case plaintiff has failed to aver a necessary tender an amendment may allege facts showing a waiver of tender.[80]

(VII) Breach. In an action on a contract additional facts connected with the breach thereof or new breaches may be set forth in an amendment to the original complaint.[81] An assignment of a breach generally,[82] or in terms too large,[83] is amendable. So an alleged breach of a special condition may be stricken out so as to leave only the assignment of the breach general.[84] But in an action for breach of contract plaintiff cannot amend by abandoning the contract first alleged and setting up another and different one.[85]

(VIII) Performance. A complaint which is defective because it does not state that plaintiff has performed on his part the conditions of the contract sued on may be amended by inserting such allegations.[86] And a complaint alleging performance of a contract may be amended so as to allege performance in part and excuse the non-performance of the remainder.[87] But where work is performed under an entire contract it is error to permit an amendment designed to allow a recovery upon a quantum meruit.[88] An amendment alleging a waiver of performance at the time fixed by the contract is permissible.[89]

(IX) Varying Written Contract. A court will not allow an amendment designed to permit the introduction of parol testimony varying the terms of a written contract.[90] But in an action on a written contract an amendment may be allowed which is not variant from the terms of such contract.[91]

d. Defenses [92] — (i) In General. Courts are particularly liberal in allowing amendments of a plea or answer.[93] As a general rule greater liberality is shown in allowing amendments by defendant than by plaintiff, for the reason that, if plaintiff has misconceived the form or nature of his action, he may discontinue and bring a new action; but defendant must avail himself of his defenses in the action brought against him, and cannot establish his right thereafter if he fails in his defense.[94] Evidence of a defense not set up in the pleadings, if objected to, is not admissible without amendment.[95]

(ii) What Amendments Permitted — (a) In General. An answer or plea may be amended so as to set out more clearly the defense intended,[96] or to change the mode of stating the defense,[97] or to present matters omitted through oversight,[98] or to cure inconsistencies of averment,[99] or to abandon matters of defense previously pleaded;[1] and if an immaterial issue is tendered in a plea leave may be given to amend or replead.[2] In like manner a plea may be amended in regard to matters in connection with which exceptions have been overruled;[3] and the objection that an amended answer will admit proof of facts that will probably defeat plaintiff's claim is of no force against defendant's right to amend at the trial.[4] Amendments setting up matter admissible under the original pleading are properly refused,[5] so the court should not permit a defendant to alter his plea merely for the purpose of securing the conclusion in the argument [6] or the right both to open and close.[7] If the evidence supporting a new defense is contradictory and inconclusive, the court may properly refuse an amendment alleging such defense.[8] Likewise the court may refuse an amendment which seeks to introduce matters inconsistent with the defense already alleged,[9] especially where the amendment is also an averment of the impossible under the conditions disclosed by the pleadings,[10] and amendments which the court is satisfied are asked merely for purposes of delay are properly refused.[11]

(b) Amendment Denying Facts Admitted. As a general rule a party will not be allowed to file an amendment contradicting an admission made in his original pleadings.[12] If it be proper in any case, it must be upon very satisfactory evidence that the party has been deceived or misled, or that his pleading was put in under a clear mistake as to the facts.[13] Likewise a court may refuse an amendment contradicting the party's own testimony,[14] and an amended plea may be refused on the ground that it is in reality contradictory to what it purports to be.[15]

(c) Facts Known When Original Pleading Was Filed. The court will not ordinarily permit defendant to file an amended plea or answer when the matter of defense proposed by the amendment was known to defendant when he filed his original pleading and no valid excuse is given for not including it therein.[16] This is especially true where he gains some benefit from the omission and makes the omission by agreement with his adversary for the purpose of receiving such benefit.[17]

(holding that, where an answer admitted certain allegations of the complaint, but plaintiff, instead of relying upon such admissions, gave evidence in support of such allegations, and defendant thereupon gave evidence to the contrary, and in contradiction of the admissions in his answer, it was within the discretion of the trial court to permit the answer to be amended so as to conform to the proof); Strong v. Dwight, 11 Abb. S. 319 (holding that under the liberal rules of pleading introduced by the code, the court may allow a verified answer to be amended by striking out a material admission and substituting a denial, but that in such a case the original answer may be used as evidence on the trial, to be rebutted by defendant).

Excuse held insufficient.— In an action by stock-holders of a company to declare void an agreement canceling a lease from another company, the lessor company asserted in its original answer that the lease was canceled for non-payment of rent. About eighteen months thereafter it sought to amend by averring that it repudiated the lease on the ground of fraud in the making thereof. Its officers had knowledge, at the time of interposing the original answer, of the facts sought to be set up in the amendment. The excuse for failing to set up the facts in the original answer was that the officers did not, prior to the service of the original answer, realize their importance, and did not, until a few months before applying for leave to amend, communicate them to the counsel of the company, who was ignorant thereof. It was held that the court improperly allowed the amendment. Jacobs v. Mexican Sugar Refining Co., 115 N. Y. App. Div. 499, 101 N. Y. Suppl. 320.

(D) Dilatory Pleas. Dilatory pleas are regarded with disfavor and must be pleaded with exactness and diligence. The weight of authority is that a plea in abatement, in the absence of statutory authorization, cannot be amended,[18] and by some statutes amendment is expressly prohibited.[19] There is, however, statutory authority for amending pleas in abatement in some jurisdictions.[20]

(E) Changing Defense.[21] There is a conflict of authority in respect of the right at common law to amend an answer by changing the defense.[22] By express provision in many states, however, amendments of the answer which do not substantially change the defense may be permitted at any time;[23] and under some statutes the court may in its discretion permit amendments changing the defense before trial,[24] although a refusal to permit such amendment is not an abuse of discretion where the facts alleged must have been within defendant's knowledge at

Amendment held not to change defense substantially.— In an action against an officer to recover the value of property sold on execution against another than plaintiff, where the answer denied plaintiff's ownership, defendant was permitted, during the trial, and after plaintiff had proved a sale and transfer of the property to him from the execution defendant, to amend his answer by alleging that such transfer was fraudulent as to creditors of the seller. It was held that the allowance of such amendment was within the discretion of the court, under Hill Annot. the commencement of the suit,[25] or where the motion is made the day before the time set for a second trial.[26] In some jurisdictions no amendments at the trial changing the defense are permissible;[27] and in most jurisdictions where the question has been passed upon, it is held that such amendments at the trial may properly be refused;[28] and the doctrine applied in the case of amendments offered at the close of plaintiff's evidence,[29] or after the close of the evidence on both sides,[30] after submission of the case to the court,[31] to conform pleadings to proof,[32] or after verdict.[33] It should be noted, however, that in most of these decisions the power to permit such amendments was not denied, but the refusal thereof held a proper exercise of the court's discretion in the particular case.[34] And in one jurisdiction it has been expressly held that an answer changing entirely the defense may be amended after introduction of plaintiff's evidence; that allowing a new answer creating a new case to be filed at the trial is no ground of exception.[35] It is not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to refuse an amendment changing the defense offered on motion for new trial, where defendant had been permitted to amend twice during trial.[36] And an amendment substantially changing the nature of the defense will not be permitted after judgment.[37]

(F) Adding New Defenses. Whether an amendment will be allowed which adds a new defense to that already interposed depends largely upon the time at which it is offered,[38] and whether the granting of it will work an injustice to plaintiff,[39] the matter being within the discretion of the court to which the application

Counter-claim barred by limitations.— The permission to file such an amendment has in many instances been refused, usually on the ground that a party ought not, at a late date, after filing his original pleadings, to be allowed to introduce an affirmative claim.[54] A defendant will not usually be allowed to introduce a set-off or counter-claim by an amendment filed after the trial has commenced.[55] And leave to file an amendment introducing a counter-claim will be refused when defendant can as readily obtain relief in an independent action.[56] A counter-claim or plea of set-off filed originally may be amended like any other plea,[57] the application to file such amendment being addressed to the sound discretion of the court.[58]

(H) Notice of Special Defense. A notice of special matter under the general issue is, in all essentials, a pleading, and therefore amendable;[59] but it has been held that a notice of special matter cannot be amended after the jury is called,[60] or after the evidence is closed.[61]

e. Description of Property or Other Subject-Matter. An amendment may be allowed for the purpose of better describing a contract sued on,[62] or correcting the misdescription of such a contract;[63] and amendments of the description of property in suit are permissible so long as the identity of the subject-matter of the suit is not changed, or a new cause of action or new issues introduced.[64] If, fact that an amended answer, setting up a counter-claim, shows on its face that the counter-claim is barred by limitations, is no ground for rejecting the amendment, for unless the statute is pleaded the claim is recoverable. Dudley v. Stiles, 32 Wis. 371.

A limitation on the rule is that the code abolishes the distinction, existing at common law, between the actions of debt and assumpsit, and makes the judgment the same for causes of action recoverable in either form; consequently, an amendment of the complaint, which would convert the action from one form into the other, although unnecessary, is allowable. Knapp v. Kings-

ing the form of the action are within certain limitations regarded as permissible.[73]

(II) Changing One Form of Action Ex Contractu to Another. Except in jurisdictions where it is held that no amendments are permissible which change the form of the action,[74] it is very generally held that so long as the cause of action itself is not changed, it is permissible to change by amendment the form of action in an action ex contractu to a different form of action ex contractu.[75] Thus an action on implied contract may be changed to one on an express contract and vice versa.[76] Assumpsit may be changed to covenant [77] or debt,[78] or the form of action may be changed from covenant to assumpit,[79] or from debt to covenant.[80] So an action begun in assumpsit may be changed to account,[81] or an action on an open account to an account stated.[82] These amendments are permissible at any stage of the proceedings.[83] They may be allowed before trial,[84] after the evidence is closed,[85] or even after verdict,[86] in order to conform the pleadings to the proof.

(III) Changing One Form of Action Ex Delicto to Another. Except in jurisdictions where amendments changing the form of action are not permissible,[87] it is held that amendments changing the form of action in an action ex delicto to another form of action ex delicto are permissible, provided the cause of action itself is not changed.[88] Thus trespass may be changed to case and vice versa,[89] an action for possession to one for conversion,[90] an action for malicious prosecution to one for false imprisonment,[91] an action of forcible entry and detainer to ejectment,[92] and trespass may be changed to trover.[93] Amendments of this character may be made during the trial,[94] after close of the argument,[95] or even after verdict.[96]

(iv) Changing From Contract to Tort and Conversely. At common law, it was not permissible to change by amendment the form of action from ex contractu to ex delicto and vice versa, and this is still the rule in many jurisdictions, both common law or code in respect of methods of procedure.[97] Nor in these jurisdictions is it permissible to amend a declaration or complaint in tort by adding a count in contract, or vice versa.[98] In many jurisdictions, however, where the same transaction or state of facts is relied on in both the original and amended pleading, amendments are permissible which change the form of action from one on contract to one in tort and vice versa.[99] In furtherance of justice these amend-

A statutory action for treble damages for trespass cannot be changed by amendment into a common-law action for trover (Missouri Lumber, etc., Co. v. Zeitinger, 45 Mo. App. 114), nor can a common-law action for trespass be changed by amendment into a statutory action for trespass which permits treble damages (Holliday v. Jackson, 21 Mo. App. 660; Fairchild v. Dunbar Furnace Co., 128 Pa. St. 485, 18 Atl. 443, 444. See, however, Mitchell v. Chase, 87 Me. 172, 32 Atl. 867, in which a declaration in the common-law form in an action of trespass for injuries received by a dog was held amendable by adding an averment that the action was brought under the statute allowing double damages for such injuries, it appearing that the pleader had originally intended to institute an action under the statute.

Filing an amended petition by consent does not alter the operation of the rule as such consent covers only the right to file the amendment, but does not waive defenses thereto when filed. Union Pac. R. Co. v. Wyler, 158 U. S. 285, 15 S. Ct. 877, 39 L. ed. 983.

count, nor a common-law action by adding a statutory count.[15] And the fact that all matters required to be set out in an action under the statute appear in the common-law declaration does not alter the rule.[16] Where, however, a change in the cause of action is not deemed an objection to the allowance of an amendment, such an amendment may be made.[17] The question is merely one phase of the general question of the right to change a cause of action by amendment.[18]

(VII) MISCELLANEOUS. Under a statute authorizing amendments changing the form of the action, it has been held permissible to change by amendment, mandamus to trespass on the case.[19] In Louisiana it has been held that a possessory action may be changed by an amendment to a petitory action.[20]

g. Formal Defects — (I) IN GENERAL. Mere formal or technical defects may always be corrected by an amendment.[21] Such an amendment may be made during the progress of the trial,[22] after the trial,[23] or even after the overruling of a motion for a new trial.[24]

after the jury is sworn.[26] A motion for leave to amend an unsigned complaint is entitled to precedence over a motion to reject the pleading for want of a signature.[27]

(III) VERIFICATION. Failure to verify a pleading,[28] or an insufficient verification,[29] is an amendable defect that may be cured if seasonable application is made for leave to amend. Leave of court is necessary in such a case,[30] at least where the full time for filing the pleading sought to be verified has elapsed;[31] and such leave may be refused where the party has not shown proper diligence in making his application.[32] Such an amendment may be made on the trial,[33] at any time before judgment.[34]

i. Judgments, Actions on. Matters of description may be corrected after verdict. An erroneous description of the term of court at which a judgment was rendered may be thus corrected,[36] and an amendment praying for a larger remedy is permissible.[37] According to a number of decisions, it is permissible to add by amendment a count on a judgment to a count on the claim on which the judgment was based, and vice versa.[38] Other decisions hold that such an amendment is not permissible,[39] and that a count in assumpsit cannot be changed by amendment to debt on a foreign judgment based on the claim which is the foundation of the count in assumpsit.[40] An amendment setting up judgments of different dates and amounts and between different parties is not permissible;[41] nor is an amendment permissible which sets up a second judgment rendered in another jurisdiction.[42]

j. Jurisdictional Matters — (i) In General. Courts generally allow amendments showing jurisdictional facts omitted from the original pleadings,[43] although this will not be permitted if the amendment changes the cause of action.[44] A party cannot urge his own non-residence as an objection to the other party's being allowed to amend.[45]

(II) In the Federal Courts. In case the citizenship of defendant is such at the commencement of the suit as to give the United States circuit court jurisdiction, failure to allege such citizenship may be cured by an amendment.[46] So it has been held that an application by a defendant for leave to amend so as to raise a jurisdictional question in a suit pending in a federal court must be granted and the issue raised tried at once even after the trial has commenced.[47] But an amendment designed to raise a federal question irrespective of the citizenship of the parties will not be allowed unless it appears that it will be likely to accomplish the result intended.[48] A party may show by amendments that he was an alien when the suit was commenced instead of a citizen as previously alleged.[49] And likewise a party described in an original pleading as a foreign subject may be properly described in an amendment subsequently filed as an alien.[50] A petition filed in a state court may be amended after the trial has commenced, increasing the damages to an amount which in the original petition would have allowed a removal, and defendant cannot complain unless it appear that such amendment was an artifice to prevent removal, and force him to submit to a trial in the state court.[51] But an amendment will not be granted to bring in a necessary party defendant who is outside the jurisdiction.[52] After a motion in arrest of judgment is made on the ground that the complaint does not show a diversity of citizenship, the court may allow the defect to be remedied by amendment.[53] Or where an exception is taken to an averment of jurisdictional facts the court will allow an amendment.[54] A defective averment of the citizenship of the parties may be amended after verdict.[55]

k. Material Allegations, Supplying. It is generally held that a pleading which sufficiently indicates the cause of action or the defense intended to be set out may be amended so as to supply a material allegation.[56] An amendment

Where an allegation of fraud is necessary in order to give the court jurisdiction, it may be inserted for that purpose. Evans v. Mills, 16 Tex. 196; Little v. Woodbridge, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 152.

action.[84] Allegations of consequential,[85] exemplary,[86] or special damages [87] may usually be added to an original claim by amendment, but if the amendment operates as a surprise on the opposite party it should not be permitted.[88] A claim may be amended so as to include interest accruing after commencement of the suit.[89] And an amendment which merely introduces an additional element of damages growing out of the same set of circumstances may be allowed.[90] A constitutional provision increasing the liability of those wrongfully causing the death of others is not retroactive in its operation, and a complaint based on an injury inflicted before the provision was adopted cannot be amended by increasing the amount of damages to an amount greater than could be recovered before such provision was adopted.[91]

(c) Reducing Damages. An element of the damage or a part of the relief demanded may always be reduced or stricken out,[92] or the claim may be stricken out as to one or more defendants.[93] Under a statute giving treble damages, a complaint may be amended so as to claim single damages only.[94] Likewise an amendment reducing the claim so as to bring the action within the jurisdiction of the court is properly allowed.[95]

(d) Time of Amendment [96] — (1) In General. An amendment increasing the ad damnum may be made before [97] or during the trial,[98] after the case has been submitted to referees,[99] or even after their report is in,[1] or before verdict.[2]

Whether these amendments should be permitted, however, is largely within the discretion of the court, and refusal to permit an amendment enlarging the amount sought to be recovered on each item, after the lapse of three years and just before the case was submitted to the jury, is not an abuse of discretion.[3]

(2) After Verdict.[4] It is commonly held that, after verdict, where the verdict is for a sum larger than the ad damnum, the difficulty may be met by entering a remittitur for the excess.[5] In respect of amendments increasing the amount of damages the decisions are not harmonious. In one case in which the nature of the damages sought did not appear, it was held that such amendment was one of form merely and not of substance, and that the amendment should be permitted.[6] In others it is held that if the damages are unliquidated the amendment should not be permitted.[7] According to some decisions if there is a full and fair trial on the merits without either party learning that the ad damnum is defective or being misled there may be an amendment in the discretion of the court and judgment rendered without a new trial.[8] But that if it does not appear that defendant had no knowledge of the defect in the ad damnum an amendment may be allowed, but a new trial must be granted in order to give him an opportunity to contest the enlarged claim.[9] So it has been held that in actions sounding

Summary of law on the subject.— The supreme court of New Hampshire, in the well-considered case of Taylor v. Jones, 42 N. H. 25, 38, gave the following summary of the law on this question: "From a careful comparison of the various authorities, we are satisfied that the reasonable rule, in relation to amendments after verdict, and one which reconciles most, if not all of the numerous decisions, would be, that where the verdict is for a sum larger than the ad damnum, the difficulty may always be remedied by entering a remittitur for the excess; that the ad damnum may be amended after verdict, when it is apparent from the declaration itself that it was left blank, or too small a sum inserted, through mistake or inadvertence only; that if there has been a full and fair trial on the merits appearing on the face of the declaration, without any knowledge by either party of the defect, judgment may be rendered without a new trial; but that, if it does not appear that the defendant had no knowledge of the defect, the amendment may be made, but a new trial must be granted, to give him an opportunity to contest the enlarged demand; that, in actions sounding in damages only, where the plaintiff deliberately estimates the injury to himself, and there is only a difference in judgment betwen the jury and himself, as to the nature, extent and aggravation of the injury, no amendment increasing the ad damnum to cover the verdict will be allowed, and the only remedy for an excessive verdict is a remittitur; yet, that the court, in their discretion, may allow the ad damnum to be increased, in any case, where, after a full and fair trial upon the merits the defendant claims or insists upon an appeal or review."

Formal remittitur unnecessary.—Instead of filing a formal remittitur plaintiff may merely make up the record for the sum claimed in the pleadings. There is no error until he attempts to take more than he originally demanded. Dox v. Dey, 3 Wend. (N. Y.) 356.

in damages only, where plaintiff deliberately estimates the injury to himself, no amendment increasing the ad damnum so as to cover the verdict will be allowed.[10] In any event an amendment after verdict increasing damages should not be permitted where there is no evidence on which to base it.[11]

(3) After Judgment.[12] After judgment an unconditional order allowing an amendment increasing the damages is not allowable.[13] The amendment should only be granted on condition of assenting to a new trial if defendant so elected.[14]

o. Profert and Oyer. Failure to make profert may be cured by amendment,[15] and failure to crave oyer may be remedied in a like manner.[16] If profert is made and it develops that the instrument cannot be produced, the pleading may be amended, leaving out the profert and inserting an excuse for not making it,[17] and this amendment excusing profert may be made after verdict.[18]

p. Right, Title, or Interest. The title or interest which a party has in the subject-matter of the controversy, or the manner in which such title was obtained, when not shown in the original pleadings, may be set forth in an amendment,[19] and if the title or right of action accrues under a statute, such fact may be alleged

s. Torts.[39] Whether an amendment will be allowed in an action ex delicto depends greatly on the particular circumstances in each case, the courts being very liberal in the matter and imposing in general only the limitation that the original cause of action shall not be substantially changed nor a new cause introduced.[40] Within the limits of this condition the grounds of the claim in a tort action may be made more definite and particular.[41]

t. Uncertainty and Indefiniteness. In case an original pleading is not sufficiently clear or specific, it is proper to allow an amendment making its allegations more definite and certain.[42] Thus an amendment which merely amplifies and explains more fully the original cause of action is allowable.[43] However, if no amplification of the original pleading is necessary a proposed amendment may be refused.[44] Pleadings may be made more definite and certain by inserting words[45] or counts,[46] by striking out words,[47] or by filing a more detailed statement of the facts.[48] However, an amendment itself may be refused on the ground that it is too indefinite and uncertain,[49] and an amendment which introduces uncertainty into the complaint is properly rejected.[50] Amendments to make more definite and certain may be made at the trial.[51]

Thus there is no error in refusing an amended plea or answer which states no matter of defense that could not be made under the original.[53] Refusal to allow an amendment is not error where the same measure of relief is available without it.[54] And an amendment which will still leave the cause of action [55] or defense [56] incomplete should be refused. The court will not consider an amendment to the complaint stating a fact which virtually extinguishes plaintiff's cause of action, but will dismiss the suit.[57] But an amended complaint will not be refused on the ground that it sets out a cause of action which cannot be established unless it appears conclusively that such amendment cannot possibly avail the party asking it.[58]

v. Variance Between Writ and Declaration. Where a variance exists between the declaration and the writ the former may be amended so as to avoid the defect.[59] And it has been held even where there is no variance between the summons and the complaint, both being in the name of plaintiff, without more, that the complaint may be amended to show that plaintiff sues as administrator.[60] But where the writ is bad the declaration cannot be amended by it.[61] In any case, a variance between the declaration and the writ must be corrected in the trial court. The supreme court has no authority to allow such amendment.[62]

w. Variance Between Pleading and Proof[63] — (i) In General. The common-law rule requiring conformity of allegation and proof has not been materially changed by the codes and modern practice acts. The consequences of a variance, however, are not so prejudicial as under the common-law practice. Then a variance was fatal to the action, but now any amendment necessary in order to make pleadings conform to proof may usually be made upon reasonable terms.[64] In general pleadings, in the absence of any objection to the evidence, may be amended to conform to the proof,[65] where the opposite party

Limitation of rule.— The rule permitting pleadings to be amended to conform to the proof does not apply where the evidence which it is claimed tends incidentally to establish a fact out of the issues was competent and relevant on the actual issues of the case. Unless the record shows that such evidence was offered to the knowledge of both parties to prove the fact foreign to the issues as well as the facts embraced within such issues, it will be presumed that it was introduced for the only purpose for which it was, under the pleadings, proper. introduced.[67] And unless it appears in the record or can be shown by the party complaining that the amendment conforming the pleadings to the proof was made to his prejudice, it will be presumed that the trial court permitted the amendment for the furtherance of justice.[68] In any court the allowance of an unnecessary amendment to conform a pleading to proof cannot be urged as error.[69] Amendments conforming pleadings to proof will not be permitted for the purpose of making regular proceedings erroneous.[70] Where two or more parties are sued jointly, and a recovery may be had against one or more, according to the proof, the action may be dismissed as to one or more without a formal amendment, if a statute so provides.[71]

(II) Discretion of Court in Allowing Amendment. Amending pleadings to conform to proof is largely within the sound discretion of the court.[72] An amendment of a pleading to conform to the proof is properly refused, when the proposed amended pleading, even if clearly proved, constitutes no cause of action or defense,[73] or where the evidence can be introduced under the pleadings as they stood.[74] But it has been held error to refuse a party leave to amend and then grant a nonsuit or direct a verdict on the ground of variance between pleadings and proof.[75] A party should be allowed to amend his pleadings to conform to the proof produced at the trial, especially where his cause of action would otherwise be barred by the statute of limitations.[76]

(III) Materiality of Variance — (A) In General. Three degrees of variance between allegations and proof are recognized with more or less distinctness, immaterial variance, material variance, and failure of proof. An immaterial variance is one which is so slight that the opposite party is in no way prejudiced or misled by it, and this will either be disregarded or an immediate amendment will be ordered without costs.[77] A material variance is one in which the difference is so considerable that, while the proof is within the general scope of the allegations, it is sufficient to mislead and prejudice the adverse party on the merits; in which case an amendment on terms will generally be allowed.[78] A failure of proof occurs when the evidence, in its whole scope and meaning, so far departs from the allegations as to prove something wholly different from what is alleged; in which case no amendment is allowed.[79] But there is some confusion in the use of these terms, some judges using the term "material variance" to indicate a variance sufficiently important to call for an amendment on terms, while others use it in the sense of failure of proof, rendering an amendment impossible.[80] Frequently a variance of such a nature that it should be regarded as material and corrected by an amendment in the court below if not so corrected will be held immaterial and disregarded on appeal.[81] Whether a variance between pleadings and proof is of such a nature as to require an amendment before the evidence can be considered, or whether it may be disregarded, is a matter that can be determined only by the circumstances of each particular case.[82]

82. See cases cited infra, this note.

A leading case on the subject of variance between pleadings and proof is probably Shaw v. Boston, etc., R. Corp., 8 Gray (Mass.) 45, decided in 1857. The declaration averred that the accident occurred while plaintiff was traveling in the highway, and the proof showed that plaintiff's horse became frightened and ran or was driven out of the highway five or six rods from the railroad crossing entered upon land owned by defendant, and plaintiff was there struck, while attempting to cross the track. In a very elaborate opinion Chief Justice Shaw discussed the whole subject of variance in general and with reference to the particular case. Although the court was divided in its opinion, it was held that the variance between the allegations and the proof was fatal and a new trial was ordered.

Material variances illustrated.— The following variances have been held material and to require an amendment: Where there were certain allegations of fraud in the declaration and the proof showed the fraud to have been for a different purpose and accomplished in a different manner (Christian v. Penn, 5 Ga. 482; Rathbun v. Parker, 113 Mich. 594, 72 N. W. 31, permitting an amendment alleging specific false representations shown by the evidence); where a party pleaded trespass to his close containing twenty-eight and three-fourths acres, and at the trial it developed that he had legal title to only three acres (Lombard v. Brackett, 12 Me. 39, a case in which the general verdict returned by the jury would have confirmed title in plaintiff to the entire close, whereas the proof showed that he owned only one-tenth of it); and a variance between alleged negligence in the operation of a switch and proved negligence in the operation of a car (Hoffman v. Third Ave. R. Co., 45 N. Y. App. Div. 586, 61 N. Y. Suppl. 590).

Immaterial variances illustrated.— In a well-considered Iowa case the original answer alleged that plaintiffs received the note in controversy of the Marsh Harvester Company, under an express contract between the parties that it was to be taken in part payment of a debt from defendant to them. By an amendment, after the introduction of the evidence, the allegation of express contract was withdrawn, and a state of facts pleaded

(B) Total Failure of Proof. There is a wide difference between a variance such as may be cured by an amendment and a total failure of proof. If the divergence between allegation and proof is total, so that the cause of action or defense as proved is another than that set up in the pleadings, then obviously there is no room for amendment and a dismissal of the complaint or rejection of the defense is the only course open to the court.[83]

(IV) Effect of Objection to Introduction of Evidence and Failure to Object. The right to amend pleadings so as to conform to proof proceeds upon the theory that this presents the issues sought to be established by the evidence introduced and admitted without objection;[84] but it is quite generally held that, where the evidence offered has been promptly objected to on the ground that such evidence does not tend to support the allegations of the pleadings, a motion to amend after admission of the evidence so as to conform to proof should not be granted,[85] and if under such circumstances it is granted, it is an abuse of

from which an agreement to take the note would be implied. The amendment was held unnecessary because the evidence that would support the amendment would support the original pleading. Had the allegation of express contract stood, the variance between it and the evidence produced would have been immaterial (Hunt v. Higman, 70 Iowa 406, 30 N. W. 769); so variance between allegations of the pleadings and the proof has been held immaterial in a case where an express contract was alleged and facts supporting an implied contract proved (Hunt v. Higman, 70 Iowa 406, 30 N. W. 769); where certain premises were described as "lot twelve" and the proof showed that "a portion of lot twelve" was meant (Fenton v. Miller, 94 Mich. 204, 53 N. W. 957); where pleadings allege that rent was payable quarterly, and the proof disclosed that the payments were to be made annually (Edwards v. Clemons, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 480); where fraud of the principal was alleged and fraud of the agent proved (Bennett v. Judson, 21 N. Y. 238); where services were alleged to have been paid for at an agreed rate of compensation and the proof showed that the agreement was to pay what the services were reasonably worth (Scott v. Lilienthal, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 224); and where a gift inter vivos was alleged and a gift causa mortis proved (Walsh v. Bowery Sav. Bank, 15 Daly (N. Y.) 403, 7 N. Y. Suppl. 669, 8 N. Y. Suppl. 344 [affirming 7 N. Y. Suppl. 97]). So in an action for false imprisonment, it is not material what crime was charged to have been committed, so that an amendment alleging that the arrest was for a particular crime is unnecessary (Sandford Tool, etc., Co. v. Mullen, 1 Ind. App. 204, 27 N. E. 488); and the variance between an allegation that slanderous words were spoken in English and proof that they were spoken in a foreign language is not material (Charwat v. Vopelak, 18 Misc. (N. Y.) 601, 42 N. Y. Suppl. 235).

Where the opposite party has not been heard, error in admitting evidence to support an estoppel not pleaded cannot be cured by an amendment after verdict, on the ground that no objection was offered to the inan amendment to conform to proofs, may cure the defect.[90] So objection to the introduction of evidence may be afterward withdrawn and an amendment to conform to proofs then properly allowed.[91]

(v) Time For Amendment. Great liberality is exercised in permitting amendments to conform the proofs to the pleadings. They may be allowed after the close of plaintiff's evidence in chief,[92] after close of all the evidence,[93] pending motion for nonsuit,[94] after part of the argument made,[95] after close of the argument,[96] at any time before the case is submitted to the jury,[97] after the case is submitted to the court sitting as a jury without argument,[98] or after the filing of an auditor's report.[99] So amendments may be permitted on motion to direct a verdict reserved till after verdict and motion for new trial,[1] after verdict,[2] or after findings by the court [3] or pending a motion for new trial.[4] And under the statutes in many jurisdictions an amendment conforming pleadings to the evidence may be filed even after judgment,[5] where it appears that the opposite party was not misled or in any way prejudiced thereby.[6] In case a judgment by confession or default entered in vacation is vacated in order to allow defendant to come in and defend, an amendment of the declaration to avoid a variance may then properly be allowed.[7] It has been held that the allowance of an amendment after trial to conform a pleading to the facts proved is equivalent to a finding of fact by the court, and the order will not be reversed on appeal, although it is apparently against the weight of the evidence, if there is some evidence to support it.[8]

x. Written Instruments — (i) In General. In general copies of written instruments may be introduced by amendment [9] where a new cause of action is not thereby introduced.[10] Thus a written contract may be set forth in an amended complaint in order to show the facts under which a sale was made [11] or that a condition has not yet happened.[12] Where the pleader in declaring upon a written instrument misdescribes it, he may, by subsequent amendment, correct or amplify the description,[13] so as to show, for instance, that the instrument was under seal.[14] An amendment changing the alleged date of a contract, or the sum to be paid, or any particular of the matter to be performed, or the time or manner of performance, does not, in the accepted meaning of the phrase, change the cause of action.[15] After having declared on a written obligation, a party may file an amendment basing his claim on other grounds or adding additional items, so long as the cause of action is not changed thereby.[16]

(ii) Variance Between Pleading and Proof. Variances between instruments sued on and those offered in evidence, where the opposite party is not prejudiced thereby, may be amended on the trial,[17] or even after ver-

So long as the form of action is not changed, and the court can see that the identity of the cause of action is preserved, the particular allegations of the declaration may be changed, and others superadded, in order to cure imperfections and mistakes in the manner of stating plaintiff's case. or refusing[28] an amendment is not a subject for review by an appellate court.

b. Subjects of Amendment. It is discretionary with the court to allow an amendment to the replication, where it appears to be necessary to enable plaintiff to fully and fairly present at the trial his defense to the new matter set up in the answer.[29] Likewise it is discretionary with the court to refuse to allow a proposed amendment, where the facts stated therein, if true, do not avoid, or present a defense to, the counter-claim pleaded in the answer;[30] where it is clear from the facts already adduced at the trial that such an amendment will be useless;[31] or where it is clear that if all the facts contained in the proposed amendment had been in evidence, they would have been subject to demurrer.[32] But when the proposed amendment contains matter not authorized by the statute of amendments to be contained in the original reply,[33] as where it sets up a new cause of action,[34] or a counter-claim to defendant's counter-claim,[35] or presents inconsistent defenses to the affirmative allegations of the complaint,[36] it cannot be allowed. Nor can an amendment be allowed in violation of a provision of the statute of amendments as to subjects of amendment, as where the proposed amendment substantially changes plaintiff's claim.[37]

c. Operation and Effect. An amended reply supersedes the original pleading, which, in going out of the record, carries with it all the rulings of the court regarding its sufficiency, and if no demurrer is filed to the amended reply, it will be regarded as sufficient.[38]

14. Amendment of Demurrer[39] — a. In General. A demurrer is regarded as a pleading within the purview of a statute providing for the amendment of any pleading, and may be amended like any other pleading.[40] Where the statute provides for the amendment of pleadings in furtherance of justice, the allowance of an amendatory demurrer is within the discretion of the court.[41] The court will not give leave to amend a demurrer which does not go to the merits of the cause,[42] or which has been adjudged irregular and frivolous.[43] When upon the death of defendant after demurring his executor is made a defendant the executor may be allowed to amend the demurrer already filed.[44]

Instances.— Thus a demurrer comes within the meaning of a statute providing for amendments as of course of any pleading within a specified time (Hedges v. Dam, 72 Cal. 520, 14 Pac. 133), or a statute leaving the amendment of any pleading to the discretion of the court (Morrison v. Miller, 46 Iowa 84).

b. Time For. A demurrer to an original pleading may be amended after an amendment to such pleading.[45] After a demurrer has been argued and submitted, an amendment thereto should not be allowed until the submission has been set aside, as the party whose pleading has been assailed has a right to be heard upon the question raised by the amendment;[46] but where it appears from the record that submission was practically, if not formally, set aside, and the adverse party had an opportunity to be heard on the amendment, an order sustaining the demurrer as amended will not be reversed on account of such irregularity.[47] Likewise the error of allowing an amendment to a demurrer, after it has been argued and submitted, is regarded as without prejudice, where the amendment in legal effect adds nothing to the original demurrer.[48]

c. Subjects of Amendment. An amendment to a general demurrer by altering it to a special one,[49] or by adding thereto grounds of special demurrer,[50] cannot be allowed. And where the allowance of an amendatory demurrer is within the discretion of the court, it is held to be a proper exercise of such discretion to refuse an amended demurrer stating a different ground from that stated in the original;[51] or to allow an amended demurrer setting up the additional ground that the action is barred by the statute of limitations,[52] when that defense was in existence at the beginning of the action and plaintiff loses no rights by the allowance of the amendment.[53]

d. Operation and Effect. An amended demurrer supersedes the original demurrer, so that an order subsequently entered providing that the demurrer be sustained and time given to amend the complaint relates to the demurrer as amended.[54]

15. Amendment by Annexing Bill of Particulars or Exhibits. Where a complaint contains a count for a balance of account,[55] or on an account annexed,[56] but without a bill of particulars, such count is amendable by annexing such a bill. Likewise where a complaint with the common counts for money had and received, and for money paid, without specification by bill of particulars or otherwise on what account it was specially received or paid out, such defect is amendable.[57] Where the statute of amendments provides that a pleading may be amended in all respects, provided there is enough in the pleading to amend by, it is held that a complaint containing a cause of action for the recovery of land may be amended by adding an abstract of plaintiff's title;[58] and likewise a complaint on a promissory note setting out the names of the parties, date, and amount of the note, is amendable by attaching a copy of the note to the complaint.[59]

16. Answering Matter Introduced by Amendment — a. In General. A new plea is necessary where there has been a material amendment to the declaration, unless the denials of the answer to the original complaint sufficiently answer the amendment.[60] New notice of the rule to plead need not be given after amendment of the declaration.[61] Answering anew acts as a withdrawal of the original answer.[62]

b. Right to Answer. Whenever plaintiff is allowed to amend, materially changing the issues already formed, or affecting the substantial rights of the parties, defendant is entitled of right to file additional pleas,[63] and, if the trial court refuses leave to amend, it is reversible error.[64] The exercise of this right cannot be restricted to any particular form of plea,[65] and defendant may set up all defenses which would be open if the suit were commenced at the time of amendment;[66] but he cannot, by filing separate answers to the original and amended complaint, treat the two as separate actions.[67] An amendment to meet an amended claim may be required instanter.[68] The right to plead anew may be waived.[69] An immaterial amendment, not affecting the rights of the parties, nor the issues, does not confer upon defendant the right to plead anew.[70] In any case an amended pleading to meet an amendment should show on its face that it is a substitute for the original pleading.[71]

c. Effect of Failure to Answer — (i) In General. Allegations of an amended declaration unanswered by defendant stand as admitted.[72] This rule does not apply, however, to an amendment made after the evidence is in for the purpose of conforming the pleading to the proof,[73] nor to amendments made from time to time during the progress of the trial.[74]

d. Time For Answering Amended Pleading. In the absence of statute or a rule of court providing otherwise, it is the usual practice to allow defendant the same time to answer a materially amended complaint as is allowed for answering an original complaint.[77] The matter, however, is largely within the discretion of the court and may be limited or extended accordingly;[78] and in exercising this discretion the court will ordinarily not grant time to answer an immaterial amendment.[79]

17. Demurrer to Amended Pleading — a. Right to Demur. A party has the right to demur to an amended pleading as if it were an original one.[80] If there is an amendment of the pleading to meet the objections pointed out by a demurrer, not only may the adverse party demur to the pleading as amended ;[81] but it is held that no question as to the sufficiency of the amended pleading is raised, without a new demurrer,[82] or the refiling of the former one, if deemed sufficiently

A plea or answer with demurrer.— It is proper to allow a demurrer to a complaint, as amended, to be interposed, without withdrawing the answer to the original complaint, where by the amendment the cause of action is so materially and radically changed that the answer is not at all applicable thereto. Refiling demurrer after amendment.—If the allowance of an amendment at a given stage of the cause rests in the discretion of the court, and the amendment, as made, does not change the issues, it is an error to refuse to allow the demurrer to such pleading to be refiled after amendment. specific, to raise the objection which it is desired to interpose to the new state of the pleading.[83]

b. Time. At what stage of the action, or within what period of time, a demurrer to an amended pleading may be filed, is generally a matter of statutory regulation.[84]

c. Grounds. If it appears on the face of an amended complaint that the action is barred by lapse of time, advantage of the defect may be taken by demurrer.[85] So if plaintiff amends his complaint by striking out the name of the person for whose use the suit is instituted, and the change of the party is stated in the amended pleading, advantage of the irregularity may be taken by demurrer.[86] Whether an amended complaint is a departure from the original cause of action is a question which cannot be raised by demurrer,[87] but only by a motion to strike out.[88] That an amended complaint, adding a new count, sets up a new and additional cause of action is not a ground of demurrer,[89] unless the cause of action in the new count is such that it cannot be joined with that of the original complaint.[90] Where facts which have arisen since the bringing of the action, and therefore could be properly brought into the case by a supplemental complaint, are included in the amended pleading, it is not a ground of demurrer.[91] That a party was surprised by the amendment, and less prepared for trial in consequence thereof, is not a ground of demurrer to the pleading as amended.[92] In conformity to the rule that a demurrer can be available only when the defect is apparent on the face of the pleading demurred to,[93] it is held that an amended complaint is not subject to demurrer on the ground that a prior amended complaint shows

Co., 93 Iowa 436, 61 N. another action pending.[94] An amended complaint is not demurrable on the ground that it may require a change in defendant's plea.[95]

d. Scope — (I) Demurrer Must Be Directed to Amended Pleading Alone. A demurrer to an amended pleading must be directed to that pleading alone;[96] and if it asks for a consideration of the original pleading, as well as the amended pleading, it will be overruled.[97]

(II) Demurrer Must Go to Whole Cause of Action or Defense. New matter inserted by way of amendment cannot be reached by demurrer to that part, but the demurrer must go to the whole cause of action or defense set forth in the amended pleading.[98] But if the original pleading has already been tested by demurrer, the court may, in its discretion, regard a second demurrer as applicable to the amendment alone, and limit it thereto.[99]

e. Effect of Filing. Filing a demurrer to an amended pleading waives a demurrer previously filed to the original pleading.[1] And the filing of a demurrer to a complaint, amended by adding a count on a cause of action accruing after suit instituted, is held to be a waiver of the right to invoke the proper remedy, which is by motion to strike out.[2]

f. Scope of Inquiry and Matter Considered. On demurrer to an amended pleading the question for consideration is the sufficiency of the pleading itself, and not the right of the party to file it.[3] An amended complaint supersedes the original, and a demurrer thereto must be determined on the sufficiency of its averments alone.[4] Hence, on demurrer to an amended complaint, the averments of the original complaint which have been abandoned by the amendment cannot be considered by the court.[5] While an exhibit will not make a bad plea good,

Demurrer held good in form and substance. — A general demurrer to the "amended second paragraph of defendant's answer for the reason that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a good defense to plaintiff's complaint" is not objectionable on the ground that "complaint" is used instead of the words "cause of action," and the demurrer is sufficient in form and substance. yet, where an exhibit is filed with an amended pleading, the court, in determining a demurrer to the amended pleading, may consider the exhibit against the party filing it.[6]

g. Operation and Effect of Decision Sustaining Demurrer. It has been held that sustaining a demurrer to an amended complaint authorizes a judgment of nonsuit, but not a direction of a verdict in favor of defendant and entry of judgment thereon.[7] After an amended pleading has been held insufficient on demurrer, it is discretionary with the court to refuse another amendment.[8] But if an amended pleading has been held good on demurrer, it is error for the court which, as well as the pleader, has been misled by the allegation of his pleading, to refuse him leave to amend after a demurrer to the pleading has been sustained.[9] And after a good plea has been amended at the suggestion of the court, and a demurrer to the pleading as amended has been sustained, it is error to refuse leave to refile the original pleading.[10] If a demurrer to an amended complaint is sustained, a cross complaint in the case, distinct and complete in all its parts, and an answer thereto, do not fall with the complaint.[11]

18. Effect of Amendment[12] — a. In General. The prima facie effect of the amendment of a pleading is an acknowledgment by the pleader that he has been mistaken, and not that a party or pleader has knowingly made a false statement in the pleading amended.[13] It is a well-recognized principle that an amended pleading based on the same cause of action or defense as the original relates back to the date when such original pleading was filed.[14] If, however, the amendment intro-

In Mississippi it is held that, on sustaining a demurrer to an amended plea, the judgment should not be final, but a judgment of respondeat ouster. Brown v. Smith, 5 How. 387. But where defendant pleads bad pleas, to which a demurrer is sustained, and judgment of respondeat ouster awarded, and he pleads bad pleas again, this is regarded as amounting to a violation of the rule to plead over, and if demurrer is again sustained, plaintiff is entitled to judgment for want of a plea. duces a new cause of action, setting up some claim or title not previously asserted, it does not relate back to the filing of the original pleading, but is subject to all the defenses that may be made to a new suit instituted at the time the amendment is filed.[15] The effect of an amendment changing substantially the issues is to dismiss the existing action and commence a new suit.[16] A party cannot, by amendment, deprive the other party of substantial rights which have already accrued to him,[17] nor prejudice proceedings already had.[18] No matter how many amendments may be filed, the necessary legal intendment is that the action was originally brought for the cause ultimately declared on.[19] After a party is allowed to amend on his own request he cannot insist that the amendment was unnecessary [20] Immaterial amendments, no matter when made, do not affect the judgment.[21] The mere allowance of an amendment decides nothing as to whether there can be a recovery on the new pleading or not,[22] and the amended pleadings themselves, and not the order of the court granting leave to amend, determine the character of the action.[23] An amendment properly allowed, conforming the pleading to the proof, effectually disposes of the question of a variance.[24] Ordinarily an amendment does not affect the jurisdiction of the court,[25] although an amendment may be made for the express purpose of conferring jurisdiction upon the court.[26] Leave to amend operates as a stay of proceedings within the time allowed for the amendment.[27] An amendment, after having been allowed, becomes a part of the pleadings, even though it might have been refused on proper objection.[28]

a pleading by way of amendment, it should be regarded as never having been introduced,[36] and although an original pleading admits an alleged fact, if an amended pleading is subsequently filed omitting such admission, it will be considered that the fact in question is denied.[37] However, it is the province of the court, not of counsel, to declare on what pleadings a case shall be tried.[38]

c. When Amendment Stands With Original. An amendment which is merely an addition to the form or substance of the original pleading does not supersede the latter, but both the original and the amendment stand together as one pleading.[39] Ordinarily where additional counts are filed, the amendment is not regarded as a substitution for the original declaration, but both old and new counts stand together;[40] and it has been held that an amended pleading will not be taken as a substitute for the original unless it appears to have been so intended,[41] and the allegations of the original petition stand, in so far as they are not withdrawn or modified by amendment.[42] But an amended pleading qualifies or cancels inconsistent allegations in the original.[43] An amendment which introduces no new or material allegations, but merely dismisses as to a party, does not deprive the pleader of the benefit of his verification to the original complaint.[44]

d. Effect in Curing Errors. By filing an amended pleading the pleader waives any irregularity or error in the proceedings prior thereto.[45] And after an amendment is allowed it is too late to move to dismiss the pleading for any defect which the amendments cured.[46] A written instrument is not rendered inadmissible in evidence on the ground of variance, where the misdescription of the instrument has been cured by amendment.[47]

e. Effect on Pending Demurrer, Motion, or Plea in Abatement. Filing an amendment to the petition after a demurrer has been interposed is in effect a submission to the demurrer.[48] After plea in abatement, leave obtained to amend confesses the plea and disposes of it.[49] An amendment of course may defeat a motion to make more definite and certain.[50]

B. Amendment as to Parties — 1. Parties Generally — a. Misnomer — (i) Right to Amend. While in the absence of statute a misnomer of plaintiff [51] or defendant [52] is not as a rule regarded as amendable, under the codes and practice acts of the several jurisdictions the usual rule is that a mistake in the name of a plaintiff [53] or defendant [54] may be amended so long as it does not operate an entire change of parties.[55] In order to justify an amendment as to defendant it should appear that process has been actually served upon the true defendant.[56]

56. Pearce v. Bruce, 38 Ga. 444; Weaver

It has been held that a complaint will not be dismissed because parties are designated by their initials,[57] but the proper remedy is a motion to require the complaint to be amended in such respect.[58] Where a defendant has been designated by a supposed name, his real name being unknown, the court should upon a plea in abatement require the pleading and process to be amended by inserting the true name.[59] In some jurisdictions a mistake in the name of a party may be corrected only by motion to correct or by the court of its own motion.[60] It has been held that an amendment as to the name of a plaintiff cannot be made by merely indorsing the alteration on the declaration.[61]

(II) Time For Amendment. As a general rule an amendment correcting a misnomer is, under the statutes of the several states, permissible at any time ;[62] as for example, after plea in abatement for misnomer,[63] after trial has commenced,[64] after the evidence has been introduced,[65] after verdict,[66] after default judgment,[67] or after motion in arrest of judgment because of a variance between the evidence and pleadings in the name of defendant.[68] An amendment has even been allowed after the death of a party.[69]

b. Adding New Parties[70] — (I) At Common Law. At common law new plaintiffs[71] or new defendants[72] cannot be inserted in a declaration by way of amendment.

(II) Statutory Provisions. In conformity with the general tendency toward liberality in the allowance of amendments,[73] the codes and practice acts of the several states make express provisions for the addition of new parties.[74] For example, it may be provided that before issue joined upon a plea of non-joinder of a party as defendant, plaintiff may be allowed to amend by inserting names of any other persons as defendants,[75] or that additional defendants may be cited to appear upon such notice and payment of costs as the court may prescribe,[76] or that the court may, upon motion of defendant, order other parties to a contract sued on to be made defendants.[77] In some jurisdictions the only limitations upon the right to amend in an action at law is that there cannot be an entire change of parties plaintiff or defendant.[78]

(III) Parties Necessary to Determination of Cause. An ordinary provision of the codes is that when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must cause them to be brought in.[79] This provision is a mere adoption of a well-known equi-

tice is done defendant,[88] and likewise to add a new party defendant.[89] But in a proceeding at law, one who has a substantial right and beneficial interest as well as the legal title in a cause of action, alone or with others, cannot be compelled to come in and bring or unite in an action as plaintiff.[90] Nor can a person injured by a tort, when unwilling to come in as plaintiff, be joined in an action on the tort as a defendant.[91] A defendant is entitled to require one contesting the title of plaintiff to the subject of the action to be made a party.[92] But a person need not be required to be made a party upon the motion of defendant, where defendant is entitled to urge his defenses as effectually in the absence of such person.[93] Under some statutes it is provided that, where a person not a party to the action makes a demand against defendant for the same debt or property with regard to which the action is pending, and defendant disputes in whole or in part the liability as asserted against him by the different claimants, he may have an order joining the other claimants as co-defendants with him in the action.[94] Unknown persons cannot be brought in as parties upon motion of defendant, under a provision authorizing a plaintiff who is ignorant of the name of a defendant to designate him in the summons by a fictitious name.[95]

(B) Necessity of Interest. Although broad provisions are contained in the statutes for the addition of new parties, the existence in such parties of some privity with or interest in the pending action is required.[96]

(C) Persons Against Whom Defendant May Recover — (1) IN GENERAL. Under a statute allowing the bringing in of necessary or proper parties, it is held that persons against whom defendant would have a right of action in case judgment is rendered against him may be made defendants upon his application.[97] But a defendant has not a right in all cases to implead other parties who might become liable to him as a result of a judgment against him, regardless of other considerations,[98] and has not the absolute right to bring in another defendant in order to try along with the cause of action a different one depending on a different issue.[99]

(2) CALLING IN WARRANTY. In Louisiana it is specially provided by statute that a defendant wishing to call one in warranty may in his answer pray the court to decree against his warrantor the same judgment which may be rendered against him on the principal demand.[1] Under this statute the right to call in a warrantor does not depend upon the question of privity between the warrantor and plaintiff in the main action.[2] But as a basis for the exercise of such right there must be a contract of warranty between defendant and the person so called in.[3] A third person cannot be brought into a suit to warrant and defend the interests of a plaintiff.[4] Nor can the right to call in warranty be extended beyond the cases enumerated by law.[5]

(D) Transferees Pendente Lite. Although it has been held that a transfer of the cause of action pendente lite does not necessitate the bringing in of the transferee by amendment,[6] it is proper for the court to allow new parties, who have become interested in the subject-matter since the commencement of the suit, to be brought in in such manner.[7]

liability to two different parties for or on account of the same debt or duty, and only one of them is before the court, the other should be brought in.[13] Parties necessary to the complete determination of the suit may be ordered to be brought in, although they are not within the jurisdiction of the court.[14]

(v) Entire Change of Parties. Under a statutory provision permitting the adding or correction of the name of a party, an entire change in parties plaintiff or defendant cannot be permitted.[15] A statute permitting amendments as to form will not permit an amendment making new parties plaintiff in order to sustain an action that was originally brought without authority.[16] An amendment which adds other usees technically speaking does not change the party plaintiff.[17]

(vi) Limitation to Original Cause of Action. Amendments with regard to parties are subject to the rule applicable to amendments with regard to other matters,[18] that an entirely new cause of action must not be introduced.[19] So where a complaint fails to state a cause of action in plaintiff, it cannot be amended by adding other parties as plaintiffs in whose favor a cause of action is shown to exist.[20] In determining whether an amendment changing or adding a party states a new cause of action, the rule has been applied that if the same evidence will support both complaints, and the same measure of damages will apply to both, no new cause is stated.[21] The addition of a new party, or even a change of the capacity in which one of a number of plaintiffs sues, does not in itself amount to the statement of a new cause of action.[22] An amendment which adds other usees does not introduce a new cause of action.[23] One who has a right to sue in

(VII) PROCEDURE — (A) In General. In case the specific procedure for the addition of a new party to the record is prescribed by statute, such procedure must be followed.[25] The court is not bound to expressly tender an opportunity for amendment.[26] Under provisions requiring persons necessary to the complete determination of the controversy to be made parties, the court must act on its own motion and refuse to enter judgment without the presence of such persons,[27] and it is not necessary that an objection should have been taken.[28]

(B) Time. An amendment adding a party must be made within the time fixed by statute or by rule of court, in case a provision as to time is made.[29] In case the right to bring in new parties exists it must be exercised with diligence after notice of its necessity.[30] By the express provisions of some statutes the right to amend must be exercised at such time and in such manner as not unreasonably to delay the trial.[31] It has been held under the circumstances of particular cases and in the construction of particular statutes that an amendment may be made at any stage of the proceedings,[32] after change of venue,[33] after plea in abatement,[34] after jury sworn,[35] at any time pending the trial,[36] at any time before final judgment,[37]

after all the evidence has been given,[38] after the cause has been reopened for further evidence,[39] after judgment,[40] after reversal on appeal,[41] and in vacation.[42] But it has been held that an amendment is properly refused after a nonsuit.[43] Where an action is brought in behalf of plaintiffs and of all other persons in like status who choose to join, a third person cannot ask to be joined after the parties to the original controversy have settled it.[44] Where it is provided by statute that action must be commenced by the voluntary appearance of, and joinder of issues by, the parties, or by service of summons, an amendment after trial, adding the name of a person who has not appeared or been served with summons, cannot be made.[45]

(c) Leave of Court. The right of defendant to amend as of course depends upon the particular statute invoked.[46] A leave to amend generally has been held to permit of an amendment joining new defendants.[47] Under some statutes a new party plaintiff may be added, as of course, before defendant has answered.[48] Where plaintiff is given a general privilege to file an amended complaint, he cannot be permitted thereunder to make an entire change of parties plaintiff.[49]

(d) Discretion of Court. As a general rule, the question of whether a new party shall be brought in is to be determined in the sound discretion of the trial court,[50] which is reviewable only for abuse.[51] Such discretion should be exercised for the full protection of those who are absent from the record.[52] The question of whether a party should or should not be brought in as necessary to the complete determination of the controversy is within the discretion of the court.[53] But where it is shown that the controversy cannot be determined as between the parties without the addition of other persons as defendants, the application must be granted.[54] It will be presumed, where nothing to the contrary appears, that new parties made parties to an amended complaint were brought in with their consent.[55] Where after a demurrer has been sustained because of the failure of a complaint to state a cause of action, plaintiff moves to amend his complaint and to add a new defendant, the ruling as to the admission of the new defendant is dependent upon the decision as to the right to amend as to the cause of action.[56]

(E) Notice of Motion or Application. Under some statutes notice to the opposite party of a motion to bring in other parties is necessary.[57]

(F) Showing as to Grounds. In order that additional parties may be brought in, the necessity for making them parties must be clearly shown.[58] A motion or application to the court for the bringing in of a new party must show a sufficient reason therefor.[59] Upon scire facias to bring in a party defendant according to the practice in some jurisdictions,[60] the only issue which may be raised by answer is the question of whether respondent is a proper party to the cause.[61] Upon a motion to bring in parties necessary to the complete determination of the cause, it cannot be urged as an objection that there is collusion between the moving party and the party whom he seeks to bring in.[62]

(G) Withdrawal of Application. In case defendants, after having sought to have additional parties brought in, but before service on such parties, agree that judgment shall be entered in favor of plaintiff, it is equivalent to a withdrawal of the application.[63]

(H) Terms. Under the statutes the court is usually authorized to impose terms [64] such as the imposition of costs,[65] or requirement that the moving party shall assume responsibility for increased costs in case of lack of success,[66] upon adding a new party. But such terms should be reasonable,[67] and it is proper to allow plaintiff to amend without imposing terms, when defendant has delayed making an objection.[68]

(I) Order. The order may be specific as to the course which is to be pursued to bring in the new parties, or it may simply provide that they be allowed to be brought in.[69] The order is not binding upon a person not within the jurisdiction of the court who has not voluntarily appeared and has not been served with process.[70]

(J) Revocation of Order. It has been held that an order requiring the addition of a party may be vacated at a subsequent term; [71] and, where it has been granted ex parte, by an associate of the judge making the order.[72]

(K) Amendment to Conform to Order. An order granting leave to bring in a new party must be strictly complied with,[73] and the pleadings must be amended [74] or supplemental pleadings filed [75] in accordance with its terms. But failure to make a formal amendment may be rendered harmless by the actual appearance of the party added and his rejoinder in the proceedings,[76] although the order authorizing the bringing in of a party makes no specific provision for an amendment; such amendment is incidental to the relief granted.[77] A defendant who has answered the original complaint is entitled to an order providing for the service upon him of the amended complaint on bringing in a new party.[78]

(L) Rights and Liabilities of Parties Brought in — (1) IN GENERAL. A person who is brought in under an order of court acquires the standing of a party by appearance, and although his pleading discloses such an interest in the subject-matter as would have entitled him to become a party on application, the fact that such application was not made is immaterial.[79] Where a person has been permitted to intervene as plaintiff upon consent of the parties, he is entitled to the same rights as though he had jointly originally instituted the action.[80] A party who has been brought in as a defendant, who has been duly served, or who has entered his voluntary appearance, cannot move to dismiss the action as to himself, where it is regularly pending and he is a necessary party thereto.[81] The fact that, after plea in abatement for the non-joinder of defendants, plaintiff amends, will not prevent him from denying the fact of their joint liability.[82]

(2) NECESSITY AND TIME TO PLEAD. Where a person is admitted as co-plaintiff upon a petition averring his interest, he need not file an original pleading but may adopt the original plaintiff's pleadings as his own, where his right is founded upon an identical obligation.[83] Where the merits of the cause have not been changed by the introduction of a new party plaintiff, defendant is not entitled to an opportunity to plead to the amended complaint.[84] One who has been brought in as a co-defendant is not bound to plead until a declaration has been filed against him.[85] When an order bringing in third persons as parties defendant upon a defendant's motion provides for the service of the answer upon them, and gives them time to plead thereto, they are not entitled to plead to the complaint.[86]

c. Striking Out Parties[87] — (i) In General. It would seem that at common law the courts have inherent power in the furtherance of substantial justice to permit amendments by which plaintiffs may strike out the name of a defendant or defendants,[88] but such power appears not to have been extended to striking the names of plaintiffs.[89] Under the codes and practice acts of the several states the striking out of a party by amendment is as a general rule permitted.[90] So, it is usually within the power of a plaintiff to amend by striking out a co-plaintiff,[91] either in actions upon contract [92] or in tort; [93] and likewise by striking out defend-original pleading is modified by the averment of interest.

84. Wellman v. Dismukes, 42 Mo. 101. See also Eversberg v. Miller, (Tex. Civ. App. 1900) 56 S. 85. Smith v. Little, 53 Ill. App. 157, holding that upon leave given to file an amended declaration, although defendants were ruled to plead instanter, a defendant who was added was entitled to the time allotted to an original defendant upon commencement of the action in which to plead.

Suppl. 589, so holding where the complaint was in a simple action at law to recover from the original defendants the amount of a judgment which they had undertaken to pay in the event of affirmance by the court of appeals, and their defense was affirmative to the effect that property and credits of certain third persons, in the hands of plaintiff, were applicable to the payment of the judgment; and the order bringing in such third persons as parties was apparently made on the theory that they might be interested to deny the allegations of the answer and make common cause with plaintiff in resisting the application of property and credits belonging to them to the payment or discharge of the liability of the original defendants.

ants, either in actions upon contract [94] or in tort.[95] But an amendment will not be allowed which will deprive the opposite party of a valuable right.[96] Under a statute providing that persons who have been misjoined as parties may be dropped by order of court at any stage of the cause, the name of a plaintiff cannot be struck from a complaint, upon the motion of defendants, against the will of plaintiff.[97] Where persons have been made parties defendant to a proceeding, because of their character as testamentary trustees, they cannot upon their own motion be struck from the proceedings upon their renunciation of the trust.[98]

(II) Complete Change of Parties. Under the statutes of amendment, however, a complete change of parties cannot be allowed.[99] So where a plaintiff has been permitted to bring in a new plaintiff, the name of the original plaintiff cannot subsequently be struck out by amendment,[1] and likewise where a new party defendant has been added the original defendant cannot be struck out.[2]

(III) Changing Cause of Action. An amendment striking out a party cannot be allowed when an entirely new cause of action is introduced.[3] But an amendment dismissing one of two joint tort-feasors made defendants, and alleging that the injury complained of was occasioned solely by the remaining defendant, does not introduce a new cause of action where the nature of the action is not changed.[4]

(IV) Striking Names of Nominal or Use Plaintiffs. Where an action is brought by one for the use of another, it is usually held that an amendment striking the name of the nominal plaintiff may be permitted,[5] and conversely, that the name of the usee may be struck.[6]

(V) Party Deceased. In case a plaintiff [7] or defendant [8] is deceased at the time suit is brought, an amendment may be allowed striking out his name. And where pending an action of ejectment brought by the trustee of a married woman the husband of the beneficiary dies, the name of the trustee may be stricken by amendment.[9]

(VI) Discretion of Court. As a general rule the allowance of an amendment striking the name of a party is within the discretion of the court;[10] and in the absence of abuse such discretion cannot be reviewed.[11] A co-plaintiff who has compromised an action is not entitled, as a matter of course, to have his name struck out as a co-plaintiff.[12]

mitted, under the statutes, at any time.[13] For example, under particular statutes it has been permitted after all the parties have appeared and pleaded,[14] after plea in abatement for misjoinder,[15] after demurrer for misjoinder,[16] after issue has been joined and the case has been opened for trial,[17] after the jury has been impaneled [18] or sworn,[19] after the evidence is closed,[20] after verdict,[21] or after a new trial granted.[22]

(VIII) Application and Permission For Amendment. Where the statute provides that names included by mistake may be stricken out, permission to strike should not be given in the absence of a showing as to mistake.[23] Defendants will be presumed to have consented to a change in plaintiffs, where no objection appears from the record.[24] So where an amended pleading is treated by the court and parties as having been properly filed, it will be regarded as having been made after proper permission.[25] In case the court improperly grants leave to a defendant to withdraw, plaintiff's remedy is by appeal from the judgment rendered in the case.[26]

(IX) Terms. Under some statutes terms may be imposed as a condition for amendment.[27] Where the provision is that amendment shall be on such terms as may be proper, the terms are within the discretion of the trial court,[28] which will not be reviewed in the absence of abuse.[29]

(X) Necessity of Actual Amendment. While it is the proper practice to file a new pleading upon amendment, striking out a party,[30] it has been held that an order specifically directing an amendment operates in itself as an amendment, without the making of the amendment in point of fact.[31]

(XI) Further Proceedings in Cause. Where the court has acquired jurisdiction of defendant, the fact that plaintiff amends striking out a co-plaintiff

Suggestion of death.— If the death of a party is suggested upon the record, it bewill not oust the court of jurisdiction.[32] Where an amendment striking an improper plaintiff has been allowed, the declaration need not be refiled,[33] nor need there be any further plea.[34] Where one of two defendants in an action of tort is stricken from the declaration by amendment, without otherwise altering the language of the declaration, all the substantial allegations are therefore to be read and understood as if there had been but one defendant originally,[35] although it has been held that where an amended and substituted complaint striking out one of the original defendants has been filed, the original complaint and answer cannot be considered as pleadings in the case;[36] and that upon amendment of a complaint brought for the use of plaintiff and another so as to make it appear that the complaint is brought for the use of plaintiff alone, the amendment operates as an abandonment of the original complaint, and as a consequence an abandonment of the pleas of defendant therefor.[37] In case the statute authorizes the amendment of the complaint by striking out parties plaintiff, the fact that certain plaintiffs jointly interested with those who remain plaintiffs were struck in a complaint does not entitle defendant to a verdict as against the remaining plaintiffs.[38]

d. Substitution of Parties[39]— (i) In General. The general rule, even under the codes and practice acts, is that it is not permissible to substitute by amendment a new plaintiff[40] or defendant[41] in place of an original sole plaintiff

Illinois.— Congress Constr. Co. v. Farson, etc., Co., 199 Ill. 398, 65 N. E. 357 [affirming 101 Ill. App. 279], holding that the court has power to permit the name of an assignor for creditors suing in behalf of a transferee of a claim in suit, to be substituted by amendment for that of the assignee for creditors, the transfer having been made by the assignee for creditors after suit brought upon the claims.

I. 305 (holding that a declaration in assumpsit upon alleged promises to plaintiff, described therein as assignee of a certain firm, cannot be amended by substituting as plaintiffs the members of such firm as trustees for plaintiffs, since the effect would be to substitute a new action).

Substitution of heirs for administrator.— Where the parties are all before the court, the heirs at law may be properly substituted as plaintiffs instead of an administrator who has no right to sue. amend by substituting one merely formal party for another.[45] Amendments substituting parties should, where permitted, always be in furtherance of a determination of the true merits of the controversy.[46]

(II) Representative Actions. Where an action has been brought by a person in behalf of himself and others, permission to discontinue such action may be refused and other plaintiffs may be substituted, where the circumstances under which the original plaintiffs attempt to discontinue are such as to warrant suspicion of collusion with defendants.[47] In case an action is brought by one person in behalf of a large number of persons similarly situated, a substitution of plaintiffs sought for the purpose of having the action discontinued and defeating its object will not be permitted.[48] In a representative action a new plaintiff who has been permitted to come in cannot, before trial, be allowed to make motions by his own attorney, which are not joined in by the attorneys for the original plaintiff.[49] But in case the original plaintiff unreasonably delays the trial, a new plaintiff may conduct the suit upon giving bond to the original plaintiff to secure payment to him of a ratable share of the entire expenses of the action when it shall be determined.[50]

(III) Time For Substitution. A right to the substitution of parties may be lost by laches.[51] After judgment has been entered the court has no power to substitute another defendant in the place of the original one.[52] But it has been held that after trial an amendment of an action brought by an undisclosed principal in his own name may be made to substitute the principal upon the record, when neither the course nor the result of the trial would have been disturbed by such amendment if made before trial.[53]

(IV) Application and Proceedings Thereon. A mere statement by counsel that they will ask for a substitution of plaintiffs is not a sufficient application to present the question for a ruling of the court.[54] In case the right to amend as to parties is, under the statute, based upon the existence of a mistake, an application for an amendment changing the name of plaintiff must show that there is error in using the name proposed to be changed.[55]

Suppl. 723, holding that a motion made a year and a half after filing of defendants' answer, for permission to amend the complaint by changing the action from one against defendants representatively to one against them individually, would not be denied on the ground of laches where the case was never put upon the calendar and was not moved by either party.

(v) Objections. An objection to an amended petition substituting a new plaintiff must be urged at the time leave to file such amended pleading is asked.[56] Error of the court in making a substitution of plaintiffs cannot be presented upon a demurrer, upon the ground of lack of legal capacity to sue.[57] Where a female plaintiff marries pending suit, irregularities in an order substituting her new name should be corrected by amendment.[58]

(vi) Subsequent Proceedings. Where a complete substitution of plaintiffs is allowed, defendant should be allowed a reasonable time to answer the complaint as it stands in the name of the new plaintiff.[59] In case of a substitution of defendants the substituted defendant has the right to treat pleadings filed by the original defendant as his own,[60] and to avail himself of all rulings made, and of all exceptions reserved by such original defendant prior to the substitution,[61] as fully as the original defendant might have done if there had been no substitution. Where, upon a transfer of interest, an order of substitution is granted to plaintiff's transferee upon due notice to defendant, the question as to title in the substituted plaintiff is determined by the order and may not be raised on the trial.[62]

e. Changing Defendants to Plaintiffs. Under a statute providing that the court may allow an amendment of the pleading to strike out and also to add the name of a party, an amendment changing a party defendant to a party plaintiff may be permitted;[63] but the change should not be made without notice to co-defendants.[64]

f. Excusing Non-Joinder. An amendment showing the reason for failing to join a party is properly permitted.[65]

known by several names and is sued under one of them, an amendment placing the fact of the identity of the corporations in issue is proper.[77]

(II) Changing Character in Which Party Sues or Is Sued.[78] As a general rule an amendment substituting a corporation for an individual plaintiff cannot be permitted.[79] But it has been held even that where an action was begun in the name of the holders of stock of a corporation, an amendment substituting the corporation as plaintiff might be permitted.[80] An amendment charging defendant as a partnership instead of as a corporation may be allowed;[81] and the converse has been held.[82] Likewise it has been held that where an action is brought by plaintiffs as copartners instead of as a corporation, through a mistake of facts concerning their incorporation, they may be permitted to amend by making the corporation plaintiff.[83]

c. Partnerships.[84] A misnomer with regard to the individual members of a plaintiff[85] or defendant[86] partnership may be corrected by amendment. A cause of action in favor of one member of the firm cannot be substituted by way of amendment for one in favor of the firm.[87] And conversely, an action by an individual cannot be changed into one by a partnership,[88] although where a petition is in effect by one of the members of the firm, for the benefit of the firm, it may be amended so as to make the members of the firm plaintiffs.[89] An action by a plaintiff individually may be amended by describing him as a surviving partner.[90]

If the question is to be tested by whether the same evidence will support both demands, the propriety of an amendment substituting a corporation as plaintiff instead of its shareholders, might be dubious, because the evidence which would prove a demand due to the shareholders would not prove one due to the corporation. It is difficult to discern the reason of this test, in view of the spirit of the Code, which allows amendments in order to let in evidence otherwise inadmissible, or to conform to evidence already received."

d. Associations. Where an action is begun in the name of an unincorporated association which is incompetent to sue, it has been held proper to allow an amendment substituting certain of its members as plaintiffs.[92] Where an action is brought against the members of a voluntary association, the names of members who are not liable upon the contract sued on may be properly stricken out.[93] Where a defendant is styled a corporation, plaintiff may amend by averring that defendant is an unincorporated association and bringing the suit against an individual named as president,[94] or the persons constituting the association.[95] However, if an unincorporated association be mistakenly sued for a claim against a corporation, the proper party cannot be substituted by amendment at the commencement of the trial.[96]

3. Changing Character or Capacity in Which Party Sues — a. In General. Where a new cause of action is not introduced, it is as a rule permissible to change by amendment the character and capacity in which a party sues.[97] A party may

C. Pleas Puis Darrein Continuance[22] — 1. Nature and Office. As a general rule, at common law, matters of defense arising after the commencement of an action and after issue joined, or matter which has come to the knowledge of the party pleading it subsequently to such joinder, can be pleaded only by a plea puis darrein continuance.[23] If the new matter arises after the commencement of the suit, but before plea or continuance, it cannot be pleaded in bar of the action generally, but may be pleaded against the further maintenance thereof.[24] Such plea is either in abatement or bar,[25] and is governed by the rules applicable to pleas in general.[26] A statutory provision abolishing special pleading generally and allowing matter which formerly could have been so pleaded to be given in evidence under a brief statement does not abolish this plea.[27] Nor is it abolished by a obligees in the contract sued on, an amendment striking out the name of all the plaintiffs except one and consequently changing the cause of action from a joint to a several one is not allowable on appeal).

2. Subject-Matter and Grounds in General. Defendant may, and generally must, file a plea puis darrein continuance in order to take advantage of accord and satisfaction,[29] performance accepted in satisfaction of a breach of contract,[30] a release,[31] a receipt in full,[32] payment,[33] an agreement to submit to arbitration,[34] a discharge in bankruptcy,[35] or a decree or judgment disposing of the same claim in another action,[36] and satisfaction thereof,[37] when any of these matters of defense arise after commencement of the suit and after issue joined; or in order to take advantage of a discontinuance of the action as to part of several defendants.[38] In some jurisdictions matters in bar arising after issue joined may but need not be pleaded puis darrein continuance.[39] Matters occurring previous to the commencement of the suit,[40] or previous to the filing of any plea or issue joined,[41] or matters within the knowledge of defendant at the time of the first continuance,[42] even though his knowledge of the legal effect thereof is derived subsequently,[43] cannot be pleaded puis darrein continuance. Matters arising after issue joined, which are not essentially matters of defense, are not the proper subject for such a plea;[44] as that defendant had become an insolvent debtor,[45] or that plaintiff made an assignment after suit was brought.[46] It has been held, however, that an action on the case is an exception to the general rule and that in such an action defendant is permitted to give in evidence, under the general issue, a release, a former recovery, a satisfaction or any other subsequent matter which shows that the cause of action

has been discharged or that in equity and good conscience plaintiff ought not to recover.[47]

3. Time to Plead and Leave of Court. Such plea should regularly be put in at or before the next continuance;[48] and although it is generally held that it cannot be filed without leave,[49] if it is offered at a proper time and is not insufficient or offered for delay,[50] it is usually allowed as a matter of right.[51] But if it is not offered at the next term after the new matter arises, it is within the discretion of the court either to reject it, or, to prevent injustice or for special reasons, to allow it to be filed nunc pro tunc, and upon such conditions as the court may impose.[52] It has been held that the court may, in its discretion, allow the plea at any time before trial,[53] even after the cause has been remanded from the court of appeals and before a second trial;[54] but ordinarily it will not be allowed to be filed after a verdict or its equivalent,[55] or the report of a referee,[56] or after judgment.[57] It cannot properly be served in vacation.[58] But defendant may be allowed to plead puis darrein continuance where any issue remains to be tried, even though he has already obtained judgment on other issues.[59] If two such pleas are filed, and no motion to strike out is made, the court on appeal will consider only the first if it presents a good defense.[60] Matters in the record may estop one from filing a plea puis darrein continuance.[61]

4. Form and Sufficiency.[62] A plea puis darrein continuance must allege facts showing that the matter of defense happened after the last continuance,[63] the date of the continuance,[64] or the time and place where the defense arose;[65] and should conclude "that the plaintiff should not further maintain his action";[66] and these facts must be set forth with precision and fullness, the highest degree of certainty being required.[67] But where a plea is by reason of the subject-matter substantially a plea puis darrein continuance, it should be so treated even though it is denominated a plea in bar generally;[68] but if it professes to be "offered in bar of the action" it must answer the whole declaration.[69] It is not necessary in such a plea to offer to pay the costs that have accrued.[70] Where such plea has been filed with leave of the court, it will be presumed that satisfactory proof had been given to the court or that it was consented to by the opposite party.[71]

even the general issue,[73] and notice of special matter filed with it,[74] and forces defendant to stand on that plea alone, except where it is stricken from the files on motion,[75] and by operation of law it has the effect to cause all preceding pleas to be stricken from the files,[76] and the cause of action to be admitted, and everything confessed, except the matter contested by it.[77] Thereafter the parties proceed to settle their pleadings de novo just as though no pleas had previously been filed in the case; [78] and no evidence on the merits can be submitted on either side.[79] In some jurisdictions, however, the statutes expressly provide that such a plea is not a waiver of any plea to the merits previously pleaded; [80] or the same result has been accomplished by other statutory restrictions.[81] The above general rule does not apply, however, where the matter of the plea affects the remedy only and not the cause of action.[82] So it has been held that where the plea goes only to one or more particular counts, or to some particular part of an entire claim it does not act as a waiver beyond what it professes to answer.[83] In case the plea is held bad, nothing is left to be determined except the amount of

83. Bennet v. Gilbert, 94 Ill. App. 505 [affirmed in 194 Ill. 403, 62 N. E. 847], holding that where there are two parties beneficially interested and the plea puis darrein continuance is limited to the interest of one of them, it acts as a waiver of former pleas only to that extent. But see Sanderlin v. Dandridge, 3 Humphr. (Tenn.) 99, where it was held that a plea since the last continuance was a waiver of all prior defenses, whether the plea went to the whole or only part of plaintiff's demand, although it is now otherwise by the statute under Shannon Code (1886), § 4633.

A plea of title to a portion of the premises claimed in an action of ejectment put in puis darrein continuance, after a plea of the general issue, is not a waiver of the general issue so as to authorize plaintiff on neglect of defendant to rejoin to a replication, to take judgment for the whole premises, but is a waiver of only so much of the general issue as is covered by such plea. Morris v. Cook, 19 Wend. (N. Y.) 699.

the damages.[84] A judgment on such plea, whether on demurrer or on trial, should be quod recuperet, or final, and not respondeat ouster,[85] except where there is a statutory provision to the contrary.[86] Nor can there be a judgment of nonsuit after such plea is interposed, defendant being put to the proof of the new matter he has suggested.[87]

6. Payment of Costs. In granting leave to file a plea puis darrein continuance the court will, as a general rule, place the burden of the costs that have accrued prior to such filing, upon defendant.[88]

7. Reply to Plea. A plea puis darrein continuance may, like any other affirmative plea, be met by a reply or replication.[89] And if a reply is not forthcoming, defendant may enter a rule of course to reply or that plaintiff be dismissed.[90] Even though the plea is not pleaded in due time plaintiff cannot treat it as a nullity but must reply or move the court to set the plea aside.[91]

8. Demurrer[92] or Motion to Plea.[93] The sufficiency of a plea puis darrein continuance if properly verified can be determined only by demurrer;[94] but a motion to strike or set aside the plea and not demurrer is the proper form of objecting that the plea was not filed at the proper time,[95] that it was accompanied by another plea,[96] that it was not properly verified,[97] or that defendant was not entitled to a trial on the pleadings he filed originally.[98] A verified plea puis darrein continuance cannot be set aside as false.[99]

9. Amendment or Abandonment of Plea.[1] If through misapprehension or inadvertence of defendant's attorney, a mistake is made in a plea puis darrein continuance, the party may amend, at the trial, on such terms as the court may in the exercise of its discretion impose,[2] usually on the payment of costs which have accrued since the plea was interposed.[3] Under a rule of course to amend, defendant may alter the plea so as to modify or vary entirely the ground of defense taken by the original plea.[4] Leave may also be given to the party by the court to

D. Supplemental Pleadings[6]— 1. In General. Supplemental pleadings belong primarily to equity practice,[7] but in many states it is provided by statute that supplemental pleadings may be filed, on leave of court, and such statutes apply irrespective of the legal or equitable nature of the litigation.[8] The rules adopted in the application of these statutes are generally the same as those formerly employed in the chancery courts,[9] combined, in the case of supplemental answers, in legal actions, with the common-law rules respecting pleas puis darrein continuance.[10] Supplemental pleadings may be amended like other pleadings.[11]

2. Nature and Office. The rights of parties to an action are ordinarily to be determined by the state of facts existing at the time of its commencement.[12] If new matter subsequently arises, it cannot ordinarily be introduced under the original pleadings,[13] or be brought in by amendment;[14] but should be taken advantage of by a supplemental pleading.[15] And although the facts occur before the commencement of the suit, if a party does not learn of their existence until after he has filed his pleading, he may usually file a supplemental pleading.[16] A

W. 245, where the court discusses a number of cases in other jurisdictions and concludes that matter occurring before trial is commenced, but not known to the parties until afterward, should be introduced by amendment instead of a supplemental plead-

supplemental pleading must be a special pleading showing facts which occurred or came to the pleader's knowledge after the former pleadings were filed;[17] and must strengthen the allegations of the original pleadings and supply the facts which may be necessary to a complete determination of the rights of the parties touching the subject-matter of the suit, upon the facts existing at the time of the rendition of the judgment.[18] Mere misnomer in designating a pleading as a supplemental pleading instead of an amended pleading or vice versa will have no effect, where the substantial rights of the parties are not affected thereby,[19] and an additional pleading may be treated according to the matter it contains as an amended pleading, although it be styled a supplementary pleading or vice versa.[20]

3. Right to File and Leave of Court.[21] The consent of the opposite party,[22] or leave of court, must be had in order to file a supplemental pleading, and the granting or refusal of such leave is a matter largely within the discretion of the court.[23] But such discretion is not arbitrary;[24] and upon good cause shown, the court cannot refuse to allow such supplemental pleading without an abuse of its discretion.[25] Although leave to file a supplemental pleading may be refused where the new matter offered is clearly frivolous or inequitable in its nature,[26] it should be granted, almost as a matter of course, in the interest of justice and for the protection of the party's rights, where the material facts alleged in the supplemental pleading have occurred since the commencement of the action and relate thereto.[27] The exercise of the court's discretion may be reviewed on appeal and, if erroneous, may be set aside;[28] but unless there has been a clear abuse of such discretion or the applicant's rights have been prejudiced, the court's ruling will not be disturbed.[29] In the exercise of its discretion, the court may impose such conditions upon the leave to file a supplemental pleading, as appear, under the circumstances, reasonable,[30] such as the payment of costs to the date of the order.[31] In general the substantial rights of the parties should not be decided on a mere motion for leave to file a supplemental pleading.[32] The court cannot give general leave to serve a supplemental pleading setting up any new matter that may thereafter occur in the action.[33]

4. Application and Notice. To entitle a party to an order permitting the filing of a supplemental pleading, he must make application therefor with reasonable diligence,[34] and if he neglects to do so for an unreasonable length of time, his application may be denied on the ground of laches.[35] However, mere delay in moving for leave does not of itself preclude the court from allowing a supplemental pleading to be filed on the ground of laches,[36] unless it appears that the delay has caused a substantial injury to some party to the action.[37] As long as the suit continues undisposed of, leave may be granted to parties to file supplemental pleadings provided of course they bring themselves within the provisions of the statute.[38] It has been held that leave to file a supplemental pleading may be granted ex parte;[39] but it is more usual to require that notice of the motion be served on the opposite party and an opportunity given to hear his objections.[40] A copy of the proposed

Assignment.— Leave to file a supplemental complaint should not be granted where its object is to allege an assignment of the cause

plaint which does not alter the substance of the original demand does not change the cause of action within the meaning of this rule,[60] as where it merely seeks additional relief, or relief which is different in degree only from that asked for in the original complaint;[61] or where it demands instalments not due when the original petition was filed;[62] but it has been held that instalments of rent accruing after the action is commenced cannot thus be recovered, because each instalment, as it becomes due, is regarded as constituting a new cause of action.[63]

c. Insufficient Cause of Action Cannot Be Cured. An original complaint which states no cause of action cannot be remedied by a supplemental pleading setting up matters that have occurred since the commencement of the suit.[64]

d. Action Prematurely Brought. If an action be prematurely brought the original complaint is of no effect and the court does not err in refusing to allow a supplemental complaint to be filed.[65] In such a case plaintiff cannot, after the cause of action accrues, as a matter of right, file a supplemental complaint or petition showing that fact;[66] although, where the circumstances are such as to excuse the premature commencement of the action and to show that the interests of justice require a change, rather than the dismissal of the supplemental petition and the commencement of a new action, the court may, in its discretion, allow it to be filed.[67]

e. Time For Filing. In general a supplemental complaint may be filed before, or during, the trial in the discretion of the court,[68] but it cannot be filed after final judgment unless such judgment is set aside.[69]

f. Sufficiency and Effect. Except where the statute provides that a supplemental complaint may be served in the place of the original complaint, and it is so served,[70] supplemental complaint is not a substitute for and does not supersede of action set out in the written complaint subsequent to the commencement of the action. Staunton v. Swann, 10 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 12.

the original complaint; but it assumes that the original complaint is to stand and both together constitute the complaint in the action,[71] whether it expressly refers to the original or not.[72] If at the time the supplemental complaint is filed the original has been rejected on demurrer, or otherwise fully disposed of, the pleadings, as they then stand, present no ground for recovery, as there is no complaint to which it can be supplemental, and the supplemental complaint cannot of itself be made the foundation of an action.[73] The only purpose of the supplemental complaint is to show how plaintiff's rights have changed since he commenced his action and to what relief he is entitled at the time the supplemental complaint is filed.[74] It must appear on its face that it is supplemental and relates to matters which have accrued subsequent to the commencement of the action.[75] Hence a supplemental complaint must aver matters which go to strengthen or prove the allegations of the original, or to show more conclusively that plaintiff is entitled to the relief then asked,[76] although it is not necessary that it should set up all the facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action,[77] nor need it set out instruments or copies thereof, when it makes express reference to the original where the instruments are set out.[78] But the fact that the supplemental complaint states the same cause of action as the original does not render it invalid, if it asks other relief.[79]

g. Bringing in New Parties.[80] The general rule is that, when a third person becomes interested in a pending litigation by assuming the liabilities of defendant in respect to the claim which plaintiff proceeds to enforce, it is proper to allow a supplemental complaint bringing in such third person as a defendant in the action.[81] But where a person is substituted as a plaintiff upon a transfer of interest, it would seem by the weight of authority that no supplemental pleading is necessary.[82]

6. Supplemental Answer [83]— a. In General. As a general rule defendant may, with leave of court, file a supplemental answer alleging any facts which have arisen or become known since the commencement of the suit and which may have a material bearing on the final determination of the suit,[84] such as a settlement between the parties,[85] or a discharge in bankruptcy.[86] Such new matter must be in addition to, or in continuation of, the original matter alleged; [87] and the court may refuse to file a proposed supplemental answer when the allegations contained therein are not material, or do not show a defense to plaintiff's claim,[88] or are of facts filed, since the order permitting him to be substituted determines his legal capacity to sue, and in the absence of any subsequent question as to the correctness of such rule it will be regarded as final. Crary v. Kurtz, (Iowa 1906) 105 N. W. 590.

After having obtained a change of venue for the convenience of witnesses the court will not allow defendant to file a supplemental answer raising issues on which the evidence which occurred previous to the filing of the original answer.[89] Any defense which defendant could as a matter of right have pleaded puis darrein continuance under the old procedure, should be allowed under the code as a supplemental answer.[90] If the sufficiency of a supplemental answer is doubtful, the court will not determine on a motion the validity of the defense set up by it, but will allow it to stand.[91] A plea in abatement may be filed as a supplemental pleading, when the grounds for abatement arise after joinder of issue.[92]

b. Right to File and Leave of Court. The right to file a supplemental answer is not an absolute and positive right, but as a general rule the court may exercise its discretion in granting or refusing leave to file such an answer,[93] taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case and imposing such terms as may seem reasonable and just,[94] such as the payment of costs to the date of the application or order.[95] As a general rule, however, if a supplemental answer contains of the witnesses would have no bearing. Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Weston, 81 Hun (N. Y.) 84, 30 N. Y. Suppl. 619.

Where there have been two trials and a reversal it is improper to require defendant to pay all the accrued costs as a condition to filing a supplemental pleading at a new trial, but defendant should be required only to pay the costs accruing after the time when the supplemental pleading could have been filed, and to stipulate to waive all costs previously awarded to plaintiff if he finally recover, and to further stipulate that plaintiff if so advised may discontinue the action without costs. Haffey v. Lynch, 46 N. Y. App. Div. 160, 61 N. Y. Suppl. 736.

Costs and leave to discontinue.— Leave to set up in a supplemental answer new matter, which has arisen after the case has been placed on the day calendar and has been set down for trial upon a particular day, should not be granted simply upon the payment of a specified sum as costs, but defendant should be required to pay the costs and disbursements of the action up to the time of making the motion; and the order granting the motion should also provide that plaintiff have leave to discontinue the action if he so desires, without costs. Pickrell v. Mendel, 87 N. Y. App. Div, 163, 84 N. Y. Suppl. 70.

Where a trial is not concluded when a motion is made for leave to serve a supplemental answer, the court has no power to order that an extra allowance should be paid by defendant as a condition for permitting defendant to serve a supplemental answer. Jenkins v. Adams, 1 Month. L. Bul. (N. Y.) 65. But where the trial is concluded and the referee's report delivered before such motion is made, the court will grant an extra allowance and will require defendants to pay the same as a condition for granting such leave. Mabie v. Adams, 1 Month. L. Bul. (N. Y.) 65.

the substance of a good defense and is put in in proper time, leave to file or serve the same should be granted almost as a matter of course,[96] unless the facts disclosed show a case calling for the exercise of the court's discretion.[97] The court may, in the exercise of its discretion, deny leave to file a supplemental answer, although the defense sought to be interposed is strictly legal, where defendant has been guilty of laches,[98] where the matter alleged is clearly frivolous,[99] where it clearly appears that it would not constitute a defense,[1] or where there is reasonable ground to believe that injustice will be done by granting such leave.[2] Application for leave to file a supplemental answer must generally be made on motion or order to show cause,[3] and should be accompanied by a copy of the proposed answer, or should at least contain a specification of the facts which defendant desires to introduce,[4] and notice thereof should be given to the opposite party.[5] In addition to a showing of material facts, in some jurisdictions, an affidavit is required stating that the defense occurred or came to the knowledge of defendant after the original answer was interposed.[6] But if application for leave to file a supplemental answer be refused on the ground that material facts do not appear with sufficient certainty in such answer or the moving affidavit, it should be with leave to renew, so as to give an opportunity for correcting the defect.[7] If upon application for leave, the court rules that it is not necessary to file a supplemental answer and defendants desire to insist on their right to file such pleading, they should appeal instead of making a second application for leave.[8]

c. Pleading New Defense. A supplemental answer cannot set up matters constituting a new and independent defense.[9]

In order that defendant may put in a supplemental answer, he must apply to the court by motion for leave to do so, so that the opposite party may be heard and the court may determine whether there has been inexcusable laches or whether any of the reasons appear which are recognized as giving authority for denying the exercise of the general right in the particular instance. d. Time For Filing. Ordinarily a supplemental answer should be offered at the earliest opportunity after the matter contained therein comes to the knowledge of defendant.[10] After an unreasonable delay the court may, in the exercise of its discretion, refuse leave to file such answer even though the matter it contains be meritorious.[11] Under varying circumstances leave to file a supplemental answer has been refused on the day the cause was set down for trial,[12] after the evidence was closed,[13] after the case had been submitted to a referee,[14] after a verdict had been rendered,[15] thirteen months after issue was joined,[16] and also when the application was not made until two months after judgment in defendant's favor had been reversed.[17] But it has been held that if the facts sought to be pleaded by supplemental answer amount to an entire satisfaction of the cause of action, and if established would utterly extinguish plaintiff's right to prosecute it, it is the duty of the court to allow the motion whether the application was made at the earliest day or not;[18] and it has been held not error to allow a supplemental answer two years after the action was brought,[19] or after judgment.[20]

e. Operation and Effect. It has been held that the filing of such an answer operates as a waiver of all previous answers.[21] But the better view regards the supplemental answer as standing together with former pleas or answers not inconsistent with it.[22] But although the putting in of a supplemental answer does not, under the code, necessarily waive the former answer, yet, where the matter sought to be introduced thereby would, before the code, have required a plea puis, which would have waived such former answer, the court may, where the new defense is of doubtful sufficiency and of doubtful equity, require defendant to waive his former answer, and rest solely on such new matter, as a condition of granting leave to file such supplemental answer.[23]

Where the application is made after several trials and the facts constituting the new defense are not fully and definitely stated and no satisfactory reason is given for the delay in presenting the application, its refusal is not error. 7. Supplemental Affidavit of Defense. Under the statutes in some states a supplemental affidavit of defense may be allowed if the court deems the defense to be probably good but defectively stated in the original affidavit;[24] and a second or even a third supplemental affidavit may be allowed,[25] the extent of the indulgence being largely within the discretion of the court;[26] and the court may, of its own motion, direct a supplemental affidavit to be filed in such a case.[27] Such supplemental affidavit need not be confined to an explanation of the original, but it may also set up a new and different defense, although such a course requires that the new defense should be closely scrutinized,[28] especially where the two affidavits are contradictory.[29] The original and supplemental affidavits are to be construed as one;[30] and therefore when, without explanation, the supplemental affidavit contradicts the averments of the original in matters essential to a valid defense, the court is warranted in holding that they are insufficient to prevent a judgment.[31] A supplemental affidavit, however, cannot be said to be contradictory of the original affidavit where the supplemental affidavit is fuller and more specific than the original and it appears that the facts averred in it are not irreconcilable with the facts expressly averred in the original, or the necessary inferences to be drawn therefrom.[32] Application to file a material supplemental affidavit may be made at any time before judgment is entered.[33] And where leave to file a supplemental affidavit is granted, it must be filed within a reasonable time thereafter;[34] and the court must also allow defendant a reasonable time within which to prepare the supplemental affidavit.[35]

8. Supplemental Reply. Although the necessity for such a pleading infrequently arises, a supplemental reply may be made by leave of court, alleging facts that have arisen since the former replication.[36] and if he stands on his original answer and does not answer the supplemental complaint, he cannot later complain because such complaint contains new matter upon which no issue has been joined.[38] He may, however, file a new answer to the supplemental complaint,[39] but he cannot, without special leave of court, answer anew or further the original complaint.[40]

10. Reply to Supplemental Answer. If defendant is allowed to file a supplemental answer, plaintiff has the usual time in which to reply thereto.[41]

11. Demurrer to Supplemental Pleading. Since a supplemental pleading is usually regarded as merely an addition to the original pleading, as a general rule a demurrer should be directed to both the supplemental and original pleadings considered as one, and separate demurrers should not be directed to the original and supplemental pleadings; nor will a demurrer lie to a supplemental pleading alone,[42] except where the supplemental pleading sets up a new and independent cause of action or defense and purports to be a substitute for the original.[43]

E. Repleader — 1. Nature of Repleader. A judgment of repleader will in general be awarded by the court in order to do justice between the parties, where there is such a defect in the form or manner of pleading that there is no issue, or that the issue joined and tried is on an immaterial point, so that it cannot be told to whom judgment should be given.[44] Awarding a repleader amounts substantially to granting a new trial, with leave to amend the pleadings.[45]

2. When Granted. A repleader cannot be allowed until after issue is joined,[46] and it will not be awarded on motion after the pleading is filed,[47] nor after demurrer.[48] And as a general rule a court will never grant a repleader except where justice cannot otherwise be obtained.[49] Ordinarily it will not be awarded where there is one material issue in the case, although others be immaterial,[50]

3. Who May Obtain. A repleader will not ordinarily be awarded in favor of the party who commits the first fault in pleading,[55] even though the verdict against him be on an immaterial issue.[56] But the rule has been held to apply only where the issues are found against the party committing the first fault, and not where it is against him.[57]

original action, for the purpose of hearing and determining at the same time all conflicting claims which may be made to the subject-matter in litigation.[63] As a general rule, under the codes, a person may become a party to a pending action only by intervention or by an order of court.[64]

2. NECESSITY OF INTERVENING. The code provisions authorizing intervention permit, but do not compel, such intervention.[65] The mere fact that a person has notice of a pending action concerning a subject-matter in which he is interested will not require him to intervene in such action under penalty of otherwise being bound by the judgment therein, unless he is in privity with a party or bound to indemnify him.[66]

3. RIGHT TO INTERVENE — a. Power to Permit in General. As a general rule the authority of a court to permit intervention is founded upon express statutory provisions;[67] but in some jurisdictions it has been implied from a provision that the court must require parties to be joined without whom a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had.[68] Under a statute providing that all persons having an interest in the subject of the action may be joined as plaintiffs, the court has the power to allow proper parties to be made to an action already pending.[69]

b. Effect of Existence of Other Remedy. A person who has otherwise a right to intervene may be permitted to do so, although he might amply protect his rights in some other way.[70]

c. Proceedings in Which Intervention Is Authorized. Under some statutes the right to intervene is not limited to any particular kind or class of actions or proceedings, but is general;[71] but the right being derived from statute,[72] it may be exercised only in those cases which are within the scope of the statute in case any limitations are imposed.[73] Under a statute providing that where a person not a party has an interest in the subject of the action, or in real property the title to which may be affected by the judgment, and makes application to be made a party, the court must direct him to be brought in; intervention cannot be had in

Where bill of interpleader would lie.— It has been held that a provision that in actions for the recovery of real or personal property third persons having an interest in the subject-matter may be brought in as parties upon their own application, is intended only to extend the power formerly possessed by courts of equity in this respect to the legal actions designated, and its ap-

d. Persons Entitled to Intervene — (i) In General. In order that a person may intervene, he must bring himself within the provisions of the statute under which he applies.[76] A person may intervene, although he is not a necessary party.[77] But persons whose interests are already represented will not be permitted to intervene.[78]

(ii) Necessity of Interest. A person to be entitled to intervene must in all cases be interested in the litigation.[79] Under some codes the provision is that any person may intervene who has an interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both.[80] Under other codes plication is confined to the class of cases in which a bill of interpleader would have accomplished the same end. Hornby v. Gordon, 9 Bosw. (N. Y.) 656.

where no fraud or collusion between the parties is charged.[86] So it has been held that a person cannot intervene to show that an amount which it was sought to recover in an action was not due from defendant to plaintiff, but was due to a third person who was a judgment debtor of the intervener;[87] nor can a creditor who has attached certain property of his debtor intervene in opposition to the appointment of a receiver in an action by other creditors of the same debtor.[88] But creditors of a third person, who have garnished defendant in an action on a note upon the ground that the third person is the real owner of the note, and not plaintiff, may be allowed to intervene.[89]

(v) Purchasers and Assignees. It is usually held that a purchaser of the property involved pendente lite has such an interest as will permit him to intervene.[90] But one to whom the cause of action has been absolutely assigned by the original plaintiff should not be allowed to intervene, but should be substituted as plaintiff in place of the original one.[91] In an action for an accounting with regard to the proceeds of a sale of land, one claiming an interest in certain of the lands under an unrecorded deed from plaintiff, prior to his deed to defendant, is entitled to intervene.[92] Under a statute which permits any person to intervene who has an interest in the matter in litigation, a person claiming as an assignee of a portion of a fund deposited in court, but claiming no interest in the original subject-matter of the suit, may be entitled to intervene.[93]

(vi) Legatees. A residuary legatee has an interest permitting him to intervene in a proceeding involving title to personal property of the estate.[94] Where legacies are specific liens upon the real property of an estate, legatees may intervene in a proceeding to compel the conveyance of such realty as the subject of a parol gift.[95] It has been held that, although a complaint is defective in not being brought against persons upon whom title to land has apparently devolved, legatees have the right to intervene if they have any lien upon the land.[96]

(vii) Persons in Representative Capacity. Subject to the rules applicable to intervention generally, an executor or administrator may intervene in a pending action.[97] When a supplemental complaint discloses facts making necessary a substitution of the representatives of a deceased defendant a motion on the part of such representative to be made a party is improperly denied.[98]

(VIII) Persons Interested in Commercial Paper. As a general rule the owner or one claiming to be the owner of a note is entitled to intervene in an action thereon.[99] One who claims as assignee of a draft sued on may intervene to protect his rights.[1] So a person claiming to be the owner of a certificate of deposit may intervene in an action thereon by the holder.[2]

e. Purpose. An intervener cannot change the nature of the action in which he intervenes,[3] hence he cannot intervene to litigate concerning the subject of the action and also with regard to an additional subject.[4] But he is not prevented from showing fraud or collusion between the original parties whereby his interests are affected.[5] An intervention to set up an equitable claim in a proceeding at law will not be allowed in the federal courts, although it might be permitted under the practice of a state court.[6] And the same rule has been applied under the codes where the distinction between law and equity is retained.[7] A person cannot be allowed to intervene for the mere purpose of objecting to a trial of the action or moving to dismiss it.[8] The grounds of intervention may have arisen subsequent to the institution of the original suit.[9] Where the ground for intervention has ceased to exist, the motion therefor is properly denied,[10] and a leave to intervene may be refused when the intervention would be unavailing.[11]

f. Leave of Court. As a general rule, under the statutes, leave of court for the filing of a petition of intervention is required.[12] But in some jurisdictions leave of court is not required.[13]

g. Discretion of Court. As a general rule, when the facts disclosed by the intervener's petition show that the right to intervene exists, the court has no right to refuse his application.[14] But where it appears that the applicant has been guilty of laches, permission to intervene may be denied or granted upon terms.[15] The decision of the question whether the pleadings or the particular facts established by the proofs sustain the application rests largely within the discretion of the court.[16] It is the general rule that an intervention will not be allowed when it will have the result of retarding the principal suit,[17] or require that the case shall be reopened for further evidence,[18] delay the trial of the action,[19] or change the position of the original parties.[20] Where an order refusing an intervention is proper under the circumstances of the case at the time of the application, the ruling is not made incorrect by a subsequent change in the circumstances.[21]

h. Waiver of Objections. Objections to the filing of a petition of intervention may be waived.[22]

4. Procedure — a. Time For Intervention. It is usually provided by the statutes authorizing intervention that the intervention must be made before trial.[23] Under such a statute a motion comes too late after the cause has been submitted to the court,[24] or after a default has been entered.[25] Under other statutes an intervention may be filed at any stage of the case, whether before or after issue joined, provided the intervention does not retard the principal suit.[26] In any event the action must be still pending,[27] and an intervention cannot be allowed after a cause has been settled by the parties,[28] or after judgment.[29] An application to intervene must be presented in time to enable the parties to the cause to meet and contest the issue which may be presented by the intervener.[30] And a petition will not be permitted to be filed where it will operate as a surprise and manifest injustice,[31] or where the issues have been practically determined.[32]

b. Application and Proceedings Thereon. The proceeding by intervention is purely statutory and the provisions of the statute must be strictly and literally followed.[33] It is usually provided that intervention shall be by petition,[34] which must be served upon the parties to the action,[35] who may answer or demur as if it were an original complaint.[36] The petition for intervention must by proper averments show the interest of the applicant in the litigation,[37] and should contain facts sufficient to show that the intervener is entitled to the relief demanded.[38]

Effect of going to trial without service.—The court acquires jurisdiction of a matter set up by intervention when the complaint is filed, and if, before it has been served, the court irregularly proceeds to trial on the issues between plaintiff and defendant, it does not thereby lose its jurisdiction of the intervention. An objection that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of intervention may be taken at any time.[39] But any informality or imperfection in the statement of facts may be waived as in the case of an ordinary complaint.[40] In determining whether an application to intervene should be allowed, the averments of the petition, so far as the same are well pleaded, must be taken as true.[41] Where an application for a leave to intervene is made, the parties all being before the court, questions in reference to the propriety of intervention may be considered as if raised on motion to strike out the intervener's complaint.[42]

c. Operation and Effect. When a person intervenes in an action he becomes, to the extent of his intervention, a plaintiff against the parties to the original action against whom his claim is made.[43] He is subject to all the rules of pleading and practice which govern plaintiffs and defendants generally.[44] An

Sufficiency of petition.—A plea of intervention in the nature of a creditor's bill should contain all the necessary allegations within itself, and the interpleader should not be allowed to refer to, and make a part of, his plea of intervention, portions of the original petition; but, where such reference is made and trial had on such pleadings, if the supreme court can determine that the judgment is right, it will not be disturbed. Waiver of issue.— It is too late for a party to a suit to plead the want of issue joined upon a petition of intervention, after he has gone into trial without answering it, unless intervener by intervening submits to the jurisdiction of the court;[45] he must take the case as he finds it[46] and cannot urge matters which would go to the dismissal of the suit,[47] or complain of the mode of procedure,[48] or make defenses which are personal to defendant,[49] or retard the cause.[50] But he may interpose a general demurrer or exceptions which go to the merits of the action.[51] He is not bound by previous rulings as to questions of law.[52]

generally.[57] A motion to dismiss should be specific as to the ground upon which it is made.[58] Where a person has been allowed to intervene he should not be afterward dismissed without a fair and sufficient reason, and cannot be dismissed at the mere discretion of the court.[59]

e. Decision and Judgment. As a general rule, under the statutes, it is provided that the intervention must be decided with the principal suit,[60] and such judgment may be rendered as would be proper in an ordinary action upon the issues raised.[61]

VIII. SIGNATURE AND VERIFICATION.

A. Signature — 1. Necessity — a. In General. Generally speaking all pleadings filed in courts of record should be signed either by the party or by his attorney.[62] Many statutes, especially in the code states, expressly require such signature.[63]

b. Amended Pleadings. An amendment may be written in above the signature or may be written below and again subscribed;[64] or, if the latter method is used, a subscription may be deemed unnecessary for the reason that the added

Time at which motion may be made.— In the absence of a statute limiting the time within which a motion to dismiss a complaint in intervention may be made, it is within the sound discretion of the court to entertain a motion to dismiss such a complaint filed in pursuance of leave obtained by an ex parte order, although made several months after leave to file the complaint had been granted and at a subsequent term. But see McMillen v. Gibson, 10 La. 517 (holding that an intervention is a separate demand, and so the trial between the original parties may be had without waiting for it); Massie v. Stradford, 17 Ohio St. 596 (holding that where the party under whom defendant in an action of trespass claims comes in by cross petition, the action of trespass will be stayed until the decision on the petition).

61. Thompson v. Chauveau, 7 Mart. N. S. (La.) 331, 18 Am. Dec. 246 (holding that where an intervener adopts and defends the acts of one of the parties as his agent, the same judgment should be rendered against him on the issue joined as if an original party to the suit); Braithwaite v. Akin, 3 N. D. 365, 56 N. W. 133 (holding that defendant may recover an affirmative judgment against the intervener, either because of matters growing out of the intervener's claim, or by establishing a counter-claim); Muhlenberg v. Tacoma, 25 Wash. 36, 64 Pac. 925 (holding that where a pledgee of city warrants, claiming to have acquired absolute ownership, sues the city to recover thereon, and the receiver of the insolvent pledger intervenes, claiming the warrants and proceeds thereof, subject to plaintiff's rights as pledgee, the court may fully determine the respective rights and interest of all the parties in the action).

Judgment against intervener and defendant.— A suit against a sheriff for trespass in taking possession of goods is not changed as to its character by an intervention of a foreign corporation, alleging that the sheriff had acted under its direction and admitting the facts, pleaded by the sheriff in justification, that his acts were done by the direction of such corporation, and seeking a removal to a federal court; but the sheriff is still a necessary party, and the judgment, if in favor of plaintiff, must be a joint judgment against all defendants. portion would be a part of the pleading as amended which is sufficiently subscribed by the original subscription.[65]

c. Copies Served. Copies of pleadings served need not be signed,[66] unless signature is required by statute or rule.[67]

d. Effect of Omission of Signature. The omission of a proper signature is by some decisions held to be ground for demurrer;[68] by others a ground for motion to strike from the files.[69] But a failure to sign a pleading, not being a defect in substance, does not render a judgment void.[70]

2. Who May or Must Sign. Certain pleadings must be signed by the party in person. Thus a plea of coverture should be so signed,[71] and so as to a plea to the jurisdiction,[72] since, if signed by an attorney, who is an officer of the court, it is supposed to have been signed by leave of court, and the asking of leave is a tacit admission of jurisdiction. But pleas in abatement may be signed either by the party in person or by counsel.[73] In the absence of statute or rule, a plea, replication, or other pleading which contains a denial merely need not be signed by counsel.[74] But special,[75] and double,[76] pleas must be so signed. Generally speaking an attorney-at-law who signs a pleading will be presumed to have authority so to do, unless the contrary appears;[77] but in the case of a public corporation which has a regular official attorney, appointed by law, there can be no presumption that any other attorney has authority to represent it, and a subscription by attorney in such a case should profess to be made by one having lawful authority.[78] One who is neither an attorney-at-law nor an attorney for that particular purpose cannot subscribe pleadings.[79]

3. Requisites and Sufficiency — a. In General. The ordinary legal meaning of the word "signature" is that the person's name has been written at the end of the instrument, and as used in the codes and practice acts the words "sign" and "subscribe" have the same import.[80] Therefore a pleading having no signature at its close, but bearing on the outside, below the indorsement on its back, the name of the attorney, is not "signed."[81] But a pleading signed "defendant" has been held sufficient, where the name of defendant appeared in the title.[82] Signing by means of a rubber stamp has been held sufficient,[83] but a printed name at the end of a pleading is not a signature.[84] If the person whose signature should be subscribed request another to sign his name in his presence, such signing is sufficient.[85] Attorneys may sign in their firm-name;[86] and it is sufficient if an attorney signs his name only, without describing himself as attorney.[87]

b. Office Address of Counsel. Statutes or rules frequently require the office address of counsel to be indorsed upon certain pleadings,[88] and a failure in this regard makes the pleading invalid.[89]

c. Signature to Verification as Signature to Pleading. A signature to an affidavit required to be annexed to a pleading has been held a sufficient signature to the pleading.[90]

B. Verification — 1. Definition. A verification as used in this title is a statement under oath, that a pleading is true.[91]

2. Necessity — a. In General. In actions at law pleadings need not in general be verified by oath, where no verification is required by statute.[92] But statutes or rules in many states have made it necessary to verify certain pleadings or pleadings setting up certain causes of action or defenses.[93] Under some statutes all pleadings must be verified;[94] in others, if any pleading is verified, all subsequent pleadings of fact must be verified,[95] which implies that, where a pleading is unveri-

and the same is true of pleas to the jurisdiction.[3] But where the truth of a dilatory plea appears of record, no affidavit is necessary.[4]

(II) Pleas in Bar. Pleas of the general issue or general denial, or pleas amounting to the same, need not be verified, unless it is required by statute;[5] and so generally with pleas in bar.[6]

(III) Pleas Puis Darrein Continuance. Previous to the passage of the statute of 4 and 5 Anne, c. 16, the law of England did not require pleas puis darrein continuance to be verified.[7] Under this statute, however, which required every dilatory plea to be verified by affidavit, it was held that all pleas puis darrein continuance must be so verified.[8] And the same holding has been made in this country.[9] Some of the cases make a distinction between pleas puis darrein continuance pleaded in abatement, and such pleas pleaded in bar. In the former case verification is held necessary;[10] in the latter case, not.[11] In some states such a plea is expressly required to be verified.[12]

c. Pleadings Denying Agency or Authority or Non-Existence Thereof.[13] The statutes of some states provide that an allegation of agency or authority shall be taken as true unless the denial thereof be verified.[14] But this rule does not prevail in respect to an allegation of a want of authority.[15] In order to bring an allegation of agency within this rule, there must be a specific allegation of the appointment of some person to do the act which is the foundation of the suit. It is not sufficient to say that the other party did the act by its agents and servants duly appointed thereto.[16]

d. Pleadings Denying Incorporation or Partnership. Under many statutes an allegation of incorporation or partnership in a pleading is admitted unless denied by the opposite party under oath.[17]

e. Pleadings Denying Capacity to Sue — (i) In General. Under the statutes of several states a plea or answer setting up that plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue,[18] or is not entitled to recover in the capacity in which he sues,[19] will not be considered unless verified.

(ii) Representative Character. Under a statute providing that plaintiff need not prove a description of character unless specially denied by verified plea, failure to deny plaintiff's representative capacity not only relieves plaintiff from proving it, but precludes defendant from showing that plaintiff is not entitled to sue in a representative capacity.[20] Plaintiff is not, however, relieved against the necessity of maintaining the cause of action, which is put in issue by the plea.[21]

f. Pleadings Relating to Written Instruments — (i) Denial of Execution — (a) In General. It is a common provision of the statutes that no person shall be permitted to deny on trial the execution of any instrument in writing, whether sealed or not, which is the foundation of the action or defense, unless the person so denying the same shall verify his plea by affidavit.[22]

But compare Clark v. Cochran, 3 Mart. (La.) 353.

The Arizona statute does not have the effect of shifting the burden of proof, but merely provides that the plea must be sworn to in order to admit evidence controverting the execution of the instrument. Apache County v. Barth, 6 Ariz. 13, 53 Pac. 187.

In Pennsylvania a denial in the affidavit of defense is sufficient. Lancaster County Nat. Bank v. Henning, 171 Pa. St. 399, 33 Atl. 335; Hogg v. Orgill, 34 Pa. St. 344.

Rule applies to instruments executed in another state.— McDougald v. Rutherford, 30 Ala. 253.

Necessity of producing instrument.— Such a provision is not intended to dispense with the production of the instrument declared on in evidence. New York, etc., R. Co. v. Hunt, 39 Conn. 75; Mahaiwe Bank v. Douglass, 31 Conn. 170; Hooker v. Johnson, 10 Fla. 198; Fosdick v. Starbuck, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 417. But see Holt County v. Scott, 53 Nebr. 176, 73 N. W. 681, holding that a written instrument, the making and contents whereof are admitted by the pleadings, may be excluded from evidence.

Instruments not filed with pleadings.— Under some decisions such a provision does not apply to instruments not actually filed with the pleadings; the execution of an instrument not filed must be proved. McCarthy v. Neu, 91 Ill. 127. See also Benedict v. Swain, 43 N. H. 33. Where the written instrument is not set out, but only an open account, with an affidavit thereto, the answer need not be sworn to. Pilling v. St. Louis Refrigerator, etc., Co., 5 Ariz. 377, 52 Pac. 1125.

instrument,[23] usually applies only where the instrument is the foundation of the action and not to a case where it is involved only collaterally.[24] It must appear that the written instrument is declared on or set forth as the cause of action.[25] Furthermore, the instrument must show an apparent execution on its face.[26] The rule equally applies, in most states, to written instruments forming the basis for counter-claims, set-offs, and cross actions;[27] but under some statutes it is held otherwise.[28] In some states no distinction is made between instruments executed by parties to the action and those executed by third persons,[29] but in others the rule applies only to instruments executed by parties to the action,[30] or by their authority.[31] The rule does not apply to instruments executed by both parties to the suit.[32] It usually applies only to parties who are alleged to have executed the instrument, so that a personal representative or heir need not deny under oath the execution by the deceased of the instrument sued on.[33] And a party may, without a sworn denial, show that he signed an instrument in a capacity which did not make it his personal obligation.[34] The rule does not apply to writings set up in connection with purely defensive matter alleged by defendant.[35] The validity of the pleading in other respects is not affected by the want of a verification. The omission of the verification merely relieves the other party

leases,[48] mortgages,[49] subscription papers,[50] insurance policies,[51] receipts,[52] releases and contracts of settlement,[53] tax-sale certificates and tax deeds,[54] and assignments and indorsements.[55] It does not apply to a decree of a court,[56] nor to an account for merchandise,[57] nor to an unprobated will,[58] nor to entries on the stock books of a corporation.[59]

(II) Denial of Ownership of Instrument Sued on. Under some statutes a plea denying the ownership of the instrument sued on must be verified by affidavit, or the allegations of ownership in the complaint will be admitted.[60] Under others an unverified denial is sufficient to put the ownership of the paper in issue unless the execution of a written indorsement of the same is alleged in the petition.[61]

(III) General Issue or Denial. Pleas of non est factum, or amounting thereto, are commonly required to be verified, or they will be of no force and effect.[62] In some jurisdictions, however, a plea of non est factum is considered

Under Ga. Code, § 2674, a registered deed is admissible in evidence without further proof, with the exception that when the maker of the deed, or one of his heirs, or the opposite party in the cause, will file an affidavit that said deed is a forgery, it becomes the duty of the court to suspend the case, until the issue as to the genuineness of the alleged deed is tried. This is a cumulative remedy. A party alleging a deed to be a forgery is not obliged to make the affidavit. After the deed has been admitted, he may introduce any competent evidence t impeach it. If he can successfully attack the deed without making the affidavit, it is his right to do so. Doe v. Roe, 36 Ga. 463.

it, else a verification of the truth of the facts alleged will not be such a verification of the correctness of the account as to make necessary a denial under oath.[70] Furthermore, a denial under oath is not required except where the original correctness of the account, or of some of its items, is attacked. An answer merely setting up some affirmative defense need not be verified.[71] And the rule does not apply where an account is involved only incidentally and is not the foundation of the action.[72] The affidavit may be dispensed with where, for suitable reasons, there is no one in position to swear to the account.[73]

trivial amendments without requiring them to be sworn to.[77] In some states it is provided by statute that an amendment must be verified only when it adds a new cause of action or defense.[78] The court may in its discretion allow an amended pleading to be verified, although the original was not,[79] and when so provided by statute may permit an amendment without verification to previous pleadings which have been verified.[80]

k. Exceptions to Rules Requiring Verification. There are usually certain statutory exceptions to the rules requiring verification of pleadings. Thus pleadings on the part of the state need not be verified, nor answers by guardians defending for infants or persons of unsound mind, and no verification is required in cases where the party might, by his admission of the truth of an allegation, subject himself to a criminal prosecution, nor as to matters concerning which he would be privileged from testifying as a witness.[81] Under this last exemption it has been held that if any part of pleading is such as to excuse any one of the parties from testifying, even if such matter would merely aid in forming a chain of testimony tending to convict the party, no verification need be made.[82] The exemption applies only to denials of matters alleged by the other party, and not to new matters alleged by the party seeking to avoid the verification,[83] unless the latter are expressly included by the statute.[84] But the party seeking the exemption

Where only a part tends to incriminate.— In Blaisdell v. Raymond, 5 Abb. Pr. (N. Y.) 144, 149 [affirmed in 6 Abb. Pr. 148], the rule was stated as follows: "Where the statute, as in 1849, required a verified answer, and made no provision for omitting the verification when the answer under oath might criminate the party, the court might require a compliance with the statute by directing the answer to be verified so far as it was not of that character, and might protect the constitutional rights of the party by excusing him from answering the parts which were of that character, and treating an averment that, by answering on oath the particular allegations specified he might subject himself to a criminal prosecution, as a denial of them. This course was adopted by analogy to the former practice, as was stated in Hill v. Muller, 2 Sandf. 684, 685. But where the law makes express provision on the subject of the verification of an answer, in such a case the terms of the statute must be complied with. Now, by the act of 1854, the verification may be omitted in all cases where the party called upon to verify would be privileged from testifying as a witness to the truth of any matter denied by such pleading. If, therefore, there was any matter denied in the defendant's answers, to the truth of which they would have been privileged from testifying as witnesses, the verification was properly omitted." must make it affirmatively appear that his case falls within the statute,[85] unless this is already disclosed by the pleadings.[86] Answers in penal actions are also sometimes excluded from the operation of the general statutes requiring verification of pleadings.[87]

1. FAILURE TO VERIFY — (I) EFFECT. A pleading which, under the law, should be verified, cannot be considered filed until it is verified; or, if it be considered filed at all, it cannot be taken as a complete pleading until it is verified,[88] or the verification waived by the adverse party.[89] Failure to verify an unnecessary pleading is immaterial.[90] And when an answer admits all the material allegations of the complaint, plaintiff is not prejudiced by the failure of defendant to verify it.[91]

(II) HOW TAKEN ADVANTAGE OF. Where verification is required, an unverified pleading may, in some jurisdictions, be treated as a nullity.[92] It may be stricken from the files,[93] or judgment by default may be taken, as if no plea has been filed.[94] Under some decisions, an unverified pleading is bad on demurrer.[95]

3. PERSONS WHO MAY OR MUST VERIFY — a. In General. Unless otherwise provided by statute,[96] a verification may be made by one not a party to the record if he has sufficient knowledge of the facts,[97] a satisfactory reason being stated for the failure of the party to verify.[98] This rule is found as a statutory provision in some states.[99] A statute requiring generally that the verification of a pleading must be made by the party filing it does not include infant parties; in such a case the next friend may verify.[1] The oath supporting the denial of the execution of a written instrument must be made by the party whose execution it purports to be.[2]

b. Where Several Parties Join in a Pleading. Where several parties join in a pleading, it is held as a rule, in the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, that a verification thereof by one of them is sufficient.[3] Some of the codes, however, provide that the verification by one of the parties shall be sufficient only when they are united in interest,[4] and this is held to apply even where the parties joining in the pleading are husband and wife.[5] Where husband and wife are sued for a debt of the wife when sole, her oath and not that of her husband is required to support the pleading.[6]

c. Agent or Attorney. If no statutory restriction exists,[7] verification of a pleading may be made by agent or attorney, if such agent or attorney has the requisite knowledge of the facts.[8] Statutes frequently give express sanction to verification of pleadings in certain cases by agent or attorney.[9] Thus it is some-

On the contrary, it was held in Plant v. Mutual L. Ins. Co., 92 Ga. 636, 19 S. E. 719, that a mere attorney at law, who is not defendant's agent in any other capacity, cannot verify an answer, in the absence of any statute authorizing it. In Silcox v. Lang, 78 Cal. 118, 20 Pac. 297, the court condemned the practice of attorneys verifying for their clients and declared that it should be discouraged.

15. See the statutes of the several states.

Under some statutes the petition of a county must be verified by its chief officer residing in the county, or, if there is no such officer residing in the county, it may be verified by its attorney.[16] An attorney or agent who is authorized to verify one pleading may properly verify the subsequent pleadings of the same party.[17]

4. Time. While it is customary and in accordance with good practice to file the verification with the pleading to be verified,[18] it is usually held competent for the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to permit a verification to be made at any time before the entry of judgment,[19] unless the time when the affidavit shall be filed is regulated by statute.[20] Such leave will not ordinarily be granted after the other party or the court has acted on the basis of the pleading being unverified.[21] If a pleading is verified too soon, the effect is to nullify the verification, and leave the pleading as though it had never been verified.[22]

5. Form. The common form of a verification of a pleading as prescribed by the codes and practice acts is that the pleading is true of the affiant's own knowledge, except as to those matters stated on information and belief, and as to these the affiant believes it to be true.[23] The verification is, however, only required to be adapted to and be appropriate to the mode of statement in the pleading. If the mode of statement in the pleading is absolute, then the verification should be absolute; but if the mode of statement is qualified, then the verification should be qualified.[24] In some classes of cases the verification is required to be positive. Thus, facts in a dilatory plea must be sworn to positively, and a verification is not sufficient which is made on belief or information and belief.[25] So also the verification of a petition on an account must be sworn to positively.[26]

6. Requisites and Sufficiency — a. In General. The substantial requirements of affidavits of verification are largely matters of statutory regulation.[27] The statute often prescribes the form to be used, but it is unnecessary to employ the exact language of the statute,[28] if the words used substantially comply with it.[29] The object of the verification is to insure good faith in the averments of the parties,[30] and hence it is construed with some liberality.[31] The verification should, in general, clearly identify the allegations to which it refers;[32] but a general unrestricted verification has been held to apply to all the causes of action or defenses set up in the pleading.[33] If the verification is broader than required, the superfluous words may be rejected as surplusage.[34] But the omission of any substantial requirement renders the verification fatally defective.[35] A mere certificate, following a pleading, to the effect that the pleading was subscribed and sworn to before a proper officer, has been held a sufficient affidavit;[36] but other cases have held it insufficient.[37] The verification should designate the affiant;[38] hence where an affidavit does not indicate which member of a firm swore to it, it is fatally defective.[39] By the weight of authority an affidavit of verification should contain a venue, or it will be treated as a nullity;[40] but it need not be entitled in the term.[41]

b. Knowledge, Information, and Belief. The great object enforced by the statute in prescribing what is essential to verification is to make it appear on the face of a pleading and its verification what matters therein contained are set forth according to the knowledge of the party making such pleading, and what matters are stated according to information and belief only. Any mode of verification that does not accomplish this end defeats the object of the statute, and accordingly must be held defective as to matter of substance.[42] If a pleading shows distinctly what allegations are made on personal knowledge and what on information and belief, it is sufficient for the verification to state that the pleading is true, of plaintiff's own knowledge, except as to those matters stated on information and belief, and as to these the affiant believes it to be true.[43] But this form of affidavit is not sufficient where the pleading does not make this distinction.[44] Thus if all matters pleaded are set forth to be according to the knowledge of the party pleading, it is unnecessary to add to the verification the words "except as to those matters stated on information and belief, and as to those matters he believes it to be true."[45] So, on the other hand, if it appears by the pleading that all matters pleaded are on information and belief only, he may omit the statement that the same is true of his own knowledge.[46] In both of these cases of omission it must appear distinctly on the face of the pleading whether the matters are so pleaded according to knowledge, or information and belief.[47] Any matter set forth in a pleading requiring verification which is not stated on the face of the pleading to be so pleaded according to information and belief must be supported by the affidavit of the party, affirming two distinct propositions: (1) That he has knowledge of the matters pleaded; and (2) that they are pleaded truly, according to that knowledge.[48] If the statute requires the affidavit to

No presumption as to mode of statement. — Where some or all of the allegations of a pleading are not expressly specified as made either on personal knowledge or on information and belief it cannot be presumed that they are of one kind rather than the other, and hence a verification to the effect that the facts stated by the pleader of his own knowledge are true and that those stated on information and belief affiant believes to be true, is bad, inasmuch as it does not embrace such undesignated allegations. show that the pleading is true "to the knowledge" of the affiant, it is not enough to state merely that it is "true." [49] A verification purporting to be made positively has been held not to be vitiated by adding the words "to the best of affiant's knowledge and belief," [50] but there are decisions to the contrary; [51] and adding "as the affiant believes" to an affidavit destroys it as a positive verification.[52] An affidavit that a plea is true to the best of defendant's remembrance is defective.[53] Nor is it a sufficient verification that the party knows the pleading to be "substantially" true.[54]

c. Verification by One Not Party to Record — (i) In General. An attorney or agent who verifies a pleading for a party must, in some states, verify positively,[55] although in others he may in certain cases verify on information and belief.[56]

(ii) Knowledge, Information, and Belief. When the verification of a pleading is made by an agent or attorney, he should specifically set forth therein, when the verification is positive, his knowledge of each material fact stated in the pleading verified, and what knowledge he has,[57] or the source of his information

Under Iowa Code, § 2673, providing that when verification of a pleading is made by a person other than a party, it must contain averments showing affiant competent to make the same, it has been held that the competency of the affiant may be shown by a general averment that the affiant has knowledge of the statements of the pleadings, and knows them to be true. Thus if an attorney verifies because of the non-residence of the party, it is held in some cases that he should so state in his affidavit (Burgess v. Jacobs, 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 415); and the statement should be made positively (Stickney v. Wolf, 2 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 403, 2 West. L. Month. 602). Other cases hold that a mere statement that the party is a non-resident or is absent from the county is in itself a sufficient statutory reason for the verification by attorney, without a further statement that it is for that reason that the verification is made by the attorney. Guyton v. Terrell, 132 Ala. 66, 31 So. 83; Stephens v. Parrish, 83 Cal. 561, 23 Pac. 797.

Where the facts are within the personal knowledge of an attorney, some cases hold that he need not state in his affidavit the reason why the party himself did not verify (Matter of Mahoney, 88 N. Y. App. Div. 140, 84 N. Y. Suppl. 329; Gourney v. Wersuland, 3 Duer (N. Y.) 613; Betts v. Kridell, 20 Abb. N. Cas. (N. Y.) 1; The Senorita v. Simonds, 1 Oreg. 274); and others hold that the statement that the facts are within the personal knowledge of the attorney is itself a sufficient reason why the affidavit is made by the attorney instead of by the party (Newman v. Bird, 60 Cal. 372; Jirava v. Brieska, 4 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 296, 1 Clev. L. Rep. 227).

there need not be a formal averment of agency when a person verifies a pleading as agent, if it is reasonably clear, from the affidavit, that it was made in that capacity.[61]

(III) Possession of Instrument on Which Action or Defense Based. When the pleading is founded upon a written instrument for the payment of money only and such instrument is in the possession of the attorney, he may, according to some decisions, verify the pleading without setting forth any further facts respecting his means of knowledge or the grounds of his belief,[62] or the reason why the party did not verify.[63] On the other hand other cases hold that in such a case the knowledge of the attorney or the grounds of his belief must be set forth.[64] The word instrument imports a writing.[65] Hence a verification by an attorney in an action upon an instrument for the payment of money only is not defective because it fails to state expressly that the instrument is in writing.[66]

7. Signature. Either the pleading or the affidavit of verification should be subscribed by the person verifying, but both need not be subscribed in order to make the affidavit sufficient.[67]

8. Jurat — a. In General. The jurat should conform to the local statutory requirements and to the general rules governing affidavits.[68] It should be made by a properly authorized officer,[69] and should show on its face the officer's authority.[70] Ordinarily the officer's seal is not essential to its validity,[71] unless required by statute.[72] An unattested jurat showing that the affidavit was made in open court is sufficient.[73]

b. Who May Administer Oath. Statutes usually designate what officers may take affidavits.[74] If the statute does not designate any particular officer, a verification may be made before any officer within the state authorized to administer oaths.[75] Unless forbidden by statute,[76] an attorney, who is a notary public, may administer an oath to his client in the verification of a pleading.[77] Such practice is, however, generally discouraged by the courts. But the proceeding cannot be treated as a nullity, and the failure of the other party to take advantage of it in apt time will operate as a waiver of the irregularity.[78]

9. Amendment.[79] An affidavit of verification may usually be amended nunc pro tunc, in respect to the jurat,[80] or venue,[81] or in respect to any other matter either of form,[82] or substance,[83] within the discretion of the court,[84] where the allowance of the amendment tends to a fair trial of the case on the merits and the adverse party is given a reasonable time to meet the amended pleading.[85] Where no verification has been attached to a pleading, or one which is a nullity, the deficiency may be supplied by amendment.[86] Since the verification is no part of the pleading, the statutes respecting the amendment of pleadings do not apply.[87]

10. Effect — a. In General. Verification in a case not provided for by statute does not improve or impair the efficacy of a pleading; the verification is mere surplusage.[88] Nor will a verification aid a pleading which is insufficient,[89] or save it from being deemed frivolous.[90] But a verified pleading cannot be stricken out on the ground of falsity.[91]

b. Defective Verification. A defective verification should not, under some decisions, be treated as a nullity unless the opposite party is given an opportunity to correct the defect.[92] A motion to strike should first be made.[93] Other cases hold that a substantially defective verification is a nullity,[94] and the pleading may be treated as unverified.[95] A defective verification furnishes, however, no ground for setting aside the pleading.[96] Nor is the validity of a judgment thereby impaired.[97] If one who has no authority to do so verifies a pleading, it may still be deemed good as an unverified pleading.[98]

IX. PROFERT, OYER, AND EXHIBITS.

A. Profert and Oyer — 1. Definition and General Nature — a. Profert. Profert is that formula in pleading whereby the pleader professes to bring into court a writing to be shown to the court and to his adversary.[99]

b. Oyer. Oyer is the counterpart of profert.[1] To crave oyer originally, in the time of oral pleading, meant demanding to hear read the instrument of which profert was made;[2] but since the day of written pleading it has meant demanding to have a copy,[3] that he may, if necessary, spread it upon the record, to enable him to make his defense,[4] or that the instrument be filed for inspection.[5]

2. Necessity, Propriety, and Sufficiency[6] — a. Profert — (i) In General. At common law, when a cause of action or defense is founded upon a deed, or where an action was brought by an executor or administrator, the pleader is

The import and practical meaning of this was that the party had the deed itself ready to give the opponent over thereof. Insurance Co. v. Thornton, 97 Tenn. 1, 40 S. W. 136 [citing 1 Chitty Pl. (16th Am. ed.) 480]. And the deed is by the intendment of the law in the actual possession of the court. Powers v. Ware, 2 Pick. (Mass.) 451. It is said that as originally understood, perhaps, the term implied that as a fact the written instrument pleaded was produced in court and read or a copy thereof annexed to the pleading. Germain v. Wilgus, 67 Fed. 597, 14 C. C. A. 561. And in Wymark's Case, 5 Coke 74*b*, 77 Eng. Reprint 165, it is said that when the deed is shown in court, by judgment of law it remains in court all of the term in which it is shown, but that at the end of the term, if the deed be not denied, then the law adjudges it to be in the custody of the party to whom it belongs.

The object is: (1) For the inspection of the court, that it might see whether the instrument is duly executed and without erasure or interlineation; (2) for the benefit of the adverse party, that he may know whether it be his seal and signature; whether there be any indorsements or addenda, or references to other instruments, which may vary the covenants, or show that they have been in part or wholly fulfilled; and particularly that he may compare it with the declaration and incorporate a correct transcript of it with the record, that the judgment rendered upon it may be pleaded in bar to any future action. required to make profert of the deed, letters testamentary, or letters of administration,[7] the deed being not merely the inducement but the foundation of the action, or the right of action being created by the act of the party and not merely by operation of law,[8] but other instruments not deeds do not require it.[9] It is required only where oyer may be demanded.[10] These rules have been modified by statute, and under the judicial systems in some states it is required that profert be made of any note or other written instrument which forms the foundation of the action or defense,[11] if the pleader has it in his possession,[12] or plaintiff is not required to lay profert in form;[13] but it necessarily exists by implication,[14] because whether laid or not defendant is entitled to the same benefit of oyer and the same production on the trial.[15] It need not be made of any instrument which is not the foundation of the action or defense,[16] and if made unnecessarily it is held to be mere surplusage which in no way affects the rights of the parties.[17]

(II) Excuse For Failure to Make — (A) In General. A stranger to an instrument, being presumed not to have it in his control,[18] or a party who is not entitled to the custody of the deed, is not bound to plead it with profert.[19] And so no profert need be made, nor can oyer be demanded, when the instrument is accessible to both parties equally,[20] or is in the possession or control of the adverse party, or is lost or destroyed,[21] or even when it is in the possession of a third for the benefit of the parties, if the pleader cannot produce it.[22]

(B) Pleading Excuse. When profert is necessary except for the existence of facts excusing it, such facts must be alleged as an excuse;[23] and if profert is made the party will not be permitted to introduce evidence of its loss or destruction or its being in the possession of the other party so as to let in secondary evidence.[24]

(III) Scope and Sufficiency. It is held to be insufficient to set out the instrument substantially or even verbatim et literatim, in the declaration, consistently with the purpose of a profert, but the pleader must give notice that he has the instrument ready to be shown.[25] But an allegation that the writing declared on is filed with the declaration, although an informal mode of making profert, is deemed sufficient for every substantial purpose;[26] and if the statute prescribes a form for suing on an instrument by copying it in the pleading, compliance with the statute is held to be sufficient and equivalent to profert, and oyer may be demanded.[27] If the declaration states the condition and assigns the breach of a bond, it is not necessary to make a separate profert of the condition.[28] Profert of a duly authenticated copy may be made when the original is accessible to but not in the possession of the party, as in case of the bond of a public officer,[29] or a recorded instrument,[30] or an instrument on file in another court.[31]

b. Oyer—(i) In General. Oyer is the counterpart of profert, and can be demanded of any instrument of which profert must be made.[32] But upon the question whether oyer can be demanded when profert is not made the practice has not been uniform. In some jurisdictions and under particular statutes it has been held that it is demandable,[33] while in other cases it is held that profert

Entry of prayer on record and proceedings thereon.— If denied when it ought to be granted, the party making the claim should move the court to have the prayer of oyer entered on the record, which entry is in the nature of a plea, and the other party may counterplead the right to oyer, or strike out the rest of the pleading following the oyer, and demur; upon which the judgment of the court is that he have oyer or that he answer without it. Williams v. Bryan, 5 Coldw. (Tenn.) 104, holding that where profert is made demurrer is not proper merely because the instrument is not produced. See also Birney v. Haim, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 262.

Refusal to plead.—A defendant who is entitled to oyer cannot be compelled to plead the instrument must be taken as alleged in the pleading in determining its sufficiency,[38] and to set up in a plea provisions of an instrument of which profert is made which are not recited in the declaration defendant should crave oyer of the instrument and set out the portions of it which are essential to the purpose of the plea.[39] So to take advantage of a variance between the declaration and the instrument sued on, oyer must be craved and a demurrer filed for the variance.[40] In those jurisdictions where oyer of the writ has been the practice, a plea based on a defect in the writ, or in an affidavit for an attachment, should crave oyer thereof,[41] and advantage of a variance between the writ and declaration could be taken until oyer had been obtained of the writ;[42] but in those jurisdictions where profert is not required of the writ or affidavit, because it is a part of the record, oyer need not be craved.[43]

(II) Time to Demand. It is the settled rule of practice at common law that oyer cannot be craved after the first term, or after the rule for pleading has expired, since the deed is not supposed to be in court after that time;[44] but it is demandable at any period before the time for pleading is out, although that has been extended, unless the order except the right to demand oyer.[45] Oyer must precede the matter of defense whether that be by plea[46] or demurrer;[47] and regularly it should precede the entry of imparlance. A party cannot, after interposing a general demurrer to the whole declaration, crave oyer, set forth the deed, and then assign special causes of demurrer to one of the counts.[48]

(III) Scope and Sufficiency. Oyer is properly craved by a prayer entered on the record, to which the opposite party may counter plead.[49] If oyer is desired of both a bond and its condition, it must be expressly demanded of both, for a bond and its condition are deemed separate things.[50] So craving oyer of an instrument does not include oyer of an assignment or indorsement thereon.[51] But oyer of a writ includes the declaration where the latter is incorporated into the writ.[52] Where different counts are set up, and each one is met by a separate plea, oyer craved in any plea affects that count only to which the plea is directed;[53] but if a general plea be made to all the counts, oyer craved and granted is available as to all the counts to which the instrument is applicable.[54]

(IV) Compliance. Defendant is held to be entitled to oyer of the original deed.[55] But where the bond is a public record in another court it is not to be court, the objection must have prevailed; but that as the record relied on as an estoppel is a return on the same writ, against which the plea is pleaded, the court can, ex officio, take notice of it.

3. Effect of Profert and Oyer. Profert alone, without oyer, does not make the instrument part of the record,[60] so that the court is necessarily confined, in its consideration of a general demurrer, to the statement of the cause of action, and cannot look to any supposed paper as a foundation of the action.[61] But the effect of obtaining oyer is to make the instrument part of the record and parcel of the pleading which contains the profert, to the same extent as though it were set out verbatim therein,[62] and the party obtaining oyer may then demur to his adver-

Plans and specifications referred to in a contract to construct a building are not parts of the contract in such a sense as to require that they should be filed as exhibits in an action on the contract. Bird v. St. John's Episcopal Church, 154 Ind. 138, 56 N. E. 129.

A newspaper account of the transaction alleged in the pleading filed as an exhibit is unauthorized and improper because it could not be read to the jury without producing an effect distinct from and in addition to the mere statement of the case which plaintiff intends to offer proofs in support of, and it would produce an effect which should come from proofs adduced in the manner which the law directs, viz., from witnesses giving their testimony under oath, and liable to cross-examination. Evidence of title to land.— This is subject, of course, to particular statutory control. Thus, in Arkansas the statute required plaintiff to set forth and exhibit by copies his evidences of title, and that defendant in his answer set forth his exceptions to any of the documentary evidence so filed, in an action for the recovery of land. It was held that this was an anomalous practice but was to be more easily harmonized with the general system of practice in Arkansas by assimilating the record to one in chancery, thus making such exhibits parts of the record but not of the pleadings. Accordingly it has been held that an instrument need be filed as an exhibit only when specially declared upon, but not when relied on under the common counts.[72]

b. Failure to Annex or File, and Excuse Therefor. A failure to attach or file the instrument in a case falling within the statute must be accompanied by a sufficient excuse therefor, or the pleading will be deemed defective.[73] It is usually deemed a sufficient excuse that the instrument is lost,[74] is in the possession of the other party,[75] is on file in the same court [76] or in another court,[77] or is held in escrow.[78] The parties may by mutual consent waive the provisions of the statute relative to filing copies of instruments.[79] In some states it is held that the other party may refuse to plead until the copy is filed,[80] or may move to dismiss.[81] But it is also held that an instrument is not rendered inadmissible in evidence because of a failure to attach or file it as an exhibit.[82] Failure to file a copy of an instrument is immaterial where the execution of the instrument is admitted.[83] The filing of a copy of the instrument may be allowed at a subsequent stage of the proceedings.[84]

2. Requisites and Sufficiency of Annexation or Filing and of Copies.[85] A mere reference to an instrument, with a prayer or statement that it be taken as part of the pleading, is not sufficient without filing or annexing the original or a copy,[86] and even when an exhibit is properly filed the pleading should by express (Workman v. Campbell, 46 Mo. 305, because if such paper must be filed in any suit against one delinquent, and remain with the court during the litigation, then but one suit can be prosecuted at the same time, and that one might be so long in court that an action against the other subscribers would be barred; and because if the subscribers should live in different counties, to require the instrument to be filed in every suit would practically amount to a denial of the process of the law), the itemized statement of account showing the expenses of constructing a fence on a railroad right of way, which the statute requires to be presented to the agent of the company, in an action for such expenses (Vandalia R. Co. v. Kanarr, 38 Ind. App. 146, 77 N. E. 1135), a will, in a partition suit, upon the construction of which the controversy turned (Shetterly v. Axt, 37 Ind. App. 687, 76 N. E. 901, 77 N. E. 865), and the record of a county board (Logansport v. La Rose, 99 Ind. 117) have been held not to be written instruments within the meaning of the statute.

Contract executed by both parties is held not to come within the provision of a statute requiring the filing of written instruments on which a pleading is founded and which were executed by the other party. Withers v. Wabash R. Co., 122 Mo. App. 282, 99 S. W. 34.

reference identify such exhibit as a part thereof,[87] and in no event can an exhibit be considered on demurrer unless it is referred to in the declaration or complaint in such a way as to make it a part of the pleading.[88] But it also held that an exhibit need not be marked by an identifying letter or character, although it is good practice to do so,[89] and that it is sufficient to name or describe it in the pleading and state that it is filed "herewith."[90] An averment that an instrument is attached as an exhibit, when in fact it is not attached, is surplusage.[91] An exhibit attached to or filed with the original pleading will not aid an amended pleading,[92] unless the amended pleading expressly refers to it and states that it is made a part of such pleading.[93] But a defendant filing an answer, a counter-claim, or cross complaint based upon a written instrument need not set out the instrument as an exhibit if plaintiff has already done so, provided sufficient reference is made.[94] If suit is brought on a number of identically similar instruments, a copy of one with an allegation as to the distinguishing marks of the others is sufficient.[95] Setting

Suggestion of defect in bond.—Under a statute providing that whenever an official bond does not contain the substantial matter or conditions required by law, or there are any defects in the approval or filing thereof, it is not void so as to discharge such officer and his sureties; but they are equitably bound to the state or party interested; and the state or such party may, by action in any court of competent jurisdiction, suggest the defect in the bond, approval, or filing, and recover the proper and equitable demand or damages from such officer and the persons who intended to become and were included as sureties in such bond, it is a sufficient suggestion of such defect in the bond, approval or filing, if the copy of the bond is attached to and made a part of the complaint. Instrument for unconditional payment of money.— Sometimes the distinction is between provision simplifying pleadings founded on instruments for the unconditional payment of money, by declaring in effect that it shall be sufficient to attach a copy and allege that a certain amount is due thereon, etc., and another provision for attaching instruments as evidence of indebtedness. Under the first provision the instrument is a part of the pleading (State v. Chautauqua County School Dist. No. 3, 34 Kan. 237, 8 Pac. 208; McArthur v. H. T. Clark Drug Co., 48 Nebr. 899, 67 N. W. 861; Pefley v. Johnson, 30 Nebr. 529, 46 N. W. 710), but only such instrument as is for the unconditional payment of money (Chadron First Nat. Bank v. Engelbercht, 57 Nebr. 270, 77 N. W. 685; Lincoln Mortg., etc., Co. v. Hutchins, 55 Nebr. 158, 75 N. W. 538). The second provision is designed as a substitute for the common-law petition of oyer, and it is held that it is not good pleading to copy or incorporate the instrument or attach it as a part of the pleading, and if attached it will not form a part of the pleading, although the adverse party is entitled to have it attached. Chadron First Nat. Bank v. Engelbercht, 57 Nebr. 270, 77 N. W. 685 (holding that in a foreclosure suit only the note need be attached and is not a part of the pleading); Holt County Bank v. Holt County, 53 Nebr. 827, 74 N. W. 259. But if the instrument is attached as a part of the pleading under the latter provision, the purpose of the statute to furnish the opposite party with notice of the instrument for inspection and to enable him to prepare his defense is subserved. Chadron First Nat. Bank v. Engelbercht, 57 Nebr. 270, 77 N. W. 685; Lincoln Mortg., etc., Co. v. Hutchins, 55 Nebr. 158, 75 N. W. 538. Similar construc-

allegation,[9] or for the purpose of furnishing particulars of description or items of values stated,[10] but never for the purpose of supplying the substantial allegations essential to the statement of the cause of action or defense,[11] unless as sometimes said, the pleading is framed for that purpose and with that end in view.[12]

Evidence or foundation of action.— In Arkansas copies of deeds which either party, in an action for the recovery of lands, relies upon as evidence of his title, and which the statute requires to be filed as exhibits with his pleading, are held to be no part of the pleadings, but the deeds themselves must be produced and read to the jury or the next best evidence must be produced when that cannot be done. Richardson v. Williams, 37 Ark. 542; Jacks v. Chaffin, 34 Ark. 534. But an exhibit which is the foundation of the action is a part of the record and it is held will explain or even control an averment in the pleading. Beavers v. Baucum, 33 Ark. 722, in equity. If, however, the exhibit is not the foundation of the action, although the statute requires it to be filed, it cannot be noticed on demurrer any further than to explain allegations and not to supply or contradict them. X. BILL OF PARTICULARS AND COPY OF ACCOUNTS.[20]

A. Bill of Particulars — 1. Nature and Office. The proper office of a bill of particulars is to inform the opposite party and the court of the precise nature and character of the cause of action or defense for which the pleader contends in respect to any material or issuable fact in the case and which is not specifically set out in his pleadings,[21] and which cannot, in many cases, be given in the pleading without great prolixity.[22] It is properly an amplification of the pleading, designed to make more specific general allegations appearing therein,[23] and

The real purpose of ordering a bill of particulars is to reach justice between the parties by evolving the truth from their discordant statements, and to give the parties every reasonable facility for coming to the trial fully prepared for all that may be produced by the other side, and this is just as important whether the matter is set up as a bare defense or as a basis for a demand for affirmative relief. thus avoid a surprise at the trial.[24] Hence it has no application, and generally will be refused where the cause of action or defense is specifically set forth in the pleadings with sufficient definiteness to give the opposite party notice thereof.[25] It is not the office of a bill of particulars to supply material allegations necessary to the validity of a pleading,[26] or to change a cause of action or defense stated in the pleading,[27] or to state a cause of action or defense other than the one stated.[28] Nor is it the office of such a bill to furnish to defendant facts whereon to found an affirmative defense,[29] or which constitutes a defense or offset for the other party.[30]

2. Right to Particulars in General. There is no fixed and inflexible rule as to when a party is entitled to a bill of particulars; but generally it is held that in any case where, from any cause, a party is placed in such a situation that he cannot properly plead, or prepare for trial or that justice cannot be done at the trial unless he is apprised of the particulars and circumstances of his opponent's case with more particularity than is required by the rules of pleading, the court may direct that information as to such matters shall be seasonably furnished.[31] A bill of particulars can be required only in those cases where the declaration or plea is allowably of so general a nature as not to apprise the party of the real cause of action or defense which he is to meet.[32] But no particulars will be ordered when

If a pleading consists largely of legal conclusions it is proper to require the facts to be set forth in a bill of particulars. Baldwin v. Nesmyth, 33 N. Y. App. Div. 634, 56 N. Y. Suppl. 318; Guichon v. Fisherman's Cannery Co., 4 Brit. Col. 516.

The granting of a bill of particulars does not depend upon the actual facts, or the knowledge of the opposite party concerning them, but is dependent upon the facts claimed to exist. Dwyer v. Slattery, 118 N. Y. App. Div. 345, 103 N. Y. Suppl. 433. And whether a plaintiff should serve a bill of particulars of his complaint must be determined by an examination of the complaint and does not depend upon the fact that defendants have served a bill of particulars of a counter-claim contained in their answer. Fickinger v. Ives, 109 N. Y. App. Div. 684, 96 N. Y. Suppl. 396.

A bill of particulars concerning a counter-claim will not be ordered for the purpose of enabling plaintiff to prepare for trial, until an issue upon the counter-claim has been raised by the service of a reply. Fidelity Glass Co. v. Thatcher Mfg. Co., 88 N. Y. App. Div. 287, 85 N. Y. Suppl. 8. But the rule is otherwise as to new matter set up in the answer by way of defense which does not require a reply. Fidelity Glass Co. v. Thatcher Mfg. Co., supra.

A bill of particulars may be required to make an answer more definite, whether the general averments constitute an adverse claim or merely matter effectual as a defense. Kelsey v. Sargent, 100 N. Y. 602, 3 N. E. 795.

32. West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Standard Oil Co., 50 W. Va. 611, 40 S. E. 591, 88 Am. St. Rep. 895, 56 L. R. A. 804; Clarke v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 732, 20 S. E. 696.

If the declaration or plea is more general or indefinite than is allowed by law, a demurrer or objection should be interposed, and a demand for particulars will not take the place of a demurrer. Clarke v. Ohio River R. Co., 39 W. Va. 732, 20 S. E. 696. And see, generally, supra, VI.

That a reply is very loosely drawn is no reason for refusing an order directing defendant to furnish a bill of particulars of his counter-claim, since such a reply cannot be treated as a nullity. Ennis v. Hoxford, 2 N. Y. Suppl. 639.

Unless it be reasonably clear that plaintiff or defendant could be more precise in his allegations, or that it be necessary to a fair trial that the opposite party should be apprised of what he has to meet with more certainty than is contained in the pleading, a motion for a bill of particulars should be refused. Vansant v. Lindsley, 2 App. Cas. (D. C.) 321.

it appears that the information sought is not necessary to enable the other party to plead or prepare for trial,[33] as where it is for the sole purpose of limiting a party's evidence.[34] A party's right to a bill of particulars is not affected by the fact that the information sought might come out in testimony to be taken before a referee or commission.[35]

3. Causes in Which Particulars May Be Required. A bill of particulars is not required in a suit in equity, since the forms of pleading in such a court are such as to furnish in most cases all the information necessary to prepare for trial.[36] Formerly it seems that the right to a bill of particulars was confined to actions for demands for money.[37] But at the present time it is generally held to extend to all descriptions of actions at law when justice demands that a party shall be apprised of the matter for which he is to be put to trial with more particularity than is required by the rules of pleading.[38] Thus a bill of particulars has been held proper in actions based on the common counts,[39] for money paid,[40] or money had or received;[41] in actions on accounts,[42] under special counts in assumpsit,[43] and on accounts stated.[44] It has been ordered in actions of libel and slander;[45] ejectment:[46] trover;[47] trespass;[48] in suits for divorce;[49] for criminal conversation;[50]

A bill of particulars in an action on account stated generally as amounting to a certain sum should give the particular items of the account so that the opposite party may determine the correctness of the account, as to what items he will admit, and as to what he will insist upon plaintiff proving affirmatively, and also as to what he may have to contend with on the trial; and also that the general pleading aided by the bill of particulars will, in the event of a subsequent action between the same parties, show what items were disposed of in the former action. for an escape;[51] for negligence,[52] partition,[53] conspiracy,[54] malicious prosecution,[55] or fraud;[56] to recover for professional services;[57] on commercial paper;[58] on life-insurance policies;[59] to set aside fraudulent conveyances,[60] or assignments;[61] and in election contests.[62] But while a bill of particulars may be ordered in a tort action, its use is largely confined to actions on contract, for if a pleading in an action of tort is not sufficiently specific the remedy by demurrer is usually adequate;[63] and under some statutes it cannot be ordered in an action for tort.[64] Some cases have held that it is inappropriate in an action for personal injuries,[65] in an action on the cause for consequential damages,[66] or in a suit on a depositary's bond.[67] It has also been held proper in indictments and informations,[68] for barratry,[69] and for libel and slander.[70]

4. Parties Who May Demand Bill of Particulars. The power of the court to order bills of particulars may be exercised in behalf of either plaintiff or defendant,[71] and the same principles apply no matter which party makes the application;[72] and the power has been exercised, even in a criminal case, in favor of the commonwealth and against the prisoner.[73]

5. Scope of Bill. A bill of particulars may be asked for in respect to one or all of the counts;[74] and as a general rule, unless restricted to a particular count, it applies to all or any of the counts which are of such a nature as to require such aid.[75]

"Great caution should be exercised by the courts in requiring parties to furnish particulars in actions for damages resulting from negligence. If it is furnished voluntarily and generally, it will be applied to the count or counts to which in its nature it is applicable.[76]

6. Effect of Bill. The effect of a bill of particulars is to enlarge or limit the scope of the complaint or counter-claim or other defense,[77] and in the absence of proof that there is a defense to one or an answer to the other, a bill of particulars will not be ordered.[78] As a general rule after a bill of particulars is filed the party furnishing the same is limited in his proofs to the particular cause of action or defense therein specified,[79] and, under some statutes, also operates to strike from the pleadings all counts or paragraphs not particularly applicable thereto.[80] But it is not itself to be considered or used as evidence against the party furnishing it.[81] It is generally held that a bill of particulars does not become a part of the pleading except to the extent of restricting the proof to matters therein specified,[82] although some cases hold the contrary view.[83] A bill of particulars cannot be withdrawn without an order of court.[84] A pleading and bill, however, should be construed together and the facts set up in a bill of particulars may be looked to in explanation of uncertainties in the pleading and vice versa;[85] and as between the pleading and the bill of particulars, the latter will in many cases control in case of inconsistency.[86] If a party voluntarily gives a bill of particulars, as he may properly do, its effect is exactly the same as though the bill had been demanded and ordered.[87] If a bill of particulars is filed in a case where it is unnecessary, it may be treated as surplusage.[88] The abandonment of the counts to which a bill of particulars refers is an abandonment of the bill;[89] and where a bill of particulars is abandoned, the party is no longer restricted in his proof to the cause of action or defense set forth in such bill.[90] Where a bill of particulars is not required at all, the party thereby waives, or rather does not exercise his right,[91] and if required in respect to one or more of part of the counts or paragraphs the right is waived as to the others.[92]

demandable of right in actions on accounts,[94] where there are general counts in the declaration.[95] This power of the court is incident to its general authority in the administration of justice.[96] It is the same power in kind that courts have to grant a new trial on the ground of surprise.[97]

8. Statutory Provisions. Codes of procedure usually provide for bills of particulars and the practice relative thereto is in general the same as at common law,[98] and in some jurisdictions they are provided for by rules of court.[99] Under some statutes the courts are vested with very liberal powers in ordering bills of particulars; and such bills should be liberally allowed,[1] unless they are clearly useless,[2] and are sought merely for the purpose of annoyance.[3] Under some codes a motion to make more definite and certain is sometimes held proper in cases where a bill of particulars will not be ordered;[4] but it is improper, under the code practice, both to order a bill of particulars and to direct that the pleading be made more definite as to the same matters.[5]

9. What Particulars May Be Had — a. In General. In accordance with the above rules, a bill of particulars may be required to set forth the details of time, place, and circumstances of the acts or transactions alleged, as constituting the cause of action or defense,[6] and details as to the character and amount of items

Reichardt v. Plaut, supra.

Other employment.— Where, in an action for a servant's alleged wrongful discharge, the answer merely alleges that plaintiff was not diligent in searching for other employment and does not allege any employment or salary that plaintiff might have secured, defendants need not furnish a bill of particulars stating in detail the names and addresses of persons from whom plaintiff could have secured employment, the nature thereof, and the salary he could have earned. so pleading is not thereby deprived of his right to the particulars.[65] Where an answer amounts to a negative pregnant with the truth of the facts necessary to sustain the complaint, and therefore is no denial at all in pleading, defendant cannot demand a bill of particulars.[66]

10. Knowledge of Parties as Affecting Right to Particulars — a. In General. Ordinarily a bill of particulars is appropriate where the information sought, if otherwise proper for a bill of particulars, is peculiarly within the knowledge of the party filing the pleading.[67] But as a general rule a party will not be required to furnish information which is equally or peculiarly within the knowledge of the party demanding the particulars,[68] as where it appears from the nature of the pleadings and from the facts shown upon the application for a bill of particulars that the party demanding it has presumably a better knowledge of the matters than his adversary.[69] But even though the adverse party has full knowledge of the acts or transactions, a pleader whose allegations are very general may be required to furnish a bill of particulars in order that the opposite party may know upon what specific demand or defense to prepare his pleadings.[70] And although the party demanding the bill of particulars has more information than the other, an order for the bill may be given, conditioned upon the former producing books, etc., for the inspection of the latter.[71]

b. Ability to Furnish Particulars. While as a general rule a party cannot be required to furnish a bill of particulars of facts concerning which, for satisfactory reasons, he is unable to give more particulars than is stated in the pleadings or original bill of particulars,[72] as of facts of which he swears he has no knowledge or means of knowledge,[73] or in respect to any matter about which he is not and cannot be expected to be informed,[74] and of which he is not shown to have knowledge,[75] nor where the party demanding the particulars has by his own act made it impossible for him to furnish them;[76] yet ordinarily he should, when requested or ordered, file a bill containing a statement of such particulars as he is able to furnish,[77] and if he is unable to furnish the particulars requested, he should state his lack of knowledge or inability as a substitute for the information required.[78] The excuse of ignorance will not be accepted as to matters which are necessary to make out a sufficient prima facie cause of action or defense,[79] nor will the negligence of the party in not keeping books of account excuse him from furnishing particulars.[80] The fact that the pleader is an executor or administrator without personal knowledge of his cause of action or defense,[81] or is an assignee,[82] will not excuse him from the necessity of furnishing a proper bill of particulars when demanded or ordered.

11. Failure to Furnish Bill of Particulars and Defective Bill[83] — a. In General. On an entire failure to furnish a bill of particulars when ordered, the court may order a stay until it is furnished,[84] or it may strike out the pleading respecting which the particulars are required and not given;[85] or such failure may be cured by amendment,[86] but it is not ground for setting aside a judgment.[87] In those jurisdictions in which a bill of particulars is not considered as a part of the pleading, no defect in the bill can be reached by demurrer,[88] or answer or plea,[89] nor by a motion to strike the bill or any of its items.[90] Nor will a motion to make the pleading more specific reach the want of a bill of particulars.[91]

b. Further and Additional Bill. The ordinary practice where the specifications in a bill of particulars do not accord substantially with the facts or when they omit essential matters, and the adverse party deems the bill insufficient, is a motion for a further or more specific bill, upon the trial;[92] or the adverse party may return the bill and demand a compliance with the former order,[93] in which case the party who furnished it may move the court to compel its acceptance and thereby have the question of its insufficiency or defectiveness determined before the trial.[94] But if the adverse party does not apply for a further or more specific bill, he cannot ignore the bill furnished and proceed as if none had been rendered,[95] unless bad faith is shown in respect to the original bill.[96] The granting or refusing of an order for a more specific bill is a matter addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court under all the facts and circumstances of the case.[97] In a further or more specific bill of particulars, a party is only required to set out matter not sufficiently alleged in the bill furnished.[98]

e. Objections to Evidence. If a bill of particulars is not deemed sufficiently specific, the remedy is a demand for a more specific bill, and not the exclusion of all evidence.[99] But the adverse party may, upon the trial, object to the admission of evidence where there is a failure to file a bill of particulars when requested or ordered,[1] unless the demand for such bill was not seasonably made;[2] where the specifications do not accord with the pleadings or the facts;[3] or where matters essential to the party's case are omitted from the bill.[4] But the mere fact that the bill is not served within the proper or statutory period does not give the adverse party an absolute right to have the evidence thereon rejected at the trial; but its admission is within the discretion of the court under the circumstances.[5] An objection to evidence, however, extends only to that portion of the cause of action or defense upon which a bill of particulars was asked and not given.[6]

N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 531, authorizing an order for a bill of particulars and providing that in case of "default" the court shall preclude the party from giving evidence as to matters which should have been covered by the bill, does not authorize an order precluding evidence where a bill supposed by the party to have been sufficient has been furnished and not returned and no attempt has been made to secure a further bill. d. Time of Objecting and Waiver. Objection to the lack or insufficiency of a bill of particulars must be seasonably made, or it will be deemed waived.[7] But the waiver of the bill of particulars does not avoid the necessity of proof of all items by the other party.[8]

e. Immaterial Variance or Mistake. No variance between the pleading and the bill of particulars,[9] and no omission or mistake in the latter,[10] will be deemed material unless it is calculated to mislead or deceive the adverse party; and the party filing the bill may be permitted to explain the matters in the bill and show that certain errors therein occurred by mistake.[11] A mere discrepancy between the amount sworn to as due and the amount stated in a bill of particulars does not necessarily impeach the good faith with which the affidavit was made.[12]

12. Demand or Application For Bill — a. Demand.[13] Where a party is entitled to a bill of particulars as a matter of right, as in some jurisdictions in actions on account, a mere demand therefor is sufficient without an order from the court,[14] and the party wishing the particulars may refuse to plead until they are filed.[15] A demand for a bill of particulars may be made after the pleading to which it relates is filed.[16] If it is wanted as an aid to drawing a pleading it may be demanded before appearance,[17] but not after a plea to the merits.[18] If unreasonably delayed the demand may be struck out on motion.[19] Or if the demand is made in a case where the opposite party deems it unauthorized, he may obtain a ruling on the propriety of the demand by a motion to strike out or nullify the demand.[20] A statute making it necessary in certain cases for a party to deliver a bill of particulars without demand is directory only, and may be waived.[21]

b. Application to the Court — (I) In General. Unless a bill of particulars is made necessary by statute, in most cases, an application to the court must be made for an order requiring it.[22] The service in good faith of an amended pleading after notice of a motion for a bill of particulars deprives the motion of its basis,[23] except where the amended pleading is not served in good faith or where it is served merely for the purpose of defeating the motion and throws little or no light on the particulars demanded.[24] The filing of a motion for a bill of particulars operates to extend the time for pleading.[25] The merits of the case cannot be inquired into on a motion for a bill of particulars.[26]

(II) Time For Application. The application for an order directing a bill of particulars must be seasonably made, and if a party delays so long that granting the application would prejudice the other party, it will be refused.[27] The application should ordinarily be made before pleading to the merits,[28] and when made after issue joined it is a suspicious circumstance, and the court should be satisfied that the object is not delay, before granting an order;[29] but where the particulars are sought not to enable the applicant to plead, but for the purpose of enabling him to prepare for trial, a motion for such a bill is premature if made before issue joined.[30] An order will not ordinarily be granted during the course of a trial.[31] But there is no fixed rule upon the subject, and the question of laches in making the application is merely one of the matters which the court will take into consideration in exercising its discretion to grant or refuse an order;[32] and ordinarily the order will not be refused where the other party has not been prejudiced by the delay,[33] and a good excuse is shown for the delay.[34]

(III) Character of Application. The application should be special, pointing out the specific facts respecting which the particulars are wanted,[35] and the purpose for which the particulars are desired;[36] but it should not ask for minute

a party is not bound to furnish a bill of particulars on mere demand and that, before delivery thereof can be compelled or penalties for the failure to do so be inflicted, the court must order that the bill of particulars be furnished.

Proc. § 531; but the proper practice in such courts under Code Civ. Proc. § 2942 requires some formal determination and direction of the court in the matter. Rosen v. Rosenthal, 22 Misc. (N. or unnecessary particulars.[37] A bill of particulars may be desired either for the purpose of pleading or to prepare for trial,[38] and the denial of an application based on the first ground will not preclude a subsequent application based on the second.[39] A motion for a bill of particulars irregularly made may be refused.[40]

(IV) ACCOMPANYING AFFIDAVIT — (A) In General. In some jurisdictions the application for an order for a bill of particulars must be based upon affidavits showing the necessity for such an order,[41] except where the party is entitled to a bill of particulars as of right.[42] Such affidavit should state specially the grounds for it,[43] and is insufficient if it states no facts, but merely that the facts asked for are necessary to enable the party to plead or prepare for trial.[44] It should allege substantially that the party has no knowledge or information respecting the matters designated, and has no means of obtaining information in regard thereto, and that it is necessary to have such knowledge as is within the possession of the other party in order to plead or prepare for trial, as the case may be.[45] Furthermore, it has been held that the affidavit must show that the allegations concerning which particulars are asked are denied by the party applying for the order.[46] Answering affidavits may be filed by the other party, but in default thereof the order will be made if a proper prima facie case is shown.[47] A new ground for relief cannot be injected into a motion for a bill of particulars by the service of an affidavit setting up such new ground.[48]

(B) By Whom Made. As a general rule such affidavit should be made by the party, and is insufficient if made by his attorney alone,[49] unless it shows some Authentication of affidavit.— Under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 723, requiring the court to disregard errors or defects in the pleadings not affecting the substantial rights of the adverse party, it is no objection to a motion for a bill of particulars that the certificate of a clerk of court of another state attached to an affidavit or deposition accompanying the motion described the affidavit as an "acknowledgment." Spencer v. Ft. Orange Paper Co., 74 N. Y. App. Div. 74, 77 N. Y. Suppl. 251.

The strict rules applicable to affidavits necessary to sustain a provisional remedy need not in every case be applied to an application for a bill of particulars. But if the court can see from all the circumstances that the granting of the bill of particulars will tend to promote fairness and justice and can do the opposite party no harm or prejudice any just claim he may have, there is no reason to be astute to find defects in the moving affidavits. well-stated reasons why it is not made by the party,[50] and that the attorney has personal knowledge of the facts alleged in the affidavit.[51] It is not a sufficient excuse for failure to have the affidavit made by the party himself that he was absent from the state or county,[52] and that there was no time to procure his affidavit.[53]

13. Order Requiring Bill. An order for a bill of particulars should direct the party of whom the particulars are required to file or serve a bill by a certain day or on such day to show cause why he has not done so,[54] after expiration of which time, if no good cause is shown, the rule may be made absolute.[55] When the order becomes absolute the party requiring the bill may then move for a rule that the bill be furnished within a certain time or that judgment of non pros. be entered.[56] The order should indicate the precise particulars which are to be furnished;[57] may order them in part and deny them in part, if they cannot be ordered as asked;[58] and should state that unless the required particulars are furnished the party will be precluded from giving evidence upon the trial.[59] If the order is oppressive in that it is too broad or requires too great particularity, application may be made to the court by motion for a modification,[60] or to vacate the order,[61] and mandamus may lie to compel a vacation of the order,[62] or it may be modified on appeal;[63] but if it is not warranted by the decision authorizing it, the remedy is a motion to resettle the order, and not an appeal.[64] If an order is suffered to be made by default, it stands as a binding adjudication and cannot thereafter be questioned.[65] Upon a proper application, the court may grant time to procure particulars necessary, the time to be allowed depending upon the circumstances of the case.[66] But a peremptory order for a bill requires that it be furnished immediately — that is, within twenty-four hours.[67] An order for a bill of particulars is not in itself a stay of proceedings,[68] but it should direct a stay if such a result is desired.[69] Where there is an interlocutory order for a bill of particulars, and that in the meantime all proceedings stay and a peremptory order is afterward made, the adverse party cannot proceed in the suit until he delivers a bill.[70] But the stay ceases to be operative if a peremptory order is not obtained at the expiration of the time allowed.[71] An order for a bill of particulars is duly served by delivery of a copy thereof; the original need not be shown.[72]

14. Form and Requisites of Bill — a. In General. A bill of particulars need not be technically accurate;[73] nor need it be as formal or precise as a pleading,[74] and mere formal defects in it will be disregarded;[75] but it must in substance inform the opposite party of the nature of the pleader's claim or defense, and generally will be held sufficient if it fairly and in substance gives the opposite party the information to which he is entitled,[76] as required by the terms of the order in cases where an order is made.[77] It need not state the grounds on which plaintiff claims, but only the items and particulars.[78] It should be made as accurate and definite as the means of information at the command of the party serving it will allow,[79] or as the nature of the case permits; [80] and it has been held that it should not be less specific than the pleading in aid of which it is given.[81] But it must not contain particulars not within the scope of the pleading to which it is furnished; [82] nor need it state more than the party is bound to prove.[83] If an action is founded upon a written instrument, a copy of the instrument is a sufficient bill of particulars; [84] and an account once delivered and referred to in the bill of particulars need not be restated therein.[85] So where a copy of an account showing all items of debit and credit is annexed to a complaint and referred to therein, no separate bill of particulars is necessary.[86] An amended pleading which is improperly filed as such may be deemed and held an amplification of a bill of particulars previously filed; [87] and a party's bank-book is a sufficient bill of particulars, as to his account.[88]

A bill of particulars should be sufficiently specific and definite to give notice to the opposite party of the claims intended to be made upon the trial and to enable him to confine the pleader's proof to the matters

b. Verification. Ordinarily a bill of particulars need not be verified unless it is required by statute.[89] Under some statutes a bill of particulars should be verified where the pleading itself is verified.[90] It has been held that the bill of

15. Amendment of Bill.[92] A bill of particulars may be amended,[93] by leave of court,[94] for the purpose of increasing the amount claimed,[95] simplifying the bill,[96] correcting the title or heading,[97] stating additional facts, not changing the cause of action or defense,[98] showing the capacity in which the party sues,[99] or striking out certain items.[1] But such amendment cannot set forth a new cause of action or defense.[2] The general rules as to amendment of pleadings apply to the amendment of bills of particulars.[3] The allowance or refusal of such an amendment rests within the discretion of the trial court, as in case of other amendments;[4] and the court may, in its discretion, impose certain conditions, such as the payment of costs, to the allowance of the amendment.[5] Such an amendment may be allowed at the trial where the other party is not prejudiced by reason of surprise, but not otherwise.[6] But unreasonable delay in making application will operate to cause a refusal of leave to amend unless it is satisfactorily excused.[7] An amended bill

of particulars ordered by the court supersedes former bills;[8] but it does not change the issue.[9]

B. Copy of Account Alleged in Pleading — 1. In General. In some jurisdictions it is required by statute that, where a pleading is founded on an account, the original or a copy thereof must be filed with the pleading or delivered on demand.[10] Such original or copy when filed or served is merely a special form of a bill of particulars, and except where special rules supersede, the general rules respecting bills of particulars apply.[11] It is not necessary that the account filed should be such as to constitute evidence per se;[12] but if it is sufficiently definite to apprise the other party of the nature and amount of the claim,[13] and is made as detailed as the nature of the case and the ability of the party will admit, it will be sufficient.[14] But mere general aggregates will not suffice.[15] An account filed which does not contain the items but which refers to a bill of items actually rendered is sufficient.[16] If the account furnished is not deemed sufficient, the proper course is not to wait until the trial, but to demand or move for a more specific account.[17] But so far as the time is limited within which the account must be furnished, the statute is only directory,[18] and the suit should not be dismissed for failure to conform.[19]

2. Verification. The statutes frequently require that the account filed or served shall be verified, in which case the terms of the verification should substantially conform to the verification called for by the statute.[20] An objec-

the court of review will not permit plaintiff in error to amend the bill of particulars in order to bring about a reversal of the judgment and a new trial upon a different issue. Kent v. Phenix Art Metal Co., 69 N. J. L. 532, 55 Atl. 256.

XI. FILING AND SERVICE; LOST OR DESTROYED PLEADINGS; WITHDRAWAL OF PLEADINGS.

A. Filing[22] and Service — 1. What Constitutes Filing.[23] Filing a pleading under the modern practice consists simply in placing it in the hands of the proper officer, usually the clerk of the court, to be preserved and kept by him, in his official custody, as a public record.[24] It is deemed filed when delivered to and received by the proper officer to be kept on file.[25] It is the duty of the officer receiving it to make the proper indorsement and entry,[26] but this is merely evidence of the filing and is not essential to the validity thereof.[27] Nor will the memorandum or indorsement alone constitute conclusive evidence of the filing.[28] But merely putting a paper into the files or leaving it in the clerk's office without handing it to the clerk is not filing it,[29] nor is it filed by merely stating on another paper that it is filed "herewith."[30] A statute making the payment of a fee a prerequisite to filing a pleading is directory only, and a failure to pay the fee does not render the filing invalid;[31] and the same is true of an order conditioning leave to file on payment of costs.[32] Failure to properly file is waived unless seasonably objected to.[33] The answer in an action to set aside a judgment, on the ground that it was procured by the false and fraudulent testimony of one of defendant's witnesses, may be filed and presented by defendant's attorney.[34] While all the parties to an action are bound to take notice of pleadings properly filed within the time required by law,[35] unless actual notice is required by statute or rule of court,[36] yet where a party in default obtains leave of court to file a pleading affecting other parties, the parties so affected should be notified of the filing of such pleading, unless such persons or their attorneys are present when the order is made.[37]

2. Necessity For Filing. According to modern practice, all pleadings are required to be filed, in order to become a part of the record.[38] Filing the pleading containing a statement of plaintiff's cause of action is sometimes necessary for the commencement of suit;[39] and sometimes it must be first filed where service by publication is made.[40] Where words are inserted in a pleading merely to make it conform to the proof, it need not be filed as an amended pleading.[41] If a replication is necessary it must be filed, and a mere minute on the record that a replication has been filed, if the replication itself does not appear, is not sufficient.[42]

3. Right to File. A party has an absolute right to have his pleading filed if tendered in due time and in proper manner, and the other party has no right to

Pleadings filed in vacation.—Although there is no statutory provision authorizing it, the court may permit additional pleadings to be filed in vacation; but, when an additional pleading is so filed, the counsel of the adverse party ought to be given notice of the application therefor and an opportunity to resist it, or to procure leave to file other pleadings and make up the issue. object, nor the court authority to listen to his objections to the filing;[43] therefore no objection to the sufficiency of a pleading can be taken by an objection to its being filed.[44]

4. Service Generally. Only when required by statute is service of copies of the pleadings on the other party or on co-plaintiffs or co-defendants necessary.[45] But the court has considerable discretion in the matter, and may, by order, dispense with the necessity of service in a proper case.[46] And the party entitled to the copy may waive service of it.[47] When service of a copy of a pleading is necessary a copy of an accompanying affidavit or exhibit must also be served if it forms a part of the pleading,[48] otherwise not.[49] In some states a copy of a pleading may be had by making seasonable demand,[50] but such demand will not be effective

Such an answer, however, is essentially a code pleading, and though the court may require it to be served on the defendant affected thereby, such service is not necessary unless so ordered to preserve the right of the party to have the questions presented by such answer tried and settled by the decree, if the co-defendant affected is before the court."

Co-defendants, one of whom practically co-operates with plaintiff, and joins in the prayer of the complaint, need not serve their separate answers on each other. Egan v. Bissell, 54 S. C. 80, 32 S. E. 1.

unless a place is designated where the service shall be made.[51] If a demand is made too late the court may, nevertheless, order service in its discretion upon proper application made.[52] Where due service has been made upon a party, his attorney cannot subsequently, by filing a notice of retainer, obtain a duplicate service upon himself.[53] A subsequent change of venue does not invalidate a service once properly made.[54] The fact that no original is on file does not necessarily invalidate the service of a copy,[55] unless there is a statute or rule to the contrary.[56] In default of service when required, the party may move to dismiss the action,[57] or may move for an order of reference to assess damages.[58]

5. Service of Amended Pleadings.[59] A copy of an amended pleading should ordinarily be served in cases where service of a copy of the original is necessary,[60] unless the amendment is a mere matter of form,[61] or is made with the consent of the opposite party,[62] or at the trial.[63] Statutes frequently contain an express requirement that copies of amended pleadings shall be served on the adverse party or his attorney;[64] but such a requirement only applies to substantial amendments,[65] and it does not apply to amendments made by order of the court.[66] In the absence of an affirmative showing to the contrary it will be presumed when such service is necessary, that an amended pleading was properly served.[67] Service of an amended pleading is not rendered invalid because of a previous failure to serve the original,[68] but service of an amendment constitutes no substitute for service of the pleading itself.[69] Default in answering the original pleading will not excuse failure to serve a copy of an amended pleading.[70]

6. Method of Service — a. In General. The method of serving pleadings is usually regulated by statute.[71]

b. On Attorney of Adverse Party. It is commonly provided by statute that when a party has an attorney in the action, service may or shall be made upon him.[72] If the attorney sought to be served is present in his office, a valid service can be made only by delivering him a copy personally.[73] If he is absent the statutes frequently allow the pleading to be left in a conspicuous place in his office,[74] or with his clerk.[75] If an unlawful entry into the office be made after office hours, and the pleading left therein, this does not constitute a good service.[76]

c. Service by Mail. Service by mail is usually provided for by statute.[77] The paper must be mailed in an envelope or sealed wrapper,[78] directed to the proper person and place,[79] and the postage prepaid,[80] or the service will be invalid. Where the paper is deposited in the post-office designated by statute, correctly addressed and the postage paid, the service is deemed complete, and the party to whom it is addressed takes the risks of the failure of the mail; [81] but where the paper is deposited in some other post-office than the one designated the attorney making the service takes the risks of its being received in time.[82] Where the paper actually comes to the hands of the person to be served within the time required by law, it is immaterial where it is mailed.[83] The day the paper is mailed and not the day it is received is the day of service,[84] and the service is good as of that day even if the paper is deposited in the post-office after the mail has closed.[85] A direction on the envelope to return to the sender if not called for within a certain number of days does not invalidate the service unless it is shown that by a return in obedience to the direction the party failed to receive the paper.[86]

7. Sufficiency of Copy Served — a. In General. The copy served must be a correct one.[87] If the original has the seal of the court, the copy served must show that fact;[88] if the original is verified by affidavit, the copy must contain the complete affidavit, including the name of the officer before whom it was taken;[89] and the copy must contain the proper caption.[90] A party has a right to consider the copy served upon him as correct, and it is that, and not the original filed, which he is called upon to answer.[91] An attested copy need not be served unless expressly required.[92] If service of an original paper is required, service of a copy will not suffice.[93] The court may in its discretion sustain an application for leave to serve an amended copy of a pleading, if the one served is imperfect.[94]

b. Remedy For Failure to Serve Sufficient Copy. By rule of court if a copy is served which is deemed insufficient, it must be returned immediately, or a notice given that it will not be accepted, so as to give the opposite attorney the opportunity of correcting the mistake,[95] and the objections to the pleading must be pointed out specifically.[96] But if the attorney upon whom it is served retains it and gives no notice of the defect, he is to be considered as waiving the objection and electing to consider it as properly amended.[97] Where papers are to be returned for irregularity, if there is no attorney's name on them, they should be returned to the party unless the attorney is known.[98] A paper once returned need not be returned again if it is again served.[99] If the paper is improperly refused and returned, a motion to require an acceptance of service may be made.[1]

8. Proof of Service. The return or affidavit of service should show all the facts making the service sufficient under the statute,[2] and it should sufficiently identify the papers served.[3] It must be certain and unequivocal,[4] but mere clerical errors will not vitiate it.[5] A written acceptance of service is sufficient to show that proper service was made.[6]

9. Time For Filing and Service. The time when pleadings must be filed and served is a matter which is usually regulated in each jurisdiction by statute or rule of court.[7] If the time is not fixed by statute or rule, the pleading must be filed within a reasonable time, and what is reasonable is a question addressed to the discretion of the court.[8] Such a statute or rule is merely directory, and the time limited may be extended by the court within its discretion on terms, good cause being shown.[9] But unless done with the court's consent a pleading is filed or served too late after the expiration of the time prescribed by statute or rule,[10]

Excusable delay.— Under N. Y. Code, § 128, requiring an answer to be served on plaintiff's attorney, if the attorney's office is closed and his dwelling-house is closed on the last day when service can be made, a service on him the next day, with notice of and may be stricken out or set aside,[11] or judgment may be moved for,[12] unless the time has been extended by consent of the parties.[13] If an order is made extending the time to plead, and is subsequently vacated as irregular, the order affords no protection whatever, and the situation is the same as though no order had ever been made.[14] An order that a party plead "forthwith" means within twenty-four hours.[15] When the rule or statute does not prescribe the time within which a copy of the pleadings must be furnished after demand, it must be served within a reasonable time.[16] In computing the time for filing a pleading intervening Sundays are to be counted,[17] unless the time limited is less than a week,[18] or unless the last day falls on Sunday or a holiday.[19] The time of filing a pleading may be proved by the indorsement of the clerk thereon.[20]

10. Taking Pleadings From Files.[21] Pleadings when filed become a part of the record of the court and cannot be taken from the files without leave of court.[22] And it has been held that leave of court will not suffice, but that both parties to the action must consent thereto.[23] Leave to withdraw a pleading does not authorize the party to actually take it off the files; the effect of the order is simply to eliminate it as a pleading affecting the issue in the cause.[24] Notes annexed to a petition cannot be taken from the files without leaving copies, which will form part of the record.[25] A pleading once filed is presumed to remain on file and a withdrawal must be affirmatively shown.[26]

substitute copies and proceed with the cause,[28] or to allow the parties to plead de novo.[29] And the substitution of a copy by agreement, without any order from the court is equally proper,[30] but a substitute filed without either leave or agreement is no part of the record.[31] Subsequent approval of the substitution of a copy is, however, as effective as previous authority.[32] A substituted pleading takes the place of the original as of the date of the original filing.[33]

The substitution of copies for original pleadings which have been lost or destroyed is sometimes provided for and regulated by statute.[36] In some jurisdictions notice of the application for leave to file a substituted pleading must be given to the opposite party,[37] but in others such notice is not required.[38] The court must be satisfied of the existence of the original files before making an order of substitution.[39] If both parties do not

2. Conditions on Granting Leave. Leave to withdraw a pleading will usually be given, where the other party will not be prejudiced,[48] upon such terms as may be just.[49] Thus, it may be made a condition of granting leave that the accrued costs, in whole or in part be paid,[50] that defects in a prior pleading be corrected,[51] that a valid plea be filed,[52] or that the party agree to be ready for trial at a certain time.[53]

3. Time of Withdrawal. As to the time when a pleading may be withdrawn there is no fixed rule.[54] The withdrawal of a pleading has been allowed on the trial[55] after the other party has demurred to it;[56] after the report of an auditor has been filed,[57] and after the cause has been remanded by the appellate tained.[68] Permission may be given to withdraw one plea or replication and rely on or file another;[69] to withdraw any pleading and file an amended pleading;[70] to withdraw an amended pleading ;[71] to withdraw an unnecessary pleading,[72] one filed without authority,[73] inadvertently,[74] or under a misapprehension of facts;[75] to withdraw a pleading which cannot be supported by evidence because of inability to give a bill of particulars,[76] to withdraw a pleading and file a motion,[77] or to withdraw a part of a pleading.[78] But it seems that ordinarily the court will not permit the withdrawal of a plea in bar and the filing of a plea in abatement.[79]

5. WHO MAY WITHDRAW. One of several co-parties cannot be allowed to withdraw a pleading filed by all jointly, if the others wish to rely upon it.[80]

6. WHAT AMOUNTS TO A WITHDRAWAL. The filing of a new pleading or an amended pleading operates as a withdrawal of the pleading on file;[81] but the filing of an additional plea is not a withdrawal of a prior plea.[82] A motion to transfer a cause to the equity side of the court operates as a withdrawal of the legal answer,[83] and a failure to offer evidence in support of a pleading is in effect a withdrawal of it.[84] Demurring to a special defense after having filed a reply will be deemed a withdrawal of the latter as to such defense.[85] An agreement that all matters may be shown in evidence under one plea does not operate to withdraw other pleas which were on file at the time the agreement was made.[86] A demurrer may be withdrawn by a statement in open court that the demurrant waives it.[87]

it the plea or answer filed,[88] but the converse is not true.[89] The withdrawal of any pleading withdraws a demurrer or plea directed against it.[90] Withdrawing a demurrer waives the defect upon which the demurrer was founded,[91] and the withdrawal of a plea or answer is an admission of the traversable facts in the declaration or complaint.[92] A pleading which has been withdrawn may nevertheless constitute a part of another pleading which has previously adopted its allegations.[93] A party having once solemnly admitted a fact by his pleading, is estopped from afterward denying the truth of such admission by the withdrawal of such pleading.[94] A withdrawal of a pleading or a portion thereof cannot put the court in error as to an order previously made.[95] Where a demurrer has been waived by answering, a subsequent withdrawal of the answer reinstates the demurrer,[96] and refiling a pleading once withdrawn restores the issue to the condition in which it stood when the withdrawal was made.[97] The withdrawal of a pleading after a demurrer to it has been overruled is not equivalent to a confession of judgment.[98] A withdrawal is not necessarily final and the court may allow the pleading to be refiled.[99] Where defendant filed a demurrer to the declaration, and the records show that he afterward withdrew his plea and no plea appears of record, this is an abandonment of the demurrer.[1] Under a statute providing that a pleading shall not be withdrawn from the files when a pleading stated to be a substitute therefor is filed, the withdrawal of a substituted petition reinstates the original petition.[2]

causes of action or defenses;[9] and motions relating to parties.[10] Such motions are, to a considerable extent, a substitute for a special demurrer as used in the common-law procedure. They are generally not regarded with favor,[11] and will be granted only in a clear case,[12] the exercise of the power being a matter of discretion with the court.[13] Two or more motions based upon substantially the same grounds cannot be filed without leave of court.[14] The fact that a party has a remedy by demurrer does not necessarily preclude a motion.[15] A motion calling attention to a defective statement in a pleading does not present an issue of fact or of law and hence cannot be classed as an answer.[16]

B. For Judgment on the Pleadings[17] — 1. Power and Discretion of Court. Judgment on the pleadings is provided for by statute in many jurisdictions,[18] but even where there is no statute it has been held that the power is inherent in every court of record when the facts shown and admitted by the pleadings entitle one party to such judgment.[19] However, in some jurisdictions, a motion for judgment on the pleadings is not deemed a proper method of objecting to the "sufficiency" of a pleading.[20] And the granting of judgment upon the pleadings upon motion is not looked upon with favor by the courts,[21] and on

18. See the statutes of the several states.

Where a statute provides that "where, upon the statements in the pleadings, one party is entitled by law to judgment in his favor, judgment shall be so rendered by the court, though a verdict has been found against such party," the court has power thereunder to render judgment on the pleadings even before a judgment has been rendered. In Nebraska it has been held that the only remedies for a faulty answer under the code are a demurrer, a motion to make more definite and certain, and a motion to strike as frivolous. Hedges v. Roach, 16 Nebr. 673, 21 N. W. 404. But in Kime v. Jesse, 52 Nebr. 606, 72 N. W. 1050, it was held that, although the earlier case outlined the proper practice, a motion for judgment on the pleadings was an additional remedy, under the statute.

In Washington it was stated that a judgment on the pleadings is allowed when there is an entire lack of a pleading, but not where a pleading filed is defective. Davis v. Ford, 15 Wash. 107, 45 Pac. 739, 46 Pac. 393. See also Redding v. Puget Sound Iron, etc., Works, 36 Wash. 642, 79 Pac. 308. But this view is not reconcilable with a later case in which the court uses the following language: "The practice of objecting to the introduction of testimony, or moving for judgment on the pleadings, because of some formal defect in the pleadings which may be cured by amendments is not to be commended. But where the motion for judgment goes to the substance of the action or defense and not to the mere form of allegation, there is no reason why the practice should not receive the sanction of the courts. If there is no cause of action or no defense, and no defect curable by amendment, the time of the court should not be taken up in hearing testimony that can avail nothing." Hubenthal v. Spokane, etc., R. Co., 43 Wash. 677, 684, 86 Pac. 955.

Important questions of law should not be settled by the summary method of motions. Jones v. Proctor, 24 Ohio Cir. Ct. 80; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Adams, 180 U. S. 28, 21 S. Ct. 251, 45 L. ed. 410.

such a motion, at any stage of the case, the court will not declare a pleading defective if it can be sustained by the most liberal construction,[22] since every reasonable intendment is to be taken in favor of the pleading claimed to be defective,[23] especially when the motion for judgment is made at the trial.[24] Pure questions of fact or mixed questions of law and fact cannot be determined on the motion.[25]

2. NATURE OF MOTION. A motion for judgment upon the pleadings is in the nature of a demurrer.[26] It is in substance both a motion and a demurrer. It is a demurrer for the reason that it attacks the sufficiency of the pleadings; and it is a motion for the reason that it is an application for an order for judgment.[27] Like a demurrer it admits the truth of all well pleaded facts in the pleadings of the opposing party,[28] it may be carried back and sustained against a prior pleading of the party making the motion,[29] and the court will consider the whole record and give judgment for the party who, on the whole, appears entitled to it.[30] But

Conclusions not admitted.— Where, in an action on a note, the answer merely stated that the cause of action was barred by limitations, a motion for judgment on the pleadings did not admit the truth of the allegation that the cause of action was barred. Extent of admission.—When a party moves for judgment on the pleadings he not only for the purposes of his motion admits the truth of all the allegations of his adversary, but must also be deemed to have admitted the untruth of all his own allegations which have been denied by his adversary (Walling v. Bown, 9 Ida. 184, 72 Pac. 960), and this rule extends to all such denials as the statute gives plaintiff to any matter of defense set up by defendant (Chemung Min. averments in the pleadings of the moving party are not necessarily to be taken as true.[31] It is wholly immaterial upon whom rests the burden of proof.[32]

3. GROUNDS — a. Failure to Reply. The proper practice, where a reply is necessary and there is no reply, is to render judgment for defendant.[33] So, where defendant sets up a counter-claim, and no reply is filed, as the statute requires, an affirmative judgment may be rendered for defendant on the counter-claim.[34]

b. Defective Pleadings in General. The pleading must be clearly bad in order to justify a judgment in favor of the other party, and if there is any reasonable doubt as to its sufficiency judgment on the pleadings will not be rendered.[35] So the defect must be substantial and not merely formal or technical.[36] Thus a a clerical error,[37] the want of a necessary verification [38] or a defective verification,[39] the want of a signature to a pleading,[40] or mere indefiniteness or uncertainty [41] will not authorize such a judgment. So if a defective pleading is cured by a subsequent pleading,[42] by verdict,[43] or by the evidence [44] it will not warrant a judgment on the pleadings in favor of the other party. After a pleading has been held bad on general demurrer and the party refuses to plead over, judgment on the pleadings may be rendered;[45] but if a demurrer to the pleadings is overruled this is conclusive against demurrants' right to judgment on the pleadings.[46] Furthermore, if the allegations of the pleadings of plaintiff, the moving party, independent of any other facts, are insufficient to support a judgment for damages, no such judgment can be rendered on the pleadings.[47]

c. Insufficiency of Complaint or Counter-Claim. Where the complaint fails to state a cause of action it is demurrable;[48] but the objection is not waived by failure to urge the objection by demurrer,[49] and a motion raising such objection may be made before or during the trial.[50] This motion is variously termed by courts, even in the same jurisdiction, a motion to dismiss, to strike out the complaint, or for judgment on the pleadings, the terms apparently being used interchangeably. Under the codes, a complaint which states any cause of action whatever, whether legal or equitable, is good as against a motion for judgment on the pleadings.[51] If a counter-claim is clearly insufficient, judgment thereon may be rendered against defendant on the pleadings.[52]

d. Failure of Answer or Reply to Deny or Set Up New Matter. Where a material issue is tendered by the pleadings, judgment on the pleadings is improper.[53] But if the answer or reply admits by failure to deny or sets up new matter which is no defense, judgment may be rendered on the pleadings.[54] So judgment may

In New York the statute authorizing judgment where the pleadings of the other party are frivolous applies only where affirmative relief can be awarded to the party against whom the frivolous pleading is filed, and hence a frivolous reply to a mere defense of new matter does not warrant such a

a frivolous demurrer.[58] The whole plea or answer is to be treated as an entirety and no judgment on the pleadings can be rendered because a part of it is frivolous.[59] If any one defense is good the entire pleading cannot be deemed frivolous.[60]

(II) What Constitutes Frivolousness — (A) In General. A frivolous pleading is one which, assuming the truth of its allegations, is so clearly and palpably bad as to require no argument to convince the court thereof, and which would be pronounced by the court indicative of bad faith in the pleader on a mere inspection.[61] An answer is frivolous where, conceding it to be true, it does not contain any defense to any part of plaintiff's cause of action, and its insufficiency as a defense is so glaring that the court can determine it upon a bare inspection, without argument.[62] If argument is necessary to convince the court of the bad faith of the pleader or the insufficiency of the plea, it cannot be held to be frivolous.[63] A pleading is not to be deemed frivolous merely because it would probably be held bad on demurrer,[64] nor because it is sham.[65] Nor does mere vagueness and uncertainty make a pleading frivolous,[66] nor the pleading of evidence or legal conclusions.[67] No plea or answer which presents a defense or an issue as to any material allegation in the declaration or complaint,[68] or as to any fact essential to plaintiff's recovery,[69] is frivolous. Ordinarily a general denial or general issue cannot be deemed frivolous,[70] nor can a special denial putting in issue any material allegation;[71] and a denial in the conjunctive form is not frivolous.[72] But a denial not of any facts but that plaintiff has a cause of action is frivolous,[73] as is one which constitutes a negative pregnant,[74] or which is evasive and does not squarely meet the allegations of the pleading to which it is directed,[75] or one which takes issue

on an immaterial matter.[76] So a plea concluding with a verification which ought to conclude to the country is frivolous.[77] The verification of a pleading may save it from being held false, but it cannot afford protection from the charge of frivolousness.[78]

(B) Denials on Information and Belief or of Knowledge or Information. A denial of any knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to a material matter, if authorized by statute, cannot be held frivolous;[79] and such a denial, even as to matters presumptively within defendant's knowledge, while it is evasive and sham, is not frivolous.[80] So the mere denial of facts on information and belief, where in proper form, does not make an answer frivolous.[81]

(C) Frivolous Demurrer. A demurrer, to be held frivolous, must be so clearly without merit, founded in bad faith, and filed for delay, that the infirmity appears on mere inspection, without any argument.[82] The mere fact that a demurrer is plaint limited such denial to the form of the allegations of the complaint, instead of denying the substance, and warrants judgment on the pleadings. Hutchinson v. Bien, 104 N. Y. App. Div. 214, 93 N. Y. Suppl. 216 [affirming 46 Misc. 302, 93 N. Y. Suppl. 189].

A frivolous demurrer is one "which raises no serious question of law."— Morgan v. Harris, 141 N. C. 358, 54 S. E. 381; Johnston v. Pate, 83 N. C. 110.

Motion in effect a motion to strike.— A motion for judgment on the pleadings because of a frivolous demurrer is in effect a motion to strike out the demurrer. Guth v. Lubach, 73 Wis. 131, 40 N. W. 681.

A frivolous exception may be overruled based on a doubtful question of law,[83] or even that it clearly is not well taken on authority,[84] is not enough to condemn it as frivolous. And an unauthorized demurrer, filed through misapprehension, is not for that reason frivolous.[85]

(D) Distinction Between Frivolous and Sham Pleadings. While the courts sometimes use the terms "frivolous" and "sham" as meaning the same thing, and a motion to strike is often based on the ground that a plea is both frivolous and sham, there is nevertheless a clear distinction between the two in that a sham plea is good on its face but false in fact, while a frivolous plea is one which on its face sets up no defense, although it may be true.[86] A frivolous pleading is always assumed to be true, while a sham pleading must be proved to be false; the character of the former is determined by mere inspection while that of the latter is usually determined by proof aliunde.[87]

f. Incomplete Defense. If any actionable part of the declaration remains admitted or unanswered, judgment on the pleadings for that portion may be rendered.[88] Thus, if a plea purports to answer the whole declaration and is sufficient as to only one count, judgment may be rendered for plaintiff after that count has been stricken out.[89] And if defendant denies only a portion of the indebtedness, judgment on the pleadings for the amount admitted is proper.[90] Where an answer sets up a sufficient counter-claim, plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings is properly denied,[91] but not where the counter-claim is for merely nominal damages.[92]

g. Inconsistent Defenses. It is not ground for a judgment on the pleadings that a pleading contains inconsistent counts or defenses,[93] as for example without argument thereon. Orleans Bank v. Rice, 13 La. 277. But it cannot prevent a cause from being put at issue when an answer has been filed with the exception. Broadwell v. Kelly, 14 La. Ann. 456.

h. Want or Insufficiency of Affidavit of Defense. In those jurisdictions where affidavits of defense must be filed in certain cases, the failure to file such affidavit, or a sufficient affidavit, when required, will entitle plaintiff to judgment;[95] but not where plaintiff's statement of claim is fatally defective [96] or does not comply with the rules.[97] The question to be determined on the motion is whether the affidavit is sufficient to send the case to the jury,[98] and if an investigation of facts dehors the record is necessary, no judgment will be rendered,[99] since the sufficiency of the affidavit will be determined by what appears on its face.[1] Judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defense will be refused if a valid defense is disclosed,[2] or in case of doubt as to the legal sufficiency of the affidavit of defense.[3] The averments in the affidavit of defense are taken as true,[4] and are to be construed in a spirit of fair liberality.[5] But the words of the affidavit are not to be taken as implying more than they express,[6] and what is not stated must be considered not to exist.[7] All the facts necessary to constitute a substantial

On the contrary, its language is to be given the same meaning it would be given in the ordinary speech of the people, and all of the statements of fact therein appearing, when thus regarded, must be accepted as true.

defense must be stated,[8] and alleged with reasonable precision and distinctness [9]— legal conclusions are not sufficient.[10] But mere lack of definiteness will not warrant a judgment.[11] If the affidavit is sufficient as to part of the claim, and insufficient as to the residue, judgment may be directed for the part insufficiently denied,[12] but the entire affidavit is not rendered bad by an insufficient portion.[13]

i. Failure to Comply With Rule of Court. Failure to comply with the rule of court requiring a memorandum of pleadings to be filed by the clerk in a cause to be made in a book kept for that purpose has been held ground for judgment on the pleadings.[14]

j. Pleading Filed Without Authority. A pleading filed without authority is ground for such a judgment the same as the want of a pleading.[15]

4. Waiver of Right to Move. The right to move for judgment is not waived by answering the frivolous or defective pleading.[16] But if the parties go to trial and introduce evidence as though an issue were properly raised, it is then too late to ask for judgment for want of a reply.[17] Where plaintiff sets forth two causes of action, his right to judgment on the pleadings as to one of them is not waived by anything he may do respecting the other.[18] The right to move for judgment for want or insufficiency of an affidavit of defense may be waived by plaintiff. Thus plaintiff's notice or motion for a plea or the entry of a rule to plead,[19] plaintiff's referring the cause to arbitrators and taking an award,[20] the placing the case upon the trial list by counsel for plaintiff,[21] or taking any steps subsequent to the affidavit calculated to mislead defendant,[22] constitutes a waiver.

thereof is inherent in the court, the codes and practice acts often expressly authorize such a motion in particular cases as where the pleading is sham, irrelevant, or frivolous.[24] Like a demurrer, the motion to strike a pleading admits the truth of all facts well pleaded for the purposes of the motion,[25] except where the motion is to strike a pleading as sham.[26] Motions to strike out pleadings for any cause are not to be encouraged;[27] and will be granted only in a clear case,[28] the granting or refusing of the motion being a matter within the discretion of the court.[29] A motion to strike out a pleading as an entirety cannot be sustained where one or more of the counts, defenses, or paragraphs therein are sufficient.[30] So a motion to strike a paragraph for irregularity should be denied if any portion of it is relevant or responsive.[31]

b. Pleadings or Particular Parts Thereof Which May Be Stricken — (i) In General.[32] Either the complaint, answer, reply, or subsequent pleadings may be stricken out in a proper case.[33] So a plea puis darrein continuance may be stricken out,[34] as may a cross complaint.[35] So a partial defense pleaded as a complete defense may be stricken out.[36] And an insufficient or improper notice of special matter under the general issue may be reached by a motion to strike.[37] So a substituted answer filed after the death of defendant may be stricken out where it is in conflict with the original and sets up no defense.[38] But generally the general issue or general denial, if authorized and in proper form, cannot be stricken out,[39] although it is otherwise if not in proper form.[40] An intervening petition which a person has a right to file is improperly stricken out without a hearing.[41] In the federal courts it seems that no motion lies to strike from the files a plea to the jurisdiction.[42]

(II) Counter-Claim.[43] If a pleading contains a counter-claim which is wholly unauthorized, a motion to strike will lie;[44] but the question whether a counter-claim is valid is one to be raised by demurrer or motion on the trial and not by motion to strike.[45] A counter-claim cannot be stricken out under a statute authorizing the striking out of a "defense."[46]

(III) Amended and Supplemental Pleadings.[47] Even after leave has been granted to file an amended or supplemental pleading, it may be stricken out, in a proper case, after it is filed.[48] For instance, if the amendment is one not allowable as where it sets forth a new cause of action or defense,[49] adds new parties after the issues are made up,[50] is contrary to the order of the court permitting the amendment,[51] was filed without necessary leave,[52] or was filed too late[53] it may be stricken out. So an amended pleading which is substantially a repetition of a former pleading may be stricken from the files,[54] especially if the former pleading has already been held bad on demurrer.[55] The fact that a demurrer was filed to an original pleading does not operate as a waiver of the right to strike the amended pleading.[56]

client, is ordinarily not ground for striking out his pleading.[62] Where the issues presented by the allegations of an answer have been previously adjudicated by the ruling of the court upon a demurrer to plaintiff's petition, the answer may properly be stricken out on motion.[63]

(II) Substantial Insufficiency — (A) In General. The precise line of demarcation between the functions of a demurrer and a motion to strike out a pleading or a separate part thereof, in so far as the objection sought to be urged is the failure to state a cause of action or defense, is difficult to determine, inasmuch as in many jurisdictions the decisions do not make it clear whether a pleading or separate part thereof may always be stricken out where it fails to state a cause of action or defense, whether the rule is directly to the contrary and that in no case can the motion to strike take the place of a demurrer for insufficiency, or whether the intermediate rule applies, which is that the motion to strike will not lie except where the insufficiency is so obvious and manifest that the court can determine on mere inspection and without argument. In some jurisdictions the decisions seem to be sufficiently broad to authorize the statement that in all cases such a motion lies, thereby making the motion practically the equivalent of a demurrer for insufficiency.[64] Most of the decisions, however, lay down the broad rule that the motion does not lie to determine whether a cause of action or defense is stated[65] — since such a motion is not usually regarded as a substitute for a

Whether matters stated in an answer constitute a justification or not cannot be determined by a motion to strike. Hanson Co. v. Collier, 119 N. Y. App. Div. 794, 104 N. Y. Suppl. 787 [reversing on other grounds 51 Misc. 496, 101 N. Y. Suppl. 690].

In Alabama, under a statute providing that pleadings may be stricken out on motion when unnecessarily prolix, irrelevant, or frivolous, a pleading cannot be stricken out merely because it does not set up a valid cause of action or defense. Wefel v. Stillman, (1907) 44 So. 203; Owensboro Wagon Co. v. Hall, 149 Ala. 210, 43 So. 71; Troy Fertilizer Co. v. State, 134 Ala. 333, 32 So. 618; Brooks v. Continental Ins. Rep. 123; Carpenter v. Jeter, 4 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 326.

In Florida the demurrer goes to the pleading as a whole for insufficiency, while the motion to strike is applicable where the pleading as a whole or any part of it is irrelevant or improper and impedes a fair trial. State v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 53 Fla. 711, 44 So. 230.

In Indiana it is well established that it is error to strike out a complaint on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. McCoy v. Stockman, 146 Ind. 668, 46 N. E. 21; Fletcher v. Crist, 139 Ind. 121, 38 N. E. 472; State v. Newlin, 69 Ind. 108; Indianapolis Piano Mfg. Co. v. Caven, 53 Ind. 258; Port v. Williams, 6 Ind. 219. The reason of the rule is, that if the facts stated are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action plaintiff has a right to amend his complaint so it will state a cause of action. This he could not do if the pleading was stricken out. The same rule applies to a cross complaint. McCoy v. Stockman, 146 Ind. 668, 46 N. E. 21.

Plea in legal effect a confession of cause of action.— Where no other defense is made than by a plea which plaintiff conceives to be in legal effect a confession of the cause of action, he should move for judgment on the pleadings, and not to strike out. Illinois.— Consolidated Coal Co. v. Peers, 166 Ill. 361, 365, 46 N. E. 1105, 38 L. R. A. 624, where the court said: "To substitute a motion to strike a pleading from the files in place of a demurrer to such pleading is to abrogate the rules of common law pertaining to pleading and practice, and to introduce a new and dangerous rule of procedure, and one that would tend to deprive parties litigant of the statutory right of amendment."

United States.— Bates v. Clark, 95 U. S. 204, 206, 24 L. ed. 471, where it was said: "This mode of disposing of a plea [striking it out] which fairly raises a most important issue of law seems to be growing in favor in the territorial courts. It is an unscientific and unprofessional mode of raising and deciding a pure issue of law. This should always be done, when it can, by a demurrer, which is the recognized and appropriate mode in the common law; or by exception, which amounts to the same thing in the civil law, as it is applied to answers in chancery practice. A motion to strike out a plea is properly made when it has been filed irregularly, is not sworn to, if that is required, or wants signature of counsel, or any defect of that character; but if a real and important issue of law is to be made, that issue should be raised by demurrer."

(B) Whether Pleading Demurrable as Test. A pleading, count, or defense which would be held good on demurrer cannot be stricken out for insufficiency;[68] nor, on the other hand, will it be stricken out merely because it is insufficient as against a demurrer,[69] although error in striking out from the files a pleading subject to demurrer is generally considered harmless.[70]

(C) Frivolous and Irrelevant Pleadings — (1) IN GENERAL. Where a pleading or separate part thereof is so far insufficient as to be frivolous,[71] a motion lies in most jurisdictions to strike out the pleading if entirely frivolous, or the separate part deemed frivolous,[72] and also a demurrer if frivolous.[73] So where an entire

A counter-claim cannot, however, be stricken out as frivolous. Cooper v. Howe, 16 Hun (N. Y.) 502. Where the code provision permits only sham and irrelevant "answers" or "defenses" to be stricken out, a counter-claim cannot be stricken out since it is not a defense and does not constitute the whole answer. Collins v. Suau, 7 Rob. (N. Y.) 94.

In Georgia a pleading may be stricken out after a demurrer to it is ruled on and in connection therewith. Mathis v. Fordham, 114 Ga. 364, 40 S. E. 324.

In England and some parts of Canada, by statute or rule of court, a motion lies to strike out the complaint where it alleges "no reasonable cause of action." The latter phrase means something more than that the complaint is so insufficient as to be demurrable and a motion lies thereunder only in plain and obvious cases where the court can clearly see that plaintiff has no cause of action. pleading or separate paragraph thereof is irrelevant, a motion to strike is authorized, by statute or otherwise, in many jurisdictions;[74] the decisions generally holding that the terms "frivolousness" and "irrelevancy" mean practically the same thing.[75] But a motion to strike on such grounds should not be granted if there is any question as to the validity of the pleading.[76]

(2) New York Rule. In New York, by statute, the remedy for frivolousness is a motion for judgment on the pleadings,[77] and a motion to strike out does not lie.[78]

In Wisconsin there is no distinction between striking out a demurrer as frivolous and overruling it, since the privilege of answering is allowed in either case. Geilfuss v. Gates, 87 Wis. 395, 58 N. W. 742; Malone v. Roby, 62 Wis. 459, 22 N. W. 575.

Irrelevancy, as the term was used in the old code provision authorizing the striking out of sham and irrelevant defenses, meant the impertinency of the old chancery system, that is, either prolixity or needless details of material matter or something out of which no cause of action or defense could arise between the parties in the particular suit. Lee Bank v. Kitching, 7 Bosw. (N. Y.) 664.

A denial in verbis of the allegation to the complaint cannot be objected to as irrelevant, although the allegations are of immaterial facts. Dovan v. Dinsmore, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 86.

An answer that is irrelevant is of course insufficient, within a code provision that answers may be demurred to for "insufficiency," but it may be insufficient without being irrelevant. Steinhauer v. Colmar, 11 Colo. App. 494, 55 Pac. 291.

(D) Pleading Legal Conclusions. If a pleading consists of nothing but legal conclusions or tenders merely an issue of law, it may be stricken out on motion;[79] but the mere presence of a legal conclusion will not warrant striking a whole paragraph.[80]

(E) Miscellaneous Objections. A pleading taking issue on immaterial matter only,[81] or an unauthorized equitable defense to a legal cause of action,[82] or an equitable plea consisting of matter which is a defense at law,[83] or an answer which is in effect a demurrer,[84] may be stricken out. But if any material fact is traversed by the answer or reply it cannot be stricken.[85]

it is one shown to be false, the additional element is often added that it is one which appears to have been interposed in bad faith or for the purpose of delay;[88] but it has been expressly decided that the power of the court to strike out such a pleading is not limited to cases where bad faith affirmatively appears and that a sham pleading may be stricken out, although interposed in the belief of its truth.[89] A pleading is not sham merely because legally insufficient,[90] or demurrable for insufficiency,[91] nor because insufficiently setting forth a valid claim or defense,[92] nor because of the omission of material facts,[93] nor because it contains inconsistent averments.[94]

(B) Power to Strike. At common law, the courts had power to strike out a pleading as false or sham.[95] Under the codes and practice acts the power is gen-

For instance a plea of limitations may be stricken out as sham in an action to foreclose, where, because of the answer not being verified, it admits the due execution of the note and mortgage, copies of which are set out in the complaint, and it appears therefrom that the action is commenced within the period fixed by the statute of limitations. Frey v. Sylvester, 24 Misc. (N. Y.) 167, 53 N. Y. Suppl. 527. But pleading facts on information and belief should not be stricken out as sham, unless it clearly appears that there could not have been any information or belief. Kelly v. Kelly, 12 Misc. (N. Ordinarily bad faith will be presumed from the fact that the answer is false and untrue. erally conferred by express provisions;[96] but the power conferred by statute is usually only that exercised at common law,[97] and the power to strike is inherent in the court where not authorized by statute.[98] The fact that a defense is demurrable does not preclude a motion to strike it out as sham.[99]

(c) What Pleadings or Parts Thereof May Be Stricken Out as Sham — (1) In General.[1] It is generally held that neither a complaint,[2] demurrer,[3] or counterclaim [4] can be stricken out as sham where the statute merely authorizes the striking out of sham "answers and defenses." But a complaint may be stricken as sham where the statute authorizes the striking of an answer "or other pleading" as sham.[5] And at common law it seems that a demurrer, where false, should be stricken out.[6]

(2) Denials. At common law the general issue cannot be stricken as sham.[7] And under the codes and practice acts, the general rule is that an answer containing a sufficient general or specific denial of all or a part of the material allega-

(4) Defense Sham in Part. The motion to strike a pleading as sham can be directed only against an entire answer or an entire defense,[17] and an entire answer will not be stricken out upon a showing that a separable part of it is sham.[18] However, if a part of an answer is false and a part true, but the part that is true, standing alone, does not constitute a defense, the whole answer may be stricken as sham.[19]

(D) Propriety of Granting Motion. The motion to strike out a pleading or defense as sham is not looked on with favor and will be granted only where the falsity clearly appears,[20] since the truth or falsity of a pleading is ordinarily to be tried by a jury with full opportunity for producing, examining, and cross-examining witnesses.[21] But a pleading may be stricken as sham where the moving being by motion to compel a separate statement,[33] or, in some jurisdictions, a motion to compel an election.[34] So generally duplicity is not ground for striking out a pleading,[35] except in those common-law states where special demurrers have been abolished.[36]

(v) Formal Defects.[37] Failure to number the folios of a pleading as required by a rule of court is not ground for striking the pleading;[38] nor is the fact that the parties are not designated as plaintiff and defendant in the caption,[39] that the caption omits the name of the pleading,[40] or that initials are used in place of a full christian name.[41] But in some jurisdictions it is held that a wholly inappropriate conclusion, such as a conclusion with a verification, when it should be to the contrary,[42] or vice versa,[43] is ground for striking a plea, as is, it has been held, the omission to entitle a pleading.[44] or if certain counts or defenses are verified and others are not, those unverified may be stricken.[48] A defective jurat will not cause a pleading to be stricken if it appears by affidavit that the pleading was in fact properly sworn to.[49] Where the affidavit is not absolutely necessary, and may be required or not in the discretion of the court, as in case of an affidavit to a plea puis darrein continuance,[50] or where verification is subject to the discretion of the pleader,[51] the pleading cannot be stricken out where the truth of the pleading is not questioned.

(VII) Disobedience to Order of Court. Pleadings are frequently stricken out as a penalty for disobedience to orders of court.[52] If the court makes an order requiring a pleading of a specified character to be filed, and the pleading filed does not conform to the order, it may be stricken from the files;[53] or if an ordered amendment is not made, the original pleading may be stricken.[54] And where the court orders money to be brought into court on a plea of tender, a refusal will justify the court in striking the plea from the files.[55] If an answer is filed which makes necessary another party and the court orders such party brought in, the continued failure of defendant to make him a party to the suit will justify striking out the answer.[56] So an answer may be stricken out because of defendant's failure to appear as a witness for plaintiff when served with a proper subpœna,[57] or because of his failure to answer a proper question put to him on his examination as a witness before trial.[58] But failure to observe an order as to one defense should not subject defendant to having his entire answer stricken out.[59]

(VIII) EMBARRASSING PLEADING. In England and some parts of Canada, statutes have been enacted authorizing the striking out of a pleading or separate part thereof where it is so framed as to "prejudice, embarrass, or delay" the fair trial of the action.[60] So in at least one state in this country a similar statute has been enacted.[61] "Embarrassing" means that a matter is pleaded which the party has no right to plead,[62] and is apparently practically the same as a frivolous pleading.[63] A pleading or paragraph is not embarrassing merely because indefinite,[64] or false,[65] or set out at unnecessary length.[66] The rule as to embarrassing pleas applies, it seems, only to affirmative pleas.[67]

(IX) FAILURE TO FILE OR SERVE IN TIME.[68] A pleading not filed in apt time may be stricken.[69] This is true after default, even when the pleading was filed by leave of court.[70] Likewise a pleading not filed in due order of pleading,[71] as where a plea in abatement is filed at the same time with, or after, a plea in bar has been filed,[72] may be stricken out. So a pleading may be stricken out where

(x) Failure to Obtain Necessary Leave of Court. Where leave of court is necessary for the filing of a pleading or an additional count or defense, it may be stricken out if it is filed without leave.[75] The same rule applies to a demurrer filed without leave where leave is necessary.[76]

(xi) Identical Causes of Action or Defenses and Superfluous Defenses. Where a party pleads a number of causes of action, pleas, or replications, which are identically or substantially the same, the other party may have all but one stricken out on motion;[77] but if they are merely similar, differing however, in a material matter, such a motion cannot be sustained.[78] So specific denials, in addition to a general denial, are deemed redundant and may be stricken out.[79] Likewise, if a defense sets up nothing which cannot be shown under another defense or plea in the answer, or a general or special denial pleaded, it may be stricken out.[80] And if the matter alleged as a counter-claim against one not a

(XIV) SCANDALOUS MATTER. A pleading may be stricken from the files where it contains scandalous matter.[91]

(XV) UNAUTHORIZED PLEADINGS. Where a party files a pleading which is wholly unauthorized, it may be stricken on motion.[92] Thus a common-law pleading in a special statutory proceeding where different pleadings are provided for may be stricken.[93] So an unauthorized plea in short may be stricken out.[94]

(XVI) VARIANCE.[95] A material variance between the writ or summons and declaration or complaint, when the defect is in the latter, has been held ground for striking the pleading from the files;[96] but the motion will not be sustained when the variance is not such as to mislead or prejudice defendant.[97]

2. ALLEGATIONS IN PLEADINGS — a. In General.[98] A motion to strike certain allegations or averments from a pleading, as distinguished from a motion to strike out a pleading or a separate count or defense therein, lies where improper matter is included in any of plaintiff's or defendant's pleadings, a motion to strike and not a demurrer being the proper remedy.[99] On the other hand a motion to strike out certain allegations as irrelevant does not lie to test the validity of a defense.[1] So allegations will not be stricken out merely because the averments are defective.[2] Allegations in a pleading constituting part of a paragraph will not be stricken out because they do not themselves disclose a reasonable cause of action.[3] As between co-defendants, if one files an answer containing matter outside the domain of controversy, the other may move to have it stricken out, although no demurrer is permitted between co-defendants.[4] The only advantage in moving to strike out matter deemed irrelevant is in finding out beforehand whether the court also deems it to be such and whether it is necessary to prepare to meet it by evidence on the trial.[5] Irrelevant matter not stricken out becomes mere surplusage and must be treated as such on the trial of the case.[6]

See also supra, II), although oftentimes the terms are used as synonymous in ruling on motions to strike. Superfluity and excess is the meaning given to the term redundancy in some of the cases (Brown v. Fish, 37 Misc. (N. Y.) 367, 75 N. Y. Suppl. 460 [reversed on other grounds in 76 N. Y. App. Div. 329, 78 N. Y. Suppl. 414]; Fasnacht v. Stehn, 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. (N. Y.) 338; Carpenter v. West, 5 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 53; Carpenter v. Reynolds, 58 Wis. 666, 17 N. Where a plea contained a surplusage consisting of a protestation of a matter of law, but the plea, divested of such surplusage, was simply "not guilty," the case will be tried on the plea, without striking the surplusage; it not being of sufficient importance. However, if redundant or irrelevant matter in a pleading is such that to strike it out would leave the pleading an unintelligible fragment, raising no issue, the proper remedy is not a motion to strike out but a motion for judgment on account of its frivolousness. A paragraph of an answer stating a good denial will not be stricken out as redundant or irrelevant. Ebling Brewing Co. v. Adler, 103 N. Y. Suppl. 93.

Allegations of special damage should not be stricken as irrelevant (Fox v. Chapman, 117 N. Y. App. Div. 127, 102 N. Y. Suppl. 378, holding that where a complaint in an action to recover damages for death by wrongful act alleged that the widow of the deceased spent large sums of money for hospital room and board and for care and medical attendance, the right to recover such items cannot be decided upon a motion to strike the allegations from the complaint; Pavenstedt v. New York L. Where the petition in a suit to set aside a conveyance did not set forth facts entitling plaintiff to relief by way of damages if he succeeded in securing the relief by way of cancellation, and there was no allegation on which damages by way of alternative relief in the event that cancellation was denied could be awarded, the court properly struck from the petition the allegations relating to damages. Hall v. Kary, 133 Iowa 465, 110 N. W. 930.

In an action for injuries, an order striking out from the complaint allegations involved in a common-law action, unless plaintiff serve an amended complaint separately stating his common-law action and action under the Employers' Liability Act, was not authorized by N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 545, authorizing the striking out of irrelevant and redundant matter. Acardo v. New York Contracting, etc., Co., 116 N. Y. App. Div. 793, 102 N. Y. Suppl. 7.

Allegations immaterial as to part of defendants.— One defendant cannot have allegations stricken from the complaint on the ground that they are immaterial against him, if they are material against some other defendant. Hoffman v. Wright, 137 N. Y. 621, 33 N. E. 554; Brown v. Fish, 76 N. Y. App. Div. 329, 78 N. Y. Suppl. 414.

Referring to other counts.— In determining the question whether certain matter is irrelevant, reference can be had to that count or defense alone in which such matter appears, and not to any other count or defense. Berry v. E. L. Moore Co., 69 S. C. 317, 48 S. E. 249. But allegations which are irrelevant and immaterial in one count or defense may in others be material so that striking them out from one count or defense does not preclude their being included in another. out as may denials intermingled with affirmative defenses.[14] So mere epithets may be stricken out as irrelevant,[15] as may superfluous phrases which tend to confuse the issues.[16] So an express admission in an answer or reply may be stricken out, since all allegations not denied are deemed admitted.[17] Where plaintiff unnecessarily pleads facts not essential to his cause of action, he cannot move to strike allegations answering them;[18] and where a party has treated certain matters as sufficiently important to require them to be made more definite and certain, he is estopped to thereafter have them stricken out.[19]

(B) Allegations of Evidence. Matters of evidence set up in a pleading may be stricken out.[20] But in some cases the court has refused to strike out such allegations on the ground that the moving party was not prejudiced thereby.[21] And where evidence of facts pleaded in allegations sought to be stricken out has any bearing on the subject-matter, the motion should be denied.[22] So it has been held that a motion to strike out of the petition evidential facts forming no part of the cause of action, but which are pleaded as aggravation of damages, is properly denied.[23]

(C) Anticipating Defenses. Matter alleged in a pleading in anticipation of a defense thereto, where improper, may be stricken out on motion.[24]

(D) Repetition of Allegations. Allegations or denials which are mere repetitions of others appearing elsewhere in the pleading may be stricken out,[25] as may averments which amount merely to a denial of facts which are already denied,[26] or which set up facts admissible under denials also pleaded.[27] So the court may strike out matter in a reply which is merely a repetition of the averments of the complaint.[28]

(E) Averments Raising Issues of Law. Averments by which it is sought to raise questions of law properly the subject of motion or demurrer may be stricken.[29]

(F) Legal Conclusions. Legal conclusions, when alleged in pleadings, may be stricken out;[30] and a denial which is a mere legal conclusion may be stricken.[31]

(G) Matter of Inducement. Matter of inducement will not ordinarily be stricken out on the ground of irrelevancy and immateriality.[32]

(H) Allegations Not Supported by Evidence. The fact that a party fails to introduce any evidence in support of certain allegations is not ground for striking out such allegations.[33]

(I) False or Frivolous Allegations. Separate allegations, not constituting entire counts or defenses, cannot be stricken out as sham or false,[34] and the same appears to be true of allegations deemed frivolous.[35]

(J) Inconsistent Allegations.[36] Allegations which are absolutely inconsistent with the rest of the pleading or with the party's prior pleading,[37] or are contradicted by previous admissions,[38] may be stricken out. So a motion to strike out matter in a reply constituting a departure is proper.[39] of the prayer for relief, since the other party cannot be prejudiced by it,[40] but some decisions sanction the practice.[41]

(vi) Scandalous Matter.[42] Scandalous matter will be stricken out on motion.[43] But matters which are proper to be shown in evidence and must be pleaded in order to be admissible cannot be deemed scandalous.[44] But while matter constituting a defense cannot be stricken out as scandalous, yet facts pleaded as a complete defense, which would be demurrable as constituting only a partial defense or as being merely in mitigation of damages, may, it has been held, be stricken as scandalous;[45] although strictly speaking it is submitted that such matter does not come within the term scandalous.[46]

(vii) Matter Tending to Prejudice, Embarrass, or Delay Trial. By statute or rules of court in England and some parts of Canada, matter may be stricken out of a pleading where it may tend to "prejudice, embarrass, or delay" the fair trial of the action.[47]

(viii) Parts of Demurrer. Parts of a demurrer cannot be stricken out.[48]

c. Necessity That Moving Party Be Prejudiced by Retention of Allegations. In most jurisdictions the codes provide that matter may be stricken out on the motion of a person aggrieved thereby, and hence the mere fact that matter is irrelevant or redundant is not of itself sufficient to authorize the granting of the motion, but in addition it must appear on the face of the pleading that harm or injustice will be done to the moving party if such matter is allowed to remain in the pleading,[49] especially in equity suits where more details are set up than actually

If the matter cannot be made the subject of a material issue, or affect the question of an injunctions or costs, or other relief to be necessary;[50] and that the striking it out will not harm the pleader.[51] Where the right of the moving party to demur to a defense set up is seriously affected by the presence of denials therein, he is so aggrieved that a motion to strike out such denials should be granted.[52] And some cases hold that a party is aggrieved if called upon to answer an irrelevant or redundant statement,[53] or even where merely compelled to read many pages of redundant matter to ascertain whether it is matter which ought to encumber the record.[54]

d. Discretion of Court. The striking out of irrelevant, redundant, or other allegations is generally not an absolute right but rests in the discretion of the court;[55] and as the motion is not favored,[56] especially in an equity cause,[57] the power to strike such matter should be exercised with reluctance and caution.[58] If there is any doubt as to the improper character of the allegations objected to, the motion should be overruled.[59] It is not the province of the court, on the hearing of the motion, to decide whether the evidence would be material or the weight or effect to be given to it upon the trial.[60] But it is no ground for refusing to strike that the pleading will thereby be left so imperfect as to be demurrable,[61] nor that the portions sought to be stricken are made parts of other counts or defenses by reference.[62] But when the striking out of allegations will measurably weaken the force of material facts sought to be stated,[63] or will render what is left unintelligible,[64] the motion will usually be denied.

D. To Make More Definite and Certain [65] — 1. Motion as Proper Remedy. Under the common-law procedure, indefiniteness and uncertainty in a pleading was ground for a special demurrer.[66] But except in a few states where indefiniteness and uncertainty is expressly made a ground of demurrer by statute,[67] the remedy, under the codes and practice acts, when a pleading is indefinite and uncertain, is to move to make it more definite and certain,[68] such motion being

Statutes.— In order that the allegations of a pleading be so indefinite and uncertain as to be subject to motion to make more definite, it is usually provided by statute that the allegation must be so indefinite or uncertain "that the precise meaning or application thereof is not apparent." Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Grannis, 118 N. Y. App. Div. 830, 103 N. Y. Suppl. 835. And see the statutes of the several states. If the court can see with reasonable certainty the meaning of the allegations and the cause of action intended a substitute for a special demurrer at common law;[69] but the motion is not a demurrer and should not be so treated,[70] and cannot be used to test the substantial sufficiency of a pleading,[71] nor can it be used to compel an election between causes of action.[72] The office of the motion is not to cure fatal defects in pleadings but to secure definite statements in pleading which are sufficient in substance but not in form.[73] If an answer is bad in substance, as a negative pregnant, the motion should be for judgment instead of to make it more definite and certain.[74] The motion will lie only when the uncertainty and indefiniteness appears on the face of the pleading,[75] and even then the granting of the motion rests in the discretion of the court.[76]

2. Distinction Between Motion and Demand For Bill of Particulars.[77] The decisions relating to motions to make a pleading definite and certain and motions to direct the service of a bill of particulars are conflicting and confusing, but all distinctions between such motions, it has been held, should not be abandoned;[78] but in some jurisdictions no distinction is drawn between the function of the two motions.[79] In some jurisdictions where the distinction is observed, a bill of particulars and not an order to make more definite and certain is the proper remedy where the moving party does not require the details demanded for the purpose of pleading, but what is really wanted is a mere particular statement of the claim or defense with a view of protection against surprise and limiting the issues at the trial.[80] In at least one jurisdiction it is only where the "precise meaning or application" of an allegation of a pleading is indefinite and uncertain that the therein to be set forth, the motion will be denied. Cook v. Matteson, 11 N. Y. Suppl. 572, 19 N. Y. Civ. Proc. 321. The remedy by motion is to enable a party before pleading to ascertain the charge made against him with sufficient definiteness to enable him to properly plead. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Granniss, supra.

Action for slander.— Where it reasonably appears from allegations contained in two separate causes of action that scandalous words therein counted upon were spoken in the same conversation, defendant is entitled upon motion to have the petition made more definite and certain, so as to show clearly the exact facts relating thereto so that it can be determined whether there is in reality more than one cause of action. Thompson v. Harris, 64 Kan. 124, 67 Pac. 456, 91 Am. St. Rep. 187.

Where the distinction clearly exists, it should be observed even though the result of either application would be the same. Harrington v. Stillman, 120 N. Y. App. Div. 659, 105 N. Y. Suppl. 75.

One reason for observing the distinction is that a motion for a bill of particulars may be opposed with affidavits, whereas a motion to make a pleading definite and certain can be determined on the pleading alone. Another reason is that the insertion in a pleading of unnecessary details violates the rule of brevity, clearness, and conciseness, which is not only commendable but is also commanded. Harrington v. Stillman, 120 N. Y. App. Div. 659, 105 N. Y. Suppl. 75.

79. Conover v. Knight, 84 Wis. 639, 642, 54 N. court can require the pleading to be amended, so that if the meaning and application of the allegation can be seen with reasonable certainty, the order should not be granted; [81] and matters of time, place, and circumstances, unless they constitute material parts of a cause of action or a defense, are strictly within the province of a bill of particulars and must be obtained by that method and not by a motion to make more definite and certain.[82] For instance, items of damage will not be ordered specified on motion to make a complaint more definite and certain, but a bill of particulars should be asked for; [83] and the same is true of items of account and the particulars in regard thereto.[84]

3. When Motion Does Not Lie. A pleading will not be ordered to be made more definite and certain where the requisite information is not within reach of the pleader; [85] nor where the uncertainty is removed by allegations appearing in a subsequent part of the pleading; [86] nor if the pleading is rendered certain by reason of a presumption which the law authorizes respecting it; [87] nor where it appears that the moving party already has sufficient information, [88] or as much information as the pleader; [89] nor where the facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of the moving party; [90] nor where the details desired pertain to the case or defense of the moving party; [91] nor merely in order to allow the moving party to demur to the pleading; [92] nor where it is sought merely to have the party state conclusions of law, [93] or unnecessary facts, [94] or make more definite allegations which are irrelevant and redundant and surplusage,[95] or immaterial;[96] nor where it is already as definite and specific as the laws of pleading require,[97] or the nature of the case allows.[98] Nor will the motion be granted when the result would be to compel the party to plead or disclose his evidence.[99] So the motion will not reach the omission to attach an instrument as an exhibit,[1] nor for indefiniteness in the prayer for relief,[2] nor for indefiniteness in any other respect which does not cause prejudice to the other party.[3] Likewise the motion will not be granted where it is not directed against vague or uncertain allegations of a pleading but seeks merely to require defendants to insert in the answer new and independent allegations prepared and framed by the movant.[4]

4. Denials as Subject to Motion. If a denial is indefinite, a motion lies to make it more definite and certain,[5] as where the answer does not clearly show which allegations are denied and which admitted.[6] For instance a general denial of each and every allegation not admitted or otherwise qualified, may be so uncertain in particular pleadings as to be subject to a motion to make more definite by specifically showing what allegations are admitted and what denied.[7] And a denial of each and every "material" allegation is subject to such a motion in order that it may be shown what allegations the pleader deems material.[8] So also a denial of knowledge or information respecting matters presumptively within the knowledge of the pleader has been held subject to attack by such a motion.[9]

5. Joinder or Commingling of Causes of Action or Defenses — a. In General. Where causes of action which cannot be united are joined in one complaint a motion will not lie to make it more definite and certain,[10] but a demurrer is the proper remedy.[11] If different causes of action or defenses which may be joined in different counts or paragraphs are intermingled in one count or paragraph, a motion will generally lie to make the pleading more definite and certain,[12] by compelling a separate statement of the causes of action or defenses.[13]

b. Motion to Separately State and Number.[14] When a pleading contains more than one cause of action or defense and they are mingled together in one count or paragraph, a motion will lie in most jurisdictions to require them to be separately stated and numbered.[15] But the motion will be denied when only one of the causes of action or defenses is well pleaded,[16] and also generally when it is fairly doubtful whether the pleading sets up a single cause of action or defense or several.[17] A demurrer and not a motion is the proper method of raising the objection that different causes of action are stated against different defendants,[18] or that no cause of action whatever is stated.[19] Irrelevant matter should be stricken out, and not required to be separately stated and numbered.[20] Unless made by seasonable motion, the objection is waived,[21] and inasmuch as the objection is deemed technical, prompt action is required.[22] Whether or not a motion to separately state and number different causes of action should be granted rests within the sound discretion of the court.[23] The pleader may be granted leave to amend so as to eliminate all allegations not relevant to a single cause of action;[24] or the motion may be sustained unless the pleader files a stipulation to the effect that he intends to rely upon but one cause of action, pointing out what it is.[25] Where the question of misjoinder of causes of action is fairly before the court on motion to separately state and number, and the court decides that only one cause of action is stated, such decision does not conclude plaintiff from subsequently raising the question of misjoinder by demurrer.[26] Refusal to obey an order to separately state and number several causes of action will authorize the court to dismiss the action, without prejudice to a future one.[27] An order requiring an amended complaint separately stating and numbering the causes of action set forth in the original complaint is complied with where the amended complaint merely sets up one cause of action.[28]

7. Effect of Refusal to Obey Order. Refusal to comply with an order, properly granted, to make a complaint more definite and certain is a contempt and the action may be dismissed,[46] the whole or the defective portion of any pleading objected to may be stricken out,[47] the court may preclude the party from introducing evidence respecting the insufficient allegations,[48] or the moving party may plead to the remaining portions of the pleading and go to trial thereon.[49] However, substantial compliance with the order is sufficient.[50]

Statutory provisions.— Where plaintiff joins in the same action a cause of action for negligence under the common law and under the statute, he cannot be required, under which cause of action he shall proceed to trial on.[57] And where the fact of misjoinder does not affirmatively appear on the face of the pleading, but such fact is for the first time disclosed by plaintiff's evidence, plaintiff may be required to elect at the conclusion of the testimony against which of several defendants he will proceed.[58] If evidence has been introduced under one count only, there is no occasion for requiring an election.[59]

b. Where Commingled in One Count. Where two or more causes of action are set forth in a complaint but not separately stated and numbered, the proper procedure in most jurisdictions is a motion to require them to be separately stated and numbered,[60] and a motion to compel an election does not lie.[61] In some jurisdictions, however, if two causes of action are improperly mingled in the same count, plaintiff may be compelled to elect upon which he will proceed,[62] while in other states the only remedy is by demurrer.[63]

2. Between Different Counts or Paragraphs Stating Same Cause of Action. While at common law a single cause of action could be set forth in two or more different forms or counts,[64] the code practice does not generally authorize such a form of pleading.[65] And where one cause of action is set forth in different counts, a motion to compel an election between the counts is proper and will generally be granted.[66] However, this rule is subject to an important exception in that it is generally held that an election will not be compelled when a plaintiff has two or more counts upon which he has a single cause of action and there is some

Motion to strike.— In some states it is held that a motion to strike, not to elect, is the uncertainty as to which he will be able to establish at the trial.[67] And according to some cases the rule would seem to be that plaintiff may in all cases plead his cause of action in different forms to meet the exigencies of proof and no election can be compelled.[68] For instance, a motion to compel an election between counts based on an express contract and a quantum meruit will not be granted.[69] So where one cause of action is against defendant as common carrier and another as warehouseman, claiming to recover only the amount of one of the causes of action, plaintiff cannot be compelled to elect.[70]

3. Between Defenses. It has been held that where defendant files several pleas in defense substantially the same,[71] or a general denial and specific denials of the same facts,[72] he may be required to elect. So where inconsistent defenses are improperly pleaded, an election between them may be compelled.[73] Ordinarily a defendant will not be compelled to elect between a defense and a counter-claim,[74] even where based on the same facts,[75] unless they are mutually inconsistent.[76] An election will not be required when one of the defenses is obviously insufficient.[77] An election between inconsistent defenses requires an election between the defenses as a whole and not merely between their inconsistent portions.[78]

4. Between Replications. Under the common-law practice, when plaintiff improperly files several replications, defendant may either demur generally, or may call on plaintiff to elect which one he will retain, and move the court to strike out the others.[79]

5. Ambiguous Counts. If the allegations of a pleading are equally appropriate to two different causes of action, plaintiff may be required to elect upon which he will go to trial.[80] This is especially true when the two causes are to be tried in different ways, one by the court and the other by a jury.[81]

6. Pleading and Demurring to Same Matter. If a defendant at the same time pleads and demurs to the same count, in those jurisdictions where such procedure is not permissible, he may be compelled to elect on which he will rely, as the two cannot stand together;[82] but if the demurrer and answer are directed to different portions of the same cause of action, the proper remedy is a motion to strike out the demurrer.[83]

7. Discretion of Court. The question of the granting or refusing a motion to require an election is largely within the discretion of the trial judge, and his ruling will not be disturbed except where abuse is shown.[84] As affecting the exercise of the discretion, one consideration is whether or not prosecution of both causes of action at one time and in one proceeding will embarrass defendant in his defense, when no such consequence would follow and no embarrassment to plaintiff's legal remedy would happen if he were obliged to bring two actions.[85] The court may properly deny a motion to compel an election if made before the case has developed to such a point that the matter can be intelligently passed upon.[86] It is prejudicial error to compel a defendant to elect between two defenses on the ground that they are inconsistent when in fact they are not so.[87]

8. What Constitutes Election. Trying a case in accordance with only one of the causes of action alleged amounts to an election,[88] or an election may be made by stipulation.[89] The fact that plaintiff making an election between different counts claimed a reservation that he might by subsequent pleadings recover under the count he elects to dispense with does not render his election any the less a final one,[90] and hence the court may permit him to withdraw such latter count after verdict.[91]

9. Effect of Election. An election which excludes one count does not waive the right to introduce in evidence any facts in the rejected count which are admissible under the allegations of the count retained.[92] After an election is made, an excluded count may nevertheless, in the discretion of the court, be allowed to remain as an amendment of the count retained so far as it would properly operate

In other cases, the presiding judge may see that such a mode of trial would be likely to lead to confusion, and to prevent the jury from reaching a correct result. as such.[93] An election once made may be changed when it results in no prejudice to the opposite party,[94] but not otherwise.[95] Where a party has been compelled to elect between certain counts in his complaint, such election does not preclude his proceeding on other counts on a new trial after a reversal.[96]

10. Refusal to Obey Order of Court. If a party refuses to obey an order requiring an election, the court may strike out all but one cause of action or defense[97] or may refuse to try the cause or order a nonsuit.[98]

F. Motions Relating to Parties. While objections relating to parties are not generally raised by motion, yet under some statutes a misjoinder of parties, either plaintiffs[99] or defendants,[1] is to be taken advantage of by a motion to strike out the name of the party improperly joined. For instance, it has been held that where there is an improper joinder of parties defendant, the remedy, if any, of one who is a proper party defendant is by motion;[2] and that a motion to strike out a co-defendant improperly joined as a party is the proper remedy where the misjoinder is not apparent upon the face of the complaint so as to warrant a demurrer.[3] But a co-defendant cannot ask that his name be stricken as that of an unnecessary party.[4] In some jurisdictions the lack of legal capacity to sue, in one of several plaintiffs, may be presented by a motion to strike out such plaintiff.[5] Inasmuch as the codes usually make no provision for a plea in abatement, an objection to a mistake in the name of plaintiff or defendant may be taken advantage of by motion.[6] Where an action is brought by parties by the initials of their christian name, the remedy of the adverse party is by motion to require the full christian names to be set out in the pleading.[7]

G. Application For Relief and Proceedings Thereon — 1. In General.[8] Motions relating to pleadings, except where it is otherwise provided by statute or rule of court, are ordinarily governed by the rules relating to motions in civil actions in general.[9] Ordinarily a motion is necessary. Where an adversary's pleading is clearly insufficient, the opposing party cannot disregard it and enter up judgment as if such pleading had not been filed but must proceed by a motion seeking the necessary relief.[10] But improper matter, if not stricken out, may nevertheless be disregarded, but by moving to strike it the party avoids the risk of disregarding matter which the court may consider material.[11] The burden is not on one party to move to have the pleading of his adversary corrected, but if it is so defective in form that it is legally insufficient, it may be attacked in any suitable manner as substantially defective.[12] The court may, on its own motion, order a pleading made more definite and certain,[13] or may strike out any improper pleading,[14] or scandalous matter.[15] But it has been held that the court cannot of its own motion strike out of any pleading redundant or irrelevant matter.[16]

2. Who May Make Application.[17] Only a party who is aggrieved may make a motion in regard to the pleading,[18] except that where the statute authorizes a motion by "any person aggrieved" the motion may be made by an attorney for a party where the attorney is the person injured.[19]

3. Time For Application — a. In General.[20] Statutes or rules of court frequently fix the time within which application must be made,[21] and a motion filed after the expiration of such period comes too late.[22] Where the time to move is not fixed by statute or rule of court the motion must generally be made promptly,[23] but there is no fixed and definite rule determining when the motion is seasonable. Generally speaking the application will not be refused when the delay is not unreasonable and does not appear to have been so great as to prejudice the other party.[24] Whenever a party is apparently guilty of laches in filing his motion the delay should be explained.[25] A motion with reference to the pleadings which is made as soon as the occasion for it is discovered,[26] or at the earliest practi-

If he does not move to strike out, and goes to trial without evidence to disprove the averment he does so at his peril. He may think that the averment is irrelevant, and therefore that no evidence will be admitted in support of it, but the court may think the averment relevant. He has a right therefore, to have the view of the court in advance, that he may know what, upon a trial in that court, he must be prepared to meet."

cable opportunity,[27] is ordinarily regarded as having been interposed in time.

b. Motion For Judgment on the Pleadings. Application may be made at any time before or after verdict,[28] and statutory provisions authorizing a motion after verdict do not preclude a motion before verdict.[29] However, no judgment on the pleadings can be rendered pending an objection to the jurisdiction of the court.[30] If a verdict has been rendered and not set aside, the ordinary remedy would be a motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, which must be made before judgment.[31] It may be made before the time allowed for amendment has expired.[32]

c. Motion to Strike Pleading or Defense. After the pleadings are at issue a motion to strike will usually be overruled.[33] But the question depends somewhat upon the character of the motion. If the motion to strike is based upon a purely formal defect, the court will insist with greater stringency upon promptness than when founded upon a substantial infirmity.[34] A motion to strike based on formal defects must, in some jurisdictions, be made before the trial term,[35] and in others all motions to strike out pleadings must be made within the time allowed for filing pleas in abatement.[36] On the other hand, it has been held that a motion to strike

But it would be difficult to give any reason for sending a cause to the jury, when there is nothing for them to pass upon. When the objections to the answer are merely formal, or when something is left besides the part included in the motion, or when error is of such a nature that it does not necessarily vitiate the pleadings, and may be waived, the rule [that the motion is too late after notice of trial] is a very proper one, but if the answer is good for nothing, if there is nothing in it upon which the defendant can rely, it is as if there was no answer, and there can be no reason given why the plaintiff should not have judgment. Delay can never make a radically defective answer good"). See also Sawyer v. Schoonmaker, 8 How. Pr. (N. Y.) 198.

a sham plea or answer may be made at any time before trial;[37] but it should be made before other inconsistent steps are taken, such as a motion to make more definite and certain;[38] and the motion has been denied before trial because of laches.[39] A false or frivolous plea or demurrer may be stricken after the filing of a demurrer or replication,[40] or joinder in demurrer,[41] or after the case has been noticed for trial, provided the time allowed for the motion has not expired.[42] So if the court wholly exceeds its power and authority in allowing a pleading to be filed,[43] or if it is filed without any authority when such authority is necessary,[44] it may be stricken at any time. After the trial has begun, however, a pleading will seldom be stricken out on any ground,[45] unless it is so defective that it presents no issue to be tried.[46] But a party who has sought by his manipulation of the pleadings to entrap his adversary cannot complain of delay even though the motion to strike is not made until after a writ of error is brought.[47] A party need not wait until after the time for amending a pleading as of course has expired before moving to strike it out.[48]

d. Motion to Strike Matter From Pleading. A motion to strike out parts of a pleading is generally held to be too late after the movant has pleaded or demurred to it,[49] or at the trial,[50] or after the trial.[51] So the general rule is that noticing a cause for trial is a waiver of the right to move to strike out redundant matter.[52]

But a motion to strike out allegations in a pleading is not waived by filing an answer after the motion has been noticed for hearing.[53]

e. Motion to Make More Definite and Certain. A motion to make a pleading more definite and certain must be made before trial,[54] and generally before issue joined on the pleading to which the motion relates.[55] So it is too late to move after having twice gone to trial upon the pleadings.[56] In some states, the motion, by statute or rule of court, must be made before demurring or answering and within twenty days from the service of the pleading.[57] An extension of time to answer, without reservation of any right to make a motion in respect to the complaint, does not extend the time to move to make the complaint more definite and certain,[58] but is a waiver of the right to move,[59] although of course, if the extension of time to answer includes the privilege to defendants to make any motion which they may be advised, a motion to make the complaint more definite and certain is thereafter proper.[60]

f. Motion to Compel Election. A motion to compel an election must generally be made before issue is joined on the merits,[61] or at least before trial,[62] although in some jurisdictions it may be granted at the trial, in a proper case, in the discretion of the court.[63]

statement and numbering of causes of action or defenses, being based on a technical objection, must be made promptly and at the first opportunity,[64] and cannot be made at or after the trial.[65]

4. Place For Motion. It must be made in the same county in which the venue of the action is laid, unless by consent of parties.[66]

5. Order of Proceedings.[67] Until one motion is disposed of another cannot be made covering the same ground.[68] As to whether a demurrer and motion to strike may be filed together against the same pleading, the better rule seems to be that the demurrer waives the motion,[69] but there is some authority to the contrary.[70] Under some decisions a party must first have a defective pleading stricken from the files before moving for judgment on the pleadings,[71] while in other jurisdictions the party may move to strike out the pleading and at the same time move for judgment on the pleadings;[72] or he may move for judgment on the pleadings, or move to strike out the answer and for judgment for want of an answer.[73] If no reply is filed, it is necessary, under some decisions, for defendant to obtain a rule to reply before he can take judgment on the pleadings.[74]

6. Notice of Motion.[75] Notice of the motion must ordinarily be given to the party or his attorney.[76] If the statute or court rule prescribes the length

In New York, where a complaint sets forth two inconsistent causes of action, and defendant waits until the trial and then moves that plaintiff be compelled to elect between them, the court may decline to decide the motion until part or all of the evidence is taken, and a denial of the motion is so far discretionary that it will not be reviewed when it appears that defendant was not harmed. 7. Motion Papers — a. In General. A motion relating to the pleadings must generally be in writing.[81] The motion papers must specify the grounds upon which it rests and the defects complained of,[82] and only the grounds mentioned can be considered by the court.[83] So relief other than that specifically prayed for cannot be granted,[84] except where there is a prayer for general relief.[85] And a motion is properly denied where it is too broad in its scope and cannot be sustained as an entirety.[86] A motion to strike out a part of a pleading should designate with particularity the precise portions of the pleading which it is sought to have stricken,[87] and no other matter aside from that designated can be stricken out.[88] A motion to make more definite and certain should point out the specific defects of which complaint is made.[89] A motion to separately state and number causes of action or defenses should assign the reason for the separation,[90] and should point out wherein more than one cause of action or defense is stated.[91] On a motion to strike out portions of a pleading, it is not necessary for the moving papers to show that the motion was made in time, but the adverse party must show the negative if he relies thereon.[92] It is no objection to a motion that it attacks a pleading as both false and frivolous without pointing out which defense is false and which defense is frivolous.[93] A motion to strike out a paragraph on the ground that it is "incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and no defense" is sufficiently specific.[94] A motion to strike an answer as sham should not demand judgment, but if the motion is granted and nothing remains presenting an issue for trial and leave to amend is not given, judgment may be rendered at once.[95] A motion may contain a demand for different kinds of relief, as, for instance, that one defense be stricken as sham and for judgment on another as frivolous,[96] or that one defense be stricken out and another be made definite and certain.[97] But a motion to make a complaint more definite and certain or in the alternative for a bill of particulars is an improper joinder because one can only be made before and the other ordinarily only after pleading.[98] There is ordinarily no occasion for a motion to be verified.[99]

In New Hampshire, where a plea appears sufficient on its face, so that a demurrer

but not otherwise.[2] Most of the motions relating to pleadings, including a motion for judgment on the pleadings,[3] a motion to strike out particular allegations in a pleading,[4] and a motion to make allegations more definite and certain,[5] are to be determined solely from an examination of the pleadings, and therefore affidavits are ordinarily improper,[6] except where the objection is that the plea is sham.[7] But where a pleading is attacked as evasive, the moving party may produce proof outside of the pleading to satisfy the court that the allegations are intended to evade a direct averment.[8] The fact that the moving papers on a motion to make more definite and certain contain an affidavit of merits does not require a denial of the motion on the ground that the detailed information is obviously unnecessary.[9]

Verified pleading.— The court will not determine on affidavits whether a pleading is sham where it is verified by affidavit. Pacific Mill Co. v. Inman, (Oreg. 1907) 90 Pac. 1099.

In Indiana the code of 1881 authorizes the striking of an answer or other pleading as sham either when it plainly appears on its face to be false in fact and intended merely for delay, or when shown to be so by the answers of the party to special written interrogatories propounded to him to ascertain whether the pleading is false. Tilden v. Louisville, etc., Ferry Co., 157 Ind. 532, 62 N. E. 31; Lowe v. Thompson, 86 Ind. 503. Prior to the enactment of this statute, the cases established a different rule. St. (1901) § 385, providing that a pleading shall be rejected as sham when shown to be so by answers of the party to special written interrogatories propounded to him to ascertain whether the pleading is false, does not authorize the court to strike out a pleading as sham upon answers of the party to interrogatories propounded to him upon his examination before trial, under Burns Rev. St. (1901) § 517, providing for examination of an adverse party as a witness before trial. Stars v. Hammersmith, 31 Ind. App. 610, 67 N. E. 554. Such statute does not authorize the court to reject a pleading upon answers to interrogatories tending to show that the facts averred in the pleading were false, where the court could only reach the conclusion that the allegations were false by weighing and balancing the probabilities arising from certain inferences to be drawn from physical facts stated in such answer. Pittsburgh, etc., R. Co. v. Fraze, 150 Ind. 576, 50 N. E. 576, 65 Am. St. Rep. 377.

and that it cannot be established merely by affidavits.[11] Inasmuch, however, as a sham defense is sufficient in form, it is usually good upon its face, and, as some courts have pointed out, it is difficult to see how its sham character can be shown except from something outside of itself.[12] The general rule seems to be that affidavits may be employed in support of the motion, when it rests upon facts dehors the record,[13] but that affidavits are not necessary when the record fully discloses the grounds and occasion for the motion.[14]

8. Scope of Inquiry. On a motion for judgment on the pleadings, the only facts to be considered are those appearing in the pleadings themselves.[15] On a motion to set aside the complaint for failure to state a cause of action made at the opening of the trial all the pleadings may be looked into and examined for the purpose of seeing whether a cause of action has been set forth.[16] The same questions are presented to the court on motion to strike a pleading as on a motion for leave to file it.[17] Upon a motion to strike a plea the court will not inquire into the sufficiency of the replication,[18] and all or part of a pleading may be stricken irrespective of defects in a prior pleading, since a motion to strike does not raise the question of the sufficiency of former pleadings, that is, it does not search the record like a demurrer.[19] Similarly a motion to make more definite and certain does not search the record.[20] However, if the fault in the pleading sought to be stricken is due to the prior fault of the moving party, this may justify the court in overruling the motion.[21] Upon a motion to strike out a portion of a pleading,[22] or to make it more definite and certain,[23] the question of the legal sufficiency of the pleading cannot be raised. If a motion to strike out portions of a pleading applies to all but an insignificant portion thereof it will be considered as aimed at the pleading as a whole.[24] If a pleading is amended after a motion to strike has been filed, the motion must be renewed if the pleading is still deemed objectionable, since the original motion no longer applies.[25] If a ruling is correct when made, it cannot be made erroneous by a subsequent alteration of the pleading which has been attacked.[26]

9. Order. An order to strike out portions of a pleading should specify particularly the matter to be stricken,[27] while an order to make a pleading more definite and certain should state in what particulars the pleading is to be amended.[28] An order which effects a radical reformation of a pleading by striking out certain parts thereof should provide for the service of the reformed pleading.[29] An order is equally erroneous whether it strikes out too much or too little.[30] Where a motion to make more definite and certain is sustained and an amendment is ordered, together with the payment of costs by the party whose pleading is held defective, the payment of costs is not a condition precedent to the right to file the amended pleading, unless expressly so stated.[31] An order requiring a complaint to be made more definite and certain, where the pleading contains allegations other than the indefinite ones, constituting a good cause of action, should not provide that on the failure of plaintiff to remedy the defect the entire complaint is to be stricken out, but should order that upon failure to comply such indefinite allegations should be stricken out.[32] The striking out of a separate count in a complaint does not include a claim for damages at the conclusion of the entire complaint and following the count stricken out, where such demand is applicable to the entire complaint.[33] If an amended pleading is improperly filed without leave, and a motion to strike it is overruled, this is equivalent to granting leave to file it.[34] A court cannot be permitted to change its ruling after years have intervened, to the prejudice of parties who have relied on the first ruling.[35]

10. Effect of Sustaining or Overruling Motion. The granting of leave to strike out a pleading constitutes a striking out;[36] and it is not necessary that allegations which have been ordered stricken should be literally taken out of the pleading, but they may be treated as though they did not appear there.[37] After a pleading has been stricken from the files it ceases to be a part of the record and is to be considered as though it had never been filed;[38] in which respect it differs from a pleading which has been held bad on demurrer,[39] or on motion for judgment on the pleadings.[40] It can be made a part of the record only by a bill of exceptions.[41] If only a portion is stricken the party may go to trial on what is left.[42] Where an amended pleading is stricken from the files the original pleading is restored,[43] and where a plea puis darrein continuance is stricken, the former pleas are restored.[44] Where a petition has been stricken for want of verification, the suit is dismissed and on verifying the petition a new summons issues together with a new service thereof.[45] Where a claim of set-off is pleaded to a count of a declaration, and such count is dismissed, the dismissal carries with it the claim for set-off, as each count and the defense thereto constitutes a separate and distinct cause of action.[46] But if one plea of the general issue is stricken, a notice of new matter thereunder may be considered a notice under another plea which remains.[47] After a plea has been stricken out as false, another plea setting up the same defense in different form cannot be received.[48] A party at whose instance a pleading is stricken from the files is estopped to assert that the motion was not well taken.[49] The rendering of judgment on the pleadings is in effect a denial of permission to intervene when a petition of intervention is on file without leave of court.[50] A motion once overruled is not subject to be called up again and reheard until the order overruling it has been set aside on motion.[51]

11. Amending and Pleading Over. The court may, in its discretion, allow a party to plead anew or plead over after a pleading or demurrer has been stricken from the files,[52] or after a motion for judgment on the pleadings,[53] if a meritorious cause of action or defense is shown.[54] But statutes authorizing pleading over after demurrer sustained have been held not applicable where the pleading is stricken out on motion.[55] Failure to apply for leave to amend will be deemed a waiver of the privilege and judgment will be entered.[56]

12. Judgment on Pleadings. Inasmuch as this species of judgment, like a judgment on demurrer, rests upon the pleadings, there can be no finding of facts where such a judgment is rendered.[57] The judgment is a judgment on the merits.[58] At common law such a judgment is called nil dicit,[59] and when plaintiff fails to file any pleading which he is required to file, judgment of non prosequitur, or "non pros" may be rendered against him.[60] If the damages sought are liquidated, a judgment on the pleadings will be for such sum, but when unliquidated, the judgment can be for only nominal damages,[61] unless proceedings to determine the damages are had,[62] or the judgment may be in the form proper where nothing is left to be ascertained but the amount of damages.[63]

erroneously striking a replication where the declaration fails to state a cause of action,[67] or erroneously striking material allegations where the evidence to support them was in fact admitted;[68] but it is ordinarily reversible error to strike out a material allegation which is properly pleaded.[69] Erroneously refusing to grant a motion to strike out portions of a pleading,[70] or to make it more definite and certain,[71] is not reversible error, where the party suffers no prejudice thereby. For instance there is no prejudicial error in striking out allegations of facts which are admissible in evidence under other portions of the pleading,[72] or in refusing to strike out such allegations.[73] But if the error is manifest,[74] and prejudice results, refusal to sustain such a motion in a proper case is reversible error.[75] It is not reversible error to strike out a demurrer unless the pleading demurred to was in fact demurrable.[76] Error in refusing judgment on the pleadings is immaterial if the party applying for it subsequently obtains a judgment on the evidence.[77]

of fact.[80] An issue of law ordinarily arises upon a demurrer.[81] An issue of fact arises upon a denial of an allegation made by the opposite party.[82] As a general rule issues arise upon the pleadings in a cause.[83] But it is not necessary in order to present a good issue that the pleadings shall be in every respect regular.[84] When an issue is once reached the cause is deemed at issue notwithstanding the right to amend still exists.[85]

2. NECESSITY FOR ISSUE. It is necessary that the parties, in the course of their pleadings, should finally come to issue on some single, certain, and material point in order that they may come to trial prepared with their evidence, and not be taken by surprise, and that the time of the court may not be consumed and the jury misled by the introduction of various irrelevant matters.[86]

Questions of law may of course be raised without a formal joining of issue, as by motion for nonsuit, or by motion for a directed verdict or a motion for judgment in the pleadings, etc. The question of the constitutionality of a statute may be raised without joining issue on it. Schenck v. Union Pac. R. Co., 5 Wyo. 430, 40 Pac. 840.

3. Tender and Joinder of Issue.[87] When a pleading concludes to the country, it is customary, under the common-law system of pleading, for the other party to file a similiter,[88] whose office is to join in the issue tendered by the opposite party.[89] This may be either a common similiter, directed to the entire pleading, or a special similiter directed to certain portions of it.[90] The similiter is deemed a merely formal step in accepting issue, and its omission is not cause for reversal,[91] nor judgment by nil dicit.[92] But it is a form which should be observed, and it has been held that an issue is not joined until the similiter is added.[93] A more liberal rule holds that where material averments are directly controverted, no other formal joining of issue can be legally required,[94] and the similiter may be put in after proceeding to trial,[95] or may be dispensed with.[96] And very informal similiters have been held sufficient.[97] If the replication conclude to the country, plaintiff may add the similiter for defendant.[98] But a similiter added without a party's consent may be stricken out.[99] An issue well tendered by the traverse of a material allegation must be accepted;[1] and this is equally true of a special traverse.[2] Joining issue upon the allegations of a pleading makes them material even if not inherently so.[3] Unless the formal issues are waived,[4] no trial can be had until issue formed.[5]

4. Materiality of Issue. It is not only necessary that issues should be presented by the pleadings but such issues must be material.[6] But a trial is not rendered erroneous by the fact that immaterial issues were presented along with

Waiver.— Where a party is forced to trial without issues joined, he waives none of his rights (French v. Scobey, 108 Ill. material issues,[7] if the trial of the latter were not injuriously affected by the trial of the former.[8] An immaterial issue should be eliminated from the pleadings;[9] but it is not the duty of the court on its own motion to perform this task,[10] although the court should exclude evidence offered in support of issues which are wholly foreign to the merits of the controversy.[11]

5. Scope of Issue — a. In General. As a general rule issues should be confined to such matters as are affirmatively alleged on the one side and sufficiently denied on the other.[12] But this rule will not be applied with undue strictness, and any controverted matter substantially within the pleadings may raise an issue.[13] However the court will not go entirely outside the pleadings in order to consider matters that cannot fairly be said to be within the issues,[14] and a wholly different issue from the one indicated by the pleadings should not be submitted to the jury.[15] It is not proper for the court to direct any matter of fact to be put in issue which is not written within the pleadings.[16] A denial of any matter by one party will not create an issue unless the same matter has been alleged by the other party.[17] Denials of conclusions of law from the pleaded facts raise no issues of fact.[18] When a replication ignores certain facts contained in a plea taking issue only on certain other facts therein, and defendant files a general rejoinder to the replication, the facts so ignored cease to be issues of the case.[19] Where defendant pleads as a defense the making of a written contract between himself and

Thus an issue may be immaterial because it does not go to the whole cause of action (Shields v. Henderson, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 239); or because formed on an irrelevant fact or a legal conclusion (Shur v. Statler, 2 Ohio Dec. (Reprint) 70, 1 West. L. Month. 317); or on matter of inducement (Garland v. Davis, 4 How. (U. S.) 131, 11 L. ed. 907).

Formal defects.—Immateriality in the issue relates to matter of substance and does not result from a mere defect in form or manner of statement. Effect of taking issue upon immaterial questions.— The fact that a defendant takes issue, in his answer, upon an immaterial question of fact does not prevent him from insisting at the trial that the allegation thus denied is immaterial. plaintiff, but specifies no consideration, the law imports one, and, if the defense is only controverted in the reply by a general denial, the issue of consideration is not raised.[20] Evidence received without objection does not have the effect of enlarging the pleadings where admissible thereunder.[21] Special damages may, however, be recovered, when not declared on in the complaint, if the evidence in regard to such special damages is given to the jury without objection.[22]

b. Plea or Answer. An answer containing a general denial of all the allegations of the complaint or petition places in issue all the allegations contained therein.[23] But in jurisdictions where code pleading prevails, other issues can be raised only by defenses affirmatively pleaded.[24] And defenses not embraced within the general issue at common law must also be affirmatively pleaded to raise issues.[25] And where a special affirmative defense is pleaded, only the substantial issue raised thereby will be considered.[26] A general rejoinder to a replication only puts in issue the facts stated in the replication.[27] The only proper issue upon a traverse is whether the inquisition is true or not.[28] If, where there is no declaration, defendant voluntarily pleads in writing he will be confined to the issue on his plea.[29] The same facts alleged in an answer may constitute both a defense and a counter-claim, and if put in issue for one purpose they are in issue as well for both.[30] An answer does not put in issue new matter set up in an answer of a co-defendant subsequently filed, especially where such co-defendant was not mentioned in the former answer.[31] Where special pleas set up new matter in defense and there is a joinder of issue thereon, such joinder creates an issue as to the truth of the new matter, but does not furnish the basis for avoiding the effect of the new matter by other new matter.[32]

B. Proof — 1. What Must Be Proved — a. In General. Although a party is not bound to prove all the allegations in his pleadings,[33] he must prove every material allegation necessary to establish his cause of action or defense.[34] But substantial proof of such material allegations is, however, all that is necessary.[35]

b. Separate Counts and Defenses. Separate counts are considered as statements of distinct causes of action, and a plaintiff is entitled to recover, if he proves any one count, although he may fail to establish the others.[36] The same rule obtains respecting several pleas, and the establishment of the truth of one good plea in bar entitles defendant to judgment, although he fail on all the rest.[37]

An admission of a fact on record amounts merely to a waiver of requiring proof of that fact; but if the other party seeks to have any inference drawn by the jury from the fact so admitted, he must prove it like any other fact. Edmunds v. Groves, 5 Dowl. P. C. 175, 6 L. J. Exch. 203, M. & H. 211, 2 M. & W. 642.

Agreement after demurrer overruled.— Where, after the entry of an order overruling a demurrer to a pleading, the parties agree that the allegations of the pleading shall be taken as true, the introduction of evidence to support the pleading is unnecessary. Com. v. Hillis, 96 S. W. 873, 29 Ky. L. Rep. 1063.

Amendment.— An admission in defendant's answer that the allegations in a certain paragraph of plaintiff's petition are true does not apply to an amendment to such paragraph containing additional allegations which is offered after the answer has been filed, nor does a failure of defendant to reply to the amendment relieve plaintiff of the necessity of supporting the allegations at the trial. Watson v. Barnes, 125 Ga. 733, 54 S. E. 723.

General issue.— In an action on the case, the plea of the general issue admits ownership and operation as alleged in the declaration where the case is tried on the theory of ownership and operation by defendant. Chicago Union Tract. Co. v. Lundahl, 117 to such admission should be disregarded.[46] The rule holds true, even though the pleading which contains the admission is not sworn to.[47] A party taking advantage of an admission must accept it in its entirety.[48] If defendant makes a general denial, plaintiff, according to some decisions, cannot take advantage of an admission contained in a special plea filed at the same time;[49] but other decisions hold that such an admission is available to plaintiff.[50] An admission by a party that he executed the instrument sued on renders any other proof than the production of the instrument by the other side unnecessary.[51] But such an admission cannot be held to cover more than by its plain terms it expressly purports to cover.[52] An amended pleading supersedes the original, and admissions made in the original pleading cannot thereafter properly be introduced in evidence against the party who made them.[53]

(II) Admissions by Failure to Deny. Both at common law and under code procedure material allegations in the pleadings of the opposite party, which are properly pleaded and not denied, are deemed admitted and therefore need not be proved.[54]

2. Burden of Proof. The party who has the affirmative of an issue has the burden of proof.[55] Thus, if an answer contains both a denial of the allegations contained in the complaint and affirmative matters of defense as well, the burden rests upon plaintiff as to the allegations put in issue by the denial, but it is upon defendant so far as the new matter of the answer is concerned.[56] Under a plea of

In Nebraska under the rule of practice which governs in actions at law in a federal court in that state, a general denial in an answer is treated as qualified by admissions made in other defenses; and where, in an action on school-district bonds, the answer contains a general denial, but also an admission of the execution and genuineness of the bonds, and pleads their invalidity, the admission governs, and plaintiff is not required to prove their execution and genuineness. non est factum, the burden is on defendant to prove that an alteration was made in a note subsequent to its execution and delivery,[57] or that a bond was delivered in escrow, on a condition not performed.[58] The rule applies to matter in avoidance set up in the answer, where the burden is always upon defendant.[59] Likewise the burden of proving a set-off or counter-claim is on defendant.[60]

3. EFFECT OF DENIAL. The plea of the general issue or a general denial makes it necessary for plaintiff to prove every material allegation of his cause of action.[61] But the general denial may be qualified in such terms as to render unnecessary a full and complete proof of all the material allegations of plaintiff's cause of action.[62] A general denial does not put in issue all the allegations of the petition, where it is not necessary to establish all such allegations in order to justify a recov-

Illustration.— In a suit to enjoin the obstruction of a street, a general denial of allegations that the land was dedicated to a public use at a certain time, and that pursuant to the dedication it was opened as a street and used by the public, was sufficient to put the truth of the allegations in issue. Mobile v. Fowler, 147 Ala. 403, 41 So. 468.

Corporate existence.— A general denial does not put in issue the corporate existence of plaintiff. Wiles v. Philippi Church, 63 Ind. 206.

Representative capacity.— In Louisiana, where a party claims in a representative capacity conferred by contract, the general issue puts him to a proof of such capacity; but if created by law, a special plea is necessary. Suydam v. Kinney, 7 La. Ann. 621; McDonald v. Millaudon, 5 La. 403. In Iowa under the statute (Code, §§ 3627, 3628) providing that a plaintiff suing in any way implying representative or other than individual capacity need not state the facts constituting such capacity, but may aver the same generally, and that, if the allegation is controverted, it shall not be sufficient to do so in terms contradictory of the allegation, but the facts relied on shall be specifically stated, where the allegation of citizenship of plaintiff in a denial as to a statement of consent for the sale of liquor is not controverted except by a denial, no issue is raised thereon, and no proof thereof required. Dye v. Augur, (Iowa 1907) 110 N. W. 323.

ery.[63] A denial of particular facts alleged by the other party requires proof of such facts only.[64] Thus non est factum merely puts the execution of the instrument in issue; plaintiff need not go further and prove other allegations in his declaration.[65] New matter pleaded in the answer and denied must be established by proof, if its truth is not apparent on the face of the pleadings,[66] and defendant must establish any item of his counter-claim which plaintiff denies.[67]

4. Conformity of Pleadings and Proof[68] — a. In General. It is a well-settled principle that no proof can be offered of matters not put in issue by the pleadings,[69] and that on the other hand evidence which tends to prove or disprove an

Where plaintiff's own witness proves his disqualification to sue, although the evidence may not be pertinent to the issue, the court is bound to notice it. Susan v. Wells, 3 Brev. (S. C.) 11.

In Maryland where in a suit brought under the rule day acts, defendant appears and complies with the provisions necessary to avoid a judgment by default, the case then proceeds as an ordinary action ex contractu, and neither the affidavit nor the cause of action filed controls the nature and character of the proof plaintiff may offer. Proof where non-joinder of parties pleaded. — Where in a suit by the manager and part-owner of a mine to recover for ore alleged to have been sold to defendant, the answer set up the non-joinder of parties plaintiff, and alleged who the true owners of the ore were, it was held that defendant was entitled at the trial to show who such owners were. Goodspeed v. Wasatch Silver Lead Works, 2 Utah 263. On an answer setting up the non-joinder of other persons as co-defendants, articles of copartnership are admissible to prove a partnership between defendants and the persons omitted. Kayser v.

also tends to prove matters not alleged.[71] If admissible under any issue the evidence must be received, although it is inadmissible under other issues.[72] Evidence which is admissible under the pleadings of one party should not be excluded merely because it is the opposite party who offers it.[73] Failure to object to the introduction of evidence unauthorized by the pleadings is a waiver of the objection.[74]

b. Statutory Provisions. Where, owing to statutory provisions as to the right or duty to file pleadings,[75] it is impossible or unnecessary for a party to file a reply, rejoinder or other pleading setting up new facts upon which he relies, evidence of such facts may be introduced without being pleaded.[76]

c. Sufficiency of Allegations to Admit Proof. Where a cause of action or defense can be reasonably inferred from the averments of the pleading evidence will not be excluded at the trial,[77] because of an imperfect statement of such cause of defense;[78] but where averments are so uncertain that the elements of a cause of action or defense cannot be inferred, evidence may be excluded at the trial.[79] As a general rule where the evidence offered tends to prove any fact substantially embraced within the allegations, whether expressly or by clear inference, it should be admitted.[80] And evidence which tends to throw light upon the acts, facts, or situation alleged, is properly admissible.[81] On the other hand, where the evi-

appropriate to only one count or defense cannot be introduced in support of an issue based entirely on another.[86] It is error to allow the introduction of evidence appropriate only to a count that is fatally defective,[87] or one that has been quashed.[88] And evidence is not admissible in support of a count or portion of a pleading abandoned or stricken out.[89]

e. Probative Facts. Only ultimate, not probative, facts, should be alleged; hence if the proof of an ultimate fact requires the prior proof of one or more probative facts, evidence thereof cannot be excluded on the ground that such facts are not alleged.[90] Any evidentiary fact which bears directly upon the issues raised by the pleadings is admissible without being pleaded;[91] and if a party states only matters of evidence in his pleadings and not the ultimate fact on which he relies, the court will not allow proof of the fact relied on, unless it follows as a necessary legal consequence from the evidentiary facts stated.[92]

f. Matters Arising After Commencement of Action. Evidence cannot be given of matters arising after the commencement of the action, unless a foundation has been laid by the proper pleadings;[93] but if the proper foundation has been laid in the pleadings, a deed executed after the commencement of the suit may be introduced without further pleading to show the nature of the agreement existing between the parties.[94]

g. Immaterial Allegations. No evidence should be admitted in support of immaterial allegations,[95] but a party who has himself tendered an immaterial issue cannot object to the admission of evidence in respect thereto.[96]

h. Written Instruments. The law does not require parties to allege that their evidence is in writing and so written evidence of a contract is admissible without an allegation that the contract has been reduced to writing.[97] But evidence of a parol agreement is inadmissible under a petition or complaint counting on a written instrument.[98] A written instrument may be admissible under the common money counts,[99] even though inadmissible under a special count because of variance.[1] Before deeds misdescribing land can be introduced along with evidence to correct the error in the description, proper ground therefor must be laid in the pleadings, by alleging the mistake and praying a reformation.[2]

i. Fraud and Mistake.[3] Except where evidence of fraud is admissible under the general issue,[4] where fraud is not pleaded evidence thereof is not admissible.[5] And where a particular species of fraud is alleged, proof of a different species is inadmissible.[6] Fraud cannot be alleged generally, but the facts constituting the fraud must be set up in order to let in evidence.[7] Evidence tending to prove a rescission of a contract is inadmissible under a plea attempting to avoid the contract on the ground of fraud.[8] Mistake must also be pleaded if a party desires to introduce evidence thereof,[9] and such evidence cannot be introduced under a plea of fraud[10] since there is a well defined distinction between a fraud and a mistake.

j. Title, Ownership, and Possession.[11] A general allegation of title is sufficient to admit evidence pertaining thereto, without setting up the facts showing its character;[12] but if a particular source or kind of title is pleaded it must be proved as alleged.[13] Under a denial of title, evidence may be introduced showing the insufficient character of the instrument under which title is claimed,[14] or showing that the title is in another.[15] An allegation of ownership does not authorize evidence of possession.[16] Evidence of a mutual assignment among plaintiffs for the purposes of bringing a joint suit cannot be shown where such assignment is not averred in the declaration.[17]

k. Declaration or Complaint. A plaintiff cannot be permitted to establish by proof a cause of action not alleged in his complaint or declaration, but must state the facts constituting his cause of action and make out his case by giving evidence to support the facts he has stated.[18] Under the code system, however, plaintiff is issue at common law,[21] there is a radical difference between them.[22] The broader general issues, in fact, go to the cause of action as a whole or to the legal effect or operation of the facts alleged.[23] But the general denials go merely to the precise facts alleged by the opposite party, and no evidence is in general admissible under them which does not tend directly to negative the allegations of the pleadings to which they are directed.[24] But the cases are not always consistent in adhering strictly to this distinction.[25] Under the stipulation of the parties to an action

But this rule is not in accordance with either the spirit of the reformed procedure or the decisions of this court. The evidence otherwise inadmissible under defendant's pleadings may be introduced.[26] Defenses to the jurisdiction or in abatement cannot generally be proved under the general issue or general denial.[27]

(II) General Issue[28]— (A) In General. The various general issues at common law differ widely in their scope, some being very broad and allowing the introduction of almost any defense, others being very narrow. The issues raised by them and the evidence admissible under them are matters which have assumed a somewhat arbitrary form, due to historical rather than logical reasons, so that the scope of any given general issue is to be determined by a recourse to the precedents and not by anything observable in the nature of the plea.[29] Under the general issue matter in justification cannot be proved; it must be pleaded specially.[30]

In discussing the broad general issue of non assumpsit, Chitty says: "It may appear singular, that under the general issue, which in terms only denies a valid contract, the defendant should be permitted to avail himself of a ground of defence which admits a valid contract, but insists that it has been performed, or that there is an excuse for the non-performance of it, or that it has been discharged; it is, as observed by Lord Holt, a practice which has crept in improperly, but is now perhaps too settled to be altered." 1 Chitty Pl. (1809 ed.) 472.

30. Brown v. Bennett, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 181;

Where matter of total or partial defense cannot be pleaded, it may be given in evidence under the general issue.[31] A plea or notice of set-off or of other special defenses does not affect defendant's right to introduce under his general issue any matters which would be admissible without a special plea or notice.[32] And evidence is admissible to establish special defenses set up in an answer in conjunction with the plea of the general issue.[33] Statutes in some of those states which still retain the common-law procedure have restricted the scope of the general issues as they were understood at common law, and have made them more nearly equivalent to the code general denials.[34]

(B) Matters Arising After Issue Joined or Suit Commenced. It is a general rule of the common law that a matter of defense which arises after the commencement of the suit and before plea must be pleaded to the further maintenance of the action; and that a matter of defense which arises after suit brought and also after plea filed, and either before replication or after issue joined, must be pleaded puis darrein continuance, and that such matters cannot be shown under the general issue.[35] An action on the case is an exception to this rule. In such an action defendant is permitted under the general issue to give in evidence a release, a former recovery, a satisfaction, or any other matter ex post facto which shows that the cause of action has been discharged, or that in equity and conscience plaintiff ought not to recover.[36] A defendant may, under the general issue or any plea which puts the amount of recovery in dispute, prove partial or complete satisfaction since the suit was commenced,[37] and matters in mitigation of damages, occurring subsequent to the commencement of the action, may be shown without being specially pleaded.[38]

(C) Parties.[39] The general rule that a defect of parties can be taken advantage of by plea in abatement only [40] is subject to exceptions; [41] thus where it does not appear on the face of the pleadings,[42] in an action ex contractu, that there are other persons who should have been joined as plaintiffs, defendant may take advantage of the non-joinder under the general issue.[43] But in actions ex delicto the non-joinder of parties plaintiff cannot be taken advantage of under the plea of the general issue, except in so far as the amount of the recovery is concerned.[44] The non-joinder of parties defendant must be pleaded in abatement, and cannot be taken advantage of under the general issue.[45] Misjoinder of parties plaintiff, or joining those who have not a joint legal interest in the suit with those who have, in actions ex contractu, need not be pleaded in abatement but may be taken advantage of under the general issue.[46] An objection that plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue cannot be urged under the general issue.[47] The right of a person substituted as plaintiff to maintain the suit may be raised by a plea in abatement, or possibly taken advantage of under the general issue, but not upon a rule to quash or abate the summons.[48] The want of authority of the agent or attorney of an absent and foreign plaintiff to sue in the name of such plaintiff is never to be taken advantage of at the trial by way of nonsuit. (3) Non Cepit.[54] Under this issue, in replevin, defendant can show only that he did not take the goods or did not take them in the place alleged.[55]

(4) Non Est Factum.[56] Under this general issue defendant can show only that he did not execute the deed or that its execution was absolutely void.[57]

(5) Not Guilty in Case.[58] This is a broad issue, like non assumpsit, and permits the introduction of almost any defense which shows that plaintiff has no right of action,[59] such as justification or excuse, former recovery, release or satisfaction,[60] or settlement.[61]

(6) Not Guilty in Trespass. This is a narrow issue and permits defendant to show only that he did not do the act alleged, that the goods did not belong to plaintiff, or that the close was not his or in his possession.[62] All other defenses, such as justification, must be specially pleaded.[63]

(7) Not Guilty in Trover.[64] Under not guilty in trover defendant may show any defense except the statute of limitations.[65]

(8) Nul Tiel Record.[66] The plea of nul tiel record puts in issue only the record recited in the writ, and therefore is proper only where there is no record at all or one different from that upon which plaintiff has declared.[67]

(E) Notice Under General Issue. In some states where the common-law system of pleading is retained, special pleas have in terms been abolished or made optional by statutes providing that defendant may give notice to plaintiff of specific matters of defense by filing a notice thereof, with the plea of general issue.[68] Evidence may then be introduced which could formerly be presented under a special plea only.[69] A failure, however, to give the required notice renders evidence of a special defense inadmissible.[70]

(III) DENIALS UNDER THE CODE — (A) In General. Under the code system of pleading, new matter of avoidance or defense cannot be given in evidence under a general denial, but it must be specially pleaded.[71] It is to be observed, however, that under such a denial defendant may properly introduce evidence of affirmative matters if its tendency is to contradict the facts alleged by plaintiff;[72] and a party may sometimes be allowed to introduce affirmative matters under a denial when by reason of the improper pleading or improper evidence of his adversary, he would otherwise be deprived of a just defense,[73] or a party may be precluded by his own conduct from objecting to the introduction of affirmative evidence when only a denial has been pleaded.[74] Even though a pleading might have been sufficient if certain of its allegations had been omitted, a denial of such allegations nevertheless makes proper the introduction of evidence to prove or disprove them.[75] When both a general denial and specific denials are employed in an answer, the scope of the general denial is limited to the issues raised by the specific denials,[76]

and if specific defenses are affirmatively pleaded, even though they might have been admissible under a general denial, this is notice to the other party that only the enumerated defenses will be relied upon, and others cannot be proved.[77] Evidence discrediting the testimony of plaintiff may be shown by defendant under general denial.[78] Where plaintiff replies with a general denial any evidence may be given which controverts the facts denied.[79] The scope of the general denial is often expressly broadened by statute in particular kinds of actions.[80] Thus in actions to recover possession of real estate, some statutes permit the introduction of any defense, equitable or legal, under the general denial.[81] In many code states a defect of parties plaintiff must be taken advantage of by demurrer or answer or it will be deemed to have been waived by defendant.[82]

(3) Waiver. The defense of waiver is an affirmative one and should be pleaded to make evidence thereof admissible.[86]

(4) Want or Failure of Consideration. Where an action is based upon an agreement which upon its face imports a consideration, it is necessary to plead specially a want of consideration, as under a general denial proof thereof cannot be introduced.[87] But where the consideration must be averred in the complaint this rule does not apply, and a general denial is sufficient to allow the introduction of such evidence.[88] Failure of consideration must be specially pleaded.[89]

(5) Illegality. Where the illegality of a contract or transaction on which an action is based does not appear on the face thereof, or from the evidence introduced to prove it, evidence of illegality cannot be introduced under a general denial;[90] but where the illegality does so appear the rule is otherwise.[91]

(6) Act of God. This is new matter of a defense which cannot be shown under a denial.[92]

(7) Champerty. This defense cannot be shown under the general denial.[93]

(8) Ultra Vires. The defense of ultra vires cannot be shown under the general denial.[94]

must show all facts necessary to constitute a legal set-off of the nature sought to be proved,[97] although it has been held that a set-off may be proved under the general issue when defendant seeks to use it merely as a defense and not as a ground for affirmative relief.[98] If pleaded in bar only it cannot be used as a basis for an affirmative judgment.[99] The general rules regarding the introduction of evidence under a counter-claim or plea of set-off are the same as those regulating the introduction of evidence under a complaint or declaration.[1] There is a sharp conflict in the cases as to whether evidence in recoupment of damages may be shown under the general issue, some holding that it may be shown,[2] others that the defense must be specially pleaded or notice given.[3] It is always proper to specially plead it.[4] Where notice is required, recoupment must be confined to the specific transactions in dispute, unless the notice thereof alleges damages in other matters.[5] Recoupment of damages cannot be shown under a denial but must be specially pleaded.[6] Where the contract sued on expressly provides for deductions, such items need not be pleaded as counter-claims, even though it would be otherwise if the contract were silent about them.[7] Consent cannot authorize the court to render judgment on cross demands not pleaded, evidence of which is not admissible under general pleas filed. The cross demands should be filed by way of amendment to support a judgment.[8]

n. Bills of Particulars. The filing of a bill of particulars or copy of account operates as a limitation of proof and restricts the recovery to the matters or items set forth therein.[9] It does not operate as a portion of the declaration as regards subsequent pleadings.[10] But evidence in rebuttal may be introduced, although not specified in the bill of particulars.[11] And proof may be offered of the aggregate of the amount claimed, and the party is not confined to proof of the details separately.[12] If the other party himself introduces evidence or makes admissions showing that the party filing the bill of particulars is entitled to recover for items not set forth in his bill, a verdict for such items may stand.[13] A bill of particulars describing generally the character of a claim is sufficient to admit evidence of the contents thereof if no more specific bill is called for.[14] If the filing of a bill of particulars or copy of account becomes necessary, failure to file it will preclude the introduction of evidence touching the matters sought to be covered by such bill of particulars or copy of account,[15] and the same result is held to follow from

C. Variance Between Allegations and Proof[17] — 1. In General. Proofs, to be effectual, must correspond substantially with the allegations; hence, if there is a variance between the nature and elements of plaintiff's cause of action as alleged and as proved, it is fatal.[18] And if there is a substantial departure from the issues formed by the pleadings in regard to some matter material to the claim or defense, this constitutes a material variance.[19] There must be a departure as to kind, not merely as to quantity or degree.[20] A variance results from a discrepancy between the allegations and proof of the same party, not between the allegations of one party and the evidence of the opposite party.[21] If the evidence can be reasonably construed to support the pleading, there is no variance,[22] for a variance does not result from mere uncertainty or inconsistencies in the allegations,[23] or the proof.[24] In determining whether there is a variance between the evidence and the allegations, the whole scope of the pleading [25] and evidence [26] should be considered. There is no variance if the proofs sustain a portion of the allegations of the pleading, provided such portion amounts to a cause of action,[27] according to the general principle that if the pleader alleges more than is necessary, the additional allegations need not be proved.[28] Evidence of the actual facts will support a pleading which sets up the same facts according to their legal effect.[29] A party cannot take advantage of a variance which is caused by his own wrongful acts.[30] The tendency of modern cases is to abolish the technical refinements which once prevailed in regard to variances and with a view to substantial justice to require much less strictness in proof than formerly.[31] If the proof substantially supports the allegations it is sufficient.[32]

2. Materiality of Variance — a. In General. A variance which does not affect the gist of the action as alleged is immaterial.[33] And material variance cannot be predicated upon immaterial or superfluous allegations,[34] nor upon immaterial matter

Statement of rule.— "It is sufficient if the proofs correspond with the allegations in respect of those facts and circumstances which are, in point of law, essential to the cause of action. The allegata and probata need have only a legal identity, and this consists in their agreement in all the particulars legally essential to support the claim preferred. Im-

of inducement,[35] nor upon unessential matters of detail.[36] But every allegation in an inducement which is material, and not impertinent and foreign to the cause, and which, consequently, cannot be rejected as surplusage, must be proved as alleged, and a variance is fatal.[37]

b. Adverse Party Surprised or Misled. It has been decided in a number of cases that a variance to be material must be such as to mislead [38] or surprise [39] the adverse party. And it is expressly provided by statute in a number of states that no variance between pleading and proof shall be deemed material unless it shall have actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice.[40] And under such statutes it is not enough for a party to allege merely that he has been misled, but it must

lars need not be strictly sustained by the proof.[48] A variance in the proof from the bill of particulars as to the amount claimed by plaintiff is immaterial, provided, it seems, that the amount proved does not exceed that stated in the bill of particulars.[49] A bill of particulars cannot enlarge a cause of action so as to make a variance when the evidence supports the allegations of the complaint.[50]

4. Set-Off and Counter-Claim. The rule as to variance in case of a set-off or counter-claim is the same as in case of a declaration or complaint.[51] Matter pleaded as a counter-claim may be sustained as a set-off if proved at the trial,[52] but a plea merely defensive cannot be used as the basis for an affirmative judgment.[53]

5. Allegations Under Videlicet. The proper office of a videlicet is to particularize or explain what goes before it,[54] or to state time, place, or manner, which are not of the essence of the matter in issue, so that they need not be proved strictly as laid.[55] But it is only when matters alleged under a videlicet are not essential and material that the party is relieved from the necessity of proving them strictly,[56] and therefore material matters must be proved with equal strictness whether laid under a videlicet or not.[57]

6. Matters of Description. Every averment which the pleadings make material as a descriptive part of a cause of action must be proved as alleged, and any variance which destroys the legal identity of the matter or thing averred with the matter or thing proved is fatal.[58] But a departure even in matters of description, if not such as to create uncertainty in the identity of the subject-matter described, cannot cause a material variance.[59]

sary.[66] And the same rule applies to allegations of place. If the precise location is alleged and the description is immaterial, the ground of charge or of complaint not being local, the description may be rejected as surplusage, and a large departure from the allegations is allowable.[67] But place sometimes becomes material as constituting matter of essential description, in which case a variance in regard thereto is material.[68]

11. PARTIES.[69] The proof must show the same parties to the contract, decree, deed, transaction, or proceeding as are alleged in the pleadings.[70] An allegation that defendant owned certain shares of stock is fatally variant from proof that the shares were owned by a corporation of which defendant was an officer.[71] Evidence of two several assaults does not support an allegation of a joint assault,[72] nor can an action against two or more for a joint trespass be sustained by evidence of an assault by one defendant.[73] If a party is described by a certain descriptive title and the proof shows a different title, the variance is material in the absence of evidence showing that the two descriptions apply to the same persons.[74]

12. Names of Persons. There is no variance between an allegation that an instrument was signed by a party's full name and evidence that it was signed by initials or other abbreviation and vice versa,[75] nor does a slight difference in the spelling of a name constitute a variance,[76] at least if proof is introduced showing the identity of the parties.[77] The presence or absence of a middle name or initial

How misnomer taken advantage of.— Under the general issue, advantage cannot be taken of the fact that plaintiff sues by a wrong name. Dohorty v. Madgett, 58 Vt. 323, 2 Atl. 115. A mistake in setting forth plaintiff's name in the declaration can only be taken advantage of by plea in abatement, unless there is a variance between the declaration and the contract offered in evidence. Chappell v. Proctor, Harp. (S. C.) 49. Misnomer of defendant can, in general, be taken advantage of only in abatement; but where, in a suit in assumpsit against two, one is arrested, and the other returned "not found," and it appears on the trial that defendant who is not brought in is misnamed in the declaration, being called "John," instead of "George," plaintiff will fail on the ground of variance. Waterbury v. Mather, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 611. Where a petition and a summons was issued against three obligors, it cannot be shown under a plea of non est factum, entered by two of defendants, without affidavit, that the name of the third obligor, who was not served with process, was "Samuel," and not "Stephen," as described in the declaration; but the objection must be made by plea in abatement. will not ordinarily constitute a variance.[78] The addition "jr." is no part of a man's name, and a difference between allegation and proof in this respect does not constitute a material variance.[79] But where the name as proved is substantially different from that alleged, it will be deemed a material variance,[80] unless the evidence shows that the same person was known by both names.[81]

13. Title or Interest. The title or interest proved must in general be the same as that alleged.[82] And so an allegation of a legal title is not supported by proof of an equitable title.[83] But the source of title, if immaterial, need not be proved as alleged. Thus there is no material variance between a title alleged to have been acquired by purchase and proof of a title by subrogation and payment,[84] nor between an allegation of title by inheritance and proof of title by possession,[85] nor between the allegation of title by purchase and proof of title by gift.[86] Ownership of the identical property alleged must be supported by the proof.[87]

An allegation of entire ownership is not sustained by evidence of an undivided joint or common interest (Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Becht, (Tex. Civ. App. 1893) 21 S. W. 971; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Teague, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 780; Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Witt, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Suppl. 775) and proof of ownership supports an allegation of ownership by assignment (Smith v. Merchants' Despatch Transp. Co., 45 Iowa 705).

Ownership and occupation.— In an action for damages growing out of the condition or manner of using certain premises, an allegation of defendant's ownership and occupation of premises is not proved by evidence that they were occupied by his lessees. Possession by a landlord is not proved by showing possession by a tenant for years in an action for obstructing a right of way, alleged to be in plaintiff's possession. 14. Amount or Value. Allegations as to amount or value need not usually be strictly proved, and a departure in the proof will not cause a material variance,[88] at least where the amount does not constitute matter of essential description.[89]

15. Contracts. The rules as to variance with respect to contracts have been stated elsewhere in this work.[90]

16. Written Instruments[91] — a. In General. In an action on an instrument, a variance is an erroneous description of the instrument, so that it does not appear to be the same when produced in evidence.[92] In case of such a variance, the instrument should not be admitted in evidence under the pleadings,[93] and even if admitted, no recovery can be had upon it.[94] But if it is correctly set out in terms or properly described in the pleading, it is admissible notwithstanding other allegations in the pleading inconsistent with it;[95] and a mere ambiguity, uncertainty, or inconsistency in the instrument shown in evidence will not constitute a variance,[96] nor will the mere misnaming of such instrument.[97] When the instrument in suit is made a part of the pleading by being attached as an exhibit, no objection for variance can be sustained;[98] but the mere conforming to the requirement that copies of instruments sued on shall be filed with the pleadings does not excuse a variance.[99] If the pleading purports to describe an instrument or record in hæc verba trifling variances may be fatal;[1] but if it purports merely to plead it substantially or according to its legal effect, a variance will not be deemed material which does not alter the substance or legal effect of it,[2] although the variance is fatal if the instrument shown in evidence is of different legal effect from that alleged.[3] But immaterial words, not set forth as descriptive of the instrument, will not cause a material variance,[4] nor will mere errors or discrepancies in spelling,[5] nor obvious clerical errors.[6] It has been held that an allegation that defendant is in possession of the instrument sued on, and that therefore plaintiff is unable to give a more accurate description, will excuse a slight error in description.[7] The consideration for a written contract must be accurately alleged,[8] but if the true consideration is alleged there is no variance if the proof shows an instrument stating a different consideration.[9] And if the consideration named in the instrument is the same as that alleged there is no variance, although it is shown that the actual consideration is different.[10] An instrument may be introduced to sustain an allegation which does not refer to it directly if it substantially supports the allegation.[11] A description of a mortgage as written or printed is supported by evidence that it was partly written and partly printed.[12] When an instrument of writing or a record is not the foundation of the action, a variance is not material, unless the discrepancy is so great as to amount to a strong probability that it cannot be the instrument or record described.[13]

b. Date of Instrument. A difference in the date of an instrument as alleged and the date as proved will ordinarily constitute a material variance;[14] but if an instrument is stated in pleading to have been made on such a day, without alleging when it was dated, an instrument dated on a different day from that stated may be given in evidence.[15]

c. Place of Execution or Payment. Words showing venue, or words descriptive of the place where an instrument was executed or is payable, are not such as to cause a variance unless used as descriptive of the instrument.[16] A descriptive allegation, as to a note, that it is payable at one place, is not supported by the production of a note payable at another place.[17] But there is no variance between a declaration counting upon a note as if made payable anywhere and a note given in evidence made payable at a designated place.[18]

d. Parties to Instrument. The alleged parties to an instrument described in the pleadings must be identically the same as those shown by the instrument when put in evidence.[19] But discrepancies or variations in the spelling, form, or initials of names may be ignored, if clearly trivial, or explained by other parts of the instrument or by evidence aliunde,[20] and allegations as to residence, being immaterial, cannot cause a variance.[21] A mortgage executed to a person as administrator is not admissible in evidence under an allegation in the pleadings that it was executed to him individually.[22] Where a deed purports on its face to have been executed by husband and wife, but the wife has not acknowledged it, according to law, it may be declared on as the deed of the husband only, and will be admitted as evidence under such declaration.[23] Where an assessment is alleged to have been made by three managers, and the proof shows it was signed by only two, this is no variance if the signing is unnecessary and it was in fact made by the three.[24] Where notes in suit are declared upon as the notes of defendant alone, and the notes produced are signed by defendant and other persons severally liable, there is no variance.[25]

e. Property Described in Instrument. A palpable variance in the description of the property mentioned in a written instrument is fatal,[26] but mere clerical errors or minor discrepancies may be explained by reference to other parts of the instrument or by evidence aliunde.[27] allowed,[30] date,[31] and form of action.[32] But mere verbal variations not affecting the identity of the judgment will not be deemed material.[33] And where the record is not the foundation of the action or defense, a variance will not be deemed material.[34]

18. Miscellaneous. If the pleading is of allowed claims and the proof shows claims presented but not allowed, there is a material variance.[35] Waiver by stipulation is not proved by evidence of waiver by conduct.[36] An allegation that property was returned for breach of warranty is not sustained by proof of a rescission of the contract and a return of the property thereafter.[37] Evidence that a note was intrusted to defendant does not support an allegation that money was intrusted to him.[38] There is a fatal variance between malfeasance alleged and non-feasance proved.[39] A count for fraud is not supported by evidence of negligence.[40] Proof of a custom among certain banks does not support an allegation of the custom of another bank.[41] There is no variance between a declaration that a boiler exploded and evidence that it was the fire-box which exploded, the fire-box being a part of the boiler.[42] And since the word "boat" in its ordinary acceptation may include "barge," any variance between an allegation that personal injuries were caused by a defect in a "barge" and proof that the defect was in a "boat" is immaterial.[43]

19. Curing Variance. An apparent variance may sometimes be cured by evidence aliunde which shows that in fact the proof offered relates to the same parties or subject-matter as the allegation.[44]

20. Effect of Variance. A new trial should be granted on material variance between the proof and the pleading.[45] And where a material variance clearly appears, and the defect is pointed out seasonably, a failure of the trial court to sustain the objection is ground for reversal.[46] But an immaterial variance between the allegations and the proof which is adduced will be disregarded,[47]

and furnishes no ground for a reversal of the judgment by an appellate court.[48]

21. Failure of Proof. Under the statutory provisions in force in some jurisdictions where the allegations of the cause of action or defense to which proof is directed are unproved, not in some particular or particulars only, but in their entire scope and meaning, this constitutes not a variance but a failure of proof which is fatal.[49] Thus, where a cause of action ex contractu is alleged and the evidence shows merely a tort, there is a failure of proof;[50] and so where one contract is alleged and a wholly different contract proved.[51] And when there is an entire absence of evidence to support some material allegation, this also constitutes such a failure of proof as to bar a recovery.[52] Where there is such failure of proof no amendment is allowable.[53]

same rule applies to the aider of an answer or plea or any other pleading by a subsequent pleading of the adverse party.[58] A defective pleading may also be cured by allegations or admissions appearing in a prior pleading filed by the adverse party.[59] But a party's pleading is not aided by his own allegations or admissions appearing elsewhere in the record,[60] and a party cannot rely upon allegations of his adversary to cure defects in his own pleading when in a subsequent pleading he denies such allegations.[61] So the doctrine of aider can only be invoked in aid of a defective statement of a good cause of action or defense, and not to aid the statement of a bad or defective cause of action or defense.[62] Whether or not a declaration or complaint can be aided by a denial in the plea or answer of a fact omitted by plaintiff or by an averment in the plea or answer of the non-existence or direct opposite of such fact, upon which averment issue is taken, is a controverted question. The general rule is that a denial or negative form of allegation of this kind will aid a defective complaint or declaration,[63] but there is authority to the contrary.[64] The common code provision that allegations in the answer shall be deemed controverted by plaintiff applies only to facts inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint and not to allegations which aid defects in the complaint.[65] An admission once made operates to cure the defect even though the pleading is withdrawn on the trial and a new pleading is filed which does not contain the admission.[66] The doctrine of aider by subsequent pleading is most commonly applied when the objection to the sufficiency of the pleading is made at the trial or after trial, verdict, or judgment; [67] but it has also been held applicable where a demurrer to a pleading is sought to be carried back to a prior pleading bad in substance; in such case the defect may be cured by the subsequent allegation or admission and the prior pleading rendered sufficient as against the demurrer.[68] On demurrer ore tenus, on the other hand, it has been held that a pleading must stand or fall by its own averments and cannot be aided by allegations or admissions in the pleadings of the adverse party.[69] Where a demurrer to a complaint is improperly overruled, the error becomes harmless after the filing of an answer supplying the omitted material averment.[70]

The objection that a pleading was not filed in time is waived by failure to move to strike it from the files. Osgood v. Haverty, McCahon (Kan.) 182.

Objections to the verification of a petition, being merely technical, must be made before objections are made to the matter in the petition itself, or the defect will be waived. Hershiser v. Delone, 24 Nebr. 380, 38 N. W. 863.

Unless uncertainty and indefiniteness are availed of by motion to make more specific, they are waived. Roberts v. Jones, 82 Ark. 188, 101 S. If an exhibit to a pleading be objectionable, the proper practice is to bring it to the attention of the court by motion. If this be not done the objection will be waived. Mulhollan v. Scoggin, 8 Nebr. 202.

Time of filing.— After demurrer to a plea it is too late to object that it was not filed in time. Manley v. Union Bank, 1 Fla. 160. But see Jennison v. Hapgood, 2 Aik. (Vt.) 31, holding that an exception as to the time of filing a plea in abatement is not waived by a demurrer.

Where no motion is made to require an election between inconsistent defenses before issue joined, the objection is waived. Dunn v. Bozarth, 59 Nebr. 244, 80 N. W. 811; Vernon v. Union L. Ins. Co., 58 Nebr. 494, 78 N. W. 929.

Joining issue on one plea only.— In an action for rent defendant pleaded payment to a third person. Plaintiff replied specially ignoring this plea, and defendant, without demurring, joined issue on the replication. It was held that the plea of payment was no longer an issue under the pleadings, and hence no reversible error was committed in excluding evidence in support thereof. 4. By Admitting Evidence Without Objection.[91] If evidence is admitted without objection to prove a fact imperfectly pleaded, the defect will be deemed waived,[92] but no such result follows where the evidence is objected to when offered.[93] In some cases this rule is held to apply only to the introduction of evidence to prove facts defectively alleged, but not wholly wanting,[94] while other cases allow the proof of material facts which are entirely omitted from the pleading, to cure such omission,[95] at least where the facts omitted go to the amount of the recovery

But it does not follow that the judge at the trial was bound to dismiss the suit. We are referred to section 148 of the Code of Procedure, declaring that an omission to demur does not waive the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. But the terms and spirit of that section are satisfied by holding that the right to object at the trial is not absolutely gone by failing to demur. . . . If, however, the proof supplies the facts which the complaint omits to state, it is competent for the court to amend the pleading, and the objection will be overruled"); Johnson v. Roach, 83 N. Y. 5. By Agreement, Submission, or Reference. Any formal defect in pleadings or proceedings may be waived by an express agreement to that effect,[97] but the waiver will not be extended to defects not embraced by the terms of the agreement.[98] Likewise, defects in the pleadings are waived by a judgment entered by consent,[99] by a stipulation for judgment,[1] by an agreement of record between the parties as to what evidence may be given under the pleadings [2] or what issues shall be tried,[3] or by a stipulation as to the facts.[4] But a stipulation as to the issues cannot waive a fatal defect in the pleadings,[5] and although a general demurrer is overruled by consent, the objection raised by the demurrer that the pleading is fatally defective is not thereby waived.[6] Nor does the submission of a demurrer without argument operate as a waiver of the defects attacked thereby.[7] An amendment of the declaration by consent after plea filed does not authorize defendant to raise any formal objections thereto which equally applied to the original declaration.[8] A submission to arbitration or to a referee,[9] or a submission to the court on an agreed case or statement of facts,[10] or an agreement that the court may find the facts and render judgment thereon,[11] waives all defects and irregularities in the pleadings not expressly reserved.

6. By Demurrer.[12] A general demurrer, on the ground of failure to state a cause of action or defense, waives formal defects which are ground for special demurrer,[13] and a demurrer specifying certain grounds waives other grounds not specified,[14] except want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter and failure to state a cause of action or defense.[15] So a demurrer is generally a waiver of defects attackable only by motion,[16] and also of the right to treat a pleading as a nullity,[17] or to object that it was not filed in time,[18] or to object to the want of an affidavit.[19]

7. By Failure to Return Copy of Pleading or Exhibit. In some jurisdictions a copy of a pleading served on the opposing party, where defective in mere matters of form, must be promptly returned or the objection is waived.[20] And the same rule applies to a bill of particulars[21] or exhibit.[22] The objection that a pleading was not served in time is waived by neglecting to return it.[23]

8. By Obtaining Extension of Time to Plead. By asking and obtaining an extension of time to plead, it has been held that a party waives all formal objections to the pleadings of his adversary.[24] But obtaining time to answer is not a waiver of a motion to specify in the complaint the name of the county in which plaintiff desires the trial to be had.[25]

9. Application of Rules to Particular Defects and Objections — a. In General. Among the objections which have been held to be waived by pleading over to the merits or going to trial without raising the objection are the following: Argumentative denials;[26] defective caption of a pleading;[27] denial improperly made upon information and belief;[28] departure in a reply;[29] duplicity;[30] failure to designate a part of an answer as a cross complaint;[31] failure to file a pleading;[32] failure to file or serve within the time prescribed by law;[33] failure to serve a copy of a plead-

22. The code provision that on demand by defendant, plaintiff shall furnish him with a copy of the "deed, instrument, or other writing whereon the action is founded" is waived by defendant where he accepted instead of the instrument itself for inspection, and retained it some weeks, although he was unable to get it on some occasions when he asked for it instead of a copy. A notice of withdrawal and change of pleas was combined with notice of special matter, which, so far as the last was concerned, was not served in time. Plaintiff used only the notice relating to the change of pleas on the trial. It was held that he did not thereby estop himself from questioning the sufficiency of the notice of special matter. In Iowa the code provides that where any of the matters enumerated as grounds of demurrer do not appear on the face of the petition, the objection may be taken by answer, and if no such objection is taken it shall be deemed waived; and that, if the facts stated by the petition do not entitle plaintiff to any relief, advantage may be taken by motion in arrest of judgment. sufficient to constitute a cause of action is not waived by failure to raise the objection by demurrer or answer or before trial but it may be raised at any time,[54] and this rule is expressly reiterated in most of the codes and practice acts.[55] This rule also applies to counter-claims,[56] although the objection that the counter-claim was not the proper subject of a counter-claim in the particular case is generally held waived by failure to urge such objection by reply or demurrer.[57] However, a failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is to be distinguished from a defective statement of a cause of action, the latter being waived by pleading over.[58]

d. Failure of Answer or Reply to State Defense. In some jurisdictions, the failure of an answer to state facts constituting a defense, as distinguished from a defective statement of a defense, is not waived by pleading over or going to trial without objection;[59] while in other jurisdictions the contrary rule seems to prevail.[60] Where a reply is insufficient in substance to constitute a defense, it has Mandatory statute.— Colo. Civ. Code, § 61, requiring all pleas, except demurrers, to be verified when a prior one has been, being mandatory, a lack of verification is not waived if objected to before the impaneling of the jury, by motion for judgment. Perras v. Denver, etc., R. Co., 5 Colo. App. 21, 36 Pac. 637.

Waiver as extending to new pleas.—If pleas in bar not accompanied by affidavit have been filed without objection on the part of plaintiff, but thereafter such pleas are withdrawn and new pleas are tendered by defendant, plaintiff does not thereby waive the right to insist on the lack of an affidavit as a valid objection to such new pleas. If a party receives the word "replication" for a replication, it will be held as a replication suitable to the defense made. Boyers v. Pratt, 1 Humphr. (Tenn.) 90.

In order to avail of an omission to file a replication the party excepting must stand on the pleadings. Even when he moves for judgment in the lower court unsuccessfully he cannot introduce his proof as though a reply were in, and, after defeat on the merits, profit by an erroneous ruling on the motion. Holke v. Herman, 87 Mo. App. 125.

Inadvertent omission.— The joinder by defendants in the issues of law raised by the answers to certain of defendant's pleas without raising the objection that other pleas were not answered is an implied waiver of answer to them until after the final determination of the issues of law. People v. Weber, 92 Ill. 288.

Rule to file.— If replications have not been filed when the trial begins, defendant is bound to know it and failure to ask them for a rule against plaintiff to file them is equivalent to consenting that the trial, so far as the pleadings are concerned, may be commenced as if the issues were properly made up. rule by going to trial.[80] So the want of a pleading is waived by submitting the case on an agreed statement of facts.[81] When a party goes to trial without asking for a default and without objecting to the want of a plea or answer, the cause will be treated as though the general issue or general denial had been filed.[82]

D. Waiver of Objection to Want, or Insufficiency, of Bill of Particulars.[83] Failure to file a bill of particulars is waived by failure to move, demur, or otherwise object before trial.[84] So all objections to the filing, service, or form of a bill of particulars are waived by pleading over or going to trial without objection.[85]

Where a case is tried as though certain allegations of the complaint were denied, they must be deemed denied. Weidenmueller v. Stearns Ranchos Co., 128 Cal. 623, 61 Pac. 374; Tracy v. Craig, 55 Cal. 91.

Where proper demand made.— A declaration being insufficient, and defendant having properly demanded a bill of particulars, he waives nothing by pleading to the declaration or noticing cause for trial, and therefore, on plaintiff's refusal to comply with the demand, his evidence is properly excluded. Peterson v. Tilden, 44 Mich. 168, 6 N. W. 270.

Where, after the furnishing of an amended bill of particulars by order of the court, defendant makes no objection to its items for over five months and until the very moment of trial, objection thereto is waived and a motion made for a further bill of particulars comes too late and is properly denied. Waiver by failure to promptly return.— The objection that the bill of particulars ac-

E. Objections Relating to Parties — 1. In General.[86] Objections relating to parties must generally be made promptly or they will be deemed waived.[87] For instance, where a person is substituted as a party in place of another, failure to then raise any objection is a waiver of the right to object thereto.[88] So where persons are allowed to intervene as parties without objection, the objection thereto is waived.[89] So the failure of plaintiff to object to the withdrawal of defendant companying a verified complaint is not itself verified is waived by retaining the bill without objection instead of returning it within a reasonable time. Paine v. Smith, 32 Wis. 335. Where defendant accepted a further bill of particulars and retained it for five months without objection, the denial of her motion to preclude plaintiff from giving evidence at the trial in support of his complaint as amended thereby was proper. McCourt v. Cowperthwait, 63 N. Y. Suppl. 240.

Waiver of compliance with rule.— A defendant who procures a rule for a bill of particulars is in a position to demand a compliance with the rule or a dismissal of the common counts from the declaration; but if he does neither and goes to trial he will be considered as having waived a compliance with the rule for a bill of particulars. Wilson v. St. John's Hospital, 92 Ill. App. 413.

When evidence may be excluded.— Where defendant demanded a bill of particulars and was not satisfied with the statement rendered, he should have demanded a more particular bill, and if it was not then furnished, apply for an order requiring such bill, and until this was done he was in no position to demand that the evidence be excluded for failure to comply with his demand for a more particular bill. Davis v. Johnson, 96 Minn. 130, 104 N. W. 766.

In California it has been held that where the account furnished on order is not satisfactory, if the opposite party intends to object to the introduction of evidence on the subject, an order for its exclusion should be obtained previous to the trial. Conner v. Hutchinson, 17 Cal. 279.

In Michigan, under a rule of the circuit court providing that where plaintiff's bill of particulars is insufficient the court may, in its discretion, nonsuit him or require a more complete bill to be delivered, a defendant who has made no objection, by motion, to the bill delivered, cannot object to the introduction of any evidence under it, on the trial, on the ground of its insufficiency. Express waiver.— The stipulation of the assignee in bankruptcy, waiving objection to an order substituting one to whom the bankrupt plaintiff had assigned the claim sued on, on notice to defendant's attorneys and the bankrupt's widow and next of kin, is properly received. Schell v. Devlin, 82 N. Y. 333.

Subsequent acquiescence.— Where, in an action in the municipal court, an order was entered impleading defendant, by his own consent, as owner of money deposited in court, to which order plaintiff objected, but, after it was granted, had judgment entered against such defendant, any objection as to the propriety of the order was waived, and the question of jurisdiction will not be considered on appeal. Want of formal order.— After the trial of issues raised upon the filing of a petition of intervention, an objection that there was no formal order of the court granting leave to

from the case on filing a disclaimer waives the right to afterward complain thereof.[90] And failure to object at the time to the reinstatement of a party previously stricken out on demurrer for misjoinder is a waiver thereof.[91] An irregularity in that new parties are brought in by amendment in an action of tort may be waived by going to trial without objection.[92]

2. Misnomer or Misdescription.[93] The misnomer of a party is waived where there is an appearance and a plea to the merits without raising the objection,[94] and the objection cannot be first urged on appeal.[95] In those jurisdictions where pleas in abatement are preserved, the objection must be urged by such a plea,[96] and where abolished the objection must be urged by answer.[97] So an objection to a pleading because of the description of parties by their initials is waived by pleading to the merits.[98]

3. Improper Plaintiff.[99] Want of legal capacity to sue and the objection that the action is not brought in the name of the real party in interest is waived where the objection is not urged by demurrer or answer, the objection being required to be urged by demurrer where apparent on the face of the complaint and by answer where not so apparent.[1]

defendant has no knowledge thereof until after the introduction of evidence upon the trial is a mooted question.[7] Objections to non-joinder are waived where the party relying thereon successfully opposes the motion by plaintiff for leave to amend in the respect complained of.[8] So where a demurrer for defect of parties is insufficient in form, the objection is waived.[9] A demurrer on the ground of a defect of parties "plaintiff" does not present the question as to a defect of parties "defendant" or whether the alleged necessary party should be brought in before the trial.[10] Where an action is brought by one having no cause of action whatever, the statute requiring a defect of parties to be raised by demurrer or answer is not applicable.[11]

5. MISJOINDER OF PARTIES.[12] At common law the misjoinder of a party could be given in evidence under a general issue or taken advantage of at any stage of the case at which it appeared.[13] At present, however, in most jurisdictions, the objection that there is a misjoinder of parties, either plaintiff or defendant, is waived unless urged by demurrer or answer;[14] although where there is not only a misjoinder

In Kansas, the rule that a defect of parties is waived where not urged by demurrer or answer is subject to the exception that where the defect is not discovered until during the trial, especially where plaintiff has concealed the real facts and thus misled defendant, defendant may then raise the objection without an amendment of the answer. form of the pleading.[21] But by amending one count or paragraph a party does not waive an objection to the sustaining of a demurrer to another count or paragraph,[22] and when the pleas set up different defenses the going to trial on one does not waive error in sustaining a demurrer to another.[23] The mere asking or obtaining of leave to amend is not a waiver, if such leave is not acted upon.[24]

2. WAIVER OF OBJECTION TO OVERRULING DEMURRER.[25] A demurrant waives his right to object to an adverse ruling on his demurrer by proceeding to trial on the merits,[26] by withdrawing his demurrer,[27] by suffering a default to be taken against

See 39 Cent. Dig. tit. "Pleading," §§ 1401, 1402.

Reservation of objections.— The filing of an amended declaration after a demurrer has been sustained to the original declaration is a waiver of all objections to the ruling on the demurrer, although the motion for leave to file the amended pleading recites that it is made without waiving such objections. Birckhead v. Chesapeake, etc., R. Co., 95 Va. 648, 29 S. E. 678.

Trial on other issues.— Where a party, after demurrers to his pleading had been sustained, went to trial on the issues as framed by other pleadings, and did not ask leave to amend his obnoxious pleading or to plead over, he could obtain a review of the ruling on the demurrer, although he did not in writing or orally advise the court that he elected to stand on his pleading. Bennett v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co., 203 Ill. 439, 67 N. E. 971.

Repleading same matter.— Where a demurrer to a pleading is sustained and an exception taken to the ruling, any error therein is not waived by the pleader filing an amended pleading which is but a repetition of the first, whether or not considered a pleading over. Watkins v. Iowa Cent. R. Co., 123 Iowa 390, 98 N. W. 910. And where a demurrer to a petition is sustained, and plaintiff files an amendment repeating all the allegations of the original petition and adding others, which are stricken out on motion, and a demurrer is then filed setting up the same grounds as the first, an appeal may be taken from the sustaining of the second demurrer; any right to claim that the amendment was a restatement of the original petition being waived by the second demurrer, in place of a motion to strike out the part to which it was interposed. Koboliska v. Swehla, 107 Iowa 124, 77 N. W. 576.

In Iowa the statute providing that answering over after a demurrer is "overruled" does not make the ruling on the demurrer an adjudication of any question raised by the demurrer, does not change the rule as to waiver by amending or answering over after a demurrer is "sustained." Krause v. Lloyd, 100 Iowa 666, 69 N. W. 1062.

Statutory provisions to the contrary.— It is sometimes provided by statute that amending after demurrer sustained shall constitute no waiver. Chestnut v. Tyson, 105 Ala. 149, 16 So. 729, 53 Am. When filing cross complaint no waiver.— The right to object to the sustaining of a demurrer to an answer is not waived by the filing of a cross complaint after the overruling, by permission of court given before the overruling. Travelers Ins. Co. v. Redfield, 6 Colo. App. 190, 40 Pac. 195.

Mere tender as sufficient to constitute waiver.—Where plaintiff, after a demurrer to his first amended complaint was sustained, tendered a second amended complaint, he could not afterward assign error to the action of court in sustaining the demurrer to the first complaint, although the court refused to allow the second amended complaint to be filed. The mere tender of an answer and request for leave to file same after demurrer overruled is sufficient to constitute a waiver. Bankers' Reserve Life Assoc. v. Finn, 64 Nebr. 105, 89 N. W. 672.

As waiver of right to object to introduction of any evidence.— Where a defendant does not elect to stand upon his demurrer when overruled, but pleads issuably, and goes to trial on the merits, he cannot raise the questions presented by the demurrer on the trial by objecting to the introduction of any evi-

nature.[33] These rules are subject to the exception that when the ground of demurrer is the want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter or the failure of the complaint to state a cause of action, the right to object to the ruling is not waived by pleading over.[34] A waiver must result from the voluntary act of the party and pleading over in accordance with the order of the court is not a waiver.[35]

3. Waiver of Failure of Court to Pass Upon Demurrer. Objection to the failure of the court to act upon a demurrer is waived by voluntarily pleading over or going to trial upon the merits.[36]

If defendant intends to avail himself of an error in striking out his answer, he should let judgment go at the time and stand on his exceptions. By pleading over and going to trial on another issue he voluntarily abandons whatever grounds he might have had for a review of the action of the court. Fuggle v. Hobbs, 42 Mo. 537.

Renewal of motion.— Where a motion filed to a petition has been overruled, and exception taken, and afterward an amended petition is filed, to which defendant answers without renewing his motion, he thereby waives the error, if any, committed in the overruling of the motion. Hunter v. Lang, 5 Nebr. (Unoff.) 323, 98 N. W. 690. So where a motion to strike a replication from the files is not renewed, notwithstanding the replication is still objectionable, after the allowance of an amendment on a cross motion for leave to amend being entered at the same time as the motion to strike the replication, defendant cannot urge the objection that the court erred in not sustaining his motion to strike off the replication. Protection L. Ins. Co. v. Foote, 79 Ill. 361.

Raising same objection by answer.—A motion to strike an answer and counter-claim is not waived by answering the counter-claim where the same point was raised in the answer to the counter-claim as was raised in the motion to strike. Ringen Stove Co. v. Bowers, 109 Iowa 175, 80 N. W. 318.

Crow v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 57 Mo. App. 135.

Motion to strike irrelevant allegations.— But proceeding to trial after a motion to strike certain parts of the pleading as irrelevant and redundant is overruled does not waive the right to object on the trial to matters complained of as irrelevant and redundant. An election to amend, as allowed in the court's order, is sufficient to constitute a waiver, although no such amendment is in fact made. Weaver v. Stacey, 93 Iowa 683, 62 N. W. 22.

Withdrawing part of pleading not stricken out.— Where the court ruled that part of the answer to an application for a writ of possession be stricken out, defendant who thereupon withdrew the balance debarred himself from objecting to the ruling. Robinson v. Veal, 65 Ga. 592.

Where a motion to dismiss an action on the ground of departure is made after a motion to amend the petition is made and sustained, the filing of an answer to the amended petition and proceeding with the trial is a waiver of defendant's right to have the ruling on the motion to dismiss reviewed. Powell v. Brookfield Pressed Brick, etc., Mfg. Co., 104 Mo. App. 713, 78 S. W. 646.

Where a plaintiff was entitled to proceed upon two separate causes of action, error in requiring him to elect was not waived by going to trial. Rucker v. Omaha, etc., Refining Co., 18 Colo. App. 487, 72 Pac. 682.

to save the objection, although the party amends, pleads over, or goes to trial.[67]

I. Objections to Evidence — 1. As Not Within Issues.[68] Failure to object to evidence at the time it is offered is a waiver of the objection that it is not admissible under the pleadings.[69] If the evidence offered is not objected to, Acquiescence of one of several parties.— In an action against two railroad companies for personal injuries caused by a defective engine and machinery, an order denying the motion of one of defendants that plaintiff specify the defects will be regarded as acquiesced in by it if it does not except thereto, although there is an exception by its co-defendant. Where a motion to strike out a portion of a petition in a federal court was erroneously sustained and the ruling duly excepted to and such motion did not go to any insufficiency or technical defect in the petition but was in effect a demurrer to so much of it as alleged a distinct and substantive part of plaintiff's cause of action, plaintiff did not waive the error by complying with the order permitting him to file an amended petition omitting the averments objected to. Williamson v. Liverpool, etc., Ins. Co., 141 Fed. 54, 72 C. C. A. 542. See also Chitwood v. Russell, 36 Mo. App. 245, where it was held that where, after denial of a motion by plaintiff to strike out part of the answer, he filed a reply thereto and went to trial thereon, he was not thereby precluded from relying on the ruling as a ground of reversal of a judgment against him; the motion and ruling having been made part of the record by bill of exceptions and a motion for a new trial having again called the attention of the court thereto.

the party presenting it is entitled to the benefit of any cause of action or defense established thereby,[70] although if it is admissible as to one issue raised by the pleadings but inadmissible as to another not made by the pleadings, its reception without objection is not a waiver of objection to the consideration of such latter issue.[71] The scope of the evidence admissible under the pleadings may be enlarged by consent of the parties.[72] Where either party tries a case as if certain issues were presented, he is estopped to afterward object that no such issues were raised by the pleadings,[73] and a request for an instruction to the jury as to an issue is a waiver of the objection that such issue is not presented by the pleadings.[74] A party cannot object to the relevancy of the evidence which he himself causes to be introduced [75] or upon which he himself rests his cause of action or defense.[76]

An objection to an application to amend so as to conform the pleading to the proof is a sufficient objection where it further appears that the issue foreign to the pleadings was not intentionally litigated by the parties. Wixon v. Devine, 91 Cal. 477, 27 Pac. 777.

or after verdict [88] or judgment.[89] The objection must specify exactly wherein the variance consists so that it may be cured by an amendment, a general objection that there is a variance not being sufficient;[90] and in some jurisdictions the adverse party is required to make a showing sufficient to satisfy the court that he has actually been misled to his prejudice.[91]

3. On Ground of Insufficiency of Pleadings. Where a pleading fails to state facts constituting a cause of action or defense, the failure to urge the objection by demurrer or answer is generally not a waiver thereof,[92] and the objection may thereafter be urged on the trial by objecting to the introduction of any evidence thereunder.[93] In some jurisdictions, however, it seems that the objection cannot

Not strictly a demurrer ore tenus.— Much confusion results from loosely designating as a demurrer ore tenus an objection to all evidence because the complaint is insufficient. Such objection is not a demurrer, in any sense, within the meaning of the code. It is merely an objection to evidence, and the court's decision thereon is merely a ruling on the

of the pleading than upon a formal demurrer,[97] and the practice is not to be encouraged.[98] If there is a single good count, the objection, made to the entire pleading, will be overruled.[99] When such an objection is made to the admission of evidence the precise ground for such objection must be stated, or the objection will not be considered;[1] and it must be shown wherein the pleading fails to state a cause of action.[2] Formal and technical defects, such as uncertainty and indefiniteness, pleading legal conclusions, etc., which are waived by pleading to the merits and going to trial, can never be taken advantage of by objection to the introduction of evidence.[3] Where one party takes issue upon an allegation in the admission of evidence to be reviewed on exception and corrected like any other ruling. Iron River v. Bayfield County, 106 Wis. 587, 82 N. W. 559.

One who pleads to the merits and goes to trial without demurring greatly impairs his right to question the sufficiency of facts stated in the complaint by objection to the introduction of any evidence, since it is only when a pleading is incapable of being made good by amendment that the court should entertain the objection and the court will indulge every reasonable presumption in favor of the complaint. Strait v. Eureka, 17 S. D. 326, 96 N. W. 695.

When rule invoked.— The rule that where a complaint is first attacked by an objection to evidence, it should be most liberally construed, can only be invoked where such an objection has been overruled, the action tried on its merits, and the imperfections of the pleading cured by proper proof. Bon Homme County v. McLouth, 19 S. D. 555, 104 N. W. 256.

All material allegations admitted to be true. — On the argument of an objection to the admission of evidence in behalf of plaintiff for the reason that the complaint discloses no cause of action, the court will assume every material allegation of the objectionable pleading as having been admitted to be true in fact. J. Cure by Verdict or Judgment[6] — 1. General Consideration — a. Statement of Rule. The phrase "cured by verdict" means that the court will, after verdict, presume that the particular averment omitted from or defectively stated in the pleadings was duly proved at the trial.[7] Such intendment must arise not merely from the verdict but from the united effect of the verdict and the issue upon which the verdict was given.[8] And the particular thing which is presumed to have been proved must always be such as the allegations of the record require to be proved, and such as can therefore be implied from those allegations by fair and reasonable intendment.[9] And on the other hand, a verdict for the party in whose favor such intendment is made is indispensably necessary, for it is in consequence of such verdict, and in order to support it, that the court is induced to put a liberal construction upon the allegations in the record.[10] But nothing is to be intended after verdict but what is expressly stated in the declaration, or necessarily implied from the facts which are stated.[11] Or, in other words,

Another statement of the rule.— "It is said in the court of King's Bench: 'Where matter is so essentially necessary to be proved, that, had it not been given in evidence, the jury could not have given such a verdict, then the want of stating that matter in express terms in a declaration, provided it contains terms sufficiently general to comprehend it in fair and reasonable intendment, will be cured by a verdict; and where a general allegation must, in fair construction, so far require to be restricted, that no judge and no jury could have properly treated it in an unrestrained sense, it may reasonably be presumed, after verdict, that it was so restrained at the trial.'" Jackson v. Pesked, 1 M. & S. 234, 14 Rev. Rep. 417 [quoted in Richardson v. Farmer, 36 Mo. 35, 45, 88 Am. Dec. 129; McLean v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 13 N. Brunsw. 179].

The statutes of jeofails often contain the provision that where a verdict has been rendered, the judgment thereon shall not be reversed for the omission of any allegation or averment without proving which the triers of the issue ought not to have given such a verdict. ing or judgment by the court where no jury is employed is equivalent, for the purpose of curing defects, to a verdict.[14]

b. Dependent on Failure to Object. The doctrine of cure by verdict applies only when no objection has been made to the defects. Thus there is no cure by verdict where the evidence is introduced over the other party's objection that it is incompetent under the pleadings and exceptions are duly saved.[15] When the defect has first been questioned by demurrer and such demurrer has been erroneously overruled the doctrine of aider by verdict has been held not to apply.[16] Nor is a defect cured by the verdict when the question of the sufficiency of the pleadings is raised by a request for a peremptory instruction.[17]

c. Defects in Collateral Parts of Pleadings. As the verdict is supported on the ground that it is presumed that the facts defectively stated or omitted were proved because they were necessary to be proved in order to warrant such a verdict, no facts will be presumed to have been proved excepting those which were involved in the issue on which such verdict was given; and therefore it has uniformly been held that a defect, omission, or imperfection in some collateral part of the pleading that was not in issue between the parties, so that there was no room to presume that the defect or omission was supplied by proof, is not aided by the verdict.[18] But such a defect is remedied by the statute of jeofails.[19]

d. In Case of Judgment by Default. No such presumptions will be indulged in favor of a pleading after a default judgment as after a trial and verdict.[20] In such cases the introduction of proof is not required, and the judgment would not therefore show that plaintiff had made out a case on which he was entitled to recover.[21] In the case of a default judgment nothing can be presumed but what appears on the face of the pleading,[22] and therefore such a judgment operates only in aid of formal defects,[23] such as, by way of concrete illustrations, want of profert,[24] variance between the instrument declared on and that produced on oyer,[25] or errors or irregularities in filing papers.[26] It will not supply the omission of allegations or cure defects therein,[27] nor will it cure an entire failure to state a cause of action or defense.[28] In some states, however, the statute of jeofails has placed a judgment by default on the same footing as a verdict.[29]

2. Nature of Defects or Omissions Cured — a. In General. Many defects in a declaration or complaint, which on demurrer would be regarded as fatal to the pleading, will be deemed to be cured by a verdict for plaintiff, if defendant go to trial without demurring.[30] Some cases hold that whenever the defects in the pleading are such as may be obviated by evidence on the trial, even though the pleading might have been held fatally defective on general demurrer, they will be held cured by the verdict and judgment.[31] Where a pleading contains irregularities or defects which would have been amendable had objection been made thereto at the proper time, such irregularities or defects are cured by the verdict or judgment.[32] In other words, every amendment which ought to have been made will be deemed to have been made after verdict.[33]

jeofails.[54] By "misconception of the form of an action," such statute refers only to cases wherein, on trial, the proof shows a cause of action fit to be asserted in a form different from that adopted.[55]

d. Misjoinder of Causes of Action. At common law a misjoinder of counts upon which the same judgment cannot be rendered is a fatal defect and cannot be cured by a general verdict on the whole declaration,[56] but the rule is otherwise under the statutes of amendments and jeofails.[57] It has, however, been held, at the common law, that in some cases the misjoinder will be aided by intendment, as by taking damages under but one count, or by entering a remittitur of damages so as to recover but for one cause of action, or where the verdict is for plaintiff on the counts well joined and for defendant on the others.[58]

e. Misnomer. A misnomer in plaintiff's name in the complaint and summons is cured by a verdict and judgment rendered in plaintiff's favor by his proper name.[59] So misnaming defendant in the introductory part of the declaration is cured by verdict, especially where defendant has pleaded in bar by his right name.[60] But the verdict or judgment in an action will not cure a defect in the name of a party unless the correct name of the party has once been rightly stated.[61]

(II) Want of Replication or Reply. Whether the want of a replication or reply is cured by verdict is a question upon which the courts are about evenly divided, it being held by some that the omission is cured,[63] by others that it is not.[64]

(III) Want of Pleadings Subsequent to Replication. By the weight of authority failure to rejoin to plaintiff's replication or reply is cured either by verdict or the statute of jeofails.[65]

g. Wrong Pleas. Several cases exist of bad pleas which are cured by verdict. The test is whether the pleas, although bad on demurrer because wrong in form, still contain enough of substance to put in issue all the material parts of the declaration.[66]

h. Assignment of Breach. Where a contract is sufficiently set forth, any defect or inaccuracy in assigning the breach is aided after verdict, for the court will intend that damages could not have been given if a good breach had not been shown.[67]

sideration is necessary to a cause of action, failure to set it forth will not be cured by verdict.[68] But a defective statement of a valid consideration will be so aided.[69] Where facts are set forth in a declaration which show a legal liability on the part of defendant to plaintiff, a defect in not alleging a promise is cured by verdict.[70]

j. Averment of Value and Damages. Failure to allege the value of property [71] or to lay damages [72] in a declaration will be cured by verdict. The omission is, at most, but an imperfect statement of the facts which constitute the cause of action. Where the action is for injuries sustained by a public nuisance, there must be a specific averment of the special damage, and the defect of such omitted averment is not cured by verdict; for, since the special injury is the gist of the action, unless alleged and proved, no cause of action exists.[73]

k. Averment of Negligence and Contributory Negligence. In actions for damages for negligence, defects, and omissions in the pleadings, in substance or form, are cured by the verdict, where the issues joined are such as necessarily require proof of the facts so defectively presented, and without which proof it is not to be presumed the verdict would have been given.[74] Thus generality of statement as to negligence or contributory negligence will be cured by verdict.[75] So failure of plaintiff to allege that he was in the exercise of due care,[76] and failure to allege that defendant knew or ought to have known of the danger,[77] are such defects of pleading as are cured by verdict. But if the declaration omits to allege any substantial fact which is essential to a right of action and which is not implied in or inferable from the findings of those which are alleged, a verdict for plaintiff does not cure the defect.[78]

l. Averment of Time. If no time is alleged in the declaration,[79] or it is mis-that the failure of a declaration for damages caused by a public nuisance to set out special injury is cured by verdict, if it allege generally that plaintiff was damnified.

stated,[80] or an impossible time is alleged,[81] the defect will be cured by verdict or judgment. The cause of action must, however, be shown to have accrued before the commencement of the suit, and if it appear otherwise from the record, the defect is fatal, and is not cured by verdict.[82]

m. Averment of Title. A verdict will cure a defect in the mode of stating a title, but not one in the title itself.[83]

n. Variance. Immaterial variances between pleadings and proofs, which might have been cured by amendment and which do not prejudice the other party,[84]

Derivation.— The word "pledge" has a legal and well-defined interpretation. It may be derived, says Cowell, from "'the Freneh pleige, fidejussor; pleiger aucun, i. e. fidejuberé pro aliquo. In the same signification is plegius used by Glanv. lib. 10, e. 5, and plegiatio, for the act of suretiship. In the Interpreter of the Grand Custumary of Normandy, c. 60, plegii dicuntur personæ quæ se obligant ad hoc, ad quod qui eos mittit, tenebatur.' 'Pledgery,' Cowell defines to be 'suretiship, an undertaking, or answering for.'" applied to transactions in which the thing pledged as such additional security is a chose in action.[9]

E. Hypothec; Hypothecation. "Hypothec" is a civil law term meaning the giving of a lien on property to be delivered thereafter.[10] Such property is said to be hypothecated.[11]

II. Requisites and Validity.

A. Nature and Elements of Pledge — 1. In General. The three elements necessary to constitute a contract one of pledge are: (1) The possession of the pledged property must pass from the pledgor to the pledgee or to some one for him;[12] (2) the legal title to the pledged property must remain in the pledgor;[13] (3) the pledgee must have a lien on the property for the payment of a debt or performance of an obligation due him by the pledgor or some other person.[14] And every contract by which the possession of personal property is transferred as security only is to be deemed a pledge.[15] But the agreement that property is to be held as a pledge must be clearly expressed or implied,[16] and a mere loose understanding,[17] or statements by one party, to which the other does not assent,[18] are not sufficient to constitute a contract of pledge.

2. What Law Governs. The validity of a contract of pledge and the rights of the parties under it is determined by the law of the place where the pledged property

Mere statement that articles are "pledged" or "hypothecated" does not necessarily make transaction a pledge. The real essence of

is situated at the time of the contract,[19] or by the law of the state where the contract is made and is to be executed,[20] even though the principal contract to which the pledge is collateral is to be performed in another state and is governed by the laws of that state.[21]

3. Margin Purchases. A contract by which a stockbroker purchases stock or bonds for a customer under an agreement by which the customer is to furnish a certain margin of security, and keep the same good when called on, and in the event of a non-compliance, the broker is to close the account by a public or private sale, creates the relation of pledgor and pledgee between the customer and the broker.[22] But where a contract is made by a commission merchant to purchase for a customer grain to be delivered at a future time, which is in the merchant's name, and agreeing to keep the margin good up to the time of delivery, the relation of pledgor and pledgee is not created.[23]

4. Distinguished From Other Transactions — a. In General. In distinguishing a pledge from other transactions, courts will endeavor to ascertain from the contract the intention of the parties and to give it effect.[24]

b. Antichresis. Antichresis is a term of the civil law meaning a delivery of real property as security for a debt.[25] It differs from a pledge in that the security consists of real property or immovables, and from a mortgage in that the possession of the property is transferred to the creditor.[26]

c. Lien.[27] A pledge is distinguished from a common-law lien in that a contract of pledge implies the pledgee's right to sell on default of the pledgor, while a mere lienor has no authority to sell, but is confined to the right to retain until payment.[28]

d. Sale.[29] Pledge differs from sale in that possession [30] but not title [31] passes in case of pledge,[32] while in a sale title passes to the vendee,[33] and transfer of possession may [34] or may not [35] be made. Also where no certain value is placed on the articles delivered,[36] or they are assigned to secure an amount less than their acknowledged value,[37] or there is no agreement to receive the articles in satisfaction of the debt,[38] or where the transfer of the property is collateral to the execution of a note[39] or the payment of a draft [40] the contract is one of pledge and not of sale.[41]

e. Conditional Sale.[42] The most important distinction between a pledge and a conditional sale is that in a contract of pledge the legal title remains in the pledgor,[43] while in a conditional sale title passes to the vendee, with a reservation to the vendor, of a right to repurchase the property at a fixed price and specified time.[44] A contract by which property is transferred by a debtor to his creditor as a security for his debt, with a provision that, if the debt is not paid at maturity, the creditor shall become the owner of the property is, in some states, enforced as a conditional

A pledge is a lien, but also more than a lien. —Jackson v. Kincaid, 4 Okla. 554, 46 Pac. 587. See also Jacobs v. Knapp, 50 N. H. 71, holding that, by the principles of the common law, a man who has the lawful possession of a thing, and has expended his money or labor upon it at the request of the owner, has a lien upon the property, and a right to retain possession of it until his demand is satisfied. This lien is in the nature of a pledge by the owner of the property to the party with whom he contracts for labor to be bestowed upon it.

Privilege distinguished.— "Privilege" and "pledge" are totally different things; privilege being a right which the nature of a debt gives to a creditor which enables him to be preferred before other creditors, even those who have mortgages. But a pledge is a contract by which a debtor gives something to his creditor as a security for his debts. Carroll v. Bancker, 43 La. Ann. 1078, 1194, 10 So. 187.

f. Assignment For Benefit of Creditors.[48] An assignment for the benefit of creditors differs from a pledge,[49] not only in that the legal title passes to the assignee,[50] but also in that it must include all the debtor's property [51] and must be made for the benefit of his creditors generally,[52] while a pledge is made to secure a particular debt, or particular debts,[53] and may consist either of a part,[54] or the whole,[55] of the debtor's personal property.[56]

The authorities show that the difference between a pledge or pawn of personal chattels and a mortgage of them is, that a mortgage passes the whole legal interest and property from the mortgagor to the mortgagee, and possession by the mortgagee is not essential to create his title, and, generally speaking, is inconsistent with such a title, while a pledge transfers only a special property in the thing pledged, the general property continuing in the pledgor. The pledgee's right is not complete until he has obtained possession, and his right or special property is to hold the pledge as security for the debt or engagement of the pledgor, and on default on the day appointed for payment or performance, to sell the pledge. Securities for money and negotiable instruments may be given in pledge, and the addition, as there is in the agreement here, of an express power to sell on default, will not change what would have been a pledge into a mortgage. Donald v. Suckling, L. R. 1 Q. B. 585, 7 B. & S. 783, 12 Jur. N. S. 795, 35 L. J. Q. B. 232, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 772, 15 Wkly. Rep. 13, 21 Eng. Rul. Cas. 301; Franklin v. Neate, 14 L. J. Exch. 59, 13 M. & W. 481. A pledgee may apply to a court of equity for an order for the sale of the goods pledged, but, as was pointed out in Carter v. Wake, 4 Ch. D. 605, 46 L. J. Ch. 841, and in Ex p. Hubbard, 17 Q. B. D. 690, 55 L. J. Q. B. 490, 59 L. T. Rep. N. S. 172 note, 3 Morr. Bankr. Cas. 246, 35 Wkly. Rep. 2, the position of a pledgee and pledgor in this court differ entirely from those of a mortgagee and mortgagor. In Ex p. Hubbard, supra, p. 702, Bowen, L. J., said: "No doubt a pledgee may in some cases enforce his charge in a Court of Equity, but in that case the relief which the Court of Equity would give would not be in respect of 'a right in equity,' but would be equitable relief in respect of a legal right." And in Carter v. Wake, supra, Jessel, M. R., held that a pledgee has not the right of foreclosure that a mortgagee has, but only the right to have the pledge sold.

(iii) Delivery of Bill of Sale. The delivery of a bill of sale or bill of parcels, absolute on its face, with the intention that it shall operate as a security, constitutes not a mortgage, but a pledge.[68] But if it contains a defeasance clause,[69] is accompanied by the delivery of a separate writing containing a defeasance clause,[70] or is accompanied by a parol agreement of the creditor to hold the property as security for a debt contracted at the time of its execution,[71] it is a mortgage.

Y.) 106; Irving Park Assoc. v. Watson, 41 Oreg. 95, 67 Pac. 945; Mitchell v. Roberts, 17 Fed. 776, 5 McCrary 425. "The assignment was absolute in form, but the thing assigned is a chose in action, and the assignment and delivery are necessary to give the pledgee the full authority to readily control it, and afford a prompt means of making the pledge available. For these reasons the fact that the title passes in form by the assignment, in case of a chose in action, does not necessarily make it a mortgage." Gay v. Moss, 34 Cal. 125, 132. "With respect to goods and chattels it is in most cases very easy to apply this distinction, but with respect to choses in action which cannot be otherwise delivered, the fact that title passes does not necessarily create a mortgage. To constitute a mortgage the title must be conveyed, but it is not in all cases a mortgage because the title is conveyed. Thus a transfer of stock may be absolute, but still if its object and character are qualified and explained by a contemporaneous paper which forms a part of the contract, and declares it to be a deposit of the stock as collateral security for the payment of a loan, and there is nothing in the contract to work a forfeiture of the right to redeem or otherwise defeat it, except by a lawful sale under the power expressly conferred in the agreement, the transaction will be regarded as a pledge." The capital stock of a corporate company is not capable of manual delivery. The scrip or certificate may be delivered, but that of itself does not carry with it the stockholder's interest in the corporate funds. . . . It may be that nothing short of the transfer of the title on the books of the company would have been sufficient to give the defendants the absolute possession of the stock and to secure them against a transfer to some other person."

h. Assignment in Trust. An assignment in trust differs from a pledge in that the title passes,[72] from a mortgage in that the assignment is not made to the creditor to be secured,[73] and from an assignment for the benefit of creditors in that it is not a transfer of all the debtor's property to secure his creditors generally.[74]

j. Question For Jury. Where there is a conflict of evidence in regard to the intentions of the parties as to whether a transfer of property should constitute a pledge or another transaction, the question is one for the jury,[76] under instructions from the court.

5. Property That May Be the Subject of Pledge — a. In General. Any valuable thing of a personal nature,[77] whether chattels, such as goods,[78] money,[79] and manuscripts,[80] or choses in action, such as accepted bills of exchange,[81] notes,[82] bonds,[83] mortgages,[84] debts,[85] certificates of stock,[86] leases of real estate,[87] patent rights,[88] insurance policies,[89] and benefit certificates in a benevolent association.[90] Where the property is not in existence, it cannot be the subject of a pledge;[91] but the agreement will be construed as a contract for a pledge,[92] and a lien in favor of the creditor will attach when the property comes into existence.[93]

b. Personal Obligation of Principal Debtor. One personal obligation of a debtor cannot become a pledge or collateral security for another obligation of the same debtor.[94]

6. Title or Interest of Pledgor. A debtor may pledge any interest that he owns in property,[95] and the pledgee will take such property subject to the liens, whether legal [96] or equitable [97] of other parties existing at the time. With the consent of the owner, a debtor may also make a valid pledge of property in which he has no interest.[98] But in the absence of the owner's consent,[99] or of his participation in the fraud of the pledgor,[1] a pledge by one who has no interest in the property is void as against the owner.[2]

7. Ratification of Unauthorized Pledge. Where the owner of property which has been pledged by another without his authority,[3] after being informed of the unauthorized pledge,[4] approves it,[5] this constitutes a ratification of the original pledge [6] and makes it valid.[7]

8. Debts and Liabilities That May Be Secured.[8] A pledge may be made not only to secure debts and obligations created at the time of delivery,[9] but also to secure preëxisting debts,[10] future loans and advances,[11] and contingent liabilities.[12]

9. Consideration. The law is very liberal in regard to the consideration required to support a pledge.[13] Accordingly it has been held that such consideration may consist not only of a loan of money,[14] a discount of notes,[15] or of an obligation assumed by the pledgee at the time of the pledge.[16] but also of a surrender or exchange [17] of property already held as collateral,[18] or an extension of time for the payment of a debt,[19] and even of a preëxisting debt [20] without any new consideration.[21] In this latter respect, the contract of pledge is an exception to the general rule in regard to the consideration required for the validity of contracts.[22]

10. Pledge in Writing. As a general rule no writing is necessary to the validity of a pledge,[23] and statutes requiring a writing for the validity of sales or mortgages [24] do not apply to pledges.[25] But in some states a pledge of incorporeal property, such as debts, negotiable instruments, and stocks, is required to be in writing.[26]

11. Equitable Pledge. Where there is a contract for a pledge, which, however, does not constitute a valid pledge because of the lack of some requisite,[27] as the non-existence of the property to be pledged,[28] or a want of delivery [29] the contract is said to create an equitable pledge [30] which a court of equity will enforce between the parties [31] and against the general creditors of the pledgor,[32] but not against subsequent bona fide purchasers or pledgees for value.[33]

12. Absolute Transfer as Pledge.[34] A bill of sale [35] or other absolute transfer of property [36] will be construed as a pledge where it appears from the instrument itself [37] or from other evidence, either written [38] or parol,[39] that it was intended as a security only.

13. Evidence as to Nature of Transactions — a. Presumption. In case of doubt whether a transaction by which personal property is given as security is a pledge, or is a sale, mortgage,[40] or absolute assignment,[41] the law favors the conclusion that it is a pledge. But in the case of an assignment absolute on its face, the burden of proof is on the party alleging that it is a pledge.[42]

b. Admissibility. Parol evidence is admissible to show that an assignment of property, absolute on its face, is in reality only a pledge [43] given to secure the assignee. So also parol evidence is admissible to explain the terms of a receipt given upon the delivery of property.[44] But where the writing amounts to a contract or agreement between the parties, it is subject to the rule that parol evidence cannot be introduced to vary or contradict the terms of a valid written contract.[45]

c. Weight and Sufficiency. Upon a question whether an ambiguous transaction constitutes a pledge, the writings, if any, accompanying the transaction,[46] the oral statements of the parties made at the time,[47] or afterward,[48] and any collateral circumstances tending to show the intentions of the parties [49] are entitled to con-

distinguishes it from a mortgage,[67] as in the latter case there is no necessity for delivery to the mortgagee.[68]

3. SUFFICIENCY — a. Manner of Delivery— (i) IN GENERAL. The delivery of possession of the goods to the pledgee may be actual, constructive,[69] or symbolical;[70] but it must be clear, unequivocal,[71] complete,[72] and effective[73] at all times[74] so as to give notice to third parties of the pledgee's rights. And it is sufficient if possession is delivered to a third person and afterward assented to by the pledgee.[75] Delivery in accordance with the terms of a previous contract[76] supplies the necessary element to render the pledge complete.[77] A mere agreement by the debtor that the creditor shall take and hold certain property as security for his debt is insufficient.[78]

Delivery of samples to the agent of the creditor to facilitate sales of the goods by him on behalf of the debtor is not a deliv-

in a savings bank by delivery of the pass-book;[89] or as by pointing out logs in a boom,[90] is sufficient. Or, if the property being present, is committed by the pledgor to the exclusive control and charge of the pledgee,[91] especially if this is followed by an act of dominion or possession[92] by the pledgee or his agent, this will suffice. But a bare agreement of the parties is never equivalent to a fictitious or symbolical delivery.[93]

b. Time of Delivery. A pledge takes effect upon delivery of the property and its validity is not affected by the fact that the contract for the creation thereof was made prior thereto.[94]

c. Possession by Agent of Pledgee — (i) In General. The delivery may be made to an agent[95] or trustee[96] of the pledgee, or to a third person to hold for him;[97] and such third person may even be an agent, clerk, or servant of the

A warehouse company, being engaged in advancing cash on security of a pledge of merchantable commodities, loaned one hundred and fifty thousand dollars on collateral notes of a corporation, taking from it leases of portions of its premises on which the personal property given as security was situated, and under contract with the corporation appointed an employee of the corporation as custodian thereof. The custodian took possession and maintained thereon placards plainly indicating that the warehouse company was specially interested in the personal property. Bank v. Harkness, 42 W. Va. 156, 24 S. E. 548, 32 L. R. A. 408 (holding that where a debtor ordered his agent in writing to hold to the order of the creditor his stock of lubricating oil stored in a certain oil tank in possession of the agent as collateral security for the debt, the indorsement on the order by the agent of an acceptance thereof transferred the possession of the oil to the creditor, so that the oil was thereby pledged for the payment of the debt).

An agreement for a pledge, accompanied by an order on a third person for the delivery of the property, is insufficient against a subsequent attaching creditor, where the pledgee failed to take actual possession. Rowell v. Clagett, 69 N. H. 201, 41 Atl. 173.

Where the vendee of goods leaves them in the vendor's warehouse, and gives a pledgee an order for them on the vendor, which is accepted, this is a sufficient delivery, and it is not affected by the removal of the goods to another warehouse by the vendor with the vendee's consent. 1. Delivery by pledgor to his agent with instructions to deliver to the pledgee is not

(II) Pledgor as Agent of Pledgee. At common law a change of possession such as is required for the validity of a pledge is not effected where the pledgor is left in control of the property,[2] even though under an agreement by which he is to hold [3] or manage [4] the property as agent for the pledgee. But under exceptional circumstances where a transfer of possession is impossible because of the nature of the property [5] or where the pledgor is left in possession by the pledgee for a special purpose,[6] the pledge has been upheld.[7]

d. Written Instruments — (I) In General. Where property is represented by an instrument in writing, such as a warehouse receipt, elevator receipt, wharfinger's receipt, bill of lading, promissory note, bill of exchange, certificate of stock, or obligation or claim upon other persons, a valid pledge of the property may be effected by a transfer of such instrument.[8]

(II) Bills of Lading. The delivery of a bill of lading as security for an advance of money is a sufficient delivery of the goods for which the bill of lading was issued to sustain the pledge.[9] sufficient (Citizens' Bank v. Janin, 46 La. Ann. 995, 15 So. 471), even though such instructions are communicated to the pledgee (Lanaux's Succession, 46 La. Ann. 1036, 15 So. 708, 25 L. R. A. 577).

(III) Warehouse Receipts.[10] Where goods have been deposited in a regular warehouse and a warehouse receipt issued therefor a delivery of the receipt is regarded as a symbolical delivery of the goods themselves [11] and is sufficient to sustain a pledge of the goods. And at common law a warehouseman, having property of his own in store, may make a pledge of it to secure a debt, by executing and delivering an ordinary warehouse receipt, which will be valid against subsequent creditors; [12] but under statutes in some states,[13] a receipt issued by the owner of goods stored in his own warehouse or store is not regarded as a warehouse receipt at all, and its delivery by the owner to a creditor does not effect a valid pledge of the goods.[14]

United States.— Dows v. Milwaukee Nat. Exch. Bank, 91 U. S. 618, 23 L. ed. 214.

See 40 Cent. Dig. tit. "Pledges," § 37.

Delivery is sufficient without assignment or indorsement.— Petitt v. Memphis First Nat. Bank, 4 Bush (Ky.) 334; Toms v. Whitmore, 6 Wyo. 220, 44 Pac. 56, where goods which the consignor had agreed to pledge as a security for a bona fide debt were delivered to a carrier for transportation to the pledgee, under a bill of lading expressly naming him as consignee, there was a valid delivery of the pledge.

Where the bill of lading is delivered to a bank as pledgee for advances, the fact that the goods are addressed to the order of the consignee does not give such consignee priority over the bank. Richardson v. Nathan, 167 Pa. St. 513, 31 Atl. 740.

But a factor cannot make a valid pledge of goods belonging to his principal by delivery of a bill of lading for advances on his own account. Lallande v. His Creditors, 42 La. Ann. 705, 7 So. 895.

E. 752; Blanc v. Germania Nat. Bank, 114 La. 739, 38 So. 537; St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Ross, 9 Mo. App. 399.

Notice to the warehouseman is not necessary. Citizens' Banking Co. v. Peacock, 103 Ga. 171, 29 S. E. 752; Cartwright v. Wilmerding, 24 N. Y. 521 (holding that the custody which the officers of customs have of goods in a bonded warehouse is not a possession, but rather a restraint upon removal vested in the government to secure payment of duties, and such property may be pledged by the owner on delivery of the warehouse receipt issued by the warehouseman); Whitney v. Tibbits, 17 Wis. 359.

A written assignment of warehouse receipts as security is valid without actual delivery, where such receipts are held by another creditor as collateral and the first pledgee is notified of the subsequent assignment. Hunt v. Bode, 66 Ohio St. 255, 64 N. E. 126; Matter of Stothfang, 20 Ohio Cir. Ct. 275, 11 Ohio Cir. Dec. 103.

But where the property mentioned in the receipt is not in possession of the warehouseman or the party who attempts to pledge it, the delivery of the receipt conveys no interest whatever. Commercial Bank v. Flower, 116 Ga. 219, 42 S. E. 474.

That the goods represented by the warehouse receipt are part of a large mass does not render the delivery of the receipt ineffectual. Merchants', etc., Bank v. Hibbard, 48 Mich. 118, 11 N. W. 834, 42 Am. Rep. 465.

Where the receipt is issued by one who holds the property in store for the owner, it is not necessary that the person issuing it be strictly a warehouseman under the statutory definition of a warehouseman. Porter v. Shotwell, 105 Mo. App. 177, 79 S. W. 728; Union Trust Co. v. Wilson, 198 U. S. 530, 25 S. Ct. 766, 49 L. ed. 1154, holding that the indorsement to a third person, as security for loans, of a receipt issued by a warehouse company for goods kept under lock and key in a place leased by it from the owner of the goods, which receipt recites that it received the property on storage, "[to be] delivered only upon surrender of this receipt properly endorsed and payment of all charges thereon," is a sufficient delivery as against attaching creditors of the owner to validate the transaction as a pledge, whether the receipt is to be deemed a public warehouse receipt under Ill. Rev. St. c. 114, § 2, or not.

Under statutes.— The delivery of the warehouse receipts for property pledged is not such delivery of the property as is required by Code, § 2138, to constitute the bailment valid as against a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, and will enable the pledgee to maintain an action of trover against the purchaser from the pledgor, a factor or warehouseman. (iv) Bills and Notes. A valid pledge of bills and notes is effected by simple delivery of them to the creditor,[15] and indorsement or other writing is not necessary.[16] A pledge by a written assignment of a note at the time in the possession of a third person has been upheld,[17] but has also been declared void [18] on the ground that possession is the very essence of a valid pledge.

(v) Stocks and Bonds. A valid pledge of bonds and shares of stock is effected by delivery of the bonds [19] and stock certificates [20] without written indorsement or assignment.[21] No transfer of the stock on the books of the corporation is necessary.[22] An agreement,[23] even though in writing,[24] and under seal,[25] that certain stocks and bonds of the debtor shall be collateral security for a debt due the creditor is without effect in the absence of a delivery of the stocks and bonds.[26]

(vi) Insurance Policies. Insurance policies also may be pledged by simple delivery, without written assignment.[27]

III. Construction and Operation.

A. In General — 1. Operation and Effect — a. In General. The delivery of a pledge does not affect the rights of the parties under the contract or obligation it is given to secure,[28] except as it provides an additional security, and as the parties may contract by special agreement.[29] Where such special agreements have been made, they will be construed so as to effectuate the intentions of the parties,[30] and will be strictly enforced.[31] or by setting up the title of a third person to the property pledged to him by the pledgor.[34]

c. Implied Warranty by Pledgor. The pledgor, by the act of pledging, impliedly engages that he is the general owner of the property pledged,[35] unless it particularly appears in the contract that he has a lessor interest in the property.[36] And if he pledges as his own property that does not belong to him, he is estopped from setting up a title to it subsequently acquired by him during the existence of the pledge.[37]

2. Property or Interest Pledged. Upon a pledge of property, the pledgee acquires all the interest which the pledgor owns in the property [38] so far as necessary for his security. While he takes the property subject to any liens on it existing at the time of the pledge,[39] he is also entitled to the benefit of any liens by which it may be secured.[40] Where the pledge is in writing [41] the usual rules of interpretation control descriptions of the property pledged.[42]

3. Title to Property Pledged. Upon a contract of pledge, the general property in the things pledged remains in the pledgor,[43] while a special property passes to may forfeit his interest or special property in the pledged property by a wrongful conversion of it.[49]

4. Nature and Extent of Lien. The creditor may hold several pledges from the same or different [50] pledgors, and is not bound to part with any of the property so held until the discharge of all the obligations it has been given to secure.[51] The pledge constitutes a security not only for the principal debt,[52] but also for the interest,[53] for an obligation substituted by agreement by the parties for the original obligation,[54] for any expenses reasonably incurred by the pledgee in the transportation [55] or care of the property pledged.[56] But if the property has been deposited to secure one debt, it cannot, in the absence of a special agreement,[57] be held by the pledgee as security for other obligations.[58] The lien of the pledgee covers not only the property pledged, but also any increase of the property, such as dividends on stock,[59] or interest on bonds.[60] Upon enforcement of the pledge by collection or sale of the collateral the pledgee is entitled to retain only so much of the proceeds as is necessary to discharge his debt, and must turn the balance over to the pledgor.[61]

it to him had no title or interest in it,[90] as a finder,[91] or a thief.[92] The pledgee's possession of negotiable instruments payable to bearer is prima facie evidence of title, and creates a presumption that he acquired them in good faith, for value, without notice, and in the usual course of business;[93] but upon evidence that the pledgor's possession was obtained from the owner through fraud,[94] or that they were fraudulently put in circulation,[95] the burden is upon the pledgee to prove that he took them in good faith, for value, before maturity, without notice, and in the usual course of business. So the pledgee of a stock certificate with a written transfer and power of attorney thereon in blank, signed by the person to whom the certificate was issued [96] or his legal representatives,[97] is recognized as a bona fide purchaser for value; but not where the certificates show on their face that the pledgor holds them as trustee.[98] The pledgee of a note or a mortgage takes subject to equities between the maker or mortgagor of which he had notice at the time of the pledge,[99] although not to those of which he had no notice,[1] even though he may receive such notice later.
