance of an amendment is a more serious ground for complaint than its refusal, because in the former case the issue is more or less affected, while in the latter the parties are left to try the issue they themselves have selected.[14] There is no abuse of the discretion of the court in allowing an amendment where the parties are not prejudiced nor the cause postponed.[15]

however, it is not reversible error to allow an unnecessary or immaterial amendment.[17]

(II) Technical Amendments. It is a proper exercise of the court's discretion to refuse to allow an amendment, introducing technicalities not tending to the promotion of justice.[18]

(III) Repetition of Original Allegations. The court may,[19] or may not,[20] in its discretion, allow an amendment setting forth substantially the same facts appearing in the original pleading, and the court may permit an amended pleading to remain on file, although it contain substantially the same matter as an amendment already stricken out.[21]

(IV) Relation to Evidence. Where the evidence shows plainly that a party has no right to recover, the court may very properly refuse any request to amend.[22] But after evidence not within the issues has been offered and admitted, without objection, the court should allow the pleadings to be amended even though the facts were known to the party desiring to amend at the time the original pleading was filed.[23]

(V) Successive Amendments. If the statute confers discretionary power on the court to allow amendments, without limiting the number thereof, the

Applications of rule.—An amendment is properly refused where the plea of limitations will be good against the pleading as amended (Patterson v. Doe, 130 Cal. 333, 62 Pac. 569), where the amendment embracing matter fully set out in an amendment previously allowed (Wright v. Roberts, 116 Ga. 194, 42 S. E. 369), where granting leave will result in allowing the party to amend himself out of court (Skellie v. Central R., etc., Co., 81 Ga. 56, 6 S. E. 811), where the proposed amendment will raise a fruitless inquiry (Yorkshire R. Wagon Co. v. Maclure, 19 Ch. D. 478, 51 L. J. Ch. 259, 45 L. T. Rep. N. S. 751, 30 Wkly. Rep. 291), where the amendment has no relevancy to the cause of action, but is introduced merely for the purpose of disqualifying a juror (Haney School Furniture Co. v. Hightower Baptist Inst., 113 Ga. 289, 38 S. E. 761), where the matter sought to be introduced by amendment does not support the claim or defense (Kahn v. Thomson, 113 Ga. 957, 39 S. E. 322; Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Jordan, 112 Ky. 473, 66 S. W. 27, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1730; Hatler v. Hunter, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 9). And if not introduced in support of the cause of action but in reply to matter set up in defendant's cross complaint, the amendment may properly be refused. Wood v. Brown, 104 Iowa 124, 73 N. W. 608.

Abandoned pleading.—An amendment is properly allowed of a pleading upon which the parties go to trial, but it is not permitted of a pleading that has been abandoned, stricken out, or ruled out of consideration in the case. Renfro v. Prior, 22 Mo. App. 403.

action of the court, after amendment had, in allowing or refusing a further amendment, is not, in the absence of clear abuse of discretion, subject for review.[24] The rule generally prevailing is that after a party has once amended on demurrer, the court will not grant leave to amend again on a second demurrer,[25] especially after argument and judgment rendered thereon,[26] or where the action is on a statute and the second demurrer turned on the construction of the statute.[27] But where there has been but one demurrer, an amendment will be allowed thereon, although there has been a previous amendment pursuant to leave of court.[28] Upon offering a second amended complaint, a party must show that his proposed amendment is material.[29]

(VI) Effect of Delay in Application.[30] Delay in application may be a ground for justly refusing to allow an amendment.[31] It is not an abuse of discretion to refuse an amendment after a motion for nonsuit has been argued, and the court is about to pronounce judgment,[32] nor after a party has once had leave to amend and has failed to do so within the time prescribed in the court's order.[33] It is not an abuse of discretion to refuse to allow an amendment introducing a cross complaint after the trial of the original issues,[34] nor to refuse permission to substantially change any matter after the issues are made up,[35] nor to amend a notice of special matter at the trial,[36] nor when, for any reason, the other party will be prejudiced by the delay.[37]

(VII) Effect of Stipulation of Parties. Even though the parties agree in open court to confine the controversy to a single issue made by the pleadings, it is discretionary with the court to permit an amendment which will introduce another issue.[38]

(VIII) Good Faith of Party Asking Amendment. A party seeking to amend must show good faith. Where the amendment seeks to delay the action,[39] evade the issues,[40] or vex and harass an opponent,[41] leave to file will be denied.

(IX) Miscellaneous Amendments. It is not improper to allow an amended petition inconsistent with the one originally filed,[42] nor is it improper to refuse to permit an amendment laying a foundation for the reformation of the written contract sued on,[43] or an amendment desired merely on account of the death of a witness.[44] The fact that at a former trial the correction of an error in the pleadings would have resulted in a verdict for defendant does not prevent the court from permitting an amendment to the complaint on a second trial.[45] After the allegations of an amended answer have been found in defendant's favor on the trial, such an amendment will not be declared evasive and insufficient on appeal.[46] It is a matter within the discretion of the court to grant or refuse permission to amend so as to shift the burden of proof.[47]

d. Abuse of Discretion. If the court permits an amendment which the law clearly does not allow,[48] or refuses an amendment which will obviously promote substantial justice,[49] it is error. Where an amendment both in form and substance violates the rules of good pleading it should be rejected.[50] If the court rules as a matter of law that a particular amendment is not allowable, when it is allowable or not, at his discretion,[51] or if the refusal of such amendment is not an act of independent discretion, but based upon an erroneous construction of a previous ruling,[52] in either case the action of the court is erroneous. It is likewise an abuse of discretion to allow an amendment conforming pleadings to proof improperly introduced over the objection of the opposite party.[53] Leave to amend should not be granted where it is apparent that the pleader cannot truthfully do so.[54]

e. Application For Leave to Amend [55] — (i) Requisites of the Application. In order to secure leave to amend it is usually necessary to make formal application to the court,[56] setting forth specifically the amendment proposed [57]

or presenting a copy of the desired amendment;[58] the form of application necessary in obtaining leave to amend is a matter within the discretion of the court.[59] But it is usual for the application for leave to amend to be made in writing.[60] The motion for leave must not be too broad, and a motion to amend generally will be refused.[61]

(II) Affidavits in Support of Application. In most jurisdictions it is discretionary with the court whether it will require a motion to amend a pleading to be accompanied by an explanatory affidavit excusing the failure to incorporate the amendment in the original pleading. Courts very generally exercise their discretion by requiring the affidavit.[62] The affidavit should present plainly

In Georgia, an affidavit was formerly required by the code, section 5057. Thompson v. Mallory, 104 Ga. 684, 30 S. E. 887. Under the act of Dec. 21, 1897, p. 35, amending section 5057 of the code, an affidavit is not a prerequisite to a motion to amend, but whether it shall be required or not is within the discretion of the court. That the discretion must be based on some facts justifying its exercise see Bass Dry Goods Co. v. Granite City Mfg. Co., 119 Ga. 124, 45 S. E. 980, where it is held that if the party seeking amendment is in court it is error to permit amendment without affidavit.

the proposed amendments,[63] should sufficiently explain and excuse the omission of the new matter from the original pleading,[64] and should show the necessity of the amendment.[65] It should state facts instead of conclusions of law,[66] and be verified by the party seeking to amend, and an affidavit by his attorney is insufficient unless the facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of the latter.[67] If, however, the motion must be made before the affidavit of the party can be obtained the affidavit of his attorney may be accepted, upon showing this fact.[68] So also where the facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of counsel.[69] Leave to renew motion to amend answer on perfected papers should be granted, where the original motion papers to amend were defective, in that defendant's affidavit to facts within his knowledge was not submitted, so that appeal from the order denying the motion to amend would have been unavailing.[70] An affidavit has been held unnecessary where the sworn testimony of a party at the trial shows that a mistake has occurred in his pleadings,[71] where the amendment is made at the trial to obviate the objection of a variance,[72] and where there is no laches to excuse.[73] And where, in an action against a corporation, a proposed amended answer merely enlarges the defense in the original answer, an affidavit of an officer of the corporation on the motion for leave to serve the amended answer is unnecessary.[74]

(III) Hearing and Determination — (A) In General. On motion to amend the court cannot assume the truth of averment without proof.[75] Any amendment may be properly refused if the necessity for it does not appear.[76] No amendment of a pleading the original of which is not presented to the court is permissible because there is nothing by which it can be determined whether an amendment is necessary.[77] Similarly a motion to amend should not be granted unless the proposed amendment be before the court; because the court cannot otherwise determine whether or not the amendment should be allowed.[78] Ordinarily a party will not be allowed to amend a pleading so as to set up facts of which he had full knowledge at the time of interposing his original pleading.[79] And the court may, before allowing an amendment, require an excuse for the defect in the pleading in order to prevent negligence and laxity in pleading.[80]

(B) Matters Considered. Upon the hearing of a motion to amend, the court will look not merely at the face of the amended pleading, but also at the extrinsic circumstances of the case;[81] but it will not look to a bill of particulars to determine whether the causes of action set out in the amendment and in the original pleading are the same;[82] and the court will inquire no further into the merits of the amendment than to see that it is not frivolous.[83] The court will not consider whether the pleading proposed for substitution would be sufficient as against a demurrer,[84] and ordinarily will not consider the fact that an amendment similar to the one proposed was denied at a different stage of the proceedings.[85]

(C) Time of Determination. Since the parties have a right to know at every stage of the trial the condition of their pleadings, the court should not reserve its ruling as to the propriety of an amendment until the close of the trial.[86]

(IV) ORDER GRANTING LEAVE — (A) Nature and Requisites of the Order. An order allowing an amended answer to be filed is not an adjudication of the identity of the causes of action in the original and amended declaration.[87] An order granting leave to amend should specify in what particular the amendment is to be made,[88] and should not be too broad. An amendment made under an order that is too broad in its terms may be stricken out,[89] and the order should be adjusted with reference to the several interests of the parties,[90] and made in the presence of,[91] or service on the opposite party directed.[92] It has been held that an order allowing an amendment should have annexed to it a copy of the amended Orders too broad in their terms.— Orders allowing a party to "amend his pleading as he may be advised" (New v. Aland, 62 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 185; Gaylord v. Beardsley, 19 N. Y. Suppl. 548), to amend by "alleging a cause of action against said defendant" (Schoonmaker v. Blass, 88 Hun (N. Y.) 179, 34 N. Y. Suppl. 424), or to "amend generally," have been held too broad. So an order to amend "in any way plaintiff deems proper" is too broad. Wood v. McGuire, 26 Misc. (N. Y.) 200, 55 N. Y. Suppl. 746.

pleading.[93] Failure to provide, in an order permitting an amendment, permission to defendant to answer an amended complaint is not error where permission is not requested.[94]

(B) Limitations in the Order as to Time of Amendment. Generally an order of the court granting permission to amend should limit the time within which the amendment should be made,[95] and the court may allow the amendment to be made, not immediately, but at some future time.[96] However, if the time be not limited, the court still has the power, by subsequent order, to prevent any improper delay.[97] Where time is given to amend the court has jurisdiction before the expiration of the time so given to grant successive orders extending the time.[98] An order extending the time of plaintiff to serve a reply to a counter-claim set up in the answer does not extend to amend the complaint.[99]

(C) Modification or Vacating of Order. A court may modify its order granting permission to amend, if circumstances arising later seem to demand it.[1] It has been held, however, that, whenever the time limited in the order has elapsed, the order becomes final and cannot be modified by any other judge extending such time.[2] And where a party obtains leave to amend upon condition that he pay costs, and makes a frivolous amendment, the court will not later modify its order in his favor.[3] If a judge impose unreasonable terms as a condition of granting leave to amend, his successor in office may be forced by a writ of mandamus to set aside the order and hear the motion on the merits.[4] If an order granting leave to amend is vacated the effect is to leave the pleading sought to be amended precisely as though no leave to amend had been granted.[5]

(D) Conformity of Amendment to Order.[6] The amendment must be in conformity with the order.[7] And averments going beyond the scope of the order may be stricken out.[8] When a part only of a pleading is demurred to and the party obtains leave to amend, unless the order specifically provides otherwise, he can amend only the part attacked by the demurrer.[9]

(V) Conditions on Granting Leave — (A) Discretion in Imposing Conditions. The trial court in allowing amendments of pleadings may impose such terms as seem, in the exercise of its sound discretion, to be just and reasonable,[10]

but this discretion must not be abused,[11] nor such terms imposed as would practically amount to a deprivation of the right secured by statute.[12] So the discretion of the court in fixing the terms upon which an amendment may be made includes the power, so long as it is not abused, to allow an amendment without imposing any terms;[13] but if a material amendment of a complaint is made on the suggestion of the court, reasonable terms should be imposed, although plaintiff deems it unnecessary and makes it only in deference to the opinion of the court.[14] The question of terms as a condition of leave to amend may be reserved until the cause is finally disposed of.[15]

(B) Submitting to a New Trial. Submission to a new trial may be a condition precedent to granting leave to amend. Permission to amend by increasing the amount of damages claimed to correspond with the amount of the verdict will usually be granted only on condition that plaintiff pay costs, relinquish the verdict, and consent to a new trial.[16] If a party defendant, relying on a variance

Provision of statute as to amendment on payment of costs held not applicable.—Where defendant filed a general demurrer to plaintiff's writ and declaration and the demurrer was sustained, and plaintiff moved to amend his writ, which was allowed, and defendant excepted to the allowance of the amendment, after which defendant filed a general demurrer to the declaration, which was overruled, defendant taking exception thereto, a statute providing that a plaintiff may amend on the payment of costs from the time of filing a demurrer does not apply until after the decision on defendant's exceptions by the law court. Hare v. Dean, 90 Me. 308, 38 Atl. 227, where it is said that in the contemplation of law plaintiff had not amended his writ and could not do so until the exceptions were overruled, and it had been finally decided that the proposed amendment was allowed.

final, and affords no subject for review,[22] whether it imposes, as a condition precedent to amendment, full costs to the time of making such amendment,[23] or part only,[24] or allows the amendment to be made without the payment of any costs whatever.[25] In some instances the court, to which the statute of amendments has left the whole question of costs, adopts rules, subjecting thereto its discretion,[26] and in such case the rules are generally adhered to;[27] but still, in any case, if the court finds its discretion seriously in conflict with the rules, its discretion must prevail, such being the statute;[28] and a departure from the rule, however well established, cannot be the subject of review.[29]

Increasing demand for damages to correspond with amount of verdict.— The rule in New York is that the supreme court has no power to allow an amendment after verdict by increasing the damages claimed to correspond with the amount of the verdict, except upon condition that plaintiff pay defendant's costs of the trial, relinquish the verdict, and consent to a new trial. An amendment rendering change of defense necessary is permitted only on payment of all costs up to the time of amendment. Chapman v. Webb, 6 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 390. See also Huntington v. Sheldon, 3 Day (Conn.) 497.

Amendment omitting parties.— The court in allowing an amendment of the complaint by towns and their commissioners, so as to rid it of the commissioners, held to have been improperly joined, should impose as a condition the payment by plaintiff towns of not only the taxable costs of the motion, but the accrued taxable costs in the action which have been adjudged against all the plaintiffs. Trial before referee.— Where on a trial before a referee he expresses the opinion that an amendment should be allowed to render certain evidence admissible and that application should be made to the special term for permission to amend, and the amendment is granted, plaintiff should, as a condition of being permitted to amend, be required to pay all the costs of the action before trial. tion to the character of the pleading, the costs imposed on the allowance of an amendment are always discretionary with the court,[33] depending on the circumstances of each case;[34] and it may be allowed, in a proper case, upon the payment of costs of opposing motion only.[35]

bb. After Reversal of Judgment in Favor of Plaintiff. The rule that, in allowing an amendment to the complaint which introduces a new cause of action or materially alters the scope of the action, costs will be imposed up to the time of such amendment, applies to cases where plaintiff is permitted to amend after a judgment in his favor has been reversed.[36]

(b) Striking Out Counts. Where the statute refers the terms of the amendment to the discretion of the court, the court may without costs allow an amendment of the complaint by striking therefrom counts or parts thereof.[37]

If the adverse party objects to a material variance at the first opportunity, an amendment to cure such variance will be allowed on the payment of all costs subsequent to the pleading upon which the issues were taken;[38] but if the case has been litigated throughout without any objection to the character of the pleading, an amendment to cure a material variance will be allowed on

But compare Dixon v. Risley, 114 Cal. 204, 46 Pac. 5, where it was held that where an appellate court directs the trial court to permit an amendment of the complaint the latter cannot impose as a condition of the amendment the payment of costs of the appeal with its accruing costs.

In New Jersey it is held that one of the usual terms on which an amendment introducing a new cause of action is allowed after trial and reversal on appeal is that the party desiring an amendment shall pay to his adversary the costs incurred in pointing out and establishing the error, and where there is uncertainty whether the reversal took place on that ground, but appears to have been one of the matters assigned for error and discussion, and counsel for the moving party candidly states his information that one member of the appellate court rested his decision on the application, leave to amend should be granted only on payment of costs. payment of costs only from and after the time the objection for variance is taken.[39] No costs will be allowed because of an amendment to cure an immaterial variance.[40]

(d) As of Course. Under a statute providing that any pleading may be once amended by the party of course, without costs and without prejudice to the proceedings already had, at any time before the period for answering expires, or at any time within twenty days after the service of the answer or demurrer thereto, a party may amend as of course within the time specified, notwithstanding a motion by his adversary in relation to such pleading within the period allowed for amendment.[41]

(e) Matter Inserted or Stricken Out by Court on Its Own Motion. Where the court of its own motion strikes matter out of an affidavit filed in a proceeding before a clerk no costs will be allowed the opposite party.[42]

(3) Amendment of Plea or Answer. An amendment of the answer which raises a substantially different issue,[43] or sets up a defense calculated to defeat the entire action,[44] should be permitted only on payment of the taxable costs to date. So too an amendment of the answer after trial and reversal on appeal which raises an issue substantially different from that litigated upon the trial should be permitted only on payment of the costs to the time of amendment.[45]

(4) Amendment of Formal Defects. Ordinarily an amendment to cure a defect in a mere matter of form is allowed on the payment of the costs of the motion;[46] but the allowance of such an amendment on payment of costs to date,[47]

Extra allowance.—It has been held that the court may require defendant to pay an extra allowance as a condition for granting leave to file a supplemental answer, where the motion for leave was not made until after the trial was concluded (Mabie v. Adams, 1 Month. L. Bul. (N. Y.) 65), but not where the motion was made before the trial was concluded (Jenkins v. Adams, 1 Month. L. Bul. (N. Y.) 65).

Where a demurrer to an amended answer was sustained and leave given to serve another amended answer, which was not acted on, and defendant afterward moved to be allowed to serve a second amended answer just as the cause was to be brought to trial, it was held that the motion should not have been granted, except on condition of the payment of the taxable term fees, and the filing and service of an affidavit of merits. or without imposing any costs whatever,[48] has been held to be discretionary with the court.

(5) Amendment by Agreement of Counsel. If there was an agreement between counsel in the court below to amend, the appellate court will grant leave to amend without costs.[49]

(6) Waiver of Objection. The decision of the court, at the trial, imposing certain costs, as a condition of granting leave to amend, will be deemed to be acquiesced in, unless exception is then and there taken.[50]

(7) Effect of Offer to Pay Costs as Condition of Amendment. If the proposed amendment is proper, an offer to pay costs, made before moving to amend and to avoid the necessity thereof, is proper to be considered on the question of costs to be imposed as a condition of amendment.[51] Thus, where plaintiff offers to allow the costs to which defendant is entitled, before moving to amend his declaration by adding a special count, defendant will not be allowed costs if he resists the motion.[52] So too, where an objection to an answer filed is a purely technical one, and before motion costs have been offered by the party desiring to amend, and declined, no costs of motion will be allowed.[53]

(8) Non-Compliance With Order to Amend. Non-compliance with an order to amend the complaint does not justify the court in imposing payment of all the costs on plaintiff, without dismissing the case or doing anything else.[54]

(9) Right of Successful Party to Tax Costs Paid as Condition of Amendment. The party eventually successful in an action, who has paid costs as a condition to the allowance of an amendment by him, is not entitled to tax against the adverse party the amount so paid;[55] and where the unsuccessful party pays costs as a condition of making an amendment, such costs cannot again be taxed against him on final judgment.[56]

The theory on which the cases in the New York supreme court are decided is that the order granting the favor on payment of costs constitutes an adjudication that the costs mentioned therein belong to the party to whom they are directed to be paid, and cannot again be taxed by either party to the action (Woolsey v. Ellenville, 84 Hun (N. Y.) 234, 32 N. Y. Suppl. 546; Seneca Nation v. Hawley, 32 Hun (N. Y.) 288), but the Connecticut cases are decided on the theory that it would be inconsistent on general principles to allow a party to recover costs for the period during which he has been in fault, and has been required to pay costs, by way of damages, for being in fault (Richardson v. Hine, 43 Conn. 201).

(E) Miscellaneous Conditions Imposed. The court may require, as a condition, the payment of a definite sum to the other party, to cover costs, expenses incidental to a continuance, etc.[57] Before permitting a plaintiff to amend his complaint so as to conform to the evidence, the court may very properly require that defendant be permitted to serve nunc pro tunc an offer of judgment which was technically defective as originally served.[58] Where a defendant asks leave to amend so as to allege that his agent did not have authority to make the contract sued on, it is proper to require, as a condition to granting leave, that the agent be produced for examination.[59] Where a party applies for leave to amend so as to set up usury, he may be required, as a condition to granting leave, to pay into court the unpaid principal with interest at the legal rate.[60] Leave to amend by setting up additional items of account may be granted on condition that a previous offer to allow judgment in a certain sum be increased to correspond with the increased demand.[61] In New York the special term in allowing amendment of the complaint may provide that service of the amendment shall be without prejudice to the position of the case on the general trial term calendar of the court.[62] Where at the conclusion of the evidence defendant asks leave to amend to conform pleadings to proof, and the court takes the application under advisement until final determination of the case and then permits the amendment, it is proper to impose the condition that the allegations of the amendment be considered denied without the filing of any formal pleadings by the opposite party.[63] It is unreasonable to impose as a condition, where the proposed amendment does not change the cause of action, that defendant be allowed to plead the statute of limitations as though the action were commenced at the time application was made for the permission to amend.[64]

(F) Right to Complain of Conditions Imposed. Where a party accepts the permission of the court to amend and complies with the conditions imposed he cannot afterward be heard to complain thereof.[65] If a party has a right to complain and considers himself aggrieved by the costs imposed as a condition of leave to amend, he cannot appeal from the condition alone, but must appeal from the entire order.[66] If a party fails upon the trial and so becomes liable for all the costs by defendant for leave to withdraw a juror and amend his answer contemplates only a compensation to plaintiff, to be measured by the taxable costs, and plaintiff, if finally successful, is still entitled to tax costs of the trial, but that the court which awards the costs in each case is at liberty to construe its own order and to say what is embraced in the award, and its construction thereof disallowing taxation of the trial fee will not be disturbed.

Payment of sum of money equivalent to costs has condition.— If the court, in allowing the amendment, imposes as a compensation to the adverse party the payment of a sum of money equivalent to the taxable costs to date, without designating it as such, it seems that such costs may be taxed by the adverse party as general costs of the action, and that such a course is not subject to the objection that there is a double taxation of the same costs. (VI) Compliance With Conditions Imposed — (A) Payment of Costs — (1) In General. Whenever leave is given to amend on payment of costs, the rule in England [68] and Canada [69] is that the payment of such costs is a condition precedent to amendment. In the United States, however, the rule prevails that when leave is given to amend on payment of costs, payment is not a condition precedent to amendment,[70] unless so specially expressed in the order.[71]

(2) Electing to Proceed Without Accepting Leave. A party given leave to amend on condition of the payment of costs may elect to proceed, without accepting the leave, with the burden of the condition;[72] and, in such case, the court will not order him to pay the costs imposed.[73] But after a party has made his election to proceed without accepting the leave, it is within the discretion of the court to require him to abide by it.[74]

(B) Amendment Within Prescribed Time. If leave to amend be granted on condition that the amendment be filed before a certain time, failure to comply with the condition, if no exception be taken, is merely an irregularity which will not be considered on appeal.[75] But where an order granting leave to amend specifies that the amendment shall be filed and the taxable costs paid within a certain time, and that, upon failure to comply with the conditions, a judgment shall be entered in favor of the opposite party, a judgment so entered will be sustained.[76] If a party is ordered to amend before the first day of the next term, he may amend any time before the cause is called for trial,[77] but not at the trial except by special leave of court.[78] Where a party fails to amend within a reasonable time the order granting leave may be set aside.[79] It has been held that failure to amend within the prescribed time is an irregularity which can be reviewed only by a motion to set aside the judgment and an appeal from the order overruling the motion.[80]

f. Necessity For Actual Amendment. The rule is well settled that mere leave to amend does not of itself operate as an amendment [81] or raise any presumption that an amendment was made.[82] The reason for this is obvious. A party may have leave to amend and yet not choose to avail himself of it. He is in no wise obliged to exercise the privilege given and make the amendment.[83] So far the decisions are in accord but are not entirely harmonious as to whether and under what circumstances the failure to actually file an amendment may be obviated. In some jurisdictions if the amendment is of a substantial character, an actual amendment is always held necessary, and the fact that the case is tried on the theory that the amendment was made, or that the nature of the proposed amendment and leave to make it appears from the record, does not obviate the necessity for making the amendment and authorize a reviewing court to consider it as having been made.[84] The rule of these decisions is, however, opposed to the weight of authority. While it is very generally conceded that proper practice requires that amendments should actually be made, it is nevertheless held in a large number of decisions that if leave to amend is given, and the cause is tried as though the amendment had been made, the necessity for making it is thereby obviated.[85]

Applications of rule.— Where a plea in

The course is to consider the order as standing for the amendment itself.[86] And where an amendment is ordered or permitted, and is of such a nature that the record furnishes upon its face all the data for applying it, it may be considered as made, although no verbal changes are made in the pleadings, which are then to be read as if they had been actually amended.[87] But where there is nothing in the record from which it can be inferred that an amendment was allowed and made,[88] or in what way the pleading should be amended,[89] no amendment can be inferred. And where, at the close of the trial, the court asks a party if he desires to amend so as to make his pleading conform to the proof, and he declines to do so, he cannot later treat the announcement of the court that it would of its own motion make the necessary amendments, as an amendment in fact.[90]

g. Mode of Making Amendments — (1) In General. There are three ways of amending pleadings subject to the discretion of the court: (1) By interlineation; (2) by writing the amendment, and the amendment only, on a separate piece of paper and referring to the original; and (3) by rewriting the original, and incorporating the amendment in it.[91] Pleadings cannot be amended orally.[92] An amendment should show the date of the original pleading.[93] A statement in the abatement is confessed and leave given to plaintiff to amend, such amendment should regularly be made, but if it is not made, and defendant proceeds with the cause he will be deemed to have waived it. Carter v. Fischer, 127 Ala. 52, 28 So. 376. Where, during the pendency of a suit, leave is obtained to amend the writ and change the form of action, although such amendment be not made on the record, if the suit be tried in its amended form, the reviewing court will consider the amendment as having been actually made. Ufford v. Lucas, 9 N. C. 214. Where the case is tried as if the amendment is made the omission to file an amended declaration inserting the name of plaintiff's wife was not sufficient cause for arrest of judgment. Lyon v. Brown, 6 Baxt. (Tenn.) 64. Where the court makes an order directing that the complaint be amended by inserting defendant's true name, the order itself is a sufficient amendment. It would have been more regular to have made the amendment in the complaint but the error, if any, is immaterial. Hoffman v. Keeton, 132 Cal. 195, 64 Pac. 264. If a plaintiff has had leave to amend his writ by striking out the name of one of defendants, and thereupon discontinued as to him and proceeded to trial against the other alone, without actually amending his declaration, this mode of proceeding, if acquiesced in at the time, furnishes no reason for granting a new trial, after a verdict against the remaining defendant. Hawkes v. Davenport, 5 Allen (Mass.) 390. Where a party, when certain testimony is objected to, asks leave to amend a pleading to conform to the facts as stated by his witnesses, and the court reserves its ruling but admits the testimony, and decides the point as if the amendment had been allowed, the appellate court will assume that the amendment was in fact allowed and made. Lazelle v. Miller, 40 Oreg. 549, 67 Pac. 307. If the court allows an amendment, suggesting that the trial proceed and the amendment be filed afterward, no objection to this course being made, it is too late, on exceptions, to object that the amendment was not filed until after verdict. Horne v. Meakin, 115 Mass. 326; Eaton v. Case, 17 R. I. 429, 22 Atl. 943. Where, after the arguments to the jury had been concluded, counsel asked leave to file an amendment to conform his pleadings to the proofs, and the amendment went into the hands of the judge without being filed, and he instructed in accordance therewith, and counsel for defendant knew of it, and knew the purport, and in substance agreed that it might be considered as filed, it was held that defendant could not after verdict, in a motion for a new trial, object for the first time to the amendment. complaint that the account sued on was verified need not be repeated when the complaint is amended.[94]

(II) By Interlineation. Where amendment by interlineation is prohibited by statute, leave to so amend is properly refused.[95] But it has been held that notwithstanding a statutory requirement that the pleading sought to be amended shall be rewritten, the question whether a particular amendment may be made by interlineation rests largely within the discretion of the court; and that the fact that the amendment was made by interlineation instead of by filing a new petition is not ground for reversal.[96] If authorized by statute,[97] or not prohibited by statute,[98] the court may in its discretion permit amendments by interlineation, especially where the amendment is of a trivial or formal character.[99] Amending by interlineation to obviate a technical objection is proper even though the pleading has been verified.[1] And it has been held that, even though the amendment is of a material defect, the failure to require a new verification is not reversible error.[2]

(III) By Filing Separate Paper. Although looked upon with disfavor by the courts, the practice prevails quite generally of making amendments by reference to and adoption of specified portions of previous pleadings, and by adding thereto new averments so as to constitute another and separate pleading.[3] An amendment made on a separate paper need not be physically attached to the original pleading if placed among the files.[4] A pleading may be incorporated in an amendment by reference even though it has been stricken from the files.[5] But an amendment which does not indicate in what part of the pleading it is to be inserted must be disregarded, as it is for the party and not for the court to present the case.[6]

(IV) By Rewriting Pleading so as to Embody Amendment. The best method of making an amendment which adds new averments to a pleading is to entirely rewrite the pleading with the proper additions,[7] and the original

pleading should either be withdrawn or so dated and arranged as to avoid confusion.[8]

h. Notice of Amendment — (I) When Notice Necessary — (A) In General. Whatever practice is followed in making a material amendment, it is generally necessary, particularly when the amendment is made of course and without leave of court, that notice of the amendment be given to the opposite party,[9] and especially if such party is in default,[10] or if the amendment substantially changes the cause of action or the nature of the judgment sought.[11] Under statutes providing that the time which an adverse party is allowed in which to do an act shall be doubled if service is made through the post-office, and that a pleading may be once amended as of course at any time before the period for answering it expires, it has been held that the time within which an amended answer may be served is not doubled if the original answer was served by mail.[12]

(B) Effect of Failure to Give Notice. If an amendment presents a new cause of action against the same or other defendants, and no notice thereof is given, a judgment based on the matter contained in the amendment is void.[13] But under some circumstances it has been held that the failure to give notice of an amendment, especially where the opposite party is not injured thereby, is but an irregularity such as will not render the judgment void.[14]

(II) When Notice Unnecessary. Usually notice is not necessary where the amendment is made in open court in the presence of the parties,[15] where the defect is cured by verdict and the amendment is made merely to render the record consistent and perfect,[16] or where the amendment alleges nothing not already sufficiently stated in the original pleading.[17] And if the amendment be made before any service is had on defendant, the summons may require him to appear and answer the complaint filed without referring to it as an amended complaint.[18] So notice may be waived by the opposite party appearing and moving to strike out the proposed amendment,[19] or moving for a continuance.[20] In Illinois the practice is settled, although not always regarded with favor by the courts, that parties to a suit are bound to take notice of amendments, and no actual notice is required.[21]

7. Amendments Causing Surprise.[22] No party should be called into court prepared to try one issue and then be required to try another, of which he then for the first time has notice; but if an amendment, in other respects proper, does not surprise the adverse party, it may be properly allowed.[23] Whether an amendment will cause surprise or not depends largely upon circumstances.[24]

8. Amendment Setting up Cause of Action Where None Existed Before or Introducing Facts Occurring After Action Commenced. It is a fundamental principle that all pleadings in a suit must primarily relate to the time when the action was commenced and must be based on facts and causes of action as they existed

For example, in an action to foreclose a vendor's lien, defendant is not entitled to service of an amendment giving merely a better description of the land on which the lien is sought to be foreclosed. McConnell v. Foscue, (Tex. Civ. App. 1894) 24 S. W. 964.

21. After the original summons is served and answered a party is presumed to be before the court for all purposes. Consequently he must take notice from the files in the case of an amendment. In Niehoff v. People, 66 Ill. App. 669, the appellate court comments unfavorably on the practice, but on appeal the supreme court, while affirming the decision, takes occasion to justify the practice. Amendments not causing surprise.— The correction of a misdescription of property (Smith v. Flack, 95 Ind. 116; Ferguson v. Ramsey, 41 Ind. 511), or the making of a description more definite (Stacy v. Bryant, 73 Wis. 14, 40 N. W. 632), has been held to create no surprise. So it has been held that a party cannot object on the ground of surprise to an amendment changing an action for use and occupation to one for breach of covenant (Bedford v. Terhune, 30 N. Y. 453, 86 Am. Dec. 394), nor to an amendment changing the allegation of a reasonable sum, as the consideration for a contract to a fixed and definite sum (Cleaves v. Lord, 3 Gray (Mass.) 66). And obviously a party cannot object to an amendment, because of surprise, when the pleadings alleged that a certain sum was due and the proof showed that it was in reality a much less sum (Sogge v. Schwartz, 116 Mich. 635, 74 N. W. 1000). When an injury is alleged to have been committed no surprise is occasioned by an amendment changing the date so as to conform to the proof. Sinclair v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 70 Mo. App. 588. An amendment conforming an allegation that a note was given by a firm to evidence showing that it was given by an assignee of the firm cannot be objected to on the ground of surprise. Williston v. Camp, 9 Mont. 88, 22 Pac. 501. In like manner a declaration that plaintiff was injured by being struck and cast on the ground by a truck which resulted in the fracture of a leg may be amended at the close of the evidence, so as to allege that the wheel of the truck ran over the leg causing the fracture, since such an averment does not operate as a surprise. Foley v. Riverside Storage, etc., Co., 85 Mich. 7, 48 N. W. 154. In an action for fraud an amendment alleging a specific false representation shown by the evidence is not objectionable on the ground of surprise. Rathbun v. Parker, 113 Mich. 594, 72 N. W. 31, but see dissenting opinion by Grant, J. Plaintiff cannot be surprised by an amendment at the trial of the separate answer of a defendant, so as to deny allegations of the then.[25] And as a general rule an amendment cannot allege facts that have arisen since the commencement of the action so as to set up a cause of action, where none before existed,[26] or so as to set up a new cause of action which has accrued since the action was begun,[27] or additional grounds of action.[28] And while ordinarily a supplemental pleading is the most appropriate means of introducing into a case matters which have occurred since the original pleading was filed,[29] in some jurisdictions an exception to this rule exists to the extent, that, where a cause of action existed at the commencement of the action, an amendment may be allowed setting up matters occurring subsequent to the commencement of the action, which have a direct bearing upon the matters in controversy, and do not change the substance of the original complaint; [30] and in at least one jurisdiction an amendment may set up any new matter which does not state a new cause of action inconsistent with that alleged in the original pleading.[31] It has been held that where, in the progress of a suit, new parties are admitted as defendants, it is incumbent on plaintiff to amend his complaint by inserting therein the names of such parties and by making proper averments concerning them.[32] But an order allowing plaintiff to amend so as to bring in new parties does not authorize an amendment so as to include additional grounds of action arising after commencement of the suit.[33]

9. Amendments Introducing Newly Discovered Matter. There is a wide complaint, when such allegations have already been put in issue by the answer of another defendant. Hoffman v. Susemihl, 15 N. Y. App. Div. 405, 44 N. Y. Suppl. 52. difference between facts not occurring until after the action is commenced and matters existing, but not discovered until after the commencement of such action.[34] In the latter case it is usually within the discretion of the court to allow an amendment.[35] The amendment is properly refused, however, where the slightest diligence would have disclosed to the party at the outset the facts which he seeks to set up by amendment,[36] or where he fails to comply with a statutory requirement that an affidavit be filed stating that at the time of filing the original pleading he did not have notice or knowledge of the facts which the amendment seeks to set up,[37] and if the facts alleged in the proposed amendment were not discovered since the original pleading was filed, but were, in fact known at that time, the court may in the exercise of a sound discretion reject the amendment.[38]

10. Time For Amendment[39] — a. In General. The purpose of this chapter is to state only those principles relating to the time of amendment, which are of the most general application. So far as possible, the question of time is considered in relation to the particular kind of amendment sought. This method of treatment is rendered almost indispensable by the fact that the character of the amendment is so frequently of controlling force in determining whether timely application has been made therefor.[40] Within the range of sound judicial discretion, an amendment may be allowed in furtherance of justice, either before the trial or at the trial, or after the trial and before final judgment,[41] and in many jurisdictions the power

Facts showing laches sufficient to authorize refusal.—Amendments have been refused when the application for leave was filed eight years after the commencement of the suit (Wolverton v. Taylor, 157 Ill. 485, 42 N. E. 49), nine years after judgment (North v. Webster, 36 Minn. 99, 30 N. See also Rice v. Ege, supra), two years after verdict for defendant (Blanchet v. Davis, 10 Tex. 158), to conform to proof two years after the proof was taken (Egert v. Wicker, 10 How. Pr. (N. On the other hand amendments have been allowed after a cause had been twice noticed for trial (Jackson v. Tuttle, 6 Cow. (N. Y.) 590), in the supreme court nine years after the commencement of the action, the statute of limitations having meantime run (Miller v. Watson, 6 Wend. (N. the facts on which the proposed amendment is based must have been known to the pleader at the time he filed his original pleading.[47] And a party may properly be denied permission to amend, where the necessity of the amendment was pointed out by the appellate court after a former trial but no attempt was made to amend until the cause again came to trial.[48] Courts as a rule will not allow an amendment setting up a new ground of recovery after the statute of limitations has run.[49] An amendment may be refused on the ground of laches where in addition to the delay it appears that the right to recover rests on a ground highly technical and not meritorious,[50] or where the amendment is diametrically opposed to the original pleading;[51] but defendant cannot charge plaintiff with inexcusable delay in moving to amend when defendant himself in part occasioned such delay,[52] or where he consented to the filing of the amendment out of time.[53] And if a party applies for leave to amend as soon as the insufficiency of his pleading appears, he is not guilty of laches.[54] A party cannot justify his laches on the ground that the proposed amendment is no surprise to the opposing party; for the latter is justified in believing where no amendment is filed within a reasonable time that his opponent means to stand on his original pleading.[55] The general rule that amendments will not be allowed where the party seeking to amend has been guilty of laches or delay is relaxed in case the party is a municipal corporation.[56]

d. After Motion For Change of Venue. The court may allow an amendment to be filed, pending a motion for a change of venue on the part of the opposite party. Until the motion is actually granted the court retains control over the case.[57]

e. After Plea or Demurrer Filed.[58] Subject to such conditions as the court may in its discretion impose, such as payment of costs and the like, a claim may

Reason for rule.— Public interests unfortunately are not as sedulously guarded or as thoroughly protected as those affecting individuals, and the most stringent rules of practice cannot for that reason be applied to the litigation involving them; more lenity is required concerning them, for the purpose of avoiding the improper enhancement of public burdens by the allowance of demands having no just foundation. be amended after plea in abatement or demurrer,[59] after plea in bar,[60] after an affidavit of defense is filed,[61] after exceptions to the petition have been overruled,[62] or pending action on such exception.[63] So a plea or answer may usually be amended after demurrer thereto.[64]

After a plea in abatement, a declaration cannot be amended by adding the name of another defendant against whom another suit has already been brought. Shute v. Davis, 2 Johns. Cas. (N. Y.) 336.

After third objection sustained.— Plaintiff demurred to the amended answer. His demurrer was overruled, and he then filed a reply, but at the trial objected to the introduction of any testimony under the answer. The objection was likewise overruled. After a new trial granted, he withdrew his reply by permission of the court and again demurred to the answer. This demurrer was sustained. Defendant was refused leave to amend his answer. It was held error to refuse leave after the answer had twice been held good. Leitz v. Rayner, 37 Kan. 470, 15 Pac. 571.

joinder in demurrer the court will not permit the filing of an amended plea or answer which does not go to the merits of the case.[70] After the pleadings are made up and a case is submitted on an agreed statement of facts, the pleadings may be amended to conform to such submission, but not so as to change its terms, or to meet the exigencies of the trial.[71]

i. After Announcement of Readiness For Trial. A statute providing that pleadings may be amended before the parties announce themselves ready for trial, but not thereafter, is directory merely,[72] and the court, after such announcement, may, in the exercise of sound discretion, refuse [73] or allow [74] an amendment. But, apart from the consideration that the statute is directory merely, its prohibition, if any, of amendment after the parties have announced themselves ready for trial must be understood only of an announcement of readiness for trial upon the issues of fact, and not upon the issues of law, which must first be disposed of.[75]

j. After Notice of Trial. The absolute right of a party to amend as of course within a given period is not cut off by the adverse party noticing the cause for trial.[76]

k. After Jury Sworn.[77] After the jury is sworn the court may permit amendments of purely formal defects [78] or amendments which do not change the substance of the issues.[79] Amendments will not be permitted, however, if the justice of the case be against the party asking the amendment,[80] and the refusal of an amendment after the jury is sworn is in any event harmless where the case is tried as if the amendment had been made.[81]

loath to permit amendments at the trial that will either make necessary a continuance [84] or injure the other party if compelled to proceed; [85] and the opposite party will be granted an opportunity to make a showing for a continuance, if surprised by an amendment allowed at the trial.[86] Courts have refused to allow amendments at the trial depriving a party of a right to a removal.[87] So an application to amend made during the trial is properly refused where the necessity for the amendment does not appear,[88] or when the averments of such amendment taken with the averments of the original pleading do not present a cause of action or defense.[89] And after a party has been fully advised early in the proceedings that his pleading is defective, the court does not abuse its discretion in refusing an amendment at the trial.[90] On the other hand, objections made for the first time at the trial that a petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action are not to be encouraged, and when the defect can be cured by an amendment the court should permit it to be made instanter and let the trial proceed.[91]

the issues may be allowed even after evidence has been introduced,[93] although an amendment offered after much evidence is introduced may be refused if no good reason is shown why it was not presented earlier.[94] In any case leave to file an amendment will not be granted after the case has been long at issue and testimony has been taken, when the proposed amendment presents matter that is immaterial.[95]

n. After Submission to a Referee.[96] The court may allow an amendment after the case has gone to a referee by adding an item of claim,[97] or by substantially increasing the claim.[98] Likewise an amendment to a plea which does not affect the vital question on which the defense is based may be allowed after commission issued.[99] But an amendment may, in the court's discretion, properly be refused at this stage.[1]

o. After Report of Master, Commissioners, Etc.[2] Amendments which do not change the issues may be made after a report of commissioners has been made.[3] But after auditors have reported an amendment will not be allowed introducing a new claim.[4]

p. After Close of Evidence or Argument of Counsel.[5] It is generally held to be within the discretion of the court to allow or refuse amendments after the evidence is heard or the arguments of counsel closed.[6] Perhaps one of the best illustrations of the propriety of amendments at this stage of the proceedings is an amendment to conform the pleading to the evidence introduced, when it con-

s. After Motion For Judgment. A motion for judgment is ordinarily regarded as in the nature of a demurrer, and pleadings may be amended after such a motion.[19]

t. After Motion For Dismissal or Nonsuit.[20] In harmony with the general rule that a motion to amend is always in season when it immediately follows an objection to the complaint or answer,[21] it is held that a motion to amend a complaint does not come too late because made after motion for a dismissal or nonsuit.[22] But as to whether a motion for leave to amend is in season, when not made immediately after the motion to dismiss or for a nonsuit, but subsequently there is some conflict of authority, it being generally held, however, that leave to amend will not be granted, if the motion is made after argument heard and concluded [23] or the court has announced its opinion.[24]

u. After Mistrial. Amendments are permissible after a mistrial. It does not alter the rights of the parties but leaves the case exactly as if no attempt to try it had been made.[25] cretion will not be disturbed on appeal.[27] But while amendments may be made after verdict in order to sustain it, they cannot be allowed for the purpose of overthrowing it.[28] An amendment will cure error, not create it.[29] In general an amendment that in no wise changes the issues,[30] or which would not have affected the verdict if made before trial,[31] is permissible. So an amendment may be allowed, after verdict, presenting an issue upon which both sides have introduced evidence;[32] but amendments after verdict, changing the issues so as to require a new trial, should be refused.[33] No amendment will be permitted presenting any issue not fairly contested at the trial and submitted to the jury under proper instructions,[34] or changing the nature of the claim.[35] And a party will not be allowed to amend his pleadings after verdict upon a point submitted and already fully covered by the original pleadings.[36] An amendment may be treated as made before verdict when permission to amend was given, although the amendment was in fact made after verdict.[37]

w. After Motion For New Trial or in Arrest of Judgment.[38] An amendment may be allowed after verdict and argument for a new trial;[39] where the allowance of such amendment does not prejudice the opposite party,[40] although an application for leave to amend after verdict and plaintiff's motion for a new trial overruled has been held too late.[41] It is not erroneous to permit an amendment after motion in arrest, by filing additional counts merely amplifying the averments of the original declaration.[42] But after arrest of judgment because of the insufficiency of the declaration, an amendment will not ordinarily be allowed.[43]

x. After Final Judgment [44] — (i) In General. In the absence of statutory authority express or implied amendments of the pleadings cannot be made after judgment.[45] But the power to amend after judgment is now very commonly provided for by statute.[46] This power it is said must be sparingly exercised,[47] and in any event an amendment will be allowed only for the purpose of sustaining the judgment, and not for the purpose of reversing it.[48] The allowance of amendments after judgment is always in the discretion of the court.[49] Whether or not the power to allow amendments will be exercised depends in a large measure on the character of the proposed amendment and the conduct of the party asking the amendment. If he has been guilty of laches, the application should be denied.[50] After final judgment an amendment setting up a new cause of action [51] or defense,[52] or substantially changing the nature of the action[53] or defense,[54] cannot be allowed. But amendments after judgment to conform the pleadings to the proof are permissible,[55] and so are amendments allowing additional counts upon the same cause of action[56] or adding or striking out the names of parties.[57] A party may be allowed to amend his complaint after default by defendant and a hearing in damages to the court,[58] defendant being given leave to plead anew and offer further evidence. And after judgment entered, the trial court may at the same term vacate the judgment and permit plaintiff to amend.[59] The allowance of a trial amendment after judgment is proper where the order was made before the trial.[60]

(II) After Judgment of Dismissal or Nonsuit. No amendment of the pleadings will be permitted after entry of judgment of dismissal or nonsuit,[61] especially where the motion is made after adjournment of the term at which judgment of dismissal was rendered.[62] And the better opinion seems to be that no amendment is permissible after judgment of dismissal or nonsuit has been pronounced,[63] although there are decisions holding that amendment is permissible at any time before the judgment is actually entered.[64]

y. After One or More Trials. It is within the discretion of the court to refuse an amendment after one or more trials have been had,[65] but even after several trials have been had the court may permit an amendment, there being nothing to show that the opposite party has been misled or that the amendment seeks to introduce a new cause of action.[66]

z. At Subsequent Term. Formerly all amendments were required to be made at the term when the error occurred;[67] but now the fact that a motion for an amendment is applied for at a subsequent term does not of itself prevent the allowance of an amendment,[68] although it has been held an abuse of discretion to allow an amendment several terms after the commencement of the action, where there were other reasons for refusal.[69]

the facts stated show that plaintiff has no cause of action,[77] allowable amendments being those which simply make perfect a cause of action which is imperfectly set forth in the pleading.[78] In some jurisdictions, however, it is held that, although the original pleading does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, an amendment curing defective or insufficient allegations is allowable,[79] at least where there is no claim of surprise nor showing that defendant will in any wise be prejudiced by the amendment.[80]

(B) Effect of Statute of Limitations.[81] The statute of limitations presents no impediment to an amendment to a declaration or complaint which merely enlarges and presents fully the case and cause of action which was undertaken to be stated in the original pleading.[82] In fact, in some jurisdictions it is regarded as a strong reason for allowing an amendment to perfect the statement of the cause of action, that plaintiff is barred by the statute of limitations from commencing another action on the cause of action defectively stated in the original pleading.[83]

Wisconsin.— K—— v. H——, 20 Wis. 239, 91 Am. Dec. 397.

United States.— Coker v. Monaghan Mills, 119 Fed. 706.

A statement of a defective cause of action cannot be cured by amendment. Mizzell v. Ruffin, 118 N. C. 69, 23 S. E. 927.

Unless, as it stands, the complaint sets forth a full and complete cause of action, no amendment is allowable. Ellison v. Georgia R. Co., 87 Ga. 691, 13 S. E. 809.

Amendment after trial.— Under a code provision authorizing an amendment of a pleading to conform to the facts proved, "where the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense," the court is not authorized to allow an amendment or complaint after trial so as to state a cause of action, where none was stated in the original pleading. Wisconsin.— Shieffelin v. Whipple, 10 Wis. 61.

At any time during the progress of the cause, such an amendment is allowable. Thouvenin v. Lea, 26 Tex. 612.

An amendment alleging the non-residence of defendant, in order to avoid the plea of the statute of limitations, adds no new cause of action, and is allowable. Hardee v. Lovett, 83 Ga. 203, 9 S. E. 680.

Charging administrator personally.— In an action against an administrator, a declaration counting on the intestate's promise, to which the statute of limitations is pleaded, may be amended by adding a count alleging a promise by the administrator. Saltar v. Saltar, 6 N. J. L. 405.

An amendment changing the name of a party plaintiff does not substantially change the claim so as to make the statute of limitations available as a bar to the allowance of the amendment. Hucklebridge v. Atchison, etc., R. Co., 66 Kan. 443, 71 Pac. 814.

Amendment averring new promise.— Where the complaint shows a cause of action on a promissory note, and defendant pleads the statute of limitations, the court will allow plaintiff to amend his complaint by alleging a new promise by defendant, so as to prevent the operation of the statute. Beard v. Simmons, 9 Ga. 4.

(II) Adding Counts For Same Cause of Action. It is uniformly held to be within the discretion of the court to allow plaintiff to amend his complaint by adding other counts for the same cause of action; [84] and this may be done after the evidence is closed,[85] after verdict,[86] or after verdict and judgment in plaintiff's favor on one count, plaintiff taking a general verdict on all the counts.[87]

(III) Introduction of New or Different Cause of Action — (A) Power of Court to Allow — (1) At Common Law. At common law the courts had no power to allow an amendment to an existing pleading, introductive of a new and distinct cause of action.[88]

(2) Under Codes and Practice Acts — (a) In General. In a majority of the states the courts have established the doctrine that the powers conferred upon them, under their codes and practice acts, in respect to amendments which

In this connection see Rowell v. Moeller, 91 Hun (N. Y.) 421, 36 N. Y. Suppl. 223; Eighmie v. Taylor, 39 Hun (N. Y.) 366, where it is said that the court having power on motion at special term to allow an amendment introducing a new cause of action, it is a strong reason for allowing such an amendment that the new cause of action thereby sought to be introduced is barred by the statute of limitations.

An additional count which contains a mere restatement of the cause of action set up in the original pleading is allowable. Swift v. Madden, 165 Ill. 41, 45 N. E. 979.

Common counts may be added to a special count in assumpsit, when not intended to introduce a new cause of action, but merely as declaring on the cause of action declared on in the special count (Mahan v. Smitherman, 71 Ala. 563), and vice versa (Owensboro Wagon Co. v. Hall, 149 Ala. 210, 43 So. 71).

A general count, which is consistent with the original declaration, may be added by way of amendment, if the court is satisfied that plaintiff will offer in evidence under it only some matter for the recovery of which the action was originally brought. And this may be secured by requiring plaintiff to file a specification at the time of the allowance of the amendment. Perley v. Brown, 12 N. H. 493.

The original counts may be stricken out and others inserted, if the cause of action be the same, and the form of action can be retained. McVicker v. Beedy, 31 Me. 314, 50 Am. Dec. 666.

Adding count substantially different.— Plaintiff cannot introduce an entirely new cause of action, but, provided he adheres to the original cause of action, he may add a new count substantially different from that contained in the original pleading. New York.— Woodruff v. Dickie, 31 How. Pr. 164. But see Ford v. Ford, 53 Barb. 525, holding that, independently of the code, the court has the power on motion at special term, at any time before verdict, to allow an amendment to the complaint by the insertion of a new cause of action, but that the power of the court to allow such an amendment during the trial of the cause did not exist before the code, nor does it seem to have been conferred thereby.

See 39 Cent. Dig. tit. "Pleading," § 686.

In California the rule is that the introduction of a wholly different cause of action is not allowable by way of amendment. Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 64 Pac. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53. And it is held that the rule is not violated by an amendment which does not materially change the cause of action (Lonvall v. Gridley, 70 Cal. 510, 11 Pac. 777), or state an essentially different cause of action (Bogart v. Crosby, 91 Cal. 278, 27 Pac. 693); nor is it violated by an amendment introducing new matter not entirely foreign to the complaint (Nevada County, etc., Canal Co. v. Kidd, 28 Cal. 673).

In Texas, while the general rule is that an amendment which introduces a new and distinct cause of action is not allowable (Williams v. Randon, 10 Tex. 74), yet such amendments are allowable under particular circumstances, and under proper limitations (Williams v. Randon, supra; Mitchell v. Lytle, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 702). Thus if not prejudicial to the adverse party, an amendment not relating back to the commencement of the suit, but confined to the time of filing the amendment, will be allowed on payment of all costs up to the time of amendment. Williams v. Randon, supra, disallowing, however, an amendment asked for on the ground that on its face it introduced a new and distinct cause of action barred by the statute of limitations.

The amendments prescribed by the Pennsylvania statute are not discretionary, but mandatory, and therefore subjects of writ of error (Newlin v. Palmer, 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 98); but these amendments are not to be permitted when they introduce a new cause of action (Tatham v. Ramey, 82 Pa. St. 130; Root v. O'Neil, 24 Pa. St. 326; Newlin v. Palmer, supra; Shock v. McChesney, 4 Yeates (Pa.) 507, 2 Am. Dec. 415; Good Roads Mach. Co. v. Old Lycoming Tp., 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 156; Kester v. Stokes, 1 Miles (Pa.) 67), especially when by reason of the statute of limitations it would work an injury to the adverse party (Trego v. Lewis, 58 Pa. St. 463).

In Canada the rule is that it is not of itself a sufficient ground for refusing a proposed amendment that it sets up a new cause of action, but the test is whether or not the adverse party would be placed in such a position that he could not be compensated by an allowance for costs or otherwise. Lee v. Gallagher, 15 Manitoba 677.

After trial.— After trial an amendment introductive of a new cause of action is not allowable. Cole v. Thompson, 134 Iowa 685, 112 N. W. 178. It is not error for the court to refuse leave after trial to amend by introducing a new cause of action, where it appears that the complaint was amended three times during the progress of the trial. Conrad v. Adler, 13 N. D. 199, 100 N. W. 722. An amendment filed without leave of court or notice to defendant and after submission of the cause, introducing a new and distinct cause of action, is filed too late to be considered for any purpose. Boardman v. Louis Drach Constr. Co., 123 Iowa 603, 99 N. W. 176; Sturman v. Sturman, 118 Iowa 620, 92 N. W. 886; Postmaster Gen. v. Ridgway, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,313, Gilp. 135.

After verdict.— It is too late to amend so as to cure a variance at the hearing of exceptions in the supreme court, where the

the power of the court, before trial, to allow plaintiff to insert in his complaint, by way of amendment, a new and distinct cause of action,[90] provided the result sought to be obtained is the same,[91] and the amendment does not affect the substantial purpose of the action; or provided the amendment is germane to the subject-matter in controversy,[92] or that the amendment does not substantially change plaintiff's claim,[93] or that the form of the action is not changed from one on contract to one sounding in tort, or from one at law to one in equity, or vice versa.[94] And, in direct conflict with the decisions of a great majority of the states which hold that courts cannot allow, during trial, an amendment introductive of a new and distinct cause of action,[95] or substantially changing plaintiff's claim,[96] amendment sets up a different cause of action. Cunningham v. Hobart, 7 Gray (Mass.) 423.

After judgment.— An amendment introducing a new cause of action (Bicklin v. Kendall, 72 Iowa 490, 34 N. W. 283. See also O'Connell v. Cotter, 44 Iowa 48; Smith v. New York, 37 N. Y. 518), or substantially changing the cause of action (Wymore First Nat. Bank v. Myers, 44 Nebr. 306, 62 N. W. 459; Scott v. Spenser, 44 Nebr. 93, 62 N. W. 312), will not be permitted after judgment. A statute permitting a party to amend his pleading at any time does not contemplate the allowance of an amendment after judgment, presenting a new cause of action. Bicklin v. Kendall, 72 Iowa 490, 34 N. W. 283. The mandatory amendments specified by the Pennsylvania statute are not to be permitted after judgment, when they introduce a new cause of action. Good Roads Mach. Co. v. Old Lycoming Tp., 25 Pa. Super. Ct. 156.

On appeal.— If an amendment substantially changing plaintiff's claim is one which the trial court had no authority to make, it may not on appeal be made by the appellate court nunc pro tunc. Storrs v. Flint, 46 N. Y. Super. Ct. 498.

In a proper case and upon good cause shown by affidavit, it is within the discretion of the court to allow before the trial an amendment introductive of a new cause of action. Shropshire v. Kennedy, 84 Ind. 111; Burr v. Mendenhall, 49 Ind. 496.

Before answer.— There is nothing in the federal statutes, nor in those of Wisconsin, which precludes the federal court sitting in that state from permitting an amendment of a complaint in an action at law before answer, to introduce an additional cause of action of the same nature and growing out of the same transaction, and which might have been joined with that stated in the original pleading; and such amendment will be allowed, where it will be in furtherance of justice, and tend to prevent a multiplicity of suits. especially if it could not have been joined with the original cause of action,[5] yet under the statute of amendments in force in some jurisdictions an additional count for a new cause of action may be allowed by amendment on timely application therefor, so long as the cause of action so brought in could have been united with the original cause of action.[6]

(d) New Cause of Action Barred by Limitations.[7] According to the overwhelming weight of authority an amendment introducing a new and distinct cause of action barred by the statute of limitations is not allowable.[8] But it has been held that where a proposed amendment to a complaint will have the effect of introducing a new cause of action barred by limitations, the purpose of the complaint as originally drawn and that of the amendment being, however, substantially the same, the court has power in its discretion to allow the amendment to be made.[9] It has been held also that the statute of limitations is not an obstacle to the allowance of an amendment setting up a new and distinct cause of action, where it appears that a defense of limitations would present considerations depriving it of all right to indulgence by the court.[10]

new and distinct ground of injury not before alleged in the declaration. Pearson v. Reid, 10 Ga. 580.

Within the meaning of the statute allowing amendments which do not change the ground of the action, an amendment of a declaration in an action for the breach of a covenant against encumbrances by which a new count is added, setting forth a new and distinct covenant, is not objectionable as changing the ground of the action. It is competent at common law to amend the declaration by a new count introductive of a new cause of action, provided such amendment correspond in character with the original count, is a kindred cause admitting the same pleading and defense, and might have been included within the declaration originally filed, especially where such cause is outlawed by the statute. (B) Under General Leave to Amend. It has been held that under a general leave to amend plaintiff may introduce in his complaint a new cause of action so long as it is kindred to that contained in the original pleading, and might have been joined therewith,[11] or so long as it does not change the action from one in tort to one on contract, or vice versa.[12]

(C) What Constitutes — (1) IN GENERAL. An amendment is not objectionable as introducing a new cause of action, where it merely varies the mode of stating the cause of action sued on;[13] states the same facts in a different legal aspect;[14] restates the grounds[15] or facts[16] relied on for recovery; strikes out redundant or irrelevant matter;[17] makes it clear that defendants named in the summons are the only parties referred to as defendants in the original complaint;[18] sets out copies of the assignment of the count sued on;[19] or indicates that the action is for the use of a third party.[20] But it is otherwise as regards an amendment changing from an action ex delicto to an action ex contractu, or vice versa;[21] from an action at law to one in equity, or vice versa;[22] from a common law to a statutory action, or vice versa;[23] from trover to trespass;[24] or from debt to assumpsit.[25] Likewise an amendment is considered as introductive of a new cause of action if it sets up a contract or instrument other than that set forth in the original pleading.[26]

(2) IN ACTIONS EX CONTRACTU. In actions ex contractu, so long as plaintiff adheres to the original instrument or contract on which the complaint is founded, an amendment is not objectionable as introductive of a new cause of action, where it merely alters the grounds of recovery on that instrument or contract;[27] or the modes in which defendant has violated it;[28] or where it merely enlarges and states more fully and accurately the facts with reference to the contract or instrument set forth in the original pleading,[29] or changes the alleged date of the contract,[30] the sum due thereunder,[31] or the time or manner of its performance;[32] or where it merely enlarges the averments of the original pleading as to the liability of a warrantor.[33] And again, so long as the matter for which the action was truly and substantially brought is not forsaken, but is adhered to and relied on for recovery, the introduction by way of amendment of a different contract in form is not regarded as introducing a new cause of action.[34] But it is uniformly held that an amendment introducing as a ground of action an instrument or contract other than that set forth in the original complaint is objectionable as introducing a new and distinct cause of action.[35]

Instances.— Where, in an action against the indorser of two promissory notes, it appeared on the trial that the notes sued on were not due, it was held that an amendment introducing five other and different notes was not allowable. Farmers', etc., Bank v. Israel, 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 293. So where a declaration was laid that defendant was indebted to plaintiff for subscription to a canal company, with interest, a new count was refused, which demanded the penalty of five per cent per month, under the act incorporating the company. Delaware, etc., Canal Co. v. Parker, 4 Yeates (Pa.) 363. So where plaintiff has counted for work and labor done, he cannot add a count setting up a claim for not being employed by plaintiff agreeably to a special agreement. Diehl v. McGlue, 2 Rawle (Pa.) 337. So where a declaration is based on contract for the purchase of goods which did not bind defendant to pay the freight, an amendment setting up a contract to pay the freight in addition to all that was sued for in the original petition introduces a new cause of

(3) In Actions Ex Delicto. In actions ex delicto the cause of action alleged in the original pleading must be adhered to and its identity preserved,[36] and hence a change, by way of amendment, from a cause of action based on negligence to a cause of action based on wilful tort,[37] or from a cause of action for slander to one for malicious prosecution,[38] or pleading a different liability on the part of defendant,[39] is an attempt to introduce a new and distinct cause of action and the amendment will not be allowed. But so long as the facts added by the amendment, however different they may be from those alleged in the original pleading, show substantially the same injury in respect to the same transaction, the amendment is not objectionable as setting up a new and distinct cause of action.[40] For example, an amendment curing defective or insufficient allegations,[41] by particularizing the more general allegations of the original pleading;[42] or more fully describing the nature of the negligence forming the basis of the action;[43] or alleging due care on the part of plaintiff at the time of the injury complained of;[44] or action, and is not allowable. Lamar v. Lamar, etc., Drug Co., 119 Ga. 850, 45 S. E. 671. So a declaration in an action on an account cannot be amended by declaring on a negotiable promissory note, given in settlement of the account, when the common-law rule that a note given for a debt is only a security for the debt, is not recognized, but the note is regarded as evidence of a new and different contract unless the contrary is made to appear. increasing [45] or diminishing [46] the claim for damages; or amplifying [47] or varying [48] the acts of negligence from which it is alleged the injuries resulted, or stating more fully the several results of such injury; [49] or making it clear that defendants named in the summons are the only parties referred to as defendants in the original pleading; [50] or striking from a complaint, the substance of which charges merely negligence, allegations tending to show a cause of action based on gross negligence.[51]

Same test differently stated.— The true criterion is, whether the alteration in the amendment is a new and distinct matter, or whether it is the same contract or injury, and a mere permission to alter it in a manner which plaintiff considers will best correspond with the nature of his complaint and with his proof and the merits of his case. But see Susquehanna Mut. F., etc., Ins. Co. v. Clinger, 10 Pa. Super. Ct. 92, holding that it does not follow that an amended pleading introduces a new cause of action because it alleges a contract in writing while the original pleading alleged a parol contract, and the test is whether the contract, for breach of which suit is brought, is the same, and not whether the evidence of the contract is the same.

(E) Question of Law For Court Whether Amendment Introduces New Cause of Action. The question whether a proposed amendment introduces a new cause of action, or whether the identity of the original cause of action is preserved by it, is one of law for the court,[61] to be determined by an inspection of the original and amended pleadings,[62] and without the aid of extrinsic evidence.[63]

b. Conditions Precedent. Where the statute prescribes some condition that must be fulfilled before the right to commence an action vests, compliance with such condition may be alleged in an amendment to the original complaint;[64] and it has been held that such amendment may be made even during a hearing in damages after default.[65]

c. Contracts — (I) In General. Material amendments in respect of the terms of a contract in suit may be made on timely application for permission to amend, if the opposite party is not surprised or misled thereby.[66]

See 39 Cent. Dig. tit. "Pleading," § 678½.

Illustrations.—An essential clause of a contract omitted from the allegations of the complaint may be supplied by amendment. Ex p. Sullivan, 106 Ala. 80, 17 So. 387. An amendment which seeks recovery of a debt on different evidence is properly allowed. Adams Oil Co. v. Christmas, 101 Ky. 564, 41 S. W. 545, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 760. A party suing on a sworn account may file an amended complaint on a note alleging that it was executed in consideration of the goods and merchandise forming the account originally sued on. Blum v. Mays, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 475. A complaint which sets forth, as a lien on certain premises, a judgment recovered in another suit may be amended by alleging that such judgment was properly docketed. Cady v. Allen, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 388 [affirmed in 18 N. Y. 573]. An amendment may be allowed showing the circumstances under which an individual note was taken in discharge of a partnership debt. Greenleaf v. Burbank, 13 N. H. 454. Where an individual note was given partly for a firm and partly for a private debt, counts may be added embracing answer.[67] An amendment will be permitted even after verdict if it be shown that a party will otherwise suffer irretrievable injury, such as loss of his debt under the statute of limitations.[68]

(III) Additional Terms. Additional stipulations of the agreement entered into between the parties may be added by amendment.[69]

(IV) Addition of Counts. So long as the cause of action remains the same, a count on a special contract may be substituted for, or added to, a declaration containing only the common counts, and vice versa.[70] And in case the original declaration implies, although it does not expressly allege, a special contract, an amendment at the trial setting up such contract is properly allowed, although probably not necessary.[71] However, an amendment introducing a count either common or special may be refused if it presents a new cause of action.[72] A party may amend so as to plead the same indebtedness in different counts in different ways,[73] or both a special and a common count may be added to a special declaration seeking to recover for the same cause of action.[74] A declaration containing only a count on an implied contract may be amended by adding a count on a special contract, the cause of action remaining the same;[75] or on the other hand, a count on an implied contract may be added to a declaration on an express contract.[76]

(V) Demand. An allegation of a promise to pay a certain sum when requested is amendable by alleging a demand upon the promisor before the suit.[77] An amendment alleging a waiver of demand and notice is permissible after the argument.[78]

(VI) Tender. An allegation that a certain sum was tendered in payment of a debt may be amended to show that the entire sum due was tendered,[79] or in only the debt which was due from the partnership. Barker v. Burgess, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 273.
